Y most Honoured Lords, Such is the indulgence of many men, especially Paper-walters, to their owne imperfections; that when they are receiued with Fauour, and sometimes Pittie, they value them to bee iust such things, as the Mercy and Grace of those, to whom they were giuen, hath made them: And so, by the prosperitie of one fault, become confident to commit the second. I am afrayd to be found in this List: that, hauing about me a conscience of trespasse in my first Dedication of this TRANSLATION to your Honours, dare yet attempt you with the latter: All that will saue me in the Imputation, is, that I did then dedicate my selfe, with my vtmost abilities: From which, the fraylties that accompany Humanity, Errors, are not easily separated. Yet, if in this second Edition they appeare lesse, either by mine owne indolence, or Printers, though not all found and weeded; that very study of bettering and handsoming the WORKE, wil (I hope) commend both it and me, to your LL. fauour: which Fauour (next to diuine Grace) I proclaime, to haue beene the chearing meane, and inspiring power, enabling me to these, and more, that shortly couet the Light vnder

AN

An aduertisement to the Reader.

Curteous Reader; It may bee, you will hold it strange, that (contrarie to the vsuall manner of Translators) I should set a new Epistle in the front of an old Booke: It is not to insinuate for more fauour, either in the behalfe of the Authour, the Printer, or my selfe. You haue bene pleased to read the worke, and I hope you haue liked it, for the Printer selles mee they are all sold, which is a good Testimony of your kinde Approbation. He hath therefore undertaken an other Impression, intreating me to take some paines to reuiew it, and to continew the History vnto these Times; wherevnto I was the more willingly drawne, for that I would not haue any other to put his sickle into my harvest, or to finish that which I had begunne.

This is only to giue you an account for what I haue done in this second Edition, and to satisfie you for some Alterations which you shall find in the course of the History; wherein some, happily, will say, I haue exceeded the Lawes of Translation. I haue in this second Edition, used two partes of Arithmetike, that is, Addition, and Substraction: for the first, whereas Iohn De Settes, (whom I onely acknowledge to bee mine Authour, vntill the Treaty of Veruins, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1598.) Making profession to write but an INVENTORY, did set downe euery action briefly and succinctlie, referring the Readers to the Originall, to bee there satisfied of all the circumstances more at large, and so happelie hath left them in suspense, beeing (as I presume) as desirous to know the manner, as the matter. I haue therefore endeouored in this Edition to ease the Reader of this labour and charge, and haue (out of the most approoued Authours that haue written of this subiect) added the reasons and circumstances of many things, which hee did but onely touch at, without any alteration of the subiect. This haue I chiefly obserued in matters of State, as Treaties, Compositions and Capitulations: wherevnto I haue added the Articles, that the Reader may not onely see what things were done, but may also know the reasons, and vpon what grounds they were concluded.

After the Treaty of Veruins, whereas Settes ends his INVENTORY, I haue tied my selfe to no certaine Authour, but haue collected it out of all the best that haue written of these later times, the which I haue continued vnto the Coronation of this young King. Wherevnto I haue added such Discourses, Conferences, Edicts, and Declarations, as haue past, the which I thought would giue some luster vnto the History, and content vnto the Reader. And thus much for my Addition. As for my Substraction, I haue taken the same course in this, as I did in my Netherland History, to make it perticular for France, else I might bee held so want discretion, making to great a Volume with vnecessary repetitions: I haue therefore as much as I could (especially in these later reignes) omitted all things that doe not concerne France, or the French, referring the Reader to the History of those countries where they were acted: as for the actions of the Low-countries, so the Netherland History & for the Turkeish warres, to its proper History, the which is very worthily written by Mr. Knowles. Concerning matters of Spaine, I referue them for a perticular History of that Country, the which if it please God to send mee life and health, you shall see published before the yeere passe aboue.

True it is that in the reignes of Charles the eight, Lewis the twelfth, and Francis the second, you shall finde much written of the warres of Italy, the which although they were acted vpon another Theater, yet were the French chiefe actors in those Tragedies. Neither could I well omit them without leauing an imputation of idlenesse vpon those generous Princes, who imploied a great part of their reignes in making warre there, for their pretentions to the Kingdome of Naples, and the Dutchy of Milan.

Thus much I thought good to aduertise you of my course in this second Edition, referring it to your kind and iudicious censures. And so I rest.

Yours.

IOHN DE SERRES, TOUCHING THE VSE of this his Inuentorie.

San Historie is the Theater of mans life, whereby all may <sup>The generall</sup> learne one common lesson, by the goodly examples, the repre- <sup>vic of histo-</sup> sents vnto their eyes, eares, and vnderstandings: Euen so thee <sup>ties.</sup> inuities all men to view, heare, and to conceiue them well, what language soeuer thee speakes, what subiect the treatates of, what time thee notes, and what person soeuer thee represents. Thus offering her selfe to all with this excellent vse, she deserves iustly to bee embraced, Experience verifying the testimonie which wise Antiquity doth giue her. That shee is the Mistresse of Mans Life, the Testimonie of Truth, the Recorder of Iustice, the resplendent Beames of Vertue, the Register of Honour, the Trumpet of Fame, the Examiner of Actions, the Comptrouler of all Times, the Rendez-vous of diuerse Euents, the Schoole of Good and Euill, and the Soueraigne Iudge of a l Men, and all Exploits. This praise is common to all Histories: But as in a generall action euery one ought to haue a more speciall eye of that which concernes his priuate duty: So in the generall History of all Nations, euery man is bound to bee more perticularly informed of that which toucheth himselfe, and instructed in the managing of the State, vnder which he is borne: By reason wherof I haue alwaies held the complaint of Thucydaides (one of the chiefe Architects of a History) very considerable, That it was a great shame for Grecians to bee Strangers in Greece; when as (busying themselves in forreine Histories) they were ignorant of their owne. May we not in like manner say, That it is a great shame that Frenchmen should be strangers in France: for why should the ignorance of our History bee more excusable in vs, then of theirs in them. Doubtlesse we often seeke for that a farte off, which is neere vnto as at home: I commend the diligence of our men in searching out of forreine Histories. But if it may be lawfull to speake of this subiect (as one of the common sort) I dare say there is no Nation vnder the cope of Heauen (without flattering my selfe with the loue of my Country) since Man was borne, that hath more admirable matters, or more worthy euents in euery kinde, and by consequence a History more memorable, then ours of France. Bee it for the forme of Gouernment: there was neuer Kingdome nor Common-weale established with goodlier lawes then our Monarchie. It is the true patterne of a perfect estate, such as the wise Politicians in former times vsed to discourse off in their Academie. A soueraigne Commander, with Authority absolutely soueraigne, but fortified with a power so well qualified with the Counterpoise of inferiour offices, as we may rightly call the French Monarchy, a mixture of all the lawfull governments of a common-weale, by a well gouerned proportion, if the lawes prescribed be well obserued, the which I haue (to that end) planted in the front of this building. Bee it for the greatnesse and strength of the State, although I know well that the foure Monarchies which commanded ouer Nations, had larger dominions then the French, yet was there neuer any Empire better vnited, better grounded, nor of longer continuance, more famous for the beautie and bounty of the soyle, situation of the country, Riches of the people, and excellencie of wittes, eyther in peace or warre. As for the greatnesse of her Prouinces, what is the French Monarchie, but diuerse kingdomes vnited in one, and sundry crownes annexed to one? But heerein it excels the rest, that although they all in generall hold as it were of the Church, yet ours hath heerein a more speciall priuiledge, hauing diueried from Europe that great deluge of Infidels, which threatned all Christendome with Shipwrack. To conclude, it yeelds to no Monarchy whatsoeuer, neither needs it any thing but good husbandry. As for worthy men, which be a liuing law, and as it were the soule of an estate, is there any nation whatsoeuer that can shew so many excellent personages, yea and Kings, as France may? There is no vanity more vaine, nor more vnworthy of a free minde, making profession of an History, wholly vowed to truth, then flattery. But the most strict Arcopagite that euer was, cannot deny, but our Monarchie may produce as many excellent Kings and Princes, as any other whatsoeuer. The three Races haue made shew in diuerse seasons: But the third had the continuance of a more temperate, for the establishing of an Estate. Let iudgment bee made by an vnpassionate tryall of their reignes and actions: to set downe Kings beautified with sundry graces, as necessitie required, valiant in warre, wise for counsell, resolute in aduersitie, milde to pardon faults, when as forgetfulnesse was necessary for the good of the State, and the quiet of the Realme.

What shall wee say of great and worthy euents, such as may chance to Man, beeing good or euill? Hath any Historic more rare examples then ours? eyther ordinary in the common sufferance of Prosperity or Aduersitie: or extraordinarie in the greatest, and most tragicall rare accidents that may bee noted in any other Nation: there was neuer State reduced into greater difficulties, both within and without the Realme, and not subuerted: And in these extreame dangers, what valiant resolutions! Truly our History sets downe in diuerse reignes, the courage and constancie of diuerse Kings and people: in shew conquered, in effect Conquerors: in that they neuer dispaired of the Common-weale, in the midst of their dispaire: what loue of Kings to their Subjects, and of Subjects to their Kings, in common calamities? Our Historie is full of examples, and of all things else considerable in the societie of Man, either in warre or peace, and which depends vpon their vertues, which gouerne the helme of this great Barke. But as wee cannot hide, nor deprive of their due praise, these goodly lights which shine in diuerse parts of our History, by the many examples of valour, equity, wisdom, magnanimity, modestie, dexterity, and other excellent vertues of our Kings, so to iudge thereof soundly, wee must flye to the Father of lights, who vsing these great and worthy personages for the building, preservation, or increase of this Monarchie, hath enriched them with great and pretious graces, that acknowledging him the author aswell of all these vertues, as of the happy successe of things managed by them, wee may learne to yeeld him homage, for the preservation, continuance, and increase of this great estate.

The negligence of our Kings hath too often brought our royall Diademe into danger, whereof they made themselves vnworthy, making it weake and contemptible in their persons, who (by their basenesse and childish gouernment) suffered their seruants to command absolutely. The kingdomes hath beene as it were dismembred by the diuision of royall commands. And by this meanes brothers deuided by strange and selfe-wild discensions, haue abandoned all to spoyle: and from these home-bred diuisions, haue sprung ciuill warres, amidst the which, the Inferiours (fishing in a troubled water) freed them-selues, and opposing against their Soueraigne, became petty Kings. Wee haue seene their rage extend farther, attempting against the Kings person, imprisoning him, forcing him to quit his crowne, and in the end reducing him to that extremity, as to dye desperately, seeing himselfe so outrageously intreated withall. Wee haue seene Kings prisoners in their enemies hands, and abandoned by their subiects, Kings besieged in their houses. Wee haue seene a poore young man appointed appointed to guide a ship (during the fury of a storme) without Helme, without Mast, without Sailes, and without Oares: beaten without by the tempest, and within by the Sayers: Seized on in his Cabin by madde men, imbrued with the blood of his most trusty seruants, murdered before his eyes, yea euen in his bosome. Wee haue seene the Crowne of Kings in their minorities, set to sale by their Tutors, who became murderers, and of Regents, Theeues, making themselves Kings: Wee haue seene a King in his non-age become madde, gouerned by the passions of Men and Women, holding the chiefe degrees in state, which did strue to ruine it with in-bred factions, rages, and populer tumults, by tragicall massacres, and furious hostilitie. Wee haue seene amidst these combustions, the Stranger not onely awaked at this brute, but also armed, entered within the Realme, and lodged within the bowels of the goodlyest Prouinces. And (which is more) installed in the Kings authority by the Ediſt of a lawfull King, seated in the royall throne, hauing the Crowne on his head, with the Scepter and Purse in his hand, and a Daughter of France in his bedde, for a pawne of this vniust pretension, a Sonne to warrant his possession, with the force and obedience of the Capitall City, and the first Princes of the blood armed with power and counsell to countenance these horrible confusions. Amidst these ruinous disorders of our Countrie, who hath preserved the realme of France, but hee that with one and the same hand, hath made both the lawe and the King of France?

O my Countrymen, it is to you to whome your History is directed, hauing the chiefe interest in the estate of our Mother, although Strangers are forced to admire it. But what? Our Ancestors haue seene all these things specified heere, and represented in particular in the discourse I now offer vnto you. But I beseech you what haue wee seene with our owne eyes, within these thirtie and five yeares? haue wee felt lesse misery, or found weaker remedies? What were our troubles, and to what extremitie were wee brought vnto of late yeares? By the conference of our History, with our Ancestors, ours serues as a Comentary for the well vnderstanding thereof, yet can wee not deny but our age hath seene things farre more extraordinary and miraculous: So as wee rightly may say, That wee haue liued in a time of Miracles: Without doubt our posterity will admire in particular the History of our time, as the rarest part of the whole body; we that haue seene it, should often belye our eares and eyes in reading or hearing it, when (thee shall appeare in publick to put vs in minde of that whereof wee were eye witnesses, and therefore witnesses about all exception: But euery thing must bee done in order and time. Behold the first part of my desseigne, which it behooues you to obserue: SHALL IT then bee in vaine, and without any fruit? it is not my intention, if the end of euery commendable enterprife be the Vse: Shall wee thinke that the knowledge of our ancient Estate is vnprofitable, and in a time when as wee haue so great need of consolation? Truly in the continuance of our long calamity, wee must needs bee oppressed with a troublesome care. But in feeling the paine, why seeke wee not the remedie? If wee often apply the example to things wee doe eyther without Lawe or against the Lawe, how much more should it auail vs being ioyned with Reason? An example rightly represented in the History of our Ancestors, serues vs now as a good guide to comfort vs, when as the like misery is common to vs and them. And if it please God to make vs like in condition, what reason haue wee to complaine? At the least wee may therein obserue, that not at this time alone France is afflicted, and hath shewed her indiscretion. So likewise by the same reason, it is not now alone that thee hath felt the succours of her Protector, who preserves her, amends her follyes, and repaires her defects: without this protecting hand, thee had long since perished. What shall wee then say? truly wee were much too blame to accuse our Fathers, and seeke to excuse our selues, of the like or greater errors: our waywardnesse were not pardonable, if our hearts should faint in these difficulties, seeing that wee learne in the same Historie, that our Fathers haue bin deliuered from the like afflictions. It is therefore a speciall vse of this Historie, to cast our eyes vpon the condition of our predecessors, to mollifie our languishings, as a necessary symptome of our inciuill warres, which like a continuall feauer hath sucked (euen to the marrow) all the vigour of this Estate, and hath not yet left it.

We must accuse our impatiencie and nicenesse, if we shall complaine to haue bin worse intreated then our fore-fathers, seeing we obserue in them the like afflictions. Experience laies goodly grounds to reason, this certain experience ingenders in our hearts hope of future things, without confusion or deceit. Doe we not then reap excellent fruits of this Historie? if by the deliuerance of our Fathers we conclude and hope for ours, but in such sort, and at such times, as the wise prouidence of God hath appointed; which ordinance, neither Enemies can hinder, nor Friends aduance: and therefore the direction of this truth doth teach vs to saile in this sea, euery one as he ought, according to his degree, expecting a happy harbor by the bountie & wisdom of him that rules the waues of humane confusions, as the soueraigne Iudge, holding in his hands, both the hearts of men, and the euents of things. Doe we grieue at our long troubles? let vs read the reigns of John, Charles the first, Charles the first, & Charles the seuenth: do we repine at our late losses? let vs read the raigne of Philip of Valois, & we shall see that the losse of the same city was deerer to him then to vs. As we may neuer disseemble our losses, so is there a time to loose, & a time to gaine, if in our houses in the country or city, all things succeed not as we desire, who can with reason require always the like successe in a State? To conclude, if to flatter the disease be no means to cure it, or to complaine without remedie, (seeing that choller and despair brings no helpe to the diseased) let vs rather seeke for remedie, then increase the disease by a bootlesse complaint. If we wish for peace abroad, let vs lodge it first in our hearts at home. This inward peace shall be a good warrant for the generally, but wee are very sicke, if we thinke by waiewardnes and furie to cure the disease. If then wee seek any sound cure for our griefs, the Apothecaries shop is open, behold some preparatiues. But what is that in regard of the serious reading of the History it selfe, as necessary at this day for French-mē, as necessity doth force vs to seek for consolatiō?

I haue endeauored therfore (my countrymen) to trace out some slender obseruations for you in this little worke, grossly such as I could, I see it is not according to the dignitie and greatnes of the subiect (worthy in truth of a good writer) but rather fit for that obscure age, when the most ancient Druides had a maxime, not to write all, or of those which haue left vs these small abridgements, the which we now vse for want of better: and without doubt, if our History had encountered such spirits as the Greeke and Latin did, it had bin nothing inferior to any of them, in beauty and profit. This is the only cause why our countrymen haue not read our History, hauing not enioyed the light of excellent writers, to represent her in her liuely colours, according to her worth. And although our France hath heretofore had cause to complain in this respect, yet now that fault is partly repaired, by the industry of some that strue to plant & beautifie it. Amongst such as haue labored in this subiect, Du Haillan in my opinion exceeds all others, & deserues immortall commendations, hauing so happily clenfed these ouergrown bushes, and made so plaine a path in this obscure Forrest: if zeale to do my countrey seruice, & hope by my example to awake the learned to do better, were not my iust excuse, where should I hide me from the blemish of inconsiderate rashnes: especially being in this citie of Paris, not only the capitall City of France (the fertile mother of good wits) but also the Rendez-vous of the greatest miracles in the world. I will therefore speake freely, that in presuming to beautifie this Historie, I haue taken for the only obiect of my aime, To seeke the truth with the vse thereof, and to giue you some cause of content. Regard not my tongue, I offer you the simple truth without painting, the which I haue curiously searched for in many good Bookes, which my necessarie aboad here hath giuen me meanes to obtaine, and the desire I haue to serue you, occasion to imploy them, for as I am wholie vowed to the publike, so will I yeeld an accompt not onely of my idleness, but also of my employments, I haue therefore resoluēd to vndertake a labour that should not bee vnprofitable, in preparing you a way to learne your Historie in the originalls, with lesse paine and more profit. I doe therefore call this my endeauour an INVENTORIE, by the direction whereof, you may see the body and euery part at your pleasure. If I may perswade the Reader to conferre this my labour with the writings of others vpon this subiect (both old and new) I shall not then need to put in caution, but be of an assured hope to obtaine a testimonie of my fidelitie: and it may be in time, of some diligence, at the least I bring nothing, that hath not bene well purified and applied to the vse. The fruit depends on the blessing of God, by the iudgement of such as shall read mee; I will protest onely for that which doth concerne my selfe: I haue used the Rule, Square, Lead and Compasse, to obserue proportion both in stile and subiect, that in my course I might direct you to the very truth; if it bee with that light and breuitie I pretended, I shall haue cause to thanke God, and to labour in some subiect of greater moment, yet I haue done my best indeauour that the learned may supply my defect, in dooing better. The course is open, euery one may runne it. I leaue the prize to them that shall doe best, my intent was onely to profit the publike: and therefore I bring not an Abridgement, but an INVENTORY. I haue searched the very Springs of such as went before me. The first haue not hindered the second: and why should the second take it ill to be followed by others? one kinde of meate may be diuersly seasoned to good purpose. A small Dya I markes the houres in like proportion to a great Clock: It is one of my wishes, that this goodlie subiect may be set to open view, that the learned may strue to exceed one another, and leaue no excuse for our Frenchmen to bee any more strangers in France, making the way easie and profitable: If in this respect my zeale and integritie may bee approued of my Country, why should I repent the inemployment of some houres in so goodly and worthy a worke, as a testimonie (at the least) that I desire to discharge my duty?

To conclude, my Countrymen, I must not conceale from you the chiefe cause that induced mee to compile this worke. About fixe and twenty yeares since, I was thrust forth vpon the Theater, (being very young) to represent the History of our miseries: the desire of forraine Nations begat this desseigne, being curious to vnderstand a particuler relation of our Tragedies. By reason whereof I presented this my first worke in Latin, that Strangers might vnderstand it. I held it for an Abortiue, and esteemed the losse but light, yet was the successe greater then my proiect, for being imbraced by the publike beyond desert, it hath so increased, as of one Booke there are made fiftene, and corrected with diuerse impressions. And as the child increased, so the Father had meanes to do him good. GOD suffering me to liue to be a witnesse of great accidents, not onely as many of my Country-men, that sees the danger from a safe Porte, but imbarcked in full Seas amidst these common tempests: for being imployed in some and no small affaires (both within and without the realme) I had the Honor to bee admitted into Kings and Princes Cabinets, to manage publique causes of Prouinces, and to conferre with the heads of Parties, to learne from their owne mouthes, and from others that had authority and imployment vnder them, the Truth of all that passed: so as being able to giue a reason for many things which I had seene, I may likewise giue an account of most that hath passed, by the proceedings and instructions of both parties. I will adde to this opportunitie the priuate deuotion which hath alwayes held my minde inclined to this care, to gather together whatsoeuer was done, when as necessity of affaires thrust mee into employments: and this my desire succeeded so happily, that both great and small haue fauourably imparted vnto mee whatsoeuer might benefit concerning this subiect. So as I haue made a iust collection of all the substance, that may serue for the building of a perfect Historie, from the beginning of the troubles to this day. The end of this painfull labour depends of him from whom proceeds the euents of all our prayers. To him therefore I referre my selfe, protetting onely of that which is in mee. As therefore I aduow my selfe both Debtor of this worke, and Author of these Bookes, which wander among men: so I protest the fault shall not be mine, if all turne not to the publike good, where-vnto it is appointed, as by the order shall be found most expedient. And expecting an end of this great masse, my intent was onely (as may easily appeare by the Table of the third Race) to set before your eyes (as in one Mappe) a Summarie of the ancient History, very necessary for the vnting and referabance of that which hath happened in our time. But the iudgement of my learned friends, hath made mee to take a new course, that the length of so tedious a painment might not bee troublesome vnto you, in giving you the whole History vnto this day, fashioned of this meane and base stature, whereof I now offer you this first part, as a Patterne of the whole peece, imbraking my selfe from the maine land in this tempestuous Sea, which must needs bee fearfull vnto mee, both by the feeling of mine owne weaknesse, and the apprehension of diuerse iudgements, as the Ebbing and Flowing of the Ocean. I durst not hazard all this small modell at one voyage. Goe forth my first parcell, and seeke thy fortune, learne by the Chapmen, how the market goes, that by thy successe I may resolue with lesse danger to Ship the rest, the which in the meane time shall attend (in a safe Harbor) the winde of your fauourable contents.

A PLOT OR DISSEINE OF THE WHOLE HISTORIE.

MEANING is to represent in this discourse, what is most remarkable in the History of FRANCE, and (with a simple, faithfull, and liuely breuity) to report all that hath succeeded in the FRENCH Monarchy, worthy of memory, to make our Frenchmen see a modell of this great building, reducing it to the first foundation, according to the proportion of the subject, and the order of times, the certaine light of truth, and by the changes of the greatest and most famous forreine States, to the end, that this our INVENTORY may serue the learned for a memorial, and learners for a direction. The enterprise is not small, although the worke be litle, but as it must be valued by the fruite, so the prooffe will appeare to such as shall vouchsafe to read what my desire was able to performe. And for a ground of this goodly and excellent History, so worthy of knowledge, we must set downe in general termes what shall be handled in the particular throughout the whole discourse, and lay before our eyes (as in a table, by the most cleere and soundest proofes that may bee drawne from likelihoods of so obscure antiquity) the beginning and continuance, with the greatest apparence of truth, the increase, with the diuers euents and successe of this state such as now it is.

It were to seeke truth in vanity, following the common error, to search for the originall of the FRENCH, in the ruines and ashes of Troy, or in the fennes of Meotides, for in the most auncent Histories of the Trojans, there is no mention of FRANCVS or FRANCION, Sonnes of HECTOR, who had but one Sonne, named ASTIANAX, slaine at three yeares of age in the sacke of Troy. There is also no likelihood to find the stemme of our FRENCH nation in the fennes of Meotides, where they were first called SICAMBRES, hauing built a Citty by imagination named SICAMERIA: and that they issued from thence in great troups. There is no more prooffe that they are come from these marshes, then from the desarts of Aethiopia. It appeares the SICAMBRIANS were a different people from the FRENCH, and that the wallies of SICAMBRIA are yet to build. But the new presumption of a certaine writer is yet more admirable, who comes from far to aduertise the FRENCH of their originall, the which he findes beyond the Moone, and with so great an assurance as he sets downe name by name the Kings of the house of SICAMBRIA and of FRANCE, their race, manners, deeds, adventures, and that in so good earnest (as reporting a thing but of yesterday, or as beeing a Counsellor to these supposed Kings) seeming with reason to reprehend such as wil not take his word for present payment, vnder the authority of certaine old Registers produced by him, wherein he names these Kings one after one, like in presumption to the Castilians, the inuentors of the fabulous History of AMADIS: or the deuisors of the offspring of the Panim Gods, or of the Romant of the Rose, hauing forged names at their pleasure, leauing therefore all these Diuinations and Fopperies, let vs search (as meere as we may) what is most likely by the traces traces of truth, untill it may guide us to firme land, not plunging our selues any further in the bogges and unknowne deserts, of an imagined Antiquity.

The French are come out of Germany. What then? a doubtlesse wee shall no where finde a more certaine originall of our FRENCH Nation then in Germany. This is most apparant; FRANCONIA beares yet the name of the old inhabitants, and the marks of their auncient possessions: the Cities of the one and the other side of the Rhine are full of their Antiquities. We can no way doubt by these marks, but they have inhabited in those parts, and it is likely they were dispersed betwixt the Rivers of Rhine and Danubius, unto the Ocean. Whether they had there beginning there, or came from any other part, it avails not to dispute, seeing the search is altogether unprofitable, for that in deed it is impossible.

Of the name of Frenchmen The derivation of the name is very difficult, being wholly unknown to the first Antiquity: for wee read not in any auncient Histories of the name of FRENCH-MEN among the nations of Germany, yet carefully observed by the most auncient. But who see not the change of auncient names to new? Alemaine is now called Germany: Heluetia, Suisse: Britaine, England: with out seeking unnecessary proofes in so apparant a matter. The FRENCH therefore being an auncient people of Germany, have changed their name with the whole country upon diuers subiects, but when, how, by whom and wherefore, it cannot be certainly defined, but by coniectures, more easie to be refuted then maintained. It appeares onely that FRANCE is a German word, which signifieth Free, and that their auncestors either having shak't of the yoke of the Roman seruitude, and recovered their auncient liberty, or remayning free amongst so many neighbours subiect to that great Empire, were called FRENCH-MEN in token of their liberty.

There are learned men which write that FRANCE was the name of a Communality of diuers people, assembled and united together, to preserve their liberties, having taken that name as a marke of their generous resolution, and not of any certain nation: although Tully (a witness above all exception) notes the name of FRANCONS among the nations of Germany, which had offered obedience to the Romanes, whilst their common-weale flourished, before the Empire began, which shewes that we cannot talke of so obscure Antiquity but doubtfully, so as it is bootlesse to pronounce Oracles upon a subiect so disputable. Truly to referre the first memories of their name to the Empire of VALENTINIAN, and the beginning of their liberty to the defeat of the Alans and to the bounty of this Emperor, having freed them in recompence of so worthy a service: that were to make a leape of about an hundred and thirty yeares, to confound things and to be ignorant of the estate of our Auncestors, who at the time of this memorable defeat, did in nothing acknowledge the Romanes; But rather for a particular fruit of the victory gotten by them in common with VALENTINIAN, they had possession of a great part of the Gaules, not holding it of any but of their sword, nor doing homage but to their owne valour. It were in breefe not to have observed the originalls of true Histories. Seeing then the auncient habitation of the FRENCH was in that part of Germanie which lay neere it unto Gaule, who can with reason deny but they are issued from thence, and that in taking Gaule they made it to change both Master and Name: This is in breefe what may be spoken with most apparancy of truth, concerning the original of our FRENCH nation, if we will not urge more then may well be iustified.

By what means and when they entered Gaule. As for their estate & government, there is great likelihood that it was a great nation grown warlike by means of asending themselves and succoring others with their owne forces. I adde that they were led and commanded by a king, for the most auncient Histories represent them under a royal authority, as I will shew else where. Doubtles they had no means to buyld this great Monarchy in Gaule without force and order, yet did they not erect it at one instant, but slip't into Gaule sundry times, either employed to succor the Romanes, or they themselves, seeing their fortune, & good adventures: and as they grew familiar by diuers sommonings, so they got footing by little & little, untill that having not only expelled the Romanes, but all other tributary Lords; they became Masters and possessors of this goodly country: so this Monarchy was built upon the ruines of the Empire, & the end of the one was the beginning of the other. The Roman Empire had not only seized upon all Gaule as the eie of Europe (having reduced it into the forme of Prouinces) but did long enjoy it by their gouernours & Lieutenants general. This authority and Roman power was in a manner disperfed ouer the whole world. But as this Empire was framed of diuers peeces, and built by iniustice and tyranny, so God (a iust iudge and reuenger of iniquities) rased them up great & pouerful enemies from all parts of the world, as it were hired to teare in sunder this Cloake, to dismember this body by peccemeales, & to punish their vnciuill rigor, by a barbarous cruelty, and their greedy iniustice, by the rauishing extortion of others. The Empire then which had robbed was sacket it selfe, and having taken anothers goods, lost their owne, being scarce able (& that by meanes of the FRENCH) to retaine any shew of this great and vast body. The fury of MAHOMET invaded Asia, and Affricke, with a part of Europe, like a violent flame, with an incredible swiftnesse, Spaine was seized on by the Vandales, Alanes, Sueues & Gothes: Italy by the Vandales, Hunnes, Gothes & Lombards: Gaule wanted not sumary guests, the Gothes seized on that goodly Gaule Narbonoise, called for the excellency a second Italy: & left their name to this goodly Prouince, which they enioyed long & called it by their name, first Gothia & after Languedoc, as it were the language of Gothe, although they giue other reasons of this name more subtle then true. The Bourgognons seized of the country which they called by their name Bourgongne, and erected a kingdome which contained the one & the other Bourgongne with the Prouinces of Lionois, Daulphine, Sauoy, and Prouence. The Normans, Brittons, & Picts, tooke euery one their ticks, to lodge in Gaule, according to the diuers occurrents of affaires which presented themselves in this general disipation of the Romans Empire, who amidst these confusions did with great difficulty retaine the least portion: knowing not how to oppose themselves against so great and victorious enemies. So the FRENCH having likewise in the beginning seized on their quarter, were so fauoured by the prouidence of God, that through their valour they layed the foundation of a new estate, so as having expelled out of Gaule, both the old and new vsurpers, in the end they became masters, and built this goodly Monarchy, the which since hath giuen a law to neigbour nations, settled the Roman Empire, stopt the violence of these cruell and barbarous nations, & (which is the greatest honor of this state) hath maintained the Christian Church in Europe: the which God hath appointed for an habitation amidst the furious confusions of Asia & Affricke, where the deluge of MAHOMETs blasphemies hath horribly excecraed: wherein the greatnes & power of Gaule is to bee admired, by the which IULIUS CAESAR could first alter the commonweale of Rome, his country, into the new forme of an Empire, & after when as all the most furious nations did flocke together to cast downe this great masse; CHARLEMAINE with the same force could preserve a great part of the West from that cruell shipwracke which had ruined all the East. And as this spoyle was not generall at one instant ouer all Gaule, but by fits, like unto a River which takes her course in a new quarter; so the FRENCH Monarchy was built by degrees. The FRENCH being first employed by the Romanes for their valour in notable occasions, we begin to reace of their name with some shew & state, under the Empire of Gallienus, about the yeare of Christ two hundred and seuenty. POSTHVMVS gouernour of Gaule armed them against his Master and with the helpe of their forces and the consent of the Gaules, he enioyed Gaule the space of seauen yeares, with the title of Emperour. It is likely this first abroad caused them to taste the fertile sweetnesse of this goodly and rich country. Thus both the example of POSTHVMVS and the prooffe of their owne forces gaue them courage to attempt for themselves. We read that under the Emperours AVRELIAN, PROBVS, DIOCLETIAN, and CONSTANTIVS father to CONSTANTINE the great, they haue often returned without any other subiect then to seeke their aduantage: so were they often repulsed by the Romanes with great losse.

These fruitlesse stryuinges might well haue cooled the heate of their attempts, but not

not their desire to seeke for means: but they continued most obstinately their practice in armes and mayntayned their reputation euen with the Romaines themselves, who were glad to haue them for friends and to imploy them in their wars, as CONSTANTINE against LICINIUS a great enemy to the Christians: and CONSTANTINVS his Sonne against the GERMANES and IULIAN the Apostata, against the Persians. Truly as well the History of the Church as Saint HIEROME in particular (one of the most famous Doctors) spake of the FRENCH as of a very renowned people, who might both hurt and hepe, by their multitudes and the valour of their Armes. The stile of this desseigne, which I haue undertaken, doth onely note the thing for your understanding, without spending time in longer proofes. This appren'disshpe of the FRENCH by their many voyages into Gaule, continued a hundred and thirty yeares for so much it was from GALLIENS to HONORIVS, under whome they began to set footing into Gaule, upon this occasion. Those of the City of Treues tired with the tyranny of the Romans, were infinitely grieved that LVCIUS their gouernor a Romane, had by force taken the wife of a notable Citizen. This excesse ministred a subiect to call the FRENCH-MEN to their ayde, who expelled the Romanes, fastid quietly on the City with the consent of the inhabitants, and so (proceeding in their conquest) they possessed their neighbour Countries, and in time became Maistres of all that lies beyond the Riuers of Elcaut, and Somme: and in the end hauing woone PARIS, and the territories there about, they gaue their name to the conquered Country. I do briefly touch what shall be represented in particular in euery place, and set downe truly the originall of the FRENCH in this Realme.

PHARAMOND layd the first stone in the buylding of this estate, CLODION followed in this desseigne, MEROVE made it appeare aboue ground, in a more goodly forme, hauing purchased credit among the Gaules, both by his valour and the happy successe of his Armes. CLOVIS (adding the profession of Christ to his Predecessors valour and his owne) did so winne the hearts of the Gaules (who were for the most part Christians) as by their hearts hee got their voluntary obedience, and the assured possession of these new Conquestes. Two nations united in one by the Conquerours, giuing lax to the Conquered, with so wise and mylde a discretion, as they held him worthy of this Alliance, and Name: and the fruite of this marriage was so happy as the new name of FRANCE was generally receiued in Gaule. Thus this new estate increased daily in the race of PHARAMOND by diuers occurrents during the space of three hundred yeares. But it was much more augmented by the famous race of PEPIN. And God the author of all good order in mankind, giuing him to Sonne CHARLEMAGNE to preuent the ruine of the Empire, enriched him with singular graces, and confirmed in him that great authority and power of King of FRANCE, and Emperour of ROME, which greatnesse God would make profitable to all Christendome. But his race, inheritor of these great honours, did not inherite his valour and happinesse, hauing scarce continued 237. yeares: but degenerating from his vertues, they lost both Authority and Crowne, so much augmented and beautified by him and CHARLES MARTEL. So this second race, unworthy of the blood and name of their Grand-fathers, was spoiled of their Kingdome by their negligence. But God the Guardian of Monarchies (who changing the persons, would preserve the State) raised up HUGH CAPET a wife and modest Prince, arming him with wisdom and dexterity fit for the preservation of his Crowne, accompanying his Armes with law, and his royall authority with well governed iustice. It is to HUGH CAPET that the Realme of FRANCE standes most indebted for the establishment of those goodly Ordinances, by the which (together with the valour and fidelity of the FRENCH) this great Monarchy hath withstood the stormes of so many ages, and maintained euen vnto this day the lawfull heire in the same Race for the space of five hundred and thirty yeares. So as gathering the summe of all these yeares, they reckon from PHARAMOND to LEUIS the thirteenth that now Raynges 1200. yeares.

This is the Plot or desseigne of the whole History of FRANCE, the which being thus laid, before we raise this great building in euery part, according to the true measures and iust proportions, let vs make a Diagramme as a liuely figure, which may containe nakedly, and without circumstance, the names of our Kings, according to the order of these three royall Races. To the which wee will adde a particular Chronology, which shall be proved by the discourse of our Inuentory, I haue distinguished it into three parts, according to the order of the three royall Races. In the front of euery part I note the names of Kings, and the time they haue reigned, that at my first entrance you may obserue all that is represented in this particular discourse, wherein the wise Reader (that shall take the paines to conferre this modell with the whole History) will iudge that I haue omitted nothing that may concerne the subiect of the History, with all principall circumstances, to the end the truth in this short, simple, and vnseemly weed, appointed for euery day, may serue as well as that which the Learned and eloquent writers shew forth in open Theaters at Festiual times. To Actions carefully described, I adde sometimes my Iudgement, for the vse of the History, examined by the Maximes of State. To actions I say generally aduowed, as for the rest I leaue them, remembreing that I am a witness and no Iudge, to doe seruice to such as could not see the Originals. I note in the beginning the Elections, the Birthes, Liues, Aduentures, Intents, Desseignes, Manners, and Completions of our Kings: the Motiues, Actions, Alterations, Crosses, Issues and Successe of their affaires, both in Warre and Peace: their Enterprises, taking of Cities and Countries, Battels, Encounters, Victories, Overthrowes, Advantages, Disadvantages, and other things remarkable in State: finally I obserue their ends in their deaths, as the Catastrophe of their Lines, and closing up of their Reignes. But to make this discourse more proportionable for the knowledge of our Monarchy, it was necessary to explaine it by that which hath chaunced of most import in foraine Estates, especially in the Church and Empire, the most famous Theaters of the world, by reason whereof I haue added a most carefull Collation of the one and the other with our Realme. I intreat the wise Reader to way with iudgement what I shall report concerning matters most subiect to comproule, as those of the Church, I doubt not but that hee shall finde that I haue contained my selfe within the limis of State, talking nothing of Religion, nor meddling with the diuerse humors of this age. I haue onely treated of the politique government of Rome, with as much modesty as the subiect would permit. I know like-wise that making profession to write a History, no man will wish me either to disguise, or to conceal the truth, the which will warrant it selfe, and free me from reproch, in making knowne to iudicious and modest wits, that I haue no other passion but my duty, whereof I can giue no better prooffe, then in iustifying my discourse with the Original, if there appeare any difficulty. I protest I haue onely had a true desire to serue the publique, whose profit is the onely scope of my labours. As for the Computations, as they be very necessary for the well understanding of the History (which is the Register of times) so hath it much troubled me, being altogether neglected by the most ancient Writers, borne in the first obscure ages. The learned which haue happily handled this subiect before me finding plainly this notable difficulty, haue held it expedient to make little or no accompt to obserue the dates, which was in my conceits (under correction be it spoken) to cut the knot asunder instead of vntoosing it. But it hath made me more carefully to labour in this search, to finde out some meanes amidst these extremities. And therefore I haue distinguished the most notable changes, not onely from one Race to another, but in the Races themselves, placing the dates in the front of the whole discourse, as a Bound-stone to limit the Lands. Moreover I haue faithfully collected in grosse the yeares of euery reigne, and haue diuided them as I thought most likely, by the continuance of publike and private actions. It is all I could do in the most ancient reignes, being unable to diuine further, but in those that approach neere to our age, the Reader shall see the uniting of things from yeare to yeare by degrees, whereby he may march plainly in so goodly a light without any confusions. The Diagrammes shall supply the particuler default of times, which wee cannot otherwise distinguish. But let vs first see the whole patterne of our Monarchy without any colour or flourish whatsoeuer.

PHARAMOND, the first
King of France.

D Pharamond the sonne of Marcomir, is held for the first King of France, by the consent of all our writers. Hee began his reigne the yeare of Christ 420. A date very remarkable to describe the first beginning of the French Monarchie. At that time Honorius and Arcadius, brethren, (sonnes to Theodosius the Great) held the Romaine Empire, inuaded so by strange nations, as it was not onely dismembred into diuers parts, but euen Rome was spoyled and sackt by Alaric King of Goths. Amidst these confusions, the French Monarchie had her beginning vpon the ruines of the Empire. The French inuited by them of Treues, for the aboue named occasion, first seized on the City, and from thence extended them-selues to the neighbour countries; they name Tongrie for their first habitation, which the learned hold to bee the country of Brabant, and about Liege. This conquest was not made at one instant but augmented by degrees, and the nearest Prouinces were first surprised. The French comming from beyond the Rhin, it seemes they did first seize on that part which then lay nearest vnto them, as the countries betwixt the Rhin, the Escaut and the Meuse; and from thence extended them-selues euen to the riuer of Loyre. They hold for certaine, that this happy exploit of the French, was vnder the name and authority of Pharamond their King, who departed not from his native country, but sending forth his troope, as a swarme of Bees, he reaped the honour and fruite of the conquest, as the Soueraigne head. Hee is commended to haue established good lawes, to haue framed and inured the French to a ciuill and well gouerned kinde of life, and to haue laid the first stone of the foundation of this great Monarchie in Gaule: he reduced into one body, and expounded more plainly, the ancient lawes of the French called Saliques: augmented them, & shewed the vse, as wel for the gouernment of the estate, as for priuate persons: and therefore he is called the author of those Lawes, although he receiued the from his ancestors. He reigned xi. yeares, leauing Clodion his son for his successor with a good taste of his integrity noted in his name: for VVaramond or Pharamond (according to the common pronunciation) in the old French language (that is to say) in Germaine, signifies a true mouth: a vertue in truth worthy of a Prince, and necessary for the conduct of humane society.

This is all that may be certainly written of the originall of the French Monarchie: yet Gregory of Tours (a very ancient author) makes no mention of Pharamond, and sets downe the beginning of this estate in grosse, as a thing vncertaine. What certainty then may we looke for of more ancient times? Wee finde in the Romaine histories, some apparent steps to guide vs to the knowledge of our beginning. These goodly Prouinces of Gaule, were courted by all their neighbours: the Romaines vnder colour of conueniency, seized on that which lay nearest vnto them; by meanes whereof, they sought to become maisters of the rest, but they wanted no competitors. The Heluetians (since called Suisses,) and likewise the Germanis would haue lodged there, if Cesar had not withstood them. His successors were encountered with the like difficulties, but in the end they preyailed to whome God had determined the possession, that is to the French, issued doubtlesse out of Germany, and gouerned by Kings. We read in the liues of the last Emperours, the names of Nelobaudes, Richimer, Marcomir, Berther, Sunno, Pharabert, Theodemir and Dagobert: but hercof we cannot with reason beleue all that the Registers of Hunibauld, and Tribemius do comment, touching these ancient Kings. Let vs therefore leaue these subtilties to such as haue leisure to refine their wittes, and lay before our eyes the light of a more sound and profitable truth: let vs obserue the estate of the Church, when as this Monarchy began to appeare, for hereafter the Church shall be her principall gemme, although the French Kings were Infidels in these first beginnings.

The estate of the Church,

Saint Jerome, Chrysostome, Ambrose, and Augustine, liued in those times, spectators of the dissipation of the Empire, wherein the Church suffered much. Damasus, Ciricius, Anastatius, Innocentius, Sosimus, and Bonifacius, Bishoppes of Rome liued there, one after another (men renowned for their piety, learning and dexterity,) amidst the confusions of the Empire, and euen at Rome whereas the Emperours were feldome seene; so as the absence of the Emperours (troubled to withstand the Barbarians, and the miserable estate of the time, which forced Christians to flye to their Bishop, for counsell and comfort to their confused afflictions) laid the foundation of their authority, then small, being tyed to their charges, and subiect to the Emperours command: but it grew by degrees, vntill it came to the height of this soueraigne and absolute power, so as in the end they haue prescribed lawes to Emperors, Kings, and Christian Princes. A necessary obseruation, both for the truth and order of this History, to vnderstand rightly both the times, and meanes of their rising. In the first age, the Bishops of Rome durst not shew them selues (being persecuted, imprisoned, and martired by the Emperors.) Since Constantine the Great, their authoritie began: in the dissipation of the Empire, it increased, and this Realme did fortifie and augment it. Our first Kings knew them not: their next successors maintayned and aduanced them as, Charles Martell, Pepin and Charlemaigne, to whome they are indebted; for the greatest support and increase of their cheefe authority.

Fundamentall Rules or Maximes of the State of France.

Before wee proceed any further in this Theater, reason and order commands vs to set downe the soueraigne Maximes of our Monarchy, as goodly Pillers in the first front of this great building: to the end we may not dispute, eyther of the ancient forme of gouernement in the first age of our Ancestors, or of the fundamentall lawes of the estate. It is necessary that our mindes (euen in our infancy) be seasoned with this common beleefe, being the bond and vnion of the naturall obedience we owe vnto our Kings. Without doubt, it is neyther true, nor likely, that

The first Maxime.

I. King of France.

A that our Predecessors, (taking possession of this goodly inheritance) made any question of that which had bene concluded amongst them from father to sonne. The most ancient histories (whose authority is without controll,) testifie, that the French nation was gouerned by Kings, and experience ioyned with reason doth shew, that the French cannot be otherwise commanded, then by a royalty. Whereto then serues this question amongst the French, touching the forme of gouernement, when as Gaule was first possessed by them? And to what end should these goodly painted speeches be vttered by our ancient warriours, who made so great profession to doe well, as they neglected eloquent words.

The French
cannot indure
any other go-uernment than a Royalty.

This Maxime thus laid, as the ground of the Estate of France, the truth of that which hath passed in ancient times, doth plainly shew, what the forme of this royalty hath bene: for who doth not see, by the names of the Kings of France, (as they haue commanded in this realme, amidst so many alterations of the State, in the change of the three Races, where we may note the succession from father to sonne, from brother to brother, and from cousine to the nearest kinsman of the bloud Royall,) that it was hereditary from all antiquity? This is the law, the vse whereof is so worthily regarded in all commands, the force whereof defends the State amidst the strangest confusions, yea sucking babes haue enioyed it without any dispute or contradiction. At the very name of an infant King, Armies haue marched vnder the commanded of a woman (otherwise very odious by reason of her vices) and yet so respected (being the Kings mother) as the French haue grown desperate in most perilous battails, returning with bloody victories, thrust forward with this onely resolution, to preserve the estate of their young King, lying in his swaddling clothes. By the force of this law, the French (after the decaide of their lawfull Kings, leauing their wiues with childe) hauing reuerenced the wombe of their Queene, expecting her deliuey: being a sonne, he was nourished, bred vp, and honoured as their King: And if he dyed in his first infancy, they haue performed his obsequies, with the like respect and reuerence, as to a King in his maiory.

The royalty of France, is

The efficacy
of a successiue Royalty.

A Royalty is the best forme
of gouern-

To conclude: reason, authority, and experience, do plainly shew, that a succeeding royalty is better, then that which depends vpon the peoples choyce and election: for what is a Royalty, but the Image of a fathers command: the loue, honour, and obedience which children beare towards their parents, bee the effects of the lawe of nature figured in their hearts. A father commands ouer many children, who although they be planted in diuers parts (as we see in the peopling of great families,) yet all returne to the cheefe stocke or stemme: all acknowledge and honor the father, all obey him while he liues, by a more voluntary obedience, for that it is meere naturall. Behold the patterne of a ciuill gouernement. To apply it to our subiect: it appeares, the first man had this naturall authority, euen as we see it at this day. As mankind multiplied into diuers families, so this multitude had neede of a greater gouernement. Man cannot liue alone: society consists in commandement and obedience. From this fountaine a royalty springs. Look what is done in a family, the like is in a state, by the same force of nature: one commands and is obeyed. There this naturall respect is the bond of lawfull obedience. So here in like sort, whereas the commandement of one giues law to all, for that the law of nature hath power ouer all, it doth authorize this respect in the hearts of subiects, by a voluntary obedience to their Kings as to their fathers. And as wee need not bee taught to honour father and mother: So, who is so vnkinde that will make any question to honour the Prince vnder whome hee is borne. It is that which the originall of the first truth doth teach vs, Honour father and mother, not only to rye vs to them that gaue vs life, but to those that make vs to liue happily in the common society of mankind: that is, to the father in the house, and to the King in the state, as the father of our fathers. Thus Royalty is the most ancient and best forme of gouernement, when as the King is father of his people, according to the ordinance of nature, as wee shall shew elsewhere at better leysure. I hope this small digression shall bee excused for the necessity of the subiect.

How it ap-
peares by reason.

A Royalty then is the image of a fathers authority. How can a father then (whom God hath giuen by the course of nature) be chosen by his children? If to liue well according to nature, and by consequence, that which proceeds from nature, bee the best, who doubts, A but a Royaltie (the which God hath giuen vs by the law of state, the soueraigne law of so-cietie, wherein wee are borne,) is without doubt better then that which depends on the tumultuous factions of people? Thus much for reason. Now let vs see what Authority saies, which speaks plainly and in the goodliest estate of the world, which was the comon weale of Israel, wherein God had planted his church, as his most pretious iewel. Truly, the lawful Royaltie of the house of Dauid, hath bin hereditarie, & successiue from father to sonne, and from Cousin to the nearest kinsman, a paterne whereby to frame a perfect estate, farre better then the common weale of Plato: who notwithstanding hath respected the bloud Royall in the race of Kings, with great prerogative, moued thereunto by the force of nature, to acknowledge the best forme of gouernment in an hereditary succession, whereas one is borne to commaund, an other to obey. I will dilate no more of so rich and ample a subiect, hauing onely coated that which is necessary for the circumstance of my purpose. But what shall we say of Experience, the mistres of fooles? What is hee, but may thereby feele the visible proofs of this truth? Doubtles those Countries & States, which haue kept this libertie to choose their Kings, do often feele (to their costs) the tumultuous fruites of their elections, struiuing with much paine to maintaine this priuilege against the lawes of nature, posling from nation to nation, with much toyle, and small profit, searching for that a farre off, which they might easily finde at home: and for the voiding of tumults (which might grow among equall Competitors) they procure vnto themselves infinite troubles, the which they might auoide, in receiuing of him willingly whome God should cause to be borne among them, with a lawfull authority. But some will object, that which we cannot deny to haue bene practised in two Races, That the French had in former times authority to place and displace their Kings: as appeares, the Kings chosen by Parliament, which were borne vpon targets: as also by the famous examples of Pepin, and Hughe Capet. Wherevnto the answer is true and plaine, that this consent was but the settle of the naturall prerogative due to the race of our lawfull Kings: and their disallowing, a declaration of their base slouthfulnesse, vnworthy of that naturall prerogative, wherewith they were honored in their birth, and from which they did degenerate in liuing ill.

And as wee see in the succession of Kings, the nearest allied holds the other by the hand: so in these two alterations, when as necessitie forced the French to change their King, (as when the like necessitie constraineth the children to giue their furious father a tutor) wee may obserue that they haue alwayes made choise of men nearest to the blood royall, preferring vertue before a maske of Authoritie corrupted with vice, the publique good before the priuate interest of a vitious man, retheyning nothing but the name of his noble race. They haue preferred (as much as they could) their naturall respect to the bloud royall. The law made the king: that is his birth. But the law of nature, followed by the law of nations, and the free consent of the people, hath not bene the cause, but the very effect of this naturall authority. So this royall authoritie is limited and ruled by the souereigne law of State: which doth so aduance the head aboue all the members of the body, as they may not be separated. For what is a king without subiects but a head without members? the King preferres his estate, as the head doth the body.
But, as the head (from whence life proceeds to the body) liues with the body, so the king (who preferres the estate by his authority) is preferred in the estate, by the consent of his subiects.

In this inseparable vnion, hee doth fortifie his power by theirs, and his command with their voluntary obedience. Plato saies, that Authoritie is not subiect to controul-ment, is pernicious to him that commaunds, and to them that are commaunded. It is a law-full and profitable restraint for kings, and the necessary counterpoise of their authori-
tie. This law will haue euery member to hold his place, in the bodie of a State:
And by consequence, that the subiects consent, (who offer their goods and liues to their king) be respected in their degree. This hinders no more the hereditary prerogative of a Royaltie, then the diuerse ministerie of the members doe the soueraigne authority of the head, ouer the whole body. And as in the beginning, or in the rising, or infancy of

A of an estate, vertue ministers occasion for the people to choose such as should command ouer them successiue, leauing as it were in sacred guard, in the hands of their best men, what they hold most precious, and so to their successors, who by all reasonable coniecture, must be good and vertuous, being borne of good parents: euen so in the end, vice makes them to hate such as abuse this prerogative: and in like manner the same vertue makes them to flye to others, whome they hold more worthy to command, in that they are obedient vnto reason. This Maxime then stands firme, that the authority of the States not being incomparable with the soueraignty of a King, the royalty of France is,
and hath alwayes bene meere hereditary, without any exception, nor can it otherwise B subsist and stand, all well considered. And who so thinkes or speaks otherwise, imagining popular common-weales in France, he is ignorant of the disposition of the French, and feedes him-selfe with a dangerous vanity.

But this law of a succeeding royalty is limited by a third Maxime: That the right of the Crowne is tied to the heirs male: whereas in many nations, for want of males, the soue-raigne authority of a royalty falls to the females of the royall race. And this law recei-ued by the approbation of the subiect people, is happily put in practise. The president is very memorable and remarkable in the Realme of England, whereas Queene Eliza-berth alone, hath surpassed the happinesse of the greatest Kings her predecessors, ruling a long time with great authority in peace: So as hauing gotten most famous victories ouer her enemies, shee hath erected, through peace, the goodlyest trophies that euer King of England could haue planted there. So great is the force of the law in the society of mankind, the which God will haue inuioable vnder the gage of faith and publique order. But the royalty of France is holy restrayned to the males, the fundamentall law of state (being called the Salique law) not admitting the females. For this soueraigne law is set downe in these wordes: In the Salique land, let no portion of the inheritance come to the female: but let the male haue the possession. That is to say, the males onely are capable of the Crowne of France: the females being wholly excluded, and by consequence their issue, the which can pretend no more interest then their mothers, neyther haue they any portion in the reuenues of the Crowne, which cannot bee alienated. So as it is giuen D them but for terme of life, by assignation of dowrie at the Kings good pleasure.

This fundamentall law is called Salique, by excellency, although the Salique lawes con-teyne the rights of priuate men: but amongst them, that which concernes the Malestie of the prince, is the principall, and for this cause is knowne by this worthy obseruation. The practise of this fundamentall law is apparent, in the first race, where the cheefe prooffe of antiquity must be made in the daughters of Childbert, sonne to the first Clouis: In the daughters of Cherebert sonne to Clotaire the first, in the daughters of Gontran, sonne of the same Clotaire, all which are excluded from the Crowne, and in their places the nearest Princes of the blood admitted by the consent of all the French. The second race hath no examples of this law in the particular circumstance of women. The third hath very nota-E ble ones: Edward King of England was excluded by iudgement of the States, from the right he pretended to this Crowne, being sonne to one of the daughters of France, the only daughter of Philip the faire, Philip of Valois, was preferred before his Neece, daughter to Lewis Hutin. And of late memorie, Francis the first of that name, Duke of Angou-lesme, before the two daughters of Lewis the twelfth, without any contradiction.

This law was obserued among the French before Pharamond was borne: and by vertue of this law, he reigned as Successor to his Ancestors, Marcomir, Canno, Melobaudes, and others. And as he was appointed by the wise prouidence of God, to bee the first Architector of this Monarchie, so was hee indued with singular graces fit for so excellent a worke, in the which the law should fortifie the valour of this fierce and warlike nation.
F Thus Pharamond is renowned for his wisdom and iudgement, who did countenance and authorize the Salique lawes, and that especially which was the cheefe, to take away all future debate from his Successors. And for the better strengthening of his lawes, hee assembled his Captains, whereof the Councillors of our ancient Kings were chosen. They name among the cheefe of them Widogast, Sabogast, Wisogast, and Bogast: the which our fabulous curiosities do transforme into some great Orators, without any apprehension

Etimologie of the word Sa-
lique.

To search out the originall of the word, neyther my stile, nor my humor will suffer me to dispute thereof: every one hath his iudgement free. But this is my opinion: as words be the Images of things, so are they inuented to represent the nature of the thing whereunto they are applied. It appeares that among the French, the Saliens were those that held the cheef degrees, and gaue the name to the whole Nation. So as all Frenchmen are often times called Saliens. The Salique lawes theretofore are the French lawes appointed to rule, and gouerne the French. It was the ancient name continued with the most ancient lawes, the which the honour of the Nation, and the reuerence of so sacred a thing, hath forbidden in any sort to alter. So the Salique law hath continued time out of mind the Soueraigne law of State, vnder the which the French haue liued: and so haue continued from father to sonne, without any alteration, eyther in the substance, or the word, maiestical in the hearts and tongues of all French men. What apparence is there then, that Philip of Valois hath borrowed the name of Pharamond, in the inuention of this law, to make it serue his turne? How much vnlikely is it, that so important a law being the ground of the Estate, should be vknowne to the French? What a drowsinesse had it beene in so wise and circumspect a nation, to suffer them-selues to be abused by a new-come Prince, and by so grosse a pollicie, to draw them-selues into apparent combustion, which hung ouer their heads, in preferring the French before the English, who had then so good a portion in France, where hee possessed the goodliest, and richest Prouinces? How vnfound is this pollicie, to imagine, that a poore Prince, Earle of Valois, hauing to do with a rich King of England, who encountred the Frenchmens mindes with an intestine force, by the golden vertue of his Angels, could haue abused such as were kept in their obedience, by the force of right and reason, for the preseruation of the Crowne of France, their Country? Who sees not, but it had bene the ouerthrow of Philip of Valois cause, to say that he had forged a law at his pleasure, to exclude the lawfull heire, and her offspring, from her right? Truly the good cause of Philip of Valois made him victorious against the forces of Edward King of England; and the ancient reuerence to him, authorized by a continuall vse, and receiued by the common consent of the French, reiectd gold, to respect the order of right, for the benefit of the lawfull heire.

These French lawes were called Saliques, of the riuer Sal which is in Franconie, or East France: It ioynes with Mein, and is not yet dried vp. It is neyther new, nor extraordinary, for people to deriue their names from Mountaines, or Riuers: and to shew an example, springing from the same thing, by noting the Riuers. The country where the city of Paris is seated (not onely the cheife of this great Realme, but the Theater of the whole world, if by a happy peace she may recover her ancient beauty) is called the Ile of France, for the concourse of diuers riuers, which ioynes with Sein: and to this end, the ship (the armes of our cheife city) shewes the conueniency of these goodly Riuers. Who can with reason obiect the apparency of this likelihood? That as our Ancestors remaying alongst the riuer of Sal, were called Saliens, so the name hath continued to posterity: the which for the like reason are called Ripuaires, as made for the commodity and vse of the dwellers vpon that banke, the which they likewise called Ripuaires, or Ribberots. Truly long time after, Conrad of Franconie, the Emperour, was called Salique, to make his beginning in that country by the ancient name. Thus much for the word. But the inuolable Maximes and Principles of the State of France, the consent of all the true and ancient Writers, the prescription of so many ages, the generall approbation of all the French nation, should make vs hold this Salique lawe, for certaine without seeking for new opinions, not onely weake and vnprofitable, but insupportable in the state, where the old prouerbe must stand for an oracle, remoue not the stone well layed. Thus hauing breefly set downe the principall lawes of the state of France, I will retorne to the course of my history.

Death of Pharamond.

Thus he reigned, thus he liued, and thus dyed Pharamond, the first King of France, leauing for hereditary successor of his Realme; his sonne Clodion according to the right

A right of lawe: and king in effect, by consent of the French. This age was the fincke of Babarous nations, by whom God would iustly punish the vniust pride of the Romaines. The greatest part came out of Asia, staying first in Germany, and from thence like Caterpillers or Grasshoppers spread them-selues ouer Gaule, Italie, and Spaine: that is to say, the Gothes or Getes, Alans, Hunnes, Sueues, and others: and from the North the Bourguignons, Normans and Lombards. Wee must know the change of these nations, for the vse of this history. But it sufficeth to touch them briefly in their places, without cloying our chiefe subiect with a cumbersome discourse.

CLODION, or CLOION the hairy, the 2. King of France.

E

CLODION, the sonne of Pharamond, succeeded his father in the yeare 431. and reigned one and twenty yeares. He laboured to follow his fathers course, and to settle himselfe in Gaule: but hauing transported certaine troupes, which made a happy beginning, passing to the Countries of Cambresie and Tournay, betwixt the riuers of Somme and Escout, behold a furious multitude of diuers nations assembled together, Vandales, Alans, Sueues, and Burguignons (iealous to see this great and warlike people follow their steps, in the conquest of a land not onely set to sale, but abandoned in the disorders of the Romaine Empire,) opposed them-selues against them. The French not able to withstand so great vnited forces, retired them-selues into their Country of Franconia. To this ialousie, was added the pride of Stillic, Lieutenant general to Honorius Emperour of the West, who easily ingaged these Nations (seeking for worke) against the French, laboured by all meanes to crosse them, and to possesse himself of Gaule: yet the successe did not fit his designe: for being preuented by Honorius his maister, he was slaine, with his son Eucherius, whom hee had appointed absolute heire of that goodly portion. But the prouidence of God had left it in prey to these great & victorious nations, being come from diuers parts of the world to diuide the Empire. Thus confusion

The first attempt of Clodion.

440. confusion prevailed by his authority, who had most interest in the practices of Stillicio, A (who in taking Gaule for himselfe) retained still the Romaine name, being overthrowne by Honorius. The deluge of these barbarous nations overflowed all Gaule, which from yeare to yeare was replenished with new guests. The Bourguignons had already seized on a great part, with the title of a kingdome, whereof Arles was the chiefe City. The Goths possessed Gaule Narbonnoise, even by the Emperours consent, who granted what he could not take from them, with promise to passe no further. So this victorious nation, dispersed in diuerse places, as in Italy, Gaule and Spaine, were called by sundry names, Wisigoths, and Ostrogoths, according to the places where they were planted, by their great multitudes and valour. Such was the disorder of the Romans, who in their B seasons had subdued the whole world, by their victorious armes. These tempests and stormes raigned during the Empires of the two brethren, Arcadius and Honorius, the one commanding in the East, and the other in the West: of Theodosius the second, son to Arcadius, and in the beginning of Valentinian the third, a vitious & unhappy Prince. The reign of Clodion fell out in those times not greatly memorable, but to obserue his resolutions and manly endeouours, to settle and increase the conquests of his father, but with no successe. Thus great and heroically enterprises haue often staies and lets in the beginning, or such difficult crosses, as they seeme quite suppressed.

the Empire.

Atius a Romaine borne, succeeded Stillicio for the Emperour, in that which remained in Gaule: he opposed himselfe violently against the French, who at diuerse times endeououred to passe the Rhin, and to returne into France. Clodion fortifying himselfe courageously against this storme, fainted not for all these first difficulties. In the end, he resolved to hazard all vpon this last cast: and to this effect he raised a mighty army, with an intent to go in person to the conquest of this goodly kingdome. But God had resolved to giue it to the French: yet by an other hand then that of Clodion, for hee died in this voyage, being on the banks of Rhin, with an intent to passe it, in the yeare of grace 451, leaving Merouee heire of his designe and valour.

Law for wearing long
haire,

Hee was called Le Chemelu, or hairy, for that hee made a law, that none but Kings and their children, with the Princes of the blood, should weare long haire, in token of command: after the Romaine manner, who shaued the heads of their slaues and seruants, D and left the Periwig onely to the Patricians, and the head bare. This custome, confirmed by the law of Clodion, hath bene long time obserued in France: so as by this marke, Clodamyre the sonne of Clonis (beinge slaine in a battaile by the Bourguignons) was knowne among the dead: and in token of a degrading or dishonouring, they shaued such as they degraded from the royall dignity: as it appeares by infinite examples: amongst the which our History makes mention of one very memorable, of Queene Clotilde, who chose rather to cut off the heads of her yong sonnes, then to haue their haire pold or shauen: that is to say, she preferred an honest death before the dishonor of her children: for in cutting off their haire (the marke of their naturall dignity) they were deprived of all hope to enioy their degree, and were confined into a base estate, vnworthy of their great- E nesse, to die continually with heart-breaking reproch and infamy.

the Church.

Genferic King of the Vandales, at that time seized vpon Affricke, and euen when as he besieged Hippone (which at this day they call Bonne, famous for the fishing of corall) Saint Augustine died the third month of the siege, the fourth yeare of his ministry, in that City, and the 76. of his age; hauing both seene and felt those tragicall ruines in the desolate estate of the Church, afflicted then in diuers parts of the world by these Barbarians. Theodosius the second, the sonne of Arcadius, a good and a wise Prince, did his best endeouour to stop the course of this last shipwrack, but hee preuailed not. The insolency of Valentinian the third (a Prince extremely vitious) thrust it headlong, and the ill government of his seruants, namely of Bonifacius gouernour of Affricke, and of Atius gouernour of Gaule (called in the Barbarians, to the subuersion of the Empire: who to bee reuenged one of another, being capitall enemies, for the ielousie of their greatnesse) did what they could to ruine their maister.

greatest grace to this first race.

451. MEROVEE, son, or the nearest kinsman to Clodion, succeeded to the Crowne, as well by vertue of the fundamentall law of state, as by the free Election of the French, in the yeare 451.

Hee was farre more happy then Clodion: for hee not onely effected his designe in passing the Rhin, and taking footing in Gaul: but did happily extend the limits of his new Kingdome. And the same Atius in his which crossed Clodion, made the way easie for Merouee viuares, for the execution of his enterprise, by this occasion: Atius fell in disgrace with Honorius his E maister, being greued to see the great successe of the Gothes, Vandales, and other barbarous nations in the Empire, imputing the fault vnto his seruants and officers. Thus growing ielous, hee calls him from his gouernement of Gaule, and sends Castrinus in his place, who was not onely acquainted with the estate of the Gaules, but was also discontented with Bonifacius Gouernour of Affricke, with whome he had commandement to ioyne his forces, to oppose against the common enemies of the Romans. During those actions, Honorius died, leauing Theodosius in the East, and Valentinian in the West, two young Princes of diuers humors.

sees gaining France.

Merouee embracing this occasion with great dexterity, foundes the hearts of his neighbours the Gaulois; and findes them disposed to his deuotion. He raiseth an army, passeth the Rhine, takes Treues at his first approach, and then Argentin, (which is now called Strasbourg) with the Countreies adioyning to it. Hee extends euen to Cambresie, and Tournay, and proceeding farther into Gaule, hee seized on the best Citties of Champagne, with so great expedition, as no Romaine appeared to stop the course of his victory: Valentinian aduertised of this successe, called backe Atius, to quench this fire, sending

 prepared for him, for Attila King of the Huns, (who named himself the Scourge of God, to chastise the Empire) having assembled an incredible number of men in the desarts of Asia (being five hundred thousand fouldiers) fallies downe like a furious deluge, spoiling all the Countries where hee passed: and hauing crossed through Poland into Germany, and passed the Rhine, hee threatned to inuade France, a Country desired by all these nations, for her fertility and beauty. Attila had no shorter course, nor better meanes to auoide this storme, then to become friends with the French, and with all the other possessors of Gaule, who were threatened by this common storme: so as in steed of warre, he made a peace with Merouee, vpon this extremity.

Attila entred Gaule, and aduanced so farre, that hee besieged Orleans (where Anian B liued then, a most famous Bishop, who did greatly comfort the besieged by his piety and wisdom) whilest that the forces of their confederate friends assembled, by the meanes of Attila, Romaines, French, Gothes and Bourguignons. Orleans being at the point to yeeld, Thierry king of the Goths arriues so happily, as hee forceth Attila to raise his siege, and to take another course. Attila marching away with this vaste body of an army, he was pursued speedily by Attila and his confederates, who ouer-tooke him in the fields of Catalaunia, the which is diuersly taken, either for the country about Chalons, or about Tholouse. A battaile was giuen, and the combate was furious, but the check fel vpon the Huns, who lost (as it is constantly written) 180000. fighting men, and the victory remained in common to the Romaines, French and Goths: but the triumph and honour C to Merouee and his men, who fought very valiantly. Thierry king of the Goths, was slaine very happily, to make the way easie for Merouee.

Attila ouer-throwne, but not quite vanquished.

It was propounded in councell, to pursue Attila, but Attila would not yeeld therunto, so as Attila saued himselfe, being beaten, but not vanquished: for with the same forces he seized vpon a great part of Pannonia the happy, whence in the end came the name of Hongarie, although after the death of Attila, who did but lay the leuain, and his posterity finished what he had begun. A question is made, what moued Attila to leaue Attila halfe vanquished. The reliques of his discomfited army were not small, after so great a losse: so as it seemed best not to force him to despaire, seeing there is but one only helpe D for the vanquished, not to hope for helpe. Attila might also haue giuen this aduise, by reason of his ialousie against the French, who should haue reaped an ouerplus of greatness by the absolute ouerthrow of this Barbarian. But with what intention soeuer he did it, it succeeded ill for himselfe, for Valentinian his maister was so discontented with him, as he caused him to be slaine, depriving himselfe of a sufficient and faithfull seruant: and (as one reproched it vnto him) he had cut off his right hand with his left. In the mean time Merouee affaires succeeded well in all places: he had wonne much reputation: he was feared of the Romaines, honoured of the Gaules, and respected and beloued of all men. Thierry King of the Goths, gaue him place by his death, with whom the Romaines might haue ioined: and his greatest opposition, was the wisdom and valour of Attila, E the which did no more checke him.

Thus the prouidence of God (which meant to vse him for the building of this Monarchie) made way for him euery where. He likewise knew how to imbrace all these opportunities with such dexterity, that taking hold of all occasions, hee entred the Country, taking possession of Paris, Sens, Orleans, and the neighbour Prouinces, with the consent of the inhabitants: and ioining these with the rest, he won the Gaules, with so good vantage, as he was held worthy to command ouer them: and so without any contention, he began to frame the body of an estate, calling France (by the name of his ancient country) the country of the Gaules, being newly brought vnder his obedience. Hereby we may see, whether it be likely that Valentinian gaue the French their liberty, for recompence of this notable seruice: and that from thence they began to be called Frenchmen, that is to say, F
 Franc and free, as some write, not well obseruing the Romaine History, whence these Romaine obseruations should with reason be drawne. Such was the valour, wisdom and happinesse of this great and worthy Prince, who with great reason gaue his name to this first race, called Merouingians, to aduow him the principall pillar of their settled estate.

 one houre to do well. In his time there chanced notable accidents in the Church. As on the one side the Barbarians dismembred the State, so the heretikes troubled the Church by their monstrous innouations, sprung vp against the truth of the ancient and Catholike doctrine: and their chiefe practises were against the sonne of God. Nestorius diuided the Natures: Eutiches did confound them: Theodosius the second, assembled a generall Councell at Ephesus, against Nestorius and Martian his successor: another at Chalcedon against Eutiches. There were likewise Synods at Orange, Valence, Carpentras, Arles, Tours, and Venice, for diuers necessities of the Church, the which order and discipline might remedy. Cyrillus and Theodore liued in those times, great personages, and worthy defenders of the truth.

CHILDERIC, or CHILPERIC, first King of that name, the 4. King of France,
 In some Copies HILPERIC.

He French and the Gaules being thus vnited, they choose Chilperic the sonne of Merouee for their King, with great solemnity, being the first assembly of this new people, consisting of two nations, and installed him, according to their ancient manner (raising him vpon a Target) they carried him about the assembly. Hee beganne to rule in the yeare 461. and reigned thirty yeares. A Prince noted in diuerse examples, both in his life and government: for in the beginning hee was vitious and vnfortunate, but being reclaimed by affliction (having changed his life) happinesse did accompany him in the end of his daies. At his comming to the Crowne, hee did greatly abuse his authority, in oppressing of his subiects, with excessive taxes, raising the wiues, and daughters of the French: who seeing themselves ill intreated in their goods and honours, they assemble, and resolute to expell Chilperic, as vnworthy to reigne, and to call in Gillon a Romaine for their king, who gouerned in Gaule for the Romaines, and held his seat at Soissons. The hate and contempt of subiects against their kings, is a great great meanes to blemish their authority. The vices of Chilperic bred this discontent in the French, and the scourge was ready to chastice him, though not to ruine him.

Chilperic (not able to oppose himselfe against this common consent) giues place, by the Councell of Guyemans a man of great account, who promised him to be his faithfull friend in his affliction, and to vse his best endeouours to pacifie the French, being incensed against him, and to cause him to bee recalled. To this end, he takes a token from Guyemans, for the more secret treating in his absence. The token was a peece of a gold ring, whereof either of them tooke a moitie. This done Chilperic, retires himselfe into Turinge, to king Basin his deere friend and kinsman, expecting better fortune. Guyemans proceeds with such dexterity, as creeping into fauour with this new king, and keeping his credit with the French, he makes himselfe fit to effect his purpose, both by the one and the other. The issue answereth the proiect. Having plausible audience with Gillon, he aduiseeth him, that to get authoritie among his subiects, he must inure them to obedience: and therefore he must not forbear to lay publike charges vpon them, else they would contemne him, and in the end insult ouer him, if in time hee did not accustom them to beare the yoke of his new authority. According to this aduise, the King (vnacquainted with the humour of the French) imposeth taxes contrary to custome, and doubles charge vpon charge. The same fire which had inflamed the French against Chilperic, incensed them presently against Gillon. For (say they) to what end should this new maister become a tirant? We can dispossesse him with the like facilitie, that we haue made him. Thus they generally complaine, euery one (according to the credit hee hath with the people) cries out, that they must preuent this mischief. Such as were the moitiues and instruments to expell Chilperic, are not the last to complaine. Guyemans doth secretly aduertise Gillon, that the means to auoid the danger which Chilperic fell into, was to preuent this practise in the breeding, & to put the principall authors thereof to death, as the ringleaders of rebellion. Gillon entertaines this aduise: he puts them to death that were the instruments of Chilperics disgrace. And so with one stone giues two strokes. He takes them away that might frustrate his designe, and disposeth the Frenchmens hearts to desire their King.

And thus he makes the way for Chilperics returne, by a very happy dexterity, and the euent was answerable. Gillon (having put these aforesaid to death) became very odious to the French. Guyemans abandons Gillon, and cunningly embraceth this occasion, in fauor of Chilperic. He blames the French for their lightnesse, to haue expelled their naturall Lord, and receiued a stranger farre more insupportable. Thus he makes them resolute to call home Chilperic: who vnderstanding their desire, and seeing the peece of gold (the token of his returne) sent by his faithfull friend, returnes confidently into France: hee is receiued by the French, and by their aide forceth Gillon to resigne him the place, and to retire himselfe to Soissons. Such was the first part of Chilperics life. The last was of another temper: for being taught by himselfe, he was so addicted to do good, as he got the good will of the French, of whom he was beloued, honoured, and obeyed all the rest of his life. So as to good mindes capable of reason, affliction serues as a chastisement, and not for a ruine: for an instruction, and not a destruction. He did fight happily against Odoacre King of the Saxons, subdued the Germans, and wonne a great country along the Rhine. He added to this State the Country of Aniou, hauing forced the City of Angiers: and to make his happinesse absolute, he had one sonne, who augmented and assured his Realme. They only obserue one notable error committed after his returne, in taking Basine to wife, being the wife of Basin King of Turinge, who had courteously entertained him in his distresse, violating the sacred lawes of hospitality, suffering himselfe to be abused with the loue of a woman, accounted a witch: for they say, this woman (who had forsaken her husband for him) made him to see a vision the first night of their vnlawful marriage, the which did represent the state of the succeeding kingdom, by Lions, Vnicornes, Leopards, the which appeared first in this vision, then by Beares, and Wolves: and lastly by Cats, Dogs, and other small beasts, the which did teare one another in sunder. You must pardon these fables of antiquity (bred as it seemes long after) by the which she would represent the estate of the three races, according to their diuerse currents.

CLOVIS the first, the first King of France, and the 1. Christian King.

L O V I S, succeeding his father Chilperic, was installed in the Royaltie, by the French, according to their ancient custome, borne vpon a target in open assembly. He began to reigne the yeare 485. and reigned thirty yeares. He had scarce attained to the age of fifteene yeares, when as he mounted to the royall throne. A yong man of great hope, borne for the setting of this monarchie. His forefathers had laied the foundation, but hee did build vpon these goodly beginnings with so great valour, wisdom, and good fortune, as he is to be held for one of the greatest Architects of this estate, hauing had the honour to be first King of France that receiued the Christian religion, the greatest beauty of this Crowne: and a priuilege so carefully planted by his successors, as they haue purchased the title of most Christian, as a marke of their chiefest greatnesse. The progresse of the History will shew both his vertues, and vices. But at this entrie, his minde being guided to so great a worke (whereunto the wise prouidence of Almighty God had appointed him) fortifieth it selfe, the first 5. yeares of his raigne (being the time of his apprenticeship) before he vndertooke any thing, the which he did manage so discreetly, embracing all occasions that were offered, as in the end he thought himself able to subdue all Gaule, if God had not staied the ambitious course of his vnlimited desires. F signes to let great men vnderstand, that he reserues a Soueraigne prerogatiue ouer all their enterprises.

We haue sayd before, that in the dissipation of the Empire, the Gaules had many vsurpers, Bourguignons, Goths, and Frenchmen: the Romaines had the least part, for hardly could they keepe Soissons, Compiègne, Senlis, and other small townes thereabouts. The Bourguignons enjoyed a great country, the two Bourguognes, the Duchie and the Earledome,

Earledome, Saüy, Lyonnois, Forests, Beauuiois, Daulphine, and Prouince, Arles being A the Metropolitane City of the Realme. The Goths possessed all Gaule Narbonnoise, to the which they gaue the name, and al Guyenne with the appurtenances. The French had the best part, from the Rhine vnto Loire, imbracing al the rich Prouinces of the low Countries vnto the Ocean, the countries of Heynault, Cambresie, Picardy, Normandy, the Isle of France, Maine, Aniou, Touraine, Vandomois, the prouince of Orleans, Beausse, Hurepois, Gaftrinois, Sologne, Berry, and the neighbour countries, although these great and large territories had particular Lords: amongst the which the King was acknowledged for Sovereigne, such was the estate of Gaule, when as Clouis vnderooke the helme of this French Monarchy. To become absolute Maister of this goodly country, which was set to sale to the mightiest: he begins with the weakest, the neerest, and him with whom he had the most apparent shew of quarrell: which was the Romaine, who held nothing of this great name, but the shew and pride, in a weaknesse altogether contemptible. Siagrius sonne to that Gyles of whom we haue spoken, commanded at Soissons for the Romans. Clouis had an hereditary quarrell against him, hauing sought to vsurpe his estate; irreconcilable quarrels among Princes. Hauing so goodly a shew to demand reason for so notable a wrong, he defies him. They assemble their forces: Clouis calles to his aide Ragnachaire, the petty King of Cambray, and Chararic of Amyens: the first assists him, the other excuseth, being desirous to keepe the stakes, and to be a looker on, and then to ioyne with the stronger. Siagrius is ouercome in bataille. In this buerthrow he leaues his estate to Clouis, and flies to Alaric King of the Goths, being at Tholouse. C
Clouis not content with Siagrius goods, demands his person of Alaric, and obtaines it.
Siagrius is sent vnto him, his hands and feet bound. Hauing him in his power, he makes him taste the griefe of his misery, reproching him that he had basely lost his gouernment and deserued capitall punishment, and so he cuts off his head; and afterwards he suppresseth Chararic, and Ragnachaire, ypon diuerse occasions. Hauing seized vpon all that belonged to the Romaine name, he turned his resolutions against the Bourguignons and the Goths: but with an industry fitting so politike a head, seeking some colour of iustice;
he makes a league of peace with the two nations, to pick a cause of quarrell, hauing some contouerfie with their Kings, for some title in shew lawfull: The issue is answerable to his designe, for he knew so well how to obserue times, watch for occurrences, and creepe D, so cunningly into their affaires, as in the end he dispossessed them both.

Clouis aspires to the Monarchy of all Gaule.

The first rooting out of the Romanes.

In the house of Bourgondy there were foure brethren, Gondebault, Gondegefil, Chilperic and Gothemar, the children of Gondioch. The ieaousie of their portions thrusts them into choller, and the fury of couetousnesse polluted the hands of Gondebault the elder with the parricide of his yonger brother Chilperic, and of his wife, but God preferred
Clotilde from the cruelty of this man, being the daughter of Chilperic, to be the meanes of this murderers misery. She was exceeding faire: this quality bred a desire in Clouis;
but especially to get footing in Bourgondy, and some interest to deale with the affaires of that estate: for which reason Gondebault would by no meanes like of that alliance:
yet not daring to shew the true cause, he made the pretext of his refusal to be the diuersity of religion, which could not agree with these vnequall marriages. Clouis preuented it with great policy, for hauing promised Clotilde that she should haue libertie of conscience, he remooues the let wherewith Gondebault did crosse him: so as the marriage was concluded. And although Clouis were a Pagan by profession, yet was he no enemy to the Christians, fitting himselfe to the humour of the Gaulois, who generally followed the Christian religion. He suffered his wife likewise to baptise her children: and three a wife Princeesse insinuating with her husband, desired nothing more then to winne him vnto God, the which chanced in this sort. Clouis did succour the Sicambriens his allies, (which be the inhabitants of Gueldres and Iuliers) against the Germans. Being in the bataille, he found himselfe ingaged in the midst of his enemies troupes and in great danger of his life. He then makes a vow vnto God, that if he would giue him the victory, he would presently submit himselfe to the Christian Church, and be baptised. God heard him. He obtaines the victory, and being returned, he resolues to performe his vow.
His wife Clotilde infinitely glad of this holy resolution, sends for Saint Remy Bishop of Rheims,

Clouis becomes a Christian.

A Rheims (a man of great pietie and eloquence) to instruct him in the true doctrine, wherein he was very ignorant, as a man that had made profession of armes all his life, borne and bred in superstition, and neuer had discoursed of Christian religion, but like a souldiar. It was necessary he should be instructed by a discreet man, that in leauing the vanity of the Pagans, he were not infected with the errors of the Arrians, which then were dispersed in diuerse places. And euen his owne sister Lamie was infected therewith.

The preaching of Saint Remy had great efficacy with Clouis: and the example of Clouis with all his men of warre. In this action, these goodly sayings are worthy to be noted.
Bend thy neck to the yoke in mildenesse (saith Saint Remy to Clouis) worship that which thou hast burnt, and burne that which thou hast worshipped. And he answereth, I worship the true God which is the father, the sonne and the holy Ghost, the Creator of heauen and earth. So, being baptised, he exhorts his men to the same beleefe. They cry all ioyntly. We leaue our mortal Gods, and are ready to follow the immortal. So Clouis was baptised at Rheims by Saint Remy, with great solemnity, and with him three thousand of his souldiars, to the incredible ioy of the Gaulois, greatly affected to Christian religion: hoping by this con-uersion to haue better vsage in time to come.

This act is very remarkable, hauing consecrated our Kings to Christian religion, the which hath preferred this realme vnto this day from most horrible confusions. Armonius saith: that a doue brought a viall full of oile in her bill, at that instant, with the which our Kings are annointed, when they are installed. But Gregory of Tours, a more ancient Author, writes onely, that Clouis was baptised. They likewise hold, that Clouis did at that time change the royall armes, and that for three toades, or as the learned say, three diademes gueules, in a field argent, he tooke the floures de-lis without number. Many monuments of our Kings in the first and second race, iustifie this change of armes, made by Clouis, as we see them in the most ancient Temple. Without dilating any more thereof,
Charles the sixth, in the Scutcheon of France, reduced the floures de-lis to three.

This publique profession of Christianity wonne the hearts of all the Gauls vnto
Clouis, and did perfect the vniõ betwixt them and the French, making their yoke easie, and them tractable. He fortified his command with this bond of religion, and layed a foundation for the absolute greatnesse of this Monarchy, which euen then beganne to take place, throughout all Gaule: Thus Gaule (with more solemnity then vnder Merouee) was called France, by the common consent of all nations: the Gaulois were no more grieved to serue the French, being victors: hauing willingly suffered themselves to be conquered, and hauing one faith and one law; they could not but with the good of their common country: so much may religion preuaile to vniõ mens hearts in a commonweale. In this beginning Clouis shewed an excellent fruite of his baptism, exceeding all his conquests. By his last victory he had subdued the Germans, and to accustom them to obedience, had imposed great and rigorous burthens. But now he doth relieue them: sends home their hostages, and moderates their yoke, shewing thereby that he is grown milder. This humanity was approued as a second victory, and more honorable then the first. Truly it is as great a victory in a great Prince, to conquer by clemency, as it is a profitable policy to winne mens hearts by reason. The Conquerour that pardons, beautifies his triumph, adding to their conquered bodies their hearts, admiring his vertue no lesse victorious then his forces.

Clouis was ill affected to the Visigoths, who held a great & large country in Gaule, obscuring the French Monarchy, the which he desired to settle: but he must finde some honest pretext to make warre. Although in effect the right of conueniency was his greatest interest, as it is often the most lawfull title of Princes: yet hee seeks a quarrell against Alaric King of the Visigoths, vpon the alliance he had made with him, the which (hee faies) had bene broken, for that the banished men, and malefactors of France, had found a free and assured refuge in his dominions: wherevnto he added a complaint of their bounds, in the division whereof he would resolutely haue the advantage. But to giue a better colour to this quarrell of State, he ioynes religion: For (saith he to his people) to what end should these Arrians haue so good a part among the Christians? Yet before he would come to open force, hee talks of a friendly conference.

Religion the only true
bond of affections.

503.

The two Kings appoint a day and a place for an enterview, to parlee of their affaires. A But this meeting increased their hatred: for being both vpon the place, some confident seruants to Clouis, gaue him notice, that Alaric had laide an ambushe to surprize him in their parle. Clouis was much moued herewith and resolues to make warre against Alaric: he raiseth an army, and being ready to march towards Guyenne, behold a new occasion, which makes him turne his forces towards Bourgongne.

Warres in Bourgongne,
and vniuers.

We haue shewed, how that Gondebault King of Bourgongne, slue his brother Chilperic, father to Clotilde, vpon the first diuision of their portions, after their fathers death. He had two brethren remaining, Gondemar and Gondegesil, of whom he desired infinitely to bee freed, hauing too many bretheren, and too little land, according to his vnstatable desire. Their debate was for Prouence and Daulphine, which they demanded for their portions. Gondebault enioyed the chiefe Cities, except Vienne, which the brethren held. Clouis his Army ouercomes that of Gondebault, marching victoriously through the countries of Venaifon, where the battaile was fought. Gondebault saues himselfe with great difficulty in Auignon, and is presently besieged by Clouis, who yet grants him an honourable composition, and labours to reconcile him with his bretheren: which done, he returnes into France, and Gondemar and Gondegesil retire into Vienne, dreaming of nothing lesse then to haue their elder brother for an enemy. But Vienne must be the pitfall of their misery, to swallow them both vp, one after an other: for behold, Gondebault is with a strong army at the gates of Vienne: and his brethren are reduced to that extremity, as hauing no meanes to defend themselves, nor to get reliefe from their friends, the City is easily taken, and euery man seekes to saue himselfe as he can. Gondemar flies into a Tower, where he is besieged, assailed, and burnt, with all his troupe. Gondegesil, is taken aliue after this tragick feare: but being alone, he slips away, and flies to Clouis, whom he found in Armes ready to march vpon this new accident.

Clouis takes new aduise. The ancient hatred he bare to Gondebault: (who had crossed him in his marriage,) the iniustice, and more then barbarous cruelty: the complaint of this poore Prince his allie, who cast himselfe into his armes, had much power to perswade him to the voyage of Bourgongne. But that which made him resolute, was for that Gondebault prepared to succour Alaric, against whom Clouis did now march with his forces. Thus the iust iudgement of God provided a scourge for his murderer, who addes rashnesse, and insolency to his first disorders. Clouis enters with an armie into Bourgongne. Feare doth not onely surprize the country, but also the peoples iust hatred of this tyrant, being infamous with so many parricides: so as in few daies the principall Cities yeeld vnto Clouis, and the rest are ready to submit themselves into his hands, as to their deliuerer.

Clouis conquests in Bourgongne.

Gondebault persued by God and men, faintes, being insolent in prosperity, and daunted in aduersity. All things conspired to his ruine. But as God doth not alwaies take sinners at the bound, he staied the blow by meanes of Clotilde, who greuing to see her house decay, to the ouerthrow of the estate of Bourgongne, makes sute to her husband, for her vnle and his country, and preuailes so with him, through her intercession, as shee perswades him to passe no further, but to leaue the rest to her vnle Gondebault, with a reasonable peace, whereof she drew the articles. Thus Clouis dismisseth his army, hauing onely provided for the gard of Vienne, Mascon, Chaalon and other townes taken from Gondebault, and he giues the charge of them to Gondegesil.

A treache-
of Gondebault.

This is all that Gondebault could hope for in so great a danger: but he would needes perishe, when as he sees himselfe without any enemy by Clouis departure, he marcheth so secretly with his forces, as in one night he surpriseth Vienne, by the Conduit heads, guided by him that had them in charge, being cast out off the Citie, with the scumme of vnprofitable people. Vienne must be the Sepulchre of Gondegesil, as it was of Gondemar: for in this vnexpected surprize, as hee, and the Bishop sought meanes to saue themselves in the temple of Saint Mory, amazement giues an easie entrie vnto Gondebault, who being maister thereof, doth massacre both Gondegesil, his brother, and the Bishop, without any respect.

A Gondebault, who vnable to resist, escapes by night, and saues himselfe in Italy, with Thierry, King of the Ostrogoths, his friend and confederate. There being tormented in conscience, without all hope of reliefe, he falls into horrible dispaire, and dies, hatefull euen to those that had receiued him: leauing a notable example to all men, that man is the cause of his owne misery; that he deceiueth himselfe, when as ouerruled by his owne passions, he thinkes to mocke God freely, who sleepest not, when as men are most secure in their wickednesse. But after a long patience, God paies both the principall, and the interest, and he that seekes an other mans goods, doth often loose his owne; the halfe being better then the whole, for to liue quietly with content. This was the end of Gondebault, and the beginning of the title which the Kings of France pretended to Bourgongne. The States of Prouence, Daulphine, and Sauoy were dependances on this crowne. Clouis reteyning Daulphine and the countries adioyning vnto Bourgongne, he left Sauoy, and Prouence to Sigismund, and Gondemar the children of Gondebault, ioyning equity and mildnesse to his iust victory.

The first winning of Bour-gongne,
Daulphine
and Prou-
ence.

B Hauing thus settled the affaires of Bourgongne, he marcheth presently with his victorious armie into Languedoc, against Alaric King of the Visigoths, who held not onely that goodly Prouence, but all the Country from the Pirenean mountaines, euen to the bankes of Rofne and Loire, as we haue said. Clouis hauing assembled his army at Tours, marcheth into Poictou, where Alaric attends him with his forces, meaning to fight with him at his entrie.

C The battaile is giuen, and much blood shed on either side, but the absolute victory remaines to Clouis: as the bodies, the field, and the head of Alaric, whom he slew with his owne hand: an accident very remarkable, that one Prince should kill another in the fury of the fight. This happened in the yeare of our Lord 509. The fruit of this notable victory was so great, as all yeelded to Clouis, where he marched. Those of Angoulême made shew of resistance: but a great part of the wall being fallen (as it were miraculously) not onely the City yeelded, but all the country (being terrified) offered their voluntary obedience vnto Clouis: as if God (holding him by the hand) had put him into the possession of all that Prouence, as the lawfull heire. Auvergne makes some shew to resist, but in the end it yeelds with all the townes of the Prouence: In this generall reuolt against the Visigoths, Almaric, the sonne of Alaric, getters a new head in the countries of his obedience, with wonderfull speed. Clouis seekes him out, and finds him nere to Bourdeaux. The battaile is fought, and the slaughter great on either side: the one army fights for honour, and the other for life, and goods. But Clouis remaines conquerour, who in detestation of his enemy, calles the place the Arrien field; which name continues vnto this day. Almaric flies to Thierry his confederate, King of the Ostrogoths in Italy, with an intent to returne speedily to be reuenged of Clouis. All the country remaines peaceable to Clouis: yea Tholouse the capitall city of the Goths kingdome. And thus he returnes, leauing a part of his army in garrison in the townes of his new conquest, vnder his sonnes command: and in his Standard (as a trophæ) he carried for a deuice, Veni, vidi, vici, I came, and saw, and ouercame, like vnto Cæsar. This great conquest gotten with incredible celerity, and admirable successe, is a worthy prooffe of Gods providence, who disposeth of States according to his wise, and iust pleasure, pulling downe one, and raising vp another.

Alaric slaine
by the hand
of Clouis.

D Thus Clouis hauing expelled the remainder of the Romaines, seized on the Bourgongnons estate, and of the Visigoths: remaining in a manner absolute Lord of the Gaules; vnder the title of the Realme of France. He desired much to liue at Tours (as indeed it is the goodly garden of France: but seeking to giue a perfect forme to this new estate, (as one head hath but one body) he choseth Paris for his capitall City, being seated in the Isle of France, and the true mansion of Kings, as well for the fertile beauty of the country thereabout, as for the concurse of riuers, which bring infinite commodities from all parts, by the channell of the riuier of Seine, into the which all the rest fall, as the common store-house of all commodities. Thus Paris from small beginnings (as may be noted by the low buildings and narrow streets of the Isle, being the first plot) is growne to a wonderfull greatnesse, being the head City of all the Realme.

504.
The Emperour sends
to Clouis.

The brute of Clouis force, published all ouer, with a great renoune of his valour, moued *Anastasi*us Emperour of the East, to desire his friendship: although he had more reason to be his enemy, hauing dispossessed him of his ancient inheritance. Thus the Empire declined, flattering his most dangerous enemies, against whom he should oppose himselfe. Hee salutes him with a very honourable Ambassage, sends him a Senators roabe, the priuilege of a Patrician and Citizen of Rome, and the dignity of a Consull: in signe of the honour his successors should haue, to be Emperours, and to preserue the reliques of the Empire from a generall shipwrack. Clouis entertained *Anastasi*us Ambassadors with honour and bounty, desirous to ouercome them with curtesie, as well as by the valour of his victorious armes.

Clouis being
is conquered.

The violent course of Clouis victories seemed vnresistable: but behold an vnexpected enemy, not onely staies him foderly, but takes from him the greatest part of his new conquests, defeats his Army, and draws him into danger neuer to performe any thing worthily. The nation of the Gothes was then very great, being dispersed in diuerse parts: in Gaule, Italy and Spaine, so as one people issued from the same beginning (as we haue said) was distinguished by diuerse names, to marke the places of their seuerall abodes. The Wisigoths or rather Westgoths, were they that dwelt in the West, that is to say in Gaule, West to Italy: the Ostrogoths or Eastgoths possessed Italy, by consequence East to Gaule. These Eastgoths had done great and notable exploits in Italy, taken and sackt Rome, and hauing seized on the goodliest countries of Italy, had there established a kingdome vnder their name, the which was ruined by the Lombards, and the Lombards by the French, as we shall see in the continuance of this history.

These Goths (named Getes by the Greekes) an ancient people of Asia) scattered themselves first along the riuer of Danuby, entring the Countrey nere to Constantinople, as well on the maine land, as in the Taurique Cherfonse, nere to this quarter. And so extending their limits, did possesse Valachier and Hongarie, and in the end Scandia, and the Countrey which lies nere the Riuer of Vistula, in the Countrey of Sueden towards the Baltique Sea: where they made their last retreat, after many losses, receiued in diuers places, seeking of their fortunes. The Realme of Gothland carries their name euen vnto this day. I thought good by the way, to note the estate of the Gothes being fit for this subiect.

Thus the successe of the French forces, and the alliance so carefully sought by the Emperour, (a capitall enemie to the Gothike name) did easily moue Thierry King of the East-goths, to succour his kinsman Almarick, a Prince spoiled of his possessions: whose example did sollicit all the Goths to preuent the danger, which did threaten them very nere. So as from Italie, Sicile, Sclauonia, and Dalmatia, by his owne means, and the credit of his friends, he gathers together fourescore thousand fighting men, the which he giues to Ibba to lead against Clouis; and he himselfe remaines in Italy, to make head against the Emperours designes, least he should cause some diuision in fauour of Clouis his confederate. The Gothike army enters by Piedmont, takes Grace and Anti-bou, and in short time, all Prouence obeyes him.

A great losse
both of Provincies and men.

The people of Languedoc (louing their old maisters, and not able to indure the infolencie of a new) yeeld easily to the stronger. Prouence remaines thus to the East-goths, and Languedoc returns to the Vuisigoths: Clouis being brought a sleepe with the imagination of a generall triumph, awakes at this brute: he armes, and marcheth speedily against the enemie: he is beaten, and loofeth 30000. men, at this encounter: whereby it appeared, that he held not victories at his girdle, nor they proceeded not from his valour. Clouis who vanquished euery where, finding himselfe beaten, and not able presently to make head against a victorious enemy, returns into France, rather madde then transported with furious choller, tossing in his braines how to be reuenged of so notable a disgrace. The Goths giue him leaue to runne and take cold, being content to haue recovered their owne. After this he attempted no more against them, and the greatest part of Bourgongne returned to the children of Gondebauls. But in the end, both Prouence and Bourgongne shall be incorporated to the Crowne, by diuerse accidents, the which we will note in diuerse places.

Clouis suruiued five yeares after all these losses, remaying commonly at Paris, hauing no heroick mind, to attempt any great conquests, yet of a cruell disposition, which made him dye with desire of other mens goods: He employed all his wits to put his kinsmen to death, hauing some seignories included within the compasse of his great monarchy, with an imagination to leaue his children a great estate vnited. In this dessein, he puts to death Chararic, to haue Amiens: Ragnachaire, to become maister of Cambray: and Sigibert, to haue no companion at Mets, although he were acknowledged in all these places for soueraigne. This rauishing of other mens goods was vnexcusable, but his tragically proceedings to haue it, was more detestable. I tremble to represent the horror of these execrable crimes:

510.
Clouis cruell practises to become great.

you may read them in the original of Gregory of Tours. The truth of the History requires they should be registred, but reason would haue the memory of so dangerous examples buried in obliuion. I desire to be dispensed withall, if I discourse not of these monstrous enormities. A modest tragedy goares not the scaffold with the blood of Iphigenia, being content to report by a messenger, that she was slaine by her fathers command, drawing a curtaine to hide the blood. But if any one will vrge me with the debt which a history doth owe, I will say that Clouis caused Chararic to be slaine, hauing seized on him and his sonne, and condemned them to a monastery. As they were cutting of their haire, the son seeing his father weepe bitterly, he said: These greene branches will grow againe: meaning the haire they cut off: for the stocke is not dead: but God wil suffer him to perishe that causeth them to be cut off. Clouis aduertised of this free speech. They complaine for the losse of their haire: (sayes he) let their heads be cut off. And so they were put to death. To get Ragnachaire (who had faithfully serued him both against Siagrius, and in all his other enterprises) he corrupted some of his domesticall seruants, with promise of great rewards, in token whereof he sent them bracelets of latten guilt. These traytors bring him Ranachaire and his brother with their hands and feet bound: Who beholding them: Outcasts (saith he) of our race, unworthy of the blood of Merouee, are you not ashamed to suffer your selues to be thus bound? you are unworthy to liue: repay the dishonour you haue done to our blood with your bloods: and so he strooke either of them with a Battle-Axe which he held in his hand, and slew them both, in the presence of his Captaines and Councell. But when as the Traitors demanded their reward, and complained of his Bracelets: Auant (saith he) Traytors, is it not enough that I suffer you to liue? I loue the treason, but I hate traytors. But the last exceeds the rest. Hee perswades the sonne of Sigibert to kill his father. This infamous parricide murders him, and returns to Clouis, to put him in possession of his treasures, whom hee had thus massacred: who being in the chamber, and bending downe into a Chest, to draw forth bagges full of gold, hee caused his braines to be beat out, and being the stronger, seized on Mets, making a good shew to the people, as ignorant of this murder.

murders
by Clouis.

Thus Clouis liued: thus hee reigned, and thus hee dyed, in the yeare of our Lord 514: of the age of forty five, the thirtieth yeare of his reign, in the flower of his enterprises, in the City of Paris. A Prince whom wee must put in ballance, to counterpoise his vertues with his vices: valiant, politick, colde, wise, temperate, diligent in execution, of admirable authority, and indued with excellent politicke vertues, fitte for an estate. Contrarywise, hee was extremely couetous, ambitious, wilfull, cruell, bloody, infinitely giuen to the world, immortalizing his good hap in this mortall life, by his many enterprises, the which hee feared not to execute with the losse of other mens goods and liues. Wee must not wonder, if wee read of confusions in the following reignes: wherein wee shall first see bloud for bloud, and the robber robbed, spoiled, dispossessed, according to the trueth of Oracles. Woe to thee that robbest, for thou shalt be robbed: that killest, for thou shalt be killed: the same measure thou measurest, shall be measured to thee againe.

Clouis.

vices.

Vnder his reign the Romane Empire vanished quite in the West. Spaine, Gaule, Italy, and Germany, were seized on by strange nations, retaining no markes of the Romaine name. The East had yet some shewes of the Empire, whereof Constantinople was the seat. Leo, Zeno, *Anastasi*us Emperours liued in those dayes, with many enemies, shame and losse. The Pope of Rome thrust himselfe forward amidst these confusions and ruines, to recoue.

The sixth raigne vnder the foure sonnes of CLOVIS.

who raigned together forty and two yeares, as Kings of France, yet with a particular title vnder this generall: but in the end Clotaire remained King alone; and therefore their raignes are distinguisbed.

To this coniunction of foure brethren some giue the sixth degree in the number of Kings, and Childebert as the eldest, beares the title.

CHILDEBERT the sixth King of France.

CLOVIS his designe was to rule alone in a great vnited Kingdome, but he sees his resolutions frustrate: for this vaste body, compounded of many peeces, is scarce vnited, but it is disioyned againe, yea in his life time: and the rest is diuided into foure parts to his children, according to the lawes of nature, but to the visible preiudice of the Estate, incompatible of so many maisters, as the following discourse will shew. A lesson both for great and small, and a notable president of the vanity of humane enterprises:

A enterprises: where the end is not alwaies answerable to the beginning. They take great paines to settle a firme estate, which shalbe soone dismembred, either by law or force, and that shalbe dispersed sodeinly, which was gathered together too hastily.

Let euery one consider, what he leaues to his Children, for the which there is no warrantable caution, but a good tide. These foure sonnes diuide the realme into foure Kingdomes. Childebert was King of Paris, and vnder this realme was comprehended the Prouinces of Poitou, Maine, Touraine, Champagne, Aniou, Guyenne and Auvergne. Clotaire King of Soissons: and the dependances of this realme were Vermandois, Picardy, Flaunders and Normandy. Clodomyr King of Orleans: and the estates of this realme, were, all the Duchy of Orleans, Bourgongne, Lionois, Daulphine, and Prouence. Thierry was King of Metz: and to his realme were subiect, the country of Lorraine, and all the countie from Rheims vnto the Rhine, and beyond it all Germany, which was the ancient parrimony of the Kings of France. He was receiued in this royall portion with his brethren, although he were a bastard, the which hath bene likewise practiced by others in the first race. And as euery one of these foure Kings called himselfe King of France, so they also added the name of their principall City where there they held their Court. Thus they called them by special title, Kings of the City where they had their residence. And in truth euery one carried himselfe as King in the countries vnder his obedience, not acknowledging the elder, but by mouth only.

B As the plurality of Maisters is a plague in an estate, so is it miraculous that the realme had not bene ruined by so many Kings: especially amidst such monstrous confusions, which then reigned, full of treacheries, cruelties, and parricides. I tremble to enter into this labyrinth, the which I will but passe ouer, measuring the Readers sorrow by my griefe, in writing and reading these tragicall confusions. But let vs obserue things by order. After these foure brethren had peaceably made their diuisions, and taken lawes of their owne accord (in the yeare 515. according to the most approued calculation) they marry their sister Clotilde to Almarie, sonne to Alarie, King of the Visigoths, who had recouered a good part of Languedoc, the which Clouis had taken from his father, and by this marriage they yeeld vnto him the City of Toulouse. But this alliance was the cause of great diuisions, and ruine. Ambition and Couetousnesse (good Counsellors of State) made euery one to conceiue as great a Kingdome for himselfe as that of his father, perswading them to attempt any thing to be great. Bourgongne was quietly returned into the possession of Gondebaulds children, Sigismond had the name of King, as the elder, and Gondemar a portion.

C Clodomyr King of Orleans, as nearest neighbour, casts his eyes vpon this goodly country, although he had no cause of pretension, but onely conueniency. Yet he finds a colour to beginne this quarrell. The rights pretended by his mother Clotilde, issued from the house of Bourgongne, and the zeale of Iustice, to chastise Sigismond; for that he had slaine his eldest sonne, to please his second wife and her Children. He enters into Bourgongne with a mighty army, seizeth on Sigismond, his wife and children, brings them to Orleans, and there castes them all into a well. Thus God punished the cruelty of Sigismond, an vnkinde father, by a cruell and disloyall hand. Clodomyr presumed, that he had conquered all, hauing slaine the King of Bourgongne. But the Bourguignons, incensed with this cruelty, confirme Gondemar in his brothers seat, and leauy an army to defend him against Clodomyr.

D The armies ioyne. Clodomyr putt vp with this first successe, promysing vnto himselfe a second triumph, who thrusting himselfe rashly into his enemies troupes, is slaine with a Lance, and is knowne by his long haire, the marke of Kings; and Princes of the bloud, as we haue said. The Bourguignons cut off his head, perch it on the top of a Lance, and make shew thereof to the French, in derision: who retire themselues after the death of their Generall. But Childebert and Clotaire his brethren, returne into Bourgongne with a strong army, and force Gondemar to flie into Spaine, leauing them free possession of the realme, the which was their proiect, rather then the reueng of their brothers death. Bourgongne was diuided among the brethren, as a common prey, all the realme of Bourgongne is therein comprehended. Thierry King of Metz had his part, but the poore children of brethren.

Clodomir are not only excluded, but two of them are barbarously slaine by the cruel commaundement of their vnnatural Vncles: and they say that Clotaire slew one of them with his owne hands, in the presence of Childebert: the other was thrust into a monastery. This confusion was followed by two others. Thierry King of Metz, making warre against them of Turinge, called his brother Clotaire to his aide: being repulsd at the first by the force of that nation; but assisted by his brother, he preuailes, and the vanquished stand at the mercy of the conquering bretheren: but behold they fall to quarrell for the spoile.

An admirable

Thus the ende of a forein warre was the beginning of a ciuill dissention betwixt them. They leauy forces, with intent to ruine one another. Childebert ioynes with his brother Thierry, against Clotaire. Such was the good gouernment of these bretheren, as desire and ambition did counsell them. They are in armes ready to murder one another. As their armies stood in field ready to ioine, behold a goodly cleere day ouercast sodenly with such darkenesse, that all breakes out into lightening, thunder and violent stormes; so as the armies were forced to leaue the place, and by this aduertisement (as it were from heauen,) these Kings, assembled to shed blood, change their mindes, and turne their furious hatred into brotherly concord. Thus God (the protector of this estate) hath watchd ouer it, to preferre it, euen when as they sought to ruine it, and that men hastened to their owne destructions. But from thence the vnited bretheren passe in to Languedoc, against Almaric King of the Visigoths their brother in law. The cause of their quarrell came from their sister Clotilde, married to this Gothie, as we haue said: so as shee, which should be the vnitng of their loues, was the cause of their bloody dissention. She was a Christian, and hee an Arrian. This difference in religion was cause of the ill vsage shee receiued from her husband, and his subiects. These bretheren, incensed by the complaint and calling of their sister, enter into Almarics Country, with their forces: who hauing no meanes to resist, seekes to saue him-selfe: but he is taken and brought before his bretheren in law, by whose commaundement he was slaine.

Thus Childebert and Thierry, hauing spoyled the treasure, and wasted the Country of their confederates, returne into France, accompanied with their sister: but she died by the way, inioying little the fruite of her vnkind impatience; although shadowed with the cloake of inconsiderate zeale. Thierry dies soone after, leauing Theodebert his sonne, heir both of his Realme, and of his turbulent and ambitious humour. A part of Bourgongne was giuen him with the title of a King, the which he left to his sonne, and as a chiefe legacy, the hatred hee did beare to his brother Clotaire King of Soissons. As soone as hee sees him-selfe King by the decease of his father, he takes part with his Vncle Childebert King of Paris, against Clotaire his other Vncle, but by chance they were reconciled. Theodebert impatient of rest, seeking wher to imploy his forces, findes that the Danes (a people of the North,) did scoure along the Sea coast, to the great hinderance of the French Marchants: he marcheth against them, being resolute to fight with them. These forces were better employed then against his brother: so the successe was more happy, for he chased away the Danes, hauing defeated a great number, and purged the Ocean from pirates. This exployte wonne him great reputation in all places, so as hee is sought vnto by the Ostrogths in Italy, being pressed by Belisarius Lieutenant Generall for the Emperour Iustinian, and a very great captaine, who had recouered Sicile, Naples, and Pouille from them, and in the end the City of Rome, which he fortified. As the Goths estate declined daily in Italy, Theodas their king reiectd, & Vitiges chosen in his place, Theodebert comes into Italy, putt vp with his victory: he takes footing, and makes head against Belisarius: but forced with sicknesse, he retires to his owne house, leauing three chiefe Captaines for the gard of the places conquerd. In his absence the Goths are defeated, and Vitiges slaine. Totila, succeddes him, who (hauing taken and sackt Rome) did so restore the Goths estate in Italy, as he became fearefull to the Romaines.

happy warre.

But the chance turned against him: his army was defeated, and him-selfe slaine: and to increase the mischiefe, those great Captaines left by Theodebert were slaine one after another, so as the Goths being chased out of Italy, by Narses, all Theodeberts great hopes vanished: yet he laboured to attempt some great enterprife against the Emperour Iustinian, and drew much people to it: but hauing made this goodly shew, and put him-

A himselfe and his friends to great expences, he was forced to returne out of Italy, without effecting of any thing: leauing a goodly example to Princes, not to attempt lightly an vnecessary warre, least they buy losse and shame at too high a rate. In the end Theodebert (who thought to haue vanquished the mightiest enemies,) was slaine by a wild Bull, going a hunting: and his great enterprises were interred with him in the same graue, hauing hunted after vanity, and found death at the end of his immortall desseignes.

Theodebert left Theobald heire of the great estates of Austrasia, Bourgongne, and Turinge, the which hee did not long enioy, dying without children, and almost without any memory that hee had liued: but onely that hee had by will, left his Vncle Clotaire heire of all his goods, whereby there sprung vp a new warre. Childebert indured this testament impatiently; as well for that hee was excluded, as also for that his brother was made more mighty by his Nephewes estate: so couetousnesse and enuie giue him aduise to crosse him. Clotaire had one bastard sonne called Grans, a sufficient man, but very wicked and audacious, who (for his insolencies) was in disgrace with his father. Childebert resolues to oppesse this sonne against the father, and to vse him in the execution of his malicious intent. Thus abusing the absence of Clotaire, (who was busied in warre against the Saxons,) hee goes to field with a great armie, supposing to haue to doe but with young men and irresolute: and the more to amaze them, hee gaue it out that Clotaire was dead. This report was coloured with such cunning (as men doe often beleeue that which they feare) that these young Princes (seeing them-selues ouer-charged with great forces) yeeld to a preiudiciall peace with their Vncle. This heart-burning seemed to extend further, when as death surpriseth Childebert, who dyes the yeare 549. without any children, and leaues his enemy Clotaire for successor, being vnable to carry his realme with him.

A horrible
punishment
of a rebellious
sonne.

Clotaire returnes out of Saxonie, being offended with his bastard. Hee pursues him into Britanie, whether hee was fled; and by a wonderfull accident (guided by the Iustice of God, the reuenger of the sonnes rebellion against the Father,) Clotaire findes his sonne with his wife in a peasants house, where (transported with fury) he burnes them aliue, (yet not extinguishing the memory of his rebellion) to terrifie rebellious children by so memorable a president. Thus there passed forty five yeares in the barbarous and vnhappy raignes of these foure soueraigne Maisters, children to the great Clouis: in the which there is nothing memorable; but the remembrance of Gods iust iudgement, against those that suffer them-selues to bee transported by their passions: for all these vitious raignes were vnhappy, passed with much paine, and ended with much misery: represented to the perpetuall infamy of the vnkinde cruelties of their Kings.

CLOTAIRE.

CLOTAIRE the first, the seventh King of France.

CLOTAIRE remained sole King of France by the death of his brethren for their children were dead, and Childbert the eldest died without issue. Behold the fruit of so great paines; after their diuisions, to erect great Monarchies. Clotaire reigned five yeares alone: hee had by two wiues, five sonnes and one daughter, that is, Cherebert; Chilperic, Sigebert, Gontran, Gautier and Clofinde: not reckoning Granus, whom he had by a Concubine. His raigne was short and wretched. He sought to extort the thirds of all Ecclesiasticall liuings for his priuate affaires: but the Clergie opposed themselves against him, so as his threats preuailed not. In the beginning he subdued the Saxons, subiects to the French: but the Turingiens being vp in armes, & he about to suppress them, the Saxons ioyne with them, to withstand him with their common forces. Yet these mutinous nations (seeing themselves encountred by too strong a party) craue pardon, and promise him obedience. Clotaire refusing to accept it, forceth them to make defence: the which they performed so desperately, as they defeated the French: and Clotaire with great difficulty, saued himselfe.

An example for Princes, not to thrust their subiects into despaire: but to imbrace all occasions wisely, that may purchase a willing obedience, and not to seeke it by extremities. After this defeat, he returns into France, and being at Compiègne, he desires to goe a hunting. Being old and decayed, he heats himselfe, falls into a quotidian and dies, the yeare 567. He was much grieued in his sicknesse, hauing liued too too ill: but he protested, that he hoped in the mercies of God. As our histories report.

Before that he ruled as King alone, he erected the little realme of Yuetot, vpon this occasion. On good Friday he slew Gautier of Yuetot his seruant, in the Chappell whereas he heard seruice. They report the cause diuersely. The greatest part hold, that the King had rauished his wife, lodging in his house, so as he that was beaten suffered the punishment. Pope Engenius displeased with this infamous murder, condemned him to

A repaire the fault, vpon paine of excommunication. Clotaire for satisfaction ordeynes that from thenceforth the Lords of Yuetot should be free from all homage, service, and obedience due to the King, for the land of Yuetot in the Country of Normandy. And so this small seigniury hath continued long with the title and prerogative of a Realme, vntill that this title of a realme was changed into a Principality, the which the house of Bellay doth now enjoy. This was the life and raigne of Clotaire the first of that name, vitious, and vnsortunate, followed with a confused and horrible tragedy in his children, whom we must marke distinctly in the front of this tumultuous reigne, thereby to walke more safely in the blinde maze of these obscure gouernments.

CLOTAIRE the first of that name, had foure sonnes.

Cherebert King of France.

Gontran King of Orleans, or Bourgong.

Chilperic King of Soissons.

Sigebert King of Metz, or Austrasia.

All which reigned together fiftene yeares: but in this eight raigne they giue the ranke and name of King to Cherebert, as to the eldest, although each of them called himselfe King of France, and commanded absolutely ouer the Countries vnder their obedience.

CHEREBERT, the eight King of France.

Ve have seene the Strange gouernment of the foure sonnes of great Clotaire: let vs now view the rest of this table, in the children of Clotaire: who suruiuing his brethren, and their children, obtained the realme alone: but presently to bee diuided into 4. parts. Of 5. sons lawfully begotten, 4. suruiued him: Cherebert the eldest, Chilperic, Sigebert, and Gontran. His body was scarce interred, when as the fire of diuision kindled among the brethren, about the diuiding of the Realme. Chilperic, a crafty and proud A man, finds meanes to seize on his fathers treasure, and labours to become maister of the City of Paris. But not able to effect it, he was forced by his bretheren (supported by the the chiefe Noblemen of the Court) to come to a diuision, euery one according to his order. Cherebert, as the eldest of the house of France, hath Paris for his part. Gontran, Orleans, and Bourgoingne. Chilperic, Soissons: Sigibert, Metz, or Austrasia: euery portion with his dependances. After this diuision of parts, their wills were so diuided, as it is strang the realme had not bene vtterly ruined amidst these horrible confusions, in so feeble beginnings.

Prouince, by consent of the brethren, was giuen to Gontran King of Orleans, and Bourgoingne. But notwithstanding this accord, Sigibert, King of one part of Bourgoingne, and of Austrasia, contends for it with his brother, and sows diuision among the Prouenfalls, doubtfull to whome they should yeeld obedience in this contention. It had bene woone and lost by Clouis, (as we haue shewed) but soone after the death of Clouis, Thierry the Ostrogoth (who had wonne it) lost it againe, through the inclination of the prouenfalls, who willingly came to the antient obedience of the Crowne of France. And the Emperour Iustin the second, liking it better in the Frenchmens hands, then in the Ostrogoths, leaues them that which he cannot take from them. In this respect, he added his consent by his deed onely. After the death of Cherebert, his brethren contend for his spoyle, with irreconciliable hatred. Gontran was the most temperate and tractable, desiring that this discord for parts, might bee determined by the French Clergy, as iudges competent, and without passion. But his aduise was not allowed. Chilperic and Sigibert, ambitious and turbulent men, would carry it by force, yet was it agreed by common consent, that none of them should enter Paris, before this Question were decided, touching their portions. But there fell out other accidents vpon this Theater, where as cunning, malice, impudencie, and fury haue caused both men and women to play a long and tragike Scanne, being the Authors and enders of these miseries. I tremble at those confusions, whereas Brunehault and Fredegond two renowned women in our France, for their notable wickednesse, shall appeare in diuerse scenes of this tragedy, Brunehault was daughter to Anaharide King of Visigoths, the wife of Sigibert King of Metz, or of Austrasia. Fredegond first was concubine, and after wife to Chilperic King of Soissons. By the pollicies and impudency of these furious heads, it cannot bee spoken, how much misery France suffered during their raignes. But let vs view euery thing in order, if any order may bee found in the most horrible Chaos of infernall confusions. Sigibert was much troubled in his territories of Germany, to defend them against the Hunnes. Chilperic embracing this occasion against his brother, enters his country, with a great army, and takes from him the City of Rheims. This surprise awakes Sigibert: and for that hee would not loose the Principall, to keepe the accessary, he leaues Germany, and speeds into France, wonderfully greeued with the wrong hee had receiued from his brother: pursuing his reuenge with such vehemency, that hee takes Soissons, the capitall city of his Realme, with his sonne Theodebert, forcing him to retire with Fredegond to Tournay, being ashamed of his cowardly desseigne. Thus Sigibert comes a Conqueror to Paris, where he is receiued by common consent: and so all the cities belonging vnto Cherebert, yeeld him obedience. But as he thought himselfe a peaceable King, mounted to the top of his desires, hauing nothing to crosse him, but wallowing in his delights, behold two young fouldiours (suborned by Fredegond) came to his Court, enter freely into the hall, and approach so neere him, and with such opportunity, as either of them stabs him with his dagger, and hee falls downe dead in the place. These murderers were soderly torne in peeces, so as they could not be knowne, nor declare by whose commandement they had committed this murthre: yet was it generally thought, that this was the practise of Fredegond, to free her husband, and to make the way more easie for her affaires, by the death of this brother who crossed her most. In truth, the death of Sigibert changed the countenance of the Court: euery one runnes after Chilpericks fortune, who was receiued King of France, in the place of his elder brother, and hee entertaines all those with fauour that offer him seruice.

CHILPERIC the first, the ninth King of France.

Hus Chilperic, began to reigne in the yeare 578. and raigned, 14. yeares at Paris and Soissons, while that Childebert, the sonne of Sigibert, reigned in Austrasia, and Gontran at Orleans, and Bourgoingne. He found Brunehault the widow of Sigibert at Paris, a woman of a subtil and audacious spirit: so as fearing least she should animate his sonne against him, hee confined her to Rouan, whether hee likewise sent his sonne Merouee, to take possession of the City: but in steed of taking the City, he was surprised by the beauty of Brunehault, who could so cunningly gaine the loue of the inhabitants, as the Bishoppe him-selfe allowed of this marriage, although she were his Aunt. Chilperic moved with the same of this loue, which proceeded vnto marriage, came to Rouan and according to the Ecclesiasticall discipline, degraded and banished this Bishoppe: and by his absolute authority, puts Merouee into a Cloyster: But hee stayed not long there: for after the departure of Chilperic, a certaine friend of his called Boson, drew him forth, being set on by Fredegond, hauing brought with him three hundred men (too small a number to fight, and too many to fly.) And so it happened to Merouee, for being pursued and taken by his father Chilperic, he was slaine by his commandement. And least Andouere his mother, (a vertuous Princeesse) and Clouis her other son, should seeke meanes of reuenge, hee reiects his wife, and causeth Clouis his other sonne to be secretly slaine, being brother germane to Merouee. These disorders could not be done without the complaint of the Nobility against Fredegond, who held not yet the degree of a wife with Chilperic, although she had free access both to his Court and bed, from the which she had dispossessed his lawfull wife. Chilperic (to pacifie these complaints) pretends some reasons for this diuorfe: and disguising the murders cunningly, he takes Galsonde to wife, the daughter of Ashanagilde King of Spaine. But the impatiency of Fredegond, doth soone dissolue the bonds of this bashfull respect, thrusting Chilperic into such a fury against this second

The punishment of these crimes.

From these domestickall crimes, insolvency rageth against the poore people, by taxes, impositions, and insupportable exactions: and report imputes all to the deuils of the same workewoman. Complaints found out in all places: but absolute authority had so preuailed, as they could find no remedy: the people being weake, and such as else might haue had meanes to countenance the ancient French liberty, were either terrified or in-chaunted by this Proserpina. But Chilperic must beare the punishment of his execrable wickednesse, by the malice of her, who had made him an instrument to massacre brother, children, and wife, and to consume by degrees his poore subiects. Whilest that Chilperic loued her exceedingly, she affected a noble man in Court called Landry de la Tour (who by her fauour had obtained two of the greatest offices of the crowne, that is of Duke of France, and Maire of the Pallace) to whom she most vildly afforded the best place in the Kings bed. This villanous and detestable loue, was cunningly cloaked with the deuils of this strumpet: who hauing a sonne by Chilperic, as a new gage of loue, she purchased daily more credit with him. But this was a short comfort for Chilperic, for foure moneths after the birth of this sonne, whom he named Clotayre, he was vnhappy slain by her and Landry, when he least expected death: this was the occasion. One morning as Chilperic (ready to goe to hunting) came booted into his wiues chamber to salute her, he found her combing of her head, with her haire ouer her face: drawing nere vnto her without speaking, he toucheth her in iest, with his riding wand on the hinder part of the head: she supposing it to be her adulterer Landry, accustomed to come secretly vnto her at all houres, saith vnto him; In my iudgement Landry, a good Knight should alwaies strike before, and not behind. The King vnderstanding by halfe a word, more then he desired to know, departs amazed, takes horse and goes a hunting, not with any intent to kill the beast, but deuising how he might be freed of Fredegonde and Landry. But he had to doe with a woman of too subtile and wily a spirit, who hauing passed her apprenticeship in so many other murders, could soone resolue to deprive her husband of his life, to saue her owne. Without any further delay she sends for Landry, reports to him the history, concludes with him to kill the King her husband in his comming from hunting, and finds ministers to execute this designe: the which succeeded as they had plotted against Chilperic, suffering in the end (by the same hand, which he had caused to shed so much blood) the horrible paine of his miserable massacres: for as hee came melancholicke from the chase, accompanied onely with one Page, he was sodenly set vpon by these murderers, who slew him with his Page, so commodiously, as they returne vnderfied to the troupe, as if they had neuer dreamt thereon.

The King is found dead: euery one cries it, euery one runnes vp and downe, and those first of all that had done the deed. But it was giuen out, that the murderers were fled into Lorraine, from whence assuredly they were come by Childeberts command. The Court is filled with teares, especially *Fredegonde*s chamber, who continued in passions with her Landry, and could not be comforted: the one calling for her good husband, the other for his good maister: but the quick sighted held them for Crocodiles teares. Thus liued, and thus died Chilperic, hated and detested euen then, and of the posterity, for prooffe that a wicked life will haue a wicked end: and that God ruines the wicked by themselves, euen when they promise vnto themselves all impunity. They adde impiety to his execrable wickednesse: for he denied the truth of the three persons in one Deity, and the incarnation of the sonne of God, wherein consists the hope of our saluation. But admonished by the French Church, he protested to leaue his error. A monstrous reigne, vnder a monstrous King: where Potentates may see, that misery is the true reward of sinne: And that horrible crimes, are punished with extraordinarie paines euen in this life. This Tragickall end of Chilperic, a wicked and vnfortunate Prince, happened in the year of our Lord 588.

CLOTAYRE the second, the tenth King of France,

THe beginning, midst, and end of this reigne is remarkable, being apparent, that God is the true gardian of this realme, without whom it must needs haue perished in these strange confusions. Clotaire a yong child of foure moneths, gouerned by his mother, a most wicked woman, being come to yeares, he finds himselfe incumbered with many warres, yea ciuill wars against his owne kinsmen, and blood. Vnho will not then confesse the issue of his reigne, (being peaceable and well gouerned,) to be a singular testimony of the prouidence of God, towards this estate. This yong childe, the sonne of bad parents, was notwithstanding receiued for lawfull King by the French, by vertue of the fundamentall law, which had appointed this realme to be hereditary. Whereby is shewed, how farre the election of our Kings extend euen in this first race.

But to conceiue well the diuerse occurrents of this reigne, we must remember, that Clotaire the first, had foure sons, Cherebert King of Paris, who is reckoned the eight King of France, and died without children: Sigebert King of Metz, slaine by Fredegonde: and Gontran King of Orleans, who suruiued all his brethren, a good, and a wise Prince, and died without children. Sigebert King of Metz left for heire Childebert his sonne, with his wife Brunchault, a subtile, and a wicked woman. This ground being laid, I will returne to the course of my history. Gontran King of Orleans, vncke by the father to this yong king, was his nearest, and most assured kinsman, so as by a generall consent of the French, he was called to be Regent of the King, and realme. And now they talked of an assemblie: Fredegonde (flying the light and liberty of publique assemblies, fearing not onely to be reiectd from the gouernment, but to be accused for the murder of her husband) preuents the States from the challing of Gontran, the first Prince of the blood, and the Kings vncke: as they should haue done, if leisure had suffered them to assemblie, and to speake in an vnited body, with publike authority. Thus she gaynes time, beseeching the cheefe of the A Councell, to provide for the Conuocation of the Estates: and in the meane time, to giue order, that Gontran may come to Paris, both to informe of the execrable murder, and alio to take vpon him the charge of her son, and the gouernment of the common weale. This discourse was farre from her thoughts, but she supposed to make an euasion by this goodly shew. And in the meane time she practised to kill Gontran. She did write vnto him in all humility, holding him as a father to the King her sonne, and the support of her widowhood, Gontran foreseeing the pollicy of Fredegonde: provided so wisely, that being arriued at Paris, he was receiued by a generall consent, Regent of the Realme. He made no shew of discontent to Fredegonde, who notwithstanding (hauing a guilty conscience) B packs vp her baggage, being ready to fly vpon the least shew that Gontran would call her into question. But it was not his meaning: his only proiect was to bring vp his yong nephew, and to preferue him, with his realme, wherein he was borne, supposing this milde manner of proceeding to be the best, both for the King and the Realme.

Thus without any alteration, he wisely dissembles all the actions of Fredegonde, he respects her as the Kings mother, and imployes her in the education of her sonne. And knowing how much the presence of the Prince workes in the subjects, to haue him acknowledged for King, he makes a progresse throughout the Realme, leading with him this yong infant, with the mother, receiuing in all places, the oth of fidelty, and obedience. Being returned to Paris, he giues him in gard to the mother, and applyed himselfe wholly to the gouernment of the Realme. As the affaires were managed with this good order, two great difficulties crosse Gontran, almost at one instant: for Childebert King of Metz, (iealous of his vnckles Authority,) requires to be associated in the Regency, the which he pretended to appertaine vnto him, with the same right it did to Gontran; and Fredegonde: for the punishing of whom he complained much, both of the foulness of the fact, which should not remaine unpunished, and of Gontrons sufferance, which was too palpable. For the which Gontran provided, stopping Childeberts entrance into Paris, and causing Fredegonde to retire her selfe quietly to Rouan, by reason of the peoples hatred, reuiued by Childeberts complaint. And for that he would not seeme to haue altogether neglected the punishing of Chilperis murder, he caused information to be made against D a Chamberlaine of the Kings, called Cherulphe, who being found guilty, he caused him to be slaine in the Temple, whither he was fled. And so proceeded no farther in this search, least Fredegonde should be found too farre engaged. Besides this crosse, there happened a second, for one named Gondebault, hauing termed himselfe a long time to be the sonne of the great Clotayre, and kept in a Cloyster: in the end he escaped, and was openly maintained by Childebert, who fought but a colour of trole, and inuouation. He is followed by a part of the Nobility, and Clergy, and seizeth on many good Townes in Guienne. And hauing written his letters to all the Prouinces, he carries himselfe for lawfull heire of the Realme, with better right (said he) then this yong child, the sonne of a strumpet: And by consequence a doubtfull heire to the Crowne.

That which was most to be feared in this new accident, was the spirit and force of Childebert: but Gontran preuented it with iudgement. For seeing himselfe old, and without Children, and knowing his Nephewes humor, he doth institute him his heir, and by that meanes makes him to abandon Gondebault. So this supposed King left by Childebert, was soone abandoned by al the rest, and by them was deliuered into the hands of Gontran, who presently put him to death. And hauing assembled the Clergy of the realme, he caused the Bishoppes to be condemned, who had so rashly followed the frensie of this bold Impostor. Gontran hauing with such dexterity preuented these dangerous difficulties, and performed those good offices to the King his Nephew, in his infancy, he retires himselfe to Chaacons, where soone after he died without Children, leauing his estate to Childebert, and the realme of his poore pupill (who had scarce attained the age of ten F yeares) to the mercy of the waues and tempests of all sorts of miseries incident vnto states.

Gontran was no sooner dead, but the ambitious desire of Childebert, grown great by the new estates of Orleans and Bourgongne, inflamed him against yong Clotayre, conceiuing an

A an assured victory in his ouerweening braine, imagining soone to suppress a yong child and a woman ill beloued. But the God of victories had otherwise disposed: for Childebert hauing brought a mighty army to field, and entered into the heart of France: behold Fredegonde (armed with more then a manly courage, and wisdom, encounters him with another army, being fortified more by her exhortations, and the presence of the yong King, (whom she shewed openly to the French) then by the number of men of warre. The battaile was giuen, and the imagined Conquerour was vanquished by a child and a woman, beeing surprised with so happy a celerity by Fredegonde, as he could hardly beleue, she had bene parted from Paris, when as he sees his whole army defeated. He lost in this conflict 20000 men, his honour, and his life: for hauing recovered his Country with much a doe, he died of melancholy, leauing an memorable example to Princes, never to attempt a warre to take from another without iust occasion.

B He left two sonnes, Theodebert and Thierry: The first had for his portion the realme of Austrasia: the second had Bourgongne. Brunchault his mother suruiued him, and kept as Metz with the eldest: she presently stirred vp these two Princes (ouer whom she had great authority as their grandmother,) to pursue Clotayre, for the shame and death of their father. Behold suddenly an army of Austrasians and Bourgongnons, marcheth into France, led by these two yong Princes. Clotayre accustomed to these sports, opposeth himselfe in person, and gets the victory, with such successe, as they say the course of the river of Aurance (where the battaile was fought) was staid by the dead bodies of the conquered. Fredegonde leapt for ioy of this second triumph, by reason of Brunchault, who was her chiefe obiect: but her ioy was presently converted into her owne funerall, for she died soone after C to teach reuenging spirits, that their hatreds which they would haue perpetuall, are mortall, and at the least wife end with their deaths.

Thus Fredegonde died in her bed, and was intured neare to Chilperie, whom shee had caused to be slaine: so as in this peaceable death, we may consider the patience of God, which doth often attend those it respects to his last iudgement. But Brunchault (who thought her selfe a conquerresse, by the death of Fredegonde) her capitall enemy, incensed Theodebert and Thierry her grand-children anew against Clotayre. They raise another army, vnder the conduct of Bernold, not willing any more to hazard their persons, being D taught by the successe of two great defeats. Bernold is slaine in this battaile, and yet the victory remaines to his men, with great losse to the French: so as it seemed the war would grow more violent betwixt these Princes, who now beganne to see a part of their reueng against their cousin Clotayre. But the malice of Brunchault, who had banded the cousins, must now diuide the brethren.

This old bitch, euen in the fury of warre, found still meanes to follow her beastly lust, and then had she got a yong courtier called Protade, for a stallion: whom she entertained in view and knowledge of the whole Court, and aduanced him beyond duty or desert. The dislike of this vnchast conuersation (offensiu to the whole world) doth in the end force E Theodebert to finde a meanes to withdraw his mother from the view of the multitude, who were eye witnesss of the filthinesse of this shamelesse old woman, and of the ignominy of his house. He supposed to send her away with pollicie: perswading her shee should doe best to retire her selfe into some goodly monasterie, there to lead a godly life, and to seeke for rest besitting her age. This admonition caused her to leaue the Court, and State of Theodebert, but not to change her minde. Shee retires then from Metz, and comes into Bourgongne to her other sonne, full of choller: and finding Thierry ill affected against his brother, she presently kindles the vnfortunate fire of disention betwixt them, which consumed them both, and finally her selfe. That posterities may note in this tragicke, the examples of Gods iust iudgement, who punisheth one sin F by another, and the sinner by his owne sinne.

This lewd woman perswades Thierry, that Theodebert was a bastard, the son of a Gardiner, and that he had lawfull cause to make warre against him, as an vsurper of that which belonged vnto him by right. Thierry being exceeding couetous, embraceth this occasion, prepares an armie against Theodebert, and imployes this Protade in the principall charge, who was a kindler of warre in the spirit of this yong Prince: The chiefe Nobles men

599 men of Bougongne infinitely grieved with these disorders, not daring directly to charge Bruneault, they set upon her Minion and kil him. By this meanes they draw Thierry to an accord with his brother Theodebert: & so either of them sends back his troupes. Thus this fire seemed to be wholly quenched, the which kindled soone after in another place, and by the practises of the same worke-woman, Thierry had remained long unmarried, entretyning change of women, by the counsell of this bitch, who daily prouided him store of fine stuffe: but solicited by the continuall perswasions, and prayers of his Councell, he takes to wife, Ademburgue the daughter of Dataric, King of Spaine, louing her with that honest affection, that a man ought to loue his wife. Bruneault ialous of this lawful loue, fearing to be dispossessed of her authority & credit, if a lawful wife possessed her husbands heart, she workes by her charmes, reducing Thierry to that extremity, that he was not able to accompany with his wife; and for a bait to his adultery, shee furnissheth other women (whom he might freely vie) as she loathed him of this poore Princeesse, causing him to send her home to her father Dataric, as vnable to beare children: who infinitely grieved with this disgrace, done him in the person of his daughter, resolues to reuenge. Hee complains of this iniury, both to Clotayre, and Theodebert, whom he knew to be enemies to Thierry, and all together resolue to make warre against him.

Bruneault seeing this great storme ready to fall upon Thierry, she perswades him to compound with his brother Theodebert, at what price soeuer, whose humor she knew well. This accord was sold by Theodebert to Thierry at a deere rate: (for he had the Countries of Champagne, Touraine, Artois and many other places) but it cost him selfe much dearer: for by this composition, all the army was disperied, and euery one retired home. Thierry (who by the aduise of his mother, stood upon his guard) surpriseth his brother Theodebert, with such aduantage, that not onely he recouers all that he had giuen him, but by the Councell of this Proserpine, he embrewes his hands in his blood, murdering him most barbarously. Theodebert had but one onely daughter, whom Thierry would take to wife, to haue some honest pretext to seize upon all his Estates. But Bruneault, (who desired greatly to see him maister, but not to haue a companion in this absolute authority) dissuades him from this marriage, inferring (to couer her hidden intent) that it was not lawfull to marry his neece. Thierry blinded with passion (who by a iust iudgement of God, sought to die by payson of this viper, by whose meanes he had done so much mischief) replies, that the daughter of Theodebert was none of his Neece, seeing that Theodebert was not his brother, being begotten by another father: reproching Bruneault, that he knew no more then she had taught him. And that upon this occasion she had encouraged him to kill him. And as they grew hot in words, he threatened to kill her. Bruneault (seeing her selfe taken by the nose, and measured by the same measure shee had measured to others,) resolues to preuent Thierry, and to murder him. She therefore giues him a morsell mixt with a languishing poison, which caused him to consume of a bloody fluxe: that as he had spilt the blood of others, so he might die in blood: & that the same wretched counsell which had bene the sepulchre of his brother, should likewise be his owne: for a memorable example to posterity, that God suffreth nothing unpunished, and doth often punish the wicked by themselves, and by their owne practises. Such was the tragike end of the troublesome life of Thierry. But what shall become of Bruneault? The Iustice of God goes slowly, but he recompenceth the slownes with the grieuousnesse of the punishment. Let vs then heare the continuance of our history. Bruneault carries a good countenance after the death of Thierry. She makes him a stately funerall like a tourney: and of foure bastard sonnes which Thierry had left, she chooseth him that pleasest her best, to install him King in his fathers place: and in the meane time she continewes the government of the realme, and calles herselfe Regent. To conclude, she doth promise vnto herselfe, in all her courses, farre better successe then Fredogonde, presuming that she exceeded her in iudgement and experience, no man remaying to controule her actions: but her discourses were vaine imaginations, and her foolish hopes the snares of her owne ruine. The Nobility of Bougongne (infinitely grieved with the horrible wickednesse of this woman, resolute not to endure the new tiranny which she practised) had recourse vnto Clotayre, as to their true and lawfull Lord. Bruneault plaies the resolute

A Solute: she prepares to warre, sends diuerse Ambassadors into Germanie: the chiefe was Farnare Maire of the Pallace of Austrasia, a man of great authority both at home and with strangers.

Having sent him for succours to some Princes of Germany, shee growes ialous of him without cause, and sends a trustie seruant of hers named Aibon, to finde meanes to kill him. Aibon hauing read those deadly letters, teares them: but vnawares hee lets fall the peeces of this letter: the which are gathered vp and carried to Farnare: who upon this new accident, takes a new aduise. He resolues to crosse the practises of this murderesse (so well knowne and hatefull to all men,) who likewise would make away her best seruants, who had bene too faithfull vnto her, in the execution of her wicked designs. Farnare doth treat so politickly in Germany, as hee with-drawes their hearts and forces from Bruneault, and wins them vnto Clotayre. This Counter-battery thus made, hee returns into Bougongne. His returne bred an vnexpected change, for she, who had alwaies deceiued, and in the end fell into the snare which she had made for another. Farnare did not seeme to know what she had designed: whereby hee had meanes to counterminie all Bruneaults policies, with so wise a dissimulation, by his great authority, as he games all the chiefe men for Clotayre: deliues into his hands the children aforesaid, pretended to be heires; and by this meanes giues him an easie victory ouer Bruneaults troupes: who yielding vnto Clotayre, deliuer vp this wicked woman, the cause of all their miseries. So at length the Wolfe is taken vnwares. Clotayre a victor, was receiued by common consent of the Austrasians and Bourguignons, and by that meanes (being absolute maister of that great inheritance of Clouis his grand-father) beganne his reigne by a worthy act of memorable Iustice. Hauing in his power the chiefe motiue of all these mischiefes, he caused Bruneaults processe to be made by the greatest personages he could chooseth in all his dominions: that in so notable an assembly, the sentence might be irreprochable. By their censures, Bruneault was found culpable of infinite and horrible crimes, and was condemned to die, by a terrible and extraordinary punishment: for she was tied to the taile of a wild mare, and drawne through a stony and rough Country, so as (being torne into diuerse peeces) she died at diuerse times most iustly, as she had cruelly caused many others to die. A notable example, to shew, that the greatest cannot auoide the soueraigne Iustice of God, who punisheth in this world, when it please him: and when he spareth them, it is a signe, that he reserues the punishment to his last Iudgement. Thus died Bruneault, onely commended in histories, to haue built many temples, and giuen great reuenues for the mainteynance thereof, whilst that she wallowed in her pleasures. Saint Gregory hath set downe certaine letters of his to Bruneault, wherein hee commends her highly for her piety and singular wisdom. Clotayre seeing himselfe King of so great a monarchy, after a long & horrible confusion of intestine warres, imploied all his care to pacifie the realme, leauing notable examples to Princes to cure the wounds of an Estate, after ciuill warres, by mildenesse. He doth publicly proclaim pardon of all iniuries both generall, and particular, to abolish the memory to come, making his example a law of perpetuall forgetfulnesse. This moderation, more victorious then any great and seuer chastisement, won him the loue and obedience of his subiects, and confirmed a true and no counterfeit concord amongst the subiects themselves. He gouerned them after their owne humours, vsing his authority with mildenesse. And for that they had liued in the Court of Kings, from whom they receiued aduancements and honours, the which they could not doe by their annuall offices (as then the governments were) he erected perpetuall magistrates, with such authority, as it might well be termed, the true patterne of a royaltie.

put to a horrible death.

Mildnes a good remedy
to cure a de-cayed estate.

He then augmented the great authority of the Maires of the Palace, who controlled the Kings house, and not of the realme. A notable president for Princes, in the settling of an estate, not so to communicate their authority to their seruants, whom they desire to gratifie, as they may haue meanes to become maisters. Clotayre layed the first stone in the change which shall happen to his posterity. Hee had one onely sonne, whose name was Dagobert. It was his greatest care to haue him well instructed, committing him

631. him to Arnon bishop of Metz, a learned man, and of a good life, and likewise to Sadragessille his gouernour. But Dagobert discovered euen then his bad disposition, intreating his gouernour Sadragessille vnworthily. Wherewith Clotayre the King was wonderfully moued against his sonne, who shewed afterwards that this was but a preparatiue to that he would attempt against his owne father, forcing him in his life time to giue him the realme of Austrasia for his portion. This kinde of rebellion was the fruite of Clotayres too great lenity: as also of priuate quarells, which bred great disorders in the Court.

Thus we see, there is nothing absolutely perfect in this world. Clotayre dies in the yeare of Christ 631. hauing gouerned 44. yeares, from his cradle, and passed happily through many perillous difficulties. A happy and a wise Prince. But as humane things are subiect vnto change, so we may say, that the French Monarchy reuiued and died in him. And at his death sprong vp the soueraigne authority of the Maires of the Pallace, the which grew to that greatnesse, as they disposed this race of the Crowne. It was Clotayres intent to gratifie his subiects, and to ease the succeeding Kings: but in effect it was a meanes to haue many Kings, and to make the lawfull contemptible, setting the seruant in the Masters place. In truth, as it is most dangerous in an Estate to giue too much Authority to a seruant, so is it most certaine, that the slothfulness and dissoluteness, of these last Kings was a ladder, whereby our Maires mounted to this greatnesse and to their ruines. The which succeeded by degrees, vnder the respect of the Kings name, for from that time of Clotayre, vnto the last King of this race, are 120. yeares. Pepin grandfather to that Pepin, who was the first King of the second race, was Maire of the Pallace, and began first to deale absolutely in the gouernment of the realme.

The lenity of Clotayre is also noted by another error: for hee tooke so great liberty to doe what he list without order, as his subiects would doe the like. And by this contempt of the law, the King grew contemptible, being not wel obeyed in his age, the which bred great quarrells betwixt great and small, who shewed no great respect, neither to King nor Iustice. In this Estate died

DAGOBERT the first of that name, tooke possession of this great Monarchie, without any controuersie. Some write, that he had a brother called Arbert, to whom he gaue for his portion all the Country on this side Loire: but dying without children, it returned to him againe. At his comming to the crowne, he found great difficulties among his subiects, being bred vp without Iustice, vnder the long liberty of ciuill warres, and the lenity of Clotayre: for the which he provided wisely, reducing Iustice, fortifying it by his authority, with so good a moderation, as no man was offended at his too great severity, neither durst any man attempt against the lawes, seeing both the reine and the rod in the hands of their lawfull Prince. Thus he purchased the commendation of a good and wise King, and peace to his people, by their obedience to Iustice. To this good order he added prohibition to longholly things: and the better to confirme this opinion in his subiects mindes, he built and enriched many Temples, especially that of Saint Denis, the which since hath bene the sepulchre of our Kings.

There were great numbers of Iewes in France, the which were hurtfull to the Realme: he banished them by a perpetuall Edict, out of the territories that were vnder his obedience. But this zeale of religion, was polluted with the foule blot of Adultery, which made him infamous both to subiects and strangers. Amond Bishop of Paris admonished him of his fault: but Dagoberts impatient thereof, banished him. Pepin his Maire continued so in this reprehension, that although Dagoberts were moued, and threatned to banish him, yet in the end he yeelded to reason, by the vertuous constancie of Pepin: and hauing dismissed many of his lewd followers, he calls home Amond. An example of Princes and seruants for the one to continue firme in their duties, for the other to yeeld to reason. Dagobert subdued the Gascons that were revolted: brought the Brittons to obedience, suppressed the Sclauons, setled the Realme of Austrasia, and gaue seasonable succours to the King of Spaine against the Saracens. This is the sum of his ames, led by Pepin, whilest that hee liued at his pleasure, in his chamber, amongst his women, or in his monastery at his deuotion. He had two sonnes, Sigebert and Clouis. Hauing assembled the Estates in great solemnity, he declared, that he had ordeined Sigebert to be King of Austrasia, and Clouis King of France, preferring the yonger before the elder without any controuersie. Hee gaue them likewise gouernours, by reason of their young yeares. And so he died in the yeare of grace 645. hauing reigned 14. yeares without any trouble. A Prince to be numbred amongst the most worthy, but for this blemish of incontinency. Thus vpon the facility of Clotayre, the voluptuousnesse of Dagoberts laied another dangerous stone in the foundation of a new royaltie, the which vnadvisedly they built for their seruants, to their Childrens cost.

CL OVIS the Second, the twelfth, King of France.

The first of the idle Kings.

Now we take the declining of the hill, to seeke the last of these Kings beneath in the valley, who had nothing royall but the race, the name, and the habiliments, having resigned their Maiesty, authority and power into the hands of their Maires. It shall be sufficient to set downe their names, the dates of their reignes, and the continuance of their race, vntill a more vigorous royalty come to take their turne.

The manners of these idle
Kings.

Hereafter in this first race, you shall see our Kings but once a yeare, the first day of May, in their Chariots deckt with flowres, and Greene, and drawne by foure oxen. Who so hath occasion to treat with them, let him seeke them in their chambers, amidst their delights. Let him talke of any matters of State, he shall be sent to the Maire, who deales with all that concerns the State: he opens packets, makes answeres without any counsel, but his owne. He heares the complaints of subiects, and giues audience to Ambassadors of foraine Princes. He ordereth all as it pleaseth him. He giues, reuokes, dischargeth, contracts, ordeines, makes Edicts, and disannuls them. To conclude, he frees his Maister from all trouble, to impose it on himselfe. But we shall see to what end he labours thus, and why he hath taken vpon him the authority and purse of his maister. Let vs now speake something of our Clouis.

Clouis then remaines in France, a peaceable King; and Sigebert his elder brother retires himselfe to his Realme of Austrasia, according to Dagobert their fathers decree. This accord was embraced by two brethren of a good and mild disposition, and was maintained wisely by their mother Nanside, and their Tutors. A notable example of rare loue betwixt two brethren, especially in great diuisions: and the iealousie of mothers, who do often support one child against another.

Clouis had married a gentlewoman of Saxony, named Bandour, a woman of a good and holy life, and much giuen to deuotion, as the Abbay of Shelles, Saint Bandour, with other foundations doe witnesse. Whilest that she busied her selfe in her deuotion, and to build

A build monasteries; Clouis laboured to confound his minde, drowning it in the flood of his voluptuousnesse. Yet they obserue one thing in him, which shewes that he was not wholly deprived of iudgement: the which happened in a time of a great dearth. To releue the poore people, he suffered them to take the siluer, wherewith the Temple of Saint Denis had bene couered by Dagobert. Doubtlesse, the care of the poore, is a worke worthy of a great Prince. Bountie is better then sacrifice: and Christian soules be the true stones of a spirituall Temple, where God dwels, as in his proper mansion. So as to nourish and support the poore, the precious members of the Church, is to build a goodly Temple.

Sigibert King of Austrasia (hauing no children, nor hope of any) was so sollicit by Grimoald Maire of his pallace, as he adopted his sonne Childebert, and soone after he himselfe had a sonne, and died, leaving him heire generall of all his realme. But Grimoald, vnder colour of this adoption, desirous to establish his sonne in the possession of Sigiberts estate, takes his yong sonne, and sends him to be brought vp in a monastery of Scotland. In effect, he had seized on all the realme, if Ersembault, Maire of the palace of France, had not valiantly opposed himselfe against this his cruell vsurpation, hauing defeated and taken both him and his sonne, and punished them both by a sollemne sentence at Paris. A notable example for many considerations: but especially a singular prooffe, that God is the Protector of Orphelins, and a iudge of the vsurpers of an others right. Clouis had three sonnes by Bandour, Clotayre, Childeric and Thierry. All three shall be Kings successiue: but Childeric was presently King of Austrasia, left without any lawfull heire, after the death of the sonne of Sigibert. He reigned sixteene yeares, and died in the yeare 692. hauing left his Realme in great peace, without any enemy.

CL OTAYRE the third, the thirteenth King of France.

LOTAYRE, the eldest sonne of Clouis, was King of France, first vnder the gouernment of Erich, and then of Ebroin Maire of the Palace: a wicked and cruell man, who shall minister occasion to talke of his life, in the succession of these latter Kings. Vnder his reigne, he made great exactions vpon all the people, who (as he said) liued too plentifully, and forgot themselves

666. themselves by the inioying of too happy a peace. Clotayre reigned foure yeares, and died A without name and without children, in the yeare 666. of whom we may say, as of the rest that succeeded him: That they haue left nothing memorable, but that they left no memory.

CHILDERIC OR CHILPERIC
the second, the foureteenth
King of France.

C HILDERIC the second sonne of Clouis was already in possession of the realme of Austrasia; but a greater drawes him into France, where he finds important difficulties, for Ebroin doubting (if Childeric should reigne) he would take from him the dignity of Maire, and giue it vnto Would Maire of Austrasia, who was his trusty seruant, perswades Thierry, the younger sonne of France, to seize vpon the realme, and causeth him to be crowned King. But Childeric comes with a strong army, being fauored by the French, who hated Ebroin, and (in respect of him Thierry) were well affected to the elder: so as he seizeth vpon Thierry and Ebroin. He did only shauie Thierry and put him into the Monastery of Saint Denis: and he sent Ebroin to Luson in Bourgogne. To small a punishment for so foule a fact: nay rather, a perpetuall prison, and insupportable torments had bene more meete for his ambitious spirit.

Childeric then was recited of all the French, to whom soone after he made a bad recompence: for he grew so proud and cruell, as there appeared in all places signes of his tyranny and cruelty. One amongst the rest cost him deere: for hauing caused a Gentleman called Bodille to be whipped, he gaue him a iust occasion to seeke his ruine. The French, wearied with his infencencies, take this barbarous act very disdainfully: so as Bodille had an easie meanes for reuenge vpon Childeric, although he were a King: he resolues to kill him, and wants no friends to accompany him in this execution. The match is made to surprise him a hunting, at their best aduantage. Childeric being there, hee is eniured by Bodille and his Companions, who increase still: and hee being ill attended by his followers,

A followers, is slaine by Bodille: who followed by his confederates, goes presently to a neere Castle, whereas Blutsilde the Queene remained great with child: being entred he slew her with her child, leauing a memorable example to Princes, neuer to thrust their subjects into dispaire; nor to abuse their authority to the dishonour, and contempt of their Nobility, which is their right arme.

Thus died Childeric, hauing raigned but two yeares. Leauing an odious memory to his posterity, to haue begun well, and ended ill: cleane contrary to Childeric the first, his Predecessor, who began ill and ended well.

THIERRY the first, the 15
King of France.

E Childeric being thus slaine, the French (not able to liue without a King, and desiring none, but one of the bloud royall) post to S. Denis, draw forth Thierry, and establish him in the Realme, from the which they had deposed him, for his elder brother: and make Landregesil the Sonne of Arohem-bault Mayre of the Pallace, with whom they were well pleased, during his Mairalty. A notable example, both of the peoples consent gouerned by reason, and the efficacy of the Soueraigne law, the which is the soule of an Estate, and the ground of a lawfull Empire.

The Realme was very peacefull in this beginning, when as Ebroin (perswaded by some discontented Noblemen) leaues his Cloister, and raiseth an army, in the beginning but small, but it so increased, by the Kings contempt and his Mayres; as he remaines a Victor, with an incredible celerity. Ebroin seizeth on the Kings person, intreats him with all reuence, and respect, and protests to require nothing, but to bee held his most faithfull seruant, as he had bene in his first raigne. Landregesil was then absent: who seeing the King taken, and all the fauour of the French turned to Ebroin, being victor, he willingly giues eare vnto him, and vpon his faith and promise of good vsage, puts him selfe into his hands, by whom he is treacherously

roully and cruelly slaine. Ebroin having begun this course, continues his cruelty, to satisfie A his reuenging minde, vntill that he (after that he had murdered many good men, contrarie to his oth, amongst the rest, Leger Bishop of Autun, hauing admonished him of his dutie, and Martin Maire of the Palace of Austrasia, to whom he had giuen his faith with a sollemne oth) in the end thrust himselfe vnaduisedly into the hands of Ermansfroy, a French gendeman, his capitall enemy, who slue him when he least feared it, hauing now an imagination to be mounted to the top of his greatnesse, and to tast the sweete liquor of his insatiable reuenge.

A notable obseruation for treacherous and reuenging spirits, who are then vanquished, when they thinke to be Conquerours. Thierry a King in shew, is a spectator of these Tragedies, as of a game at tables, of his diuers Maires, which play at leuell coile, vntill that Pepin gets it, and enioyes it onely, with the souereigne gouernment of the French Monarchie. B

Pepin during the confusions of these reignes had beene in Austrasia, and purchased great credit with all men: so as he was held worthy of this great charge, the which he gouerned with so great wisdom and valour, as hauing settled France in a peacefull Estate, he had purchased more credit, and authority among the French, then the King himselfe. In the end Thierry dies, in the yeare 693. hauing reigned nineteene yeares, leauing Clouis and Childebert, his Children, for a witnesse, that he had liued: but in effect Pepin, and his, for the true heires of the realme.

D A G O B E R T the second, the 18. King of France.

HE reigned foure yeares, and left two Children, Chilperic and Thierry, with no better memory then the rest. So there passed forty and foure years, during which time Pepin had good meanes to fortifie his authority, the which was in effect absolute, by the negligence, or rather idleness of these Kings, who made a necessary way to new designs, by their voluntary suffrance to inroach vpon their authority. Pepin well acquainted with the humour of the French, (naturally bent to loue their Princes) did not openly despise his masters: but excused their weake dispositions, not capable of much paine, representing the heavy burthen of a great Estate, and that the honour to gouerne it, is a trouble which costes deere. He setled an impression in the Frenchmens mindes, that those onely were worthy to bee Kings, that knew how to gouerne.

So without any insinuating speech, the ordinary seruices he did to the realme, maintaining it in peace, his great profession to loue Religion, Iustice and the people, (whose ease he was wonderfull carefull of) did recommend him to all men: and the good turnes he did to all persons, by reason of his charge, did daylie purchase him many friends and seruants. Doubtlesse, as it is as great policy to be a good man, so is there no small dexterity in the taking of Cities and Countries by the hearts of men. Thus Pepin laied the foundation, and his successors finished the perfect building of a new gouernment.

A lesson for our Kings, to haue a care how they referre the charge of affaires to their seruants, and to whom they trust, and how. This example doth verifie, that they were better to be more carefull, and to take more paines, then to disroabe themselues of this great authority, the which makes them not onely eminent aboue all men, but carries (as it were) a type of the Maiesty of God, in the gouernment of the world, whereof they must yeeld him an account, and not loose that by base cowardlinesse, which they should maintaine by vertue. But let vs returne to Pepin, he made great shew to loue Religion, and vpon this cause he makes warre against Rabod Duke of Frise a Pagan, whom he conquered and forced

A to receiue the Christian religion with all his subiects. He restored Lambert Bishop of Vtrecht to his dignity, being expelled by Ebroin, and confined into a Monastery: finally, he infinitely fauored all that tended to the seruice of God: and one of his chiefest cares was to aduance them that had charge ouer the Church: whose loues he had so purchased by this good viage, as they soone requited him, causing the people to loue him, with whome such as rule their consciences haue great authority.

This was a point of state, as much as of deuotion. He also made prooue of his valour in diuers forts, reducing the people of Germany on either side the Rhine, to the obedience of the French, who began to mutine, and so restored the beauty of the realme of Austrasia. He was carefull to maintaine iustice, and imbraced the people, no waies oppressing them with any new impositions. In the meane time he was not carelesse of him-selfe and his Children. He commaunded absolutely, being armed with the authority of his Soueraigne, neither was there any appeale from him vnto the King.

He had two sonnes by Plectrude, Drogon and Grimoald: he gaue Champagne to Drogon, and after his death he caused his sonne to succede him with the title of a Duke. In the beginning he gaue the offices of great Master, and general of the Treasure, to Norbert his deere friend: but after his death he inuested his own son Grimoald in those places. But as the vanity of man transports it selfe beyond the limits of respect, it chanced in the end, that Pepin forgot himselfe in his prosperity: for not satisfied with Plectrude his lawfull wife, hee fell in loue with a gentlewoman named Alpaide, by whome he had one Bastard, (which shalbe very famous in the course of this history, vnder the name of Charles Martel): and as the mischiefe encreased, he puts away Plectrude and marries Alpaide. Lambert Bishoppe of Vtrecht admonished him of this fault: but he suffered Alpaide to cause him to be slaine by her brother Dodon, who soone after felt the punishment of this blood, for being strooke with a disease of wormes, not able to endure his owne stench, he cast himselfe headlong into the riuer of Meuze. Grimoald the sonne of Pepin, following his fathers example, abandoned him-selfe to strange women, disdayning his wife. But this adultery was deere to them both: for Grimoald (too familiar with one named Rangere, sonne in law to Rabod Duke of Frise,) was slaine with him, by a iust iudgement of God, hauing taught him so filthy a trade, to abandon him-selfe to strumpets, and to reiect his wife. Pepin was so perplexed for the death of his sonne, as hee died for griefe and choller against Rabod, the author of this murder. Thus both he and his sonne reaped the fruits of their adultery.

Vpon his death-bed he ordained Charles (his Bastard) to succede him in the gouernment of the realme: but Plectrude imbracing this occasion, vpon the death of her husband, and well supported by her kinsfolkes, causeth Charles to be taken and put in prison at Cologne, and advanceth Thybauld the sonne of Drogon, her owne sonne and Pepin's, to the gouernment, although in effect she vnder his name gouerned all the affaires of state. This gouernment of a woman (which is visually imperious and without reason) offended the most resolute among the French: so as weary to be commanded by a distaste (Dagobert dying, during these alterations) they tooke a Prince of the blood called Daniel forth of a cloister, who had bin a Monke the greatest part of his youth. Him they crowne King, vnder the name of Chilperic the second, to haue a royall name to countenance his actions: and they giue him a Nobleman of France called Rainsfroy, to be his Mayre: who hauing leauied an army, defeated Thybauld and his grand-mother Plectrude with small fight. But when as Rainsfroy thought himselfe voide of all his enemies, he findes a strong Competitor: for Charles Martel being freed from prison, could politickly embrace the occasion, and get authority by the perplexity of Plectrude, to whome he offers him-selfe with all his meanes. The decree of Pepin did import much: but the dexterity and valour of Charles could be no more concealed, then a goodly light in darkenesse. Hee entertaynes such as were affected to Plectrude, and her sonne, in such sort as (seeing them selues abandoned) they receiue him for Mayre, according to the will of Pepin, whose image Charles did carry in his forehead, and his memory liued yet in the hartes of the French.

Charles being receiued and installed Mayre of France, first assured him-selfe of the children of King Dagobert, causing them to bee gently brought vp in a Monastery, and afterwards (not pursuing his reuenges as Ebroin had done) hee made a publike declaration, that that his onely intention was, to free the Realme from the confusions which were so visible to all men, and restore it to the ancient dignity: neither would he attempt any thing, but by the consent and aduice of the French. And indeed, he began to manage the affaires, to the great content of all men. He established an old Prince of the blood, named Clotayre, with a Counsell of state, vnder whose name and authority he gouerned as Mayre and chiefe of the Counsell: and therefore some writers reckon this Clotayre among the Kings of France, although he were no King. Rainfroy with his Chilperic (finding him-selfe too weake for such an enemy) had recourse to Rabod duke of Freeze, a capital enemy to the house of Pepin, with whose aide he letties an army, incounters Charles, and ouerthrowes him at the first charge. But Charles nothing amazed at this checke, rallies his forces, and knowing that the enemy pult vp with this victory, marched in disorder, he charged their confused troupes with such aduantage, as he defeats them quite, neere vnto Cambray: so as Chilperic and Rainfroy could hardly escape with a finall traine. And so Charles proceeds with his victory: for being aduertised that Plectrude was at Cologne, where he is receiued by the inhabitants, and hauing Plectrude and her son Thibauld in his power, he inflicts no other punishment, but iniouynes them to liue in quiet, and to attempt nothing without his liking. A worthy reuenge of a generous minde to pardon the vanquished. Eudon succors him; but being vanquished by Charles, he submits himselfe with the pretended Chilperic, to his discretion: and so did Rainfroy, relying vpon the Conquerours faith: Charles vseth the victory modestly, pardons Rainfroy, and giues him the gouernment of Aniou, and suffers Eudon to enioy his liuing, vnder the obedience of the Crowne. And to settle the Realme in good order, he degrades Chilperic, being aduanced against Law, and causeth the eldest sonne of Dagobert to be chosen King, named Chilperic, as the true and lawfull heire. So he reigned vnder the gouernment of his Mayre.

CHILPERIC the third, the 19. King of France.

Prince of no valour, simple and voluptuous. In his time the Suenes, Saxons, and Banarians (disdaining to liue vnder a simple and effeminate King) sought to withdraw them-selues from the French obedience: but Charles reduced them to the yoke, reaping repentance for their rebellion. Plectrude was wearie of ease: who abusing the mildnesse of Charles, retires to Vlmes, with her daughter Sanachilde, the lawfull childe of Pepin, and seekes to draw the people of Danubie into rebellion against Charles: who hauing intelligence of her practises; posts thether with a running Campe, pacifies the Germaines, and puts her in prison: but we read not how he disposed of her, nor of her sonne Thibauld. Thus hee confirmed his authority in all places. In the meane time Chilperic dies, hauing reigned fise yeares, and in his place his Brother was Crowned King.

THIERRY the Second, the 20
King of France.

He reigned ten yeares, and dying, left his sonne Childeric, the last King of this first race of Merouingiens. This is all that is memorable in these two reignes, whilst that the second race prepares to come in place and to take possession of the crowne, and scepter of the French Monarchie. Charles Martell, from Mayre of the Palace is chosen Duke, or Prince of the French. He laies the foundations of a new raigne for his posterity, and in this respect is numbred among the Kings, the 22.

Now our discourse must be of that great Charles, surnamed Martel, by reason of the force, both of his body, and minde: shewing breefely according to our stile, what meanes he had to aduance his race to royall Throane.

As things succeeded in this manner: Charles Martel, who knew what force an interest purchased by good order hath in an Estate, informs his friends priuately (which were many) how how much it did import (considering the apparent weakenesse of their King, and the necessity of the realme) to haue one Commander, whom all the rest might obey: for when the King speaks not, euery one (holding himselfe as great as his companion) will play the King, & so by consequence many mischiefs grow daylie, a multitude of Maisters beeing a ruine to an Estate. That the authority of a Maire was not great enough to that effect: and although it might be extended vpon necessity, yet was it not conuenient: seeing that which concerns the good & quiet of all, ought to be approued by al and settled by a free & general consent. Hauing thus disposed the mindes of such as might rule in matters of great import, hee makes a conuocation, which he calls a Parliament, in the which it is concluded: That seeing Charles Martel had by many proofes shewed himselfe worthy of a great command, hauing well vsed his authority of Maire, and that vrgent necessity required a speedy and conuenient remedy: therefore the absolute gouernment should be deliuered into his hands. And to the end his authority should be knowne, and obeyed with more respect, hereafter he should be called Prince, or Duke of Frenchmen. This decree did greatly countenance the authority of Charles Martel, beeing confirmed by such an assembly, and by so affectionate a consent: but his vertues made him to be held most worthy of so honorable a charge: occasion made prooffe of his vertue, and the successe was a foretelling that the Realme was appointed to his posterity. Soone after there fell out this notable occasion.

Wee haue made mention of Eudon, the pretended Duke of Guienne. Martel hauing vanquished him, suffered him to enioy his liuing, vnder the obedience of the Crowne. This accord pleased not Eudon, who not able to bee reuenged of Martel, practised such meanes as ambition and couetousnesse did prescribe him. The Sarazins (a Turkish nation) had passed out of Asia into Affrike and Spaine, and had possessed those goodly and great Prouinces vnder the command of their King Abderamen. Eudon solicits them to come into France, and promisseth a free passage. The Sarazins willingly imbrace the offer of so easie an entrie, and resolute to people France with a great Colony of their nation. They enter Guienne with an army of foure hundred thousand fighting men. A fearefull number at this day, but plainly set downe by the common consent of all writers. Charles Martel seeing this great storme ready to fall vpon France, resolues first to take away the cause of their coming, and as Eudon's discontent had drawne them in, so hee labours to be reconciled vnto him.

He concludes a peace with Eudon, taught by the horrible spoile of Guienne, what it is to see such men to worke. In the end he disposeth all things to stop the violence of so rauishing an enemy, assembling all the forces he could, to make a body able to incounter them: but he armed himselfe chiefly with resolution and courage, fit instruments in necessity, vnder the prouidence of the God of armes and victories. The Sarazin was already aduanced as farre as Touraine, within vew of Tours, nere to the riuer of Loire, where Martel resolved to attend him, as well to ingage him in a Country farre from retreat, and to make Eudon and his men more resolute, in whose Countie it was to be tried, as also to haue France ready in case of necessity. Abderamen: trusting in the multitude of his souldiars both of horse and foot, resolues to compass in the French: and to this end had dispersed his battailions, euery one a part, making shew of a great army, appointing his horse mingled with Camels, and furnished with sundry new kinds of armes, to ioyne the battailions one to another. The order and countenance of this army was fearefull to men, neuer wonted to behold such an huge inundation of strangers.

Martel (who fought more with courage and valour in a good cause, then with numbers) hauing assembled the body of his army, he confirms their resolutions before the combat, wishing them to haue no hope but in God, and in themselves, shewing that they had their enemies before, and the riuer of Loire behind, that hee had commanded them of Tours not to open the gates, but to the Conqueror, and had appointed troupes of horse vpon the wings of his army, to kill such as fled, as enemies. To conclude they had no other France, but where they were, in the which they must either conquer or die. Eudon with his Guennois made their army apart, not farre from Martel, and with his consent.

The battailes being aranged, and euery Commander hauing perswaded his men to doe their best endeouours, the Sarazin giues the charge, supposing to compass in the French easily, as with a net: but of all sides he finds men courageous in their defence. The incounter was great,

A great, and the combat furious. In the heat of the conflict Eudon disbands, and violently chargeth the Sarazins campe, being full of women, children, and baggage, and with a small guard, he forceth the defences, and enters it, cuts in peeces, and kills all he encounters without difference of age or sex. The Barbarian not accustomed to the readinesse of the French, who encountered his sundry Battailions in grosse, as they presented themselves, turning after the manner of their discipline; seeing many of his men slaine, and for a second mischiefe, hearing the cries and shriekings of women, and children, massacred in the campe, began to be amazed, and to wauer. Martel (discouering their countenance, and that their battailions grew thin) cries out mainly to his souldiars. Courage my friends. God hath set vp his banner, he fights for vs: let vs charge these miscreants. The souldiars (encouraged at this voice, & at the visible successe of their armes,) very victory victory. The Sarazin not knowing which way to turne him, being charged on all sides, breakes his battailions, abandons his ranks, and casts away his armes. All are dispersed, the multitude oppresseth them. Hereupon Martel and Eudon ioyne together, after the spoile of the campe: vpon this disorder they charge valiantly through these dismembred troupes, as into a thicke haruest, without any resistance: all ouerflowes with bloud, they are weary with killing. The remainder which fled is small, the prisoners lesse: all die by the sword, or are beaten downe with battle-axes: the victorious French (inraged with the sight of these vanquished Barbarians, seeking to dispossesse them, their wiues and children, of their habitations) made them the subiects of their choller. King Abderamen is found dead, in a heape of carcases, not wounded, but smothered by the multitude that fled. Histories assure, there were slaine vpon the place three hundred seuentie five thousand men, and of the French fiftene hundred, amongst the which were many of the Nobility and men of account. Thus God did ouerthrow the greater number by the lesse, and by his force the multitude was an incumber to the enemy. But aboue all, this deliuerance was remarkable, for that God not only freed France from the slavery of Infidels, but also the rest of Europe, the which this deluge had almost ouerflowne, as it had done Asia and Affrike already. So thanks were giuen vnto God, in all Christian Kingdomes, and the name of Martel generally renowned, as a chiefe instrument of the singular deliuerance of all Christendome. After this defeat, he diuided the spoiles amongst the souldiars, and the better to reward the Nobility, he remitted them the tenths and tithes for certaine yeares, with the consent of the Clergie, to whom he promised satisfaction.

This memorable defeat was a scale of the new dignity granted vnto Martel by the fauour of the French, confirmed by his owne valour, or rather by the bounty of God, the essentiall cause of his happy successe. This battaile was called the battaile of Tours: it happened in the yeare 730. but the end of this warre was the beginning of an other, and almost from the same spring, and by the same current. Wee haue shewed Eudon's deeds at the battaile of Tours. For this great seruice he expected some notable recompence: But Martel excusing himselfe, that he could not alienate the reuenues of the Crowne, nor doe any thing to the preiudice of his Master, left Eudon no more aduanced then before the warres, and very ill satisfied: but he died soone after, leauing Hunault and Issroy his children, heires of his discontent.

After their fathers decease, they seeke all possible meanes to trouble the quiet of France. Their chiefe strength was in Guienne: they had likewise some in Prouence, through the fauour of Maurice, Gouernour of the Country, and Earle of Marseilles; but especially in Languedoc; whence they were issued, as I haue said, being descended from the Visigoths, whose memory with their name liues still throughout all that Prouince, although they all depend vpon the Crowne of France. Thus they assemble all the people they can, either by friends or credit, and fortifie good Townes against the French, attending to make warre with all violence. But finding all these meanes too feeble for so great a project, they proceed farther. The Sarazins remayning in Spaine were much grieved at so great a losse of their men, being a generall dishonour to all their nation. They are easily drawne into this League, to be reuenged of the French: and the better to fortifie their partie, they ioyne with the Varidales, Ostrogots, and Alans, which remained yet in Spaine, not friends amongst themselves, yet common enemies to the French.

King Athin led the Sarazins troupes: Hunault and Ieffroy brethren commanded those that were assembled in the Prouinces on this side Loire. Besides their forces they had intelligence within Lions, and the best Cities of Bourgongne, assuring themselves to seize vpon Daulphine, as well for the necessity of Languedoc (where they had a great partie) as also by means of Maurice the Prouenfall, and the credit they had with the principall of the Country. Thus they make a great party, to vndermine and ruine the State of France, and did manage their practises with such secrecie, as their army was sooner in field then Martell could haue intelligence of their preparations. The body of this army assembled in Languedoc, passeth the Rofne, entreteth into Daulphine, and goes through it with such celerity and ease, as (the Citties of Pierrelate, Saint Pol, Montlimar, Liuron, Valence, Romans, and other Townes bordering vpon the Rofne, (hauing yeelded at the first brute) they surpriseth the Citie of Lions, by means of their intelligence. Vienne alone held firme for the Kings seruice, in this deluge of Goths and Sarazins. They passed from Lions by Sauoy, and the countries on either side of the mount Iura, and in the end seized on many of the best Cities of Bourgongne, Chaaon, Mafcon, Dijon, and Auxerre, by means of their intelligences and the generall amazement. Martel slept not in this confusion: but to preuent this vnexpected storme, he assurth the Cities, and leuies men with all expedition. The towne of Sens (through the resolute counsell of their bishop Otho) sallies forth so fitly vpon the Sarazin army, as (hauing slaine a great number) they force them to raise the siege with shame. Other towns by their example grow resolute, vnder the assurance of their commanders, whom they finde carefull of their preleruation. Thus this army halfe victorious, (feearing a second skirmish of Tours, by the waighty blowes of Martel, loth to ingage themselves farther in France) retires into the Countries of their allies, leauing garrisons in the townes they had surpriseth. One part passeth into Languedoc, and lodgeth in friend townes: an other seizeth on Auignon (then a City of Prouence) by the means of Maurice gouernor of the country: Arles holds firme for the Kings seruice: Amidest these confusions and the treachery of Maurice, Hunault and Ieffroy returne into their Country of Guionne, to preuent the designs of Martel, and to retaine their townes in obedience. Hauing thus disposed of their affaires, they send ioyntly into Spaine for new forces, whilest that Martel labours to settle that which they had disordered in many places. And in truth they had prouided worke for him, the which he preuented in this sort.

Hee sends Childebert presently into Prouence with a meane army, as well to assure the townes that stood firme, as to keepe the enemy at a bay, and to crosse their designs. Hee himselfe remains in Bourgongne with a great army, to recouer such townes as were held by the enemy. Both worke according to their proiects, but not with like successe. Childebert besiegeth Auignon, but with much toyle, losse of time, and small hope of successe, so as he was shamefully forced to raise the siege: but then comes Martel with his army, hauing recouered the Cities of Bourgongne, Lions and the rest of Daulphine, with the like facility as they had beene lost: punishing the rebels in all places. Being incamped before Auignon, he so presseth the siege, as in few daies hee takes the towne, and cuts the Sarazins in peeces: yet their King Athin saued himselfe in Languedoc, by the riuer of Rofne, and retired to Narbonne to his other troupes. Martel (hauing releued the Citie of Arles with a new garrison) passeth into Languedoc, and besiegeth Narbonne, being then a very strong City and of great importance for the whole Prouince. And as this siege grew long, behold a new army of Sarazins comes out of Spaine, vnder the conduct of Amore, an other pettie Sarazin King. Martel fearing least they of Guienne should come, and those within the Citie issue forth, and all being vnited make one body of an army, he resolues to fight with them apart, vsing this stratageme which succeeded happily. Hee leaues a part of his army before the Citie, with the same countenance as if it had beene whole, rising without found of drumme or trumpet: and surpriseth this new army of Sarazins with such celerity, as he defeats them.

Athin frustrate of hope of any succors, saues himselfe by sea, with a small troupe, and abandons Narbonne, and the whole Country, to the mercy of Charles Martel, then a Conquerour. This was the end of that perillous warre bred by Hunault and Ieffroy the sonnes of Eudon: and the fruit of all these broyles in Languedoc, was that they brought those Cities which

A which had followed them, to extremity, whom Martel punished seuerely for their rashnesse and rebellion. The histories name Narbonne, Nismes, Beziers and Agde, the which he caused to be sackt and burnt. It is likely that the ancient walles of Nismes were then pulled downe, whereof we now see the ruines of an admirable greatnesse, vndoubtfull signes of the ancient beauty and wealth of that goodly city: the which in the time of the Romaine Empire, being free in Gaule Narbonoise, did enioye the priuileges of Italy, hauing had the honour to furnish Rome with an Emperour.

Hunault and Ieffroy (being authors of this warre) remained yet unpunished. Martel was diuined by the warre he made against the Frisians, whom he vanquished and forced to become Christians, and to that end he sends them Doctors. A pardonable zeale in a warrior, for in truth mens soules cannot be wonne by the sword, nor religion forced, but must be planted in the heart by reason. The punishment of these turbulent men, was reserved vnto Pepin, who knew well how to effect it, as we shall see. At this time King Thierry died, hauing reigned six and twenty yeares in conceit: and left Childebert his sonne, not heire of the realme, but of his idleness, to make the last releafe of the crowne, and consigne it into a better hand.

CHILDERIC the fifth, the 21. King of France, and the last of the first race.

F was King in shew nine yeares, five vnder the authority of Charles Martel, and foure vnder Pepin, who dispossessed him, made him a Monke, and seated himselfe in his place, as we shall see in order. But let vs obserue what remaines of Martel. The care and toyle of great affaires, with his old age, hauing soare broken him, he resolues to dispose of things in time, and to leaue a peace to his children. He had four sons, Caroloman, Pepin, Giles, and Griffon, all of diuers humors. Caroloman and Giles more modest, & of a milder spirit, Pepin & Griffon, more rough and ambitious. Whilest he liued, he greatly honored the kings person, neither did he in open shew meddle with that maine point of royaltie: but in effect, diuiding his authority to his Children with the title of gouernments. He purchased them an interest by his vertue, & in time the possession of the realme. To his eldest son Caroloman he left Austrasia, to Pepin (whom he knew to be of a more quicke & hardy spirit) France, as the body of the Estate. And seeing Giles vnfit for armes & giuen to deuotion he made him Archbishop of Rouan. To bridle the turbulent spirit of Griffon; and to take fro him al occasiō of debate, he would not giue him any certaine portion, but the good wil of his elder bretheren: being taught by the experience of former raines, that many commanding bretheren are dangerous to an estate: shewing himselfe more wise & happy therein then Clouis.

Thus Charles Martel (hauing liued fifty five yeares) died in the yeare of grace 741. hauing commanded absolutely in France twenty and five yeares, as Mayre or Prince of the French, vnder the raignes of Chilperic, Thierry and Childeric. One of the worthiest men that euer liued, either in this Monarchy or in any forraigne Estate. He was religious, wise, iust, valiant, modest in prosperity, resolute in aduersity, temperate in authority, not passionate nor reuengfull, diligent and fortunate. By these excellent vertues hee did quietly purchase this great degree, whereby his posterity hath mounted to the royall throne, although he had but the paine to get it, and the honour to preferue the realme from ship-wrake in the weaknesse of these Kings, and the stormes of many confusions. His Children (according to the diuersity of their humors) had diuers euents. Caroloman wanted no valour, but hauing accompanied his Brother Pepin in diuers exploits, in the end he resignes him all his authority, becomes a Monke, and dies so at Vienne. Giles full of ambitious heat, not pleased with the wise resolution of his father, did all he could to crosse his brother Pepin, although hee had giuen him a sufficient portion in Normandy. Transported with this spleene, he surses vp the Saxons, Bawarians, and those of Guienne, against him at diuers times. In the end (being suppressed in all places) he vndertakes a voiage into Italy, to attempt some thing against his brother: but hee was slaine by the way, by a gentleman of Bourgongne, as a man of no valour nor quality. This fire was thus quenched, and Giles died vnworthily, leauing this lesson to posterity, That ambition hastens ruine, and contrariwise, that the one halfe is better then the whole.

Pepin, seeing himselfe alone in great authority, vnderpropt by the merriits of his Grandfather, resoluēd so to behaue himselfe, as his owne deserts should not onely confirme this reputation left him by inheritance, but also perswaded the French that hee was worthy of a greater command, and by their free consents, hold him capable of the Crowne. Hee knew the humor of the French, who loue & honor their king with an especial deuotion, and cannot be induced to doe otherwise, but by great & vrgent reasons. He manageth this desseigne with such dexterity, as he effectuēd it, and the meanes (which the providence of God did minister vnto him) did as it were guide him by the hand: for to him we must attribute the principall cause of this notable change. The Sarazins infinitely greeued with these two defeats, prepare another army: Jeffroy was also of this party, & it seemed this third League did threaten France with a greater storme. Pepin remembering that his father had bene surprized, sends forth his spies, and being speedily aduertised of their desseigne he assembles all the forces he could, with an incredible celerity: finding himselfe first in armes, he enters into Guyenne, and seizeth on the passages of the Pyrenean mountaines. Jeffroy being thus surprized, sets a good face on it, promising obediēce to Pepin: & is a mediator for the Sarazins, vndertaking that they should renounce their interest, and neuer enter more into France. Pepin obtaining his desire (being glad to haue preuented this storme, and forced so redoubted enemies to receiue a law from him) applied himselfe to the peoples humor. He dismisseth his army, busying himself in repairing of the churches which the Sarazins had ruined: to ease the citties that were spoyled, & in giuing them meanes to recouer themselves: to establish iustice, to vnburthen the subiects of publike carges, & to let the French vnderstand that he was as fit for peace as war. The church of Rome was then in great reputation; and the Popes did only busie themselves with the seruice of God & to maintaine Princes in concord, the which purchased them great credit, for the respect Christian people bare to religion. Zachary held then the Pontificall seat, and had the Lombards for a subiect of continual feare, being his irreconcilable enemies: against whom

A whom hee could not haue more assured and speedy helpe then in France, and by Pepin meanes, who held the foueraigne authority. Martel had already auoided a most dangerous warre, through the amity he had with Luitprand King of the Lombards, after whose death, Rachyfe Duke of Friul, chosen in his place, threatens the Pope openly: for all the Lombards faire shewes, and his large protestations of friendship, were but foretellings of the breach of his faith. For this reason Zachary entertained Pepin carefully, the which did helpe him much to compass his desire. And although his ambitious humour made him sometimes to speake too peremptorily of his victories and ordinary defects, yet could he containe himself in greatest occasions: and behaued himselfe in such sort, as he seemed not to aspire vnto the crowne, but that necessity and the common consent of all the French, did (as it were) force him therevnto. The most remarkable thing in all the course of this history, is the order he held to compass a desseigne of so great importance.

As he discouered couerly of his intention, and openly of the vrgent necessity to prouide speedily for the estate of the Realme: he had sed men to preach forth his praises, and the disgraces of Childeric, being as visible in the one, as remarkable in the other: reason giuing due praise to vertue, and dishonour to vice. In the one they see a simple stupidity, in the other a stayed grauity; in the one a brutish fury; and in the other a moderate and temperate spirit: in the one a beastly carelesnes, in the other an actiue diligence; in the one a dissolute intemperancy, and in the other a well grounded continency. So as in the one was all good, and in the other all bad; in the one all pleased, in the other all displeased; and their actions were the table of their contrary dispositions. Childeric loued no man, neither did any man loue him. Pepin loued all, and was beloued of all, tying all vnto him by all occasions and good offices, and all to his masters losse. The common people loued Pepin intirely, as the Protector of their liberty: and hated Childeric as one that regarded not the common good, in respect of his foolish and beastly voluptuousnes: being neither willing nor able to doe well.

So the one being contemned and hated, was held vnworthy to raigne; the other prayed and beloued, was esteemed most worthy to be a King. The friends of Pepin failed not to proclaim his meriits in all places, and the people embraced it with all content. But there were many difficulties in the execution of this generall desire: Religion (much respected by the French): the naturall reuerence and deuotion they bare to their Kings, and the remembrance of the meriits of old Clouis, were strong lets to stay the violent desires of the most affectionate. But Pepin could well preuent all this by an admirable and happy dexterity. To the remembrance of Clouis vertues, he opposed the memory of horrible disgraces, and infamies, wherewith his posterity had bene polluted: and withall, the carelesnesse of these latter Kings, noting all in ranke from father to sonne. And contrary-wise, hee did represent vnto them, the liuely remembrance of the great meriits of Pepin his grand father, of Martel his father, and his owne, and from experience past, he concludes of the future hope. As for the reuerence of the French to their Kings: hee shewed that it was vowed to true Kings, and not to Kings in imagination, painted and disguised: and that the oth of allegiance tyed them to a religious King, being valiant, iust, mercifull, vpright, diligent, practised in affaires, fit to withstand his enemies, to punish the wicked, to defend the good, and to protect the Christian law, according to the expresse words of the solleinne oth which the French giue their King at his coronation. Why should they then be bound to a vicious King, negligent and carelesse of himselfe and his subiects, vnder the colour of a Crowne and Scepter? to conclude, the contract was limited, and the French were bound to obey that King that was a lawfull King, who (being endued with royall vertues) performed the office of a true King. These reasons were plaine, and easily receiued of all men, finding this change to be very necessary for the common good: neither was there any one but expected some profit in his owne particular, and sought to purchase the fauour of Pepin.

But yet there remained a scruple of religion, for the dispensing of their oth. This article must be decided at Rome, where Pepin (assuring himselfe of his good friends, who were necessarily to vse him) hoped for a good end, seeing the principall was determined by the consent of the French. He therefore sends Bruchard Bishop of Bourges, and Folrad his Chaplaine vnto Rome, (men pleasing to all, and faithfull to himselfe,) to represent the Estate of France

746. France, and the generall desire of the French, to Pope Zacharie. The Pope (duly informed A of the weaknesse of Childeric, being hated, and contemned of all men, without any support, and of the generall resolution of the French to receiue Pepin, but chiefly moued with hope, to draw great helps from him against the Lombards his capitall enemies) dispensed the French from their oath of obedience to Childeric, and to all his race.

879.	27.	Lewis the 2. his sonne , called the Stuttering, King and Emperour, who reigned but a yeare and six months
		At his death he left his wife with child, who being borne, was acknowledged for lawful King, and called Charles the Simple : his minority lasted 22. yeares. Many Tutors, and many confusions. These Regents are crowned Kings, and (acknowledged by that name) doe hold the ranke among Kings, and so we must diuide, these 22. yeares, to euery Regent according to his raigne.
881.	28.	Lewis the 3. and Caroloman, bastard of Lewis the Stuttering , raigne as Regents five yeares.
889.	29.	Charles the 3. a Prince of the blood , called the grosse, as Regent, hee reigned 7. yeares, being both King and Emperour: he was put from them both.
896.	30.	Eudes or Odon sonne to Rob. Duke of Aniou , as Regent he reigned 10. yeares. In the confusion of these last Maisters the royall authority being greatly weakened, many countries freed themselves from the obedience of the French Monarchy: So fell out
		THE ECLIPSE OF THE EMPIRE, Both in Germany and Italy. The body of the Empire remained in Germany, being afterwards gouerned by an Emperour, chosen by the Princes Electors. And Italy was dismembred into diuers Principalities, vnto diuers Potentates. In the end, after this minority of 22. yeares.
899.	31.	Charles the 4. called the Simple , sonne to Lewis the Stuttering , was crowned as lawfull King and reigned 25. yeares. But Raoul of Bourgoigne , A Prince of the blood, was called by the league, to put downe King Charles , called the Simple: being imprisoned by them, and forced to renounce the crowne. Charles dying with griefe, Raoul reigned 13. yeares, but in the end was expelled from this usurpation.
923.	32.	Lewis the 4. called d'Outremer , or beyond the sea, sonne to Charles the Simple , being called out of England, (whether his mother had carried him to preserve him from the League) was acknowledged King and reigned 29. yeares.
936.	33.	Lothaire his sonne succeeded him, who reigned thirty and three yeares.
954.	34.	Lewis the 5. sonne to Lothaire , reigned about two yeares, and dying without issue, interred with him the race of Charles Martel , as his Ancestors had of long time obscured his vertues, and that of the valiant Charlemagne , unfortunate in their successors.
986.	35.	Thus the second race called Carolingiens , hauing reigned 230. yeares, ended in Lewis the 5. and gaue place to the third race , which raignes at this day.

PEPIN the short, the 23. King of France: and first of the second race.

THE French thus freed by the Popes dispensation, from their oath of obedience, assemble the Generall Estates: and to auoyde confusion in the Realme, apparently growne by the negligence of their Kings, they concluded to reiect Childeric, and to choose Pepin: the one vnworthy to raigne, by reason of his vices, and the other most worthy to be King, for his royall vertues.

And to the end, the fundamental law of state should not be directly infringed in this new election, they bring Pepin from the race of great Clovis, of whome they said he should be acknowledged for the next heire, seeing that (vertue and his race being duely weighed) he approached nearest to him in vertue. Pepin himselfe would not assist at this assembly: that the offer of this dignity (being made without his apparent seeking it) might be the more honorable. Being called to heare the Generall conclusion of the Parliament, and the common desire of all the French, he presents himselfe, being pleasing to all men, in more then an ordinarie sort: little of body, but shewing in his countenance the greatnesse of his spirit: amiable by his mild and modest behauiour, and admirable for his graue pleasing Maiesty.

The Assembly lets him vnderstand by Boniface Archbishop of Mayence or Mentz, that the French (in regard of his vertues, and their future hope) had by a free and generall consent, chosen him King of France. And for execution of the said decree, he was instantly (in the presence of them all) installed King, the royall crowne was set vpon his head by the said Archbishop, and then he was rayed vpon a target, and carried about the assembly, after the ancient ceremony of the French. And by vertue of the same decree, Childeric was chalenged as vnworthy of the crowne, degraded, shauen, and confined into a Monastery, there to passe the remainder of his daies. This notable change happened in the yeare 750. in the City

King by the Parliament,

A of Soissons, but with so resolute a consent of all the French nation, as there appeared not any one that made shew to dislike thereof. A most assured testimony, that God had so determined, hauing reserved to himselfe the souereigne authority ouer Kings, to place and displace, gird and vngird, raise and cast downe, according to his good pleasure, alwaies iust, and alwaies wise. To him we must ascribe the principall and souereigne cause of all changes: For God is the gouernour, as he is the Creator: It being a necessary consequence, that hee gouernes that which he hath created, and by his prouidence watcheth especially ouer mankinde, for whom he hath made the world. If we shall otherwise seeke the nearest causes of this alteration, we may iustly say, that vice dispossessed Childeric, and vertue set Pepin in possession of the crowne: loue and the reuerence of subiects, being the support of publike authority: hate and contempt the ruine thereof. To the end that Princes by so worthy an example, may learne to banish vice which (making them hatefull and contemptible) thrusts them from their thrones, and to plant vertue, which causing them to be respected and honored, makes them to reigne ouer nations.

Now we beginne a new gouernment, vnder new Kings, and in a new race. In the beginning we shall see two great Princes, vnder whom good order shall make an alteration of affaires, with an abundance of all blessings, both spirituall and temporall. Iustice, wisdom, pollicy, armes, valour, large limits of territories, abundance of peace, and the excellent knowledge of learning, to raise this estate to the greatest happinesse that euer it enioyed, and scarce any other kingdome whatsoeuer, let forraigne nations say what they please. But the happinesse of these two Kings shall not be hereditary in their posterity, who beginning soone to degenerate, shall decline by degrees, vntill that vice depriving them of the crowne, vertue shall giue it to another, who shall shew himselfe a more lawfull successor, and right heire to Charlemagne, hauing a better part in his vertues. This second race shall enioy the kingdome 237. yeares, beginning to reigne in the yeare 750. and ending in the yeare 987. hauing begun by vertue, and ended by vice. A goodly lesson for Potentates: that bounty, wisdom and valour, are no hereditary possessions to be left vnto their children, but they are the gifts of God, the author of all good, and their souereigne Prince, to whom they owe homage for their greatnesse, as to him of whom depends absolutely all the kingdomes of the earth, and whose prouidence is the infallible rule of the changes which we see incident to mankinde, the which the ignorant without reason, attribute to blind fortune.

Pepin seeing himselfe seated in the throne of the French Monarchy, by the honorable fauour of the French: hee resolues to satisfie their hopes by the effects of his actions: and beginnes to confirme in their mindes the true and firme bond of obedience, the which is vnited with these two strings, loue, and the peoples respect to their superiours. No thing being more naturall, then to loue him from whom we receiue, or hope for good, and to respect him whom we hold sufficient to make vs to liue peaceably, and in quiet, especially when he hath power and command in the common-weale, without the which the particular cannot subsist.

Thus Pepin assembles the generall estates, meaning to lay a good foundation in time for the affaires of the realme, by the aduice of such as had called him: and according to his Fathers stile, he names this assembly a Parliament, wherevnto he calles the Clergy, the Nobility, the Iudges of the land, and the common people: that with one consent they might resolue what was necessary for the whole estate, consisting of these goodly parts. During these alterations, the Saxons (as farthest from their Masters) had shaken off the yoke of the French obedience: and by their example and practises, had drawne other people of Germany (subiect to this Crowne) to the like reuolt. Pepin armes presently, and goes with such expedition, as he ouerthrowes them at the passage of the riuer of Vistula: but the Popes distresse giues him presently a new cause to imploy his forces: for Zacharie being dead, Stephen the second (a Romaine borne) succeeds both in place and troubles: being forced to defend himselfe against the Lombardes, the Capitall enemies of the Romaine sea. Astolpho was then their King, who made great preparatiues against this new Pope, although he made no shew of open hatred. Stephen well informed of the Lombards humour and intent, resolues, not to attend the stroake, but to fortifie himselfe in time, and seeking first to Constantine Emperour of the East, without any successe, he intreats Pepin to succour him: from whom hauing receiued a fauourable A anwere, the better to obtaine the remedy he expected, he resolues to goe into France:

where being honourably entertained by Pepin, he doth againe Crowne him King of France, in Saint Denis Church in a great and solemne assembly, and makes miserable Childeeric a Monke, assigning him the Cloister for a perpetuall prison, and a Friars frock for an ignominious punishment, without any hope of returne. Then he imploied all his wits to per-swade Pepin, to vndertake the voyage of Italy against the Lombards, and drew him easily thercvnto. But Asfolpho (fearing the Pope) imploied Caroloman (the brother of Pepin) to di-uert him from this enterprise. This Caroloman was a Monke, and in great reputation of piety, but he could not dissuade Pepin from this designe: yet would he not attempt any thing B rashly, but first try mildnesse before force. He therefore sends his Ambassadors to the Lombard, to summon him to yeeld Rauenna, and all the townes of the sixe gouernours to the Pope. Asfolpho vseth great temperance in his answers, to shew the reuerence he bare to the Church of Rome, and to Pepin's intercession: but he resolued neuer to yeeld any thing. Pepin finding the Lombards euasions, and policie (who sought but to auoide this storme) assembles a Parliament: and laies before them both duty and necessity, to succour the Pope.
To this end he resolues to leauy an Army against the Lombard. Winter being spent in these treaties, and in the preparations for warre: in the spring he enters Italy with a strong and mighty army, which marcheth victoriously in all places, taking townes, and spoiling the country of Asfolpho, and then he went to besiege Pavia, the chiefe City of Lombardy.
Asfolpho foreseeing his ruine, flies to humble intreaties, both to the Pope and Pepin. C
The Pope lulled asleepe with the Lombards faire promises, not greatly louing the French, but by constraint: suffers himselfe first to be abused, and then he perswades Pepin to returne back into France.

Asfolpho promised to yeeld vp both Rauenna, and all that he detained from the Church, the which he could not performe in so great a defolation of his country, being surcharged with such an enemy. Stephen was well satisfied with this promise, forgetting the Lombards humour, so well knowne vnto him. Pepin glad to see the Pope satisfied (hauing no other obiet but to giue him satisfaction) returns presently into France, to his own affaires. But he had scarce passed the Alpes, when as Asfolpho assembles all his subiects (being mad with rage D for their great losses, & infinitely incensed against the Pope, who had drawn in the French) and enters the territories of the Church in hostile manner, sackes and spoiles all with a furious cruelty, and sodenly besiegeth Rome, where the Pope was resident. Stephen amazed at this v unexpected violence, sends back to Pepin, implores his aide, laments his credulity, and detests the treachery of the Lombards: he beseecheth him to make hast, if he will preferue his old age from the cruell hand of this disloyall, and the whole Church from a horrible de-folation, exceeding that of the Vandales or Ostrogoths.

Pepin moued with the Popes intreaties, and the apparent danger, assembles his forces, with a wondrefull celerity: and although Constantine by a most affectionate message laboured to diuert him, yet he brings backe his army into Italy. The fruite of his returne was both sodaine and great: for Asfolpho at the brute thereof raiseth the siege from before Rome, and retires to Pavia, the chiefe City of his realme. Pepin besiegeth him and forceth him to E accept of such conditions of peace, as he would prescribe. viz. That Asfolpho should presently deliuer up all that he held of the Church, and giue hostages: and Pepin should remaine in Italy at the Lombards charge, until he had performed all things. Asfolpho sends in forty hostages, yeelds Rauenna, with the Cities of the sixe Gouernours, and those he held in Ro-magnia: but when there remained no more to deliuer vp, but the Cities of Ferrara and Faenza, the Lombard did cunningly delay the full accomplishment of his promise, to finde some meanes to send back so rude an officer as the French, lying vpon his country in garrison, and spoiling it, and so to deceiue both the Pope and Pepin: but behold a strange accident befalls him. Being a hunting, chasing more after his fantasies then the beast, his horse F casts him downe a rocke and breakes his neck.

Thus the subtil Lombard thinking to deceiue, was deceiued: he ended his subtilty with his life, and the warre begonne by him without reason, by a iust death. The Pope recouers his places, and Pepin returnes into France, taking nothing in Italy, but leauing the realme of Lombardy

A Lombardie in the same estate he found it, without any alteration. This Kindome ended not with Asfolpho, for Didier Duke of Hetruria his nere kinsman, seizeth presently thereon, by meanes of his intelligences: but Rachise brother to Asfolpho (who was lately became a Monke) leaues his flock to enioy his fathers kingdom: yet for that he was the weaker with this iust title, the Pope compounds this controuersie in fauor of Didier, who remained King of Lombardy, vpon condition that the Cities of Ferrara and Faenza should be yeelded to the Church. But let vs returne to Pepin: his absence, with two yeares continuall warres, had broken the vsuall custome to call a Parliament, and bred many disorders within the realme: so as being returned into France, he presently called a solemne Parliament, wherein he established lawes according to the inconueniences that were to be redrest: as good lawes doe commonly proceed from bad manners. In this assembly he gaue audience to the Ambassadors of the Emperor Constantine, who demanded a confirmation of the amity and alliance which the Emperour had with the house of France: and receiues the new homage of Tassillon Duke of Bauaria. So referring all matters of importance to the iudgement of the Estates, honouring them that had honoured him, he doubled his subiects deuotion, and made good lawes within his realme. But knowing the humour of the French, impatient of rest, he found how difficult it was to retaine them long in peace, without some forraigne imploiment: and necessary presents him two occasions, one in Guienne, and the other in Saxony, Countries subiect to the Crowne of France, but both impatient of the French command. The Saxons beganne first: with whom Tassillon Duke of Bauiera, (who as we said did homage to the King) ioynes, contrary to his oth. This warre seemed to be of some difficulty, drawing to it all the other Germanes subiect to this Crowne: but Pepin preuented it with such speed, as hauing suppressed the Saxons, he forced them to a new obedience, charging them to bring him yearly three hundred good horses for an homage, that they should vndergoe the censurè of the Estates, & to be enemies to the enemies of the King and realme.

Hauing thus pacified Saxony, he makes a generall assembly at Wormes, to settle the af-fares of Austrasia: from thence he marcheth with his victorious army, against Jeffroy Duke of Guienne, according to the resolution of the Estates, being leuiued for that occasion. We haue said, that Eudon, father to Jeffroy, had much troubled and anoyed France, and left his children heires of his discontent: but Martel withdrawne by some new difficulties, could not finish that which he had begun. Jeffroy remaines sole Duke of Guienne, by the death of his brother: he growes daily more insolent, bandies all his subiects of Guienne openly against France, and afflicts the Clergy infinitely in their liues and liuings. Pepin begins with admonitions and threats: but Jeffroy growes more obstinate in contemning his Kings command, so as they must come to open force, and Jeffroy must pay the interests of his long delaies. Pepin enters Guienne with an army, and Jeffroy seeing his resolution, sends his deputies to auoide this storme, beseeching him with all humility to pardon what was past, promising obedience. Pepin (hauing commanded him to make restitution to the Clergy) returnes into France and dismisseth his army, supposing Guienne to be quiet. Jeffroy seeking his owne ruine by his furious rashnesse, goes to field with such forces as he could leuy among his subiects, and hauing passed Loire, he enters Bourgogne in hostile manner, hoping to surpris Chaslons. The King held then a Parliament at Orleans, when this intelligence came vnto him, he sends them presently to Neuers: assembles his forces, and marcheth against Jeffroy, who sodenly repasseth the riuier, and with great marches recouers Bourdeaux, as the City of his greatest safety, being as much confused in his defence, as he was rash in his attempt. Pepin pursues him, and in his passage all the Townes of Guienne yeeld without any difficulty, as to him whom they acknowledge for their lawfull King. Jeffroy forsaken of all men, pursued criminally by his Prince, is slaine by one of his houthould seruants, and is interred like a beast, in a marish nere to Bourdeaux. In detestation of his memory, the place is called the Tombe of Caiphas vnto this day: Thus was the vniust and rash rebellion of Jeffroy punished: and by his death the warre died in Guienne: and the wise valour of Pepin was so much the more commended, for that his iust pursute was accompanied with patience and mildnesse. But Pepin was mortall: the toile of so great warres, and the care of publike affaires, had much broken him, so as his old age might bee more profitably

employed in the maintenance of Iustice and peace, then in warre, the burthen whereof he might without danger lay vpon his eldest sonne Charles, a wife and a valiant yong Prince, of whose modesty and obedience he was well assured.

Thus resoluing to passe the rest of his daies in quiet, but not idly, he retires to Paris, but soone after he was surpris'd with a sicknesse, whereof he died, and so went to heauen, there to find rest which he could not enioy on earth: it was in the yeare 768. and of his reign the eighteenth. By his wife Berthe with the great foote, he left two sonnes, Charles and Caroloman: recommending them to the Estates, to giue them portions at their pleasures: So great was the assurance of this good Prince in the loue of his subiects, whom as he had made the most assured gard of his Person and State, so at his death he left his children to their faithfull discretion. He had seuen daughters, Berthe the wife of Milon Earle of Mans, mother to that great Roland, Hiltrude wife to Rene Earle of Genes, mother to that renowned Oliver, Roharde, Adeline, Laubergue, Ode and Alix. He had the happinesse to enioy his owne father; vntill he came to the age of man: the like good hap continued in his children: and for the perfecting of his happinesse, he had a sonne, one of the greatest and most excellent Princes that euer weare crowne. Thus Pepin the first of that race, mounted the royall throne of France: thus he reigned, thus he liued, and thus he died, leauing to his posterity a happy taste of his name. A religious Prince, wife, moderate, valiant, louing his subiects, and beloued of them, happy in father, in children, and in his gouernment, an excellent patterne for excellent Princes, who by his example hold it for a resolute maxime, That the strongest fortresse for a Prince is the loue of his subiects, and the surest bond of their authority, a respect gotten and preferred by vertue.

Estate of the Empire and of the Church.

The Empire
in the West.

In Gaule.

In Spaine.

In Italy.

But before we enter the reigne of Charlemagne, we must briefly represent the Estate of the Romane Empire, the which was happily vnited to the French Monarchy, and of the Church of Rome, by reason whereof there happened great and notable exploits vnder his reigne. The Empire of Rome had nothing remaining in the West, as we haue shewed. Gaule was possessed by the French, with the best part of Germanie: and since the beginning of their Monarchy, vnto the time we now describe, it hath bene greatly enlarged, not only in compasse of territories, and obedience of people, but also in reputation of ciuility, mildnesse, iustice, wisdom, and valour, as well by the happy successe of their victorious armies, as by the modest vsage of their victories, towards such as they subdued. Spaine was apporportioned to diuers nations, Vandales, Goths, Sarazins, pel mel, some here, some there. Italy was in miserable estate. Rome (sometimes the head of the world) was then the sinke of all confusion, the Rendezuous of all furious nations, as if they had vndertaken the ruine thereof by taske, hauing sackt it three times: for vnder the Empire of Honorius, in the yeare of grace 414. the Goths, by their King Alaric, tooke it after two yeares siege, and sackt it, without demanteling thereof. Forty five yeares after, vnder the Empire of Martian, in the yeare 459. the Vandales vnder the conduct of Genfericke their King, take it againe, sacke it, spoile it, and disgrace it, leading the widow of the Emperour Valentinian the third, basely in triumph. In the time of Iustinian the Emperour, the Goths vnder the command of Totila, hauing vndermined it with a long siege, tooke it, sackt it, and demantel'd it. Thus Rome was no more Rome, but a horrible confusion, after so many ruines, retaining nothing of her ancient beauty, but onely the traces of her old buildings, and the punishment of her tyranny, hauing endured that which she had caused other Cities to suffer.

Italy desolate
by the Goths.

Behold Italy wasted, infinitely tormented by sundrie enemies, who had vniustly afflicted all the nations of the earth. The Goths had first seized thereon, and enioyed it long, but as vnder the Empire of Iustinian in the yeare of Christ 552. they were expelled by the valour of Narfer, an excellent captaine, who defeated their army, slew their King Totila, and repossessed Rome: so soone after, the Lombards comming out of Germany, lodged in their place, as if they had played at leuell coyle, being drawne thither by Narfer himselfe, being discontented with the ill vsage he had received from Iustinian his maister. The Lombards held Italy about two hundred yeares, vntill that Charlemagne expelled them. At the same time the sixe Gouernours for the Empire of Rome, held Rauenna and some other Cities depending, (thus was the greatnesse of the Romaine Empire restrained) but with such couetousnesse

A couetousnesse and insolvency, as it tyred them no lesse then forraigne foes. That gouernment of sixe ended by the Lombards, and the Lombards by the French, (as the sequell will shew) who purchased credit euery where by comparing of the barbarous and confused inuasions of these warlike nations, they adding to the valour & good successe of their armes, iustice, piety, temperance and clemency: this reputation of vertue, winning them as many hearts as their swords did Cities.

During these confused and obscure times, there passed about foure hundred years, from the first sack of Rome, vntill that Charlemagne (expelling the Lombards) became absolute maister of Italy, and was made Emperour at Rome. All this passed vnder the Empires of Theodosius, sonne to Arcadius, of Valentinian the third, Martian, Leo the second, Zenon, Anastasius, Iustino the first, Iustinian the first, Iustin the second, Tiberius, Mauritius, Phocas, Heraclius, Constantin the second, Iustinian the second, Philipicus, Artemius, Leo the third, Constantin the third, Leo the fourth, Ireneus, Nicephorus, vnder whom by a publicke and sollemne contract, the distinction of the Easterne and Westerne Empires was made.

The command of the West is left, as it were, in garde with Charlemagne, and the French nation. But the East was in a bad plight, although the name and seate of the Empire were yet at Constantinople: for besides the dissipation of the State, (to increase their misery) a new sect sprung vp, forged by Mahomet an Arabian borne, vnder a colour of liberty, by the mixture of sundry doctrines, and after a mould of carnall felicity. With this charme he corrupted infinite numbers of people, and erected a new Kingdome in the East, from whence he vtterly expelled the Romaine name, with all the dignity of the Empire. This was in the time of the Emperour Heraclius, in the yeare of grace 623. an infamous date, to note the beginning of Mahomet's blasphemies. He began in Arabia, hauing wonne credit with the Sarazins, who were Arabian souldiars, desperate aduenturers, and discontented with the Romaines: and by the first beginning of his new doctrine, hee got so great reputation, as hee assembled an infinite number of men, armed with an incredible celerity, vnder the ensigne of liberty. So as hee marched as a conquerour in all places, hauing not onely subdued (by the force of these tumultuous troupes) Arabia (where he was borne) but also Persia, Palestina, Iudea, Egypt, and Affrike, and then ranging ouer Asia the lesse, hee came to the gates of Constantinople, in lesse then thirte yeares.

But the providence of God, caring for the preferuation of his Church, opposed the French Monarchie, against the violent rage of Mahomet, which else had ouerflowne all Europe, into the which he had already made a breach by Spaine, had gotten a great country, and was ready to inuade France, if Charles Martel had not stopt his course at Tours, as we haue sayd. During these confusions in the Empire, the Bishop of Rome grew great by these ruines. The Goths and Vandales were more enemies to the State, then to religion: for although for the most part they were Arrians, yet did they aduow themselves Christians, and held the common signe of Christianity, so as in the taking and sacking of the City of Rome, the Bishop was somewhat respected, and in his fauour the people built vpon the foundation of the ruined houses: and many of the Country finding more safety at Rome, then in other Cities of Italie, retired themselves thither, and peopled the city. So by this occasion new Rome (the seat of the Popes iurisdiction) succeeding the Emperours, hath bene built within old Rome, amidst the Pallaces, Walkes, Basiliques, Colizces, Amphitheatres, and other ancient buildings.

But about all, the credit and authority of the Bishop of Rome (by these new occurrents) crept in by degrees, vntill he aduanced himselfe above the Emperours, Kings, and Princes of Christendome: yet he of Constantinople held himselfe the superior, being in the proper seat of the Empire, and in the light of the Imperiall Court. Thus they fall to debate, and the cause of their dissensions was the preheminance of their seas, and the authority of the vniuersall Bishop. This contention bred infinite confusions in the church, and in an vnseasonable time, which inuited men to sacke and spoile. So as Saint Gregory Bishop of Rome (a man of singular piety and learning) hauing courageously opposed himselfe against Iohn Bishop of Constantinople, who affected this title of vniuersall Bishop, and detesting so vnreasonable and vnseasonable an ambition, cries out. Oh times, oh manners, the whole world is

speech of S.
Gregory.

set on fire with warre. Christians are euery where massacred by Idolaters, cities and Temples razed by Barbarians, and yet the pastors of the church (as it were treading vnder foot the common-law of Gods people) dare vsurpe names of vanity, and braue it with those prophane titles.

He that takes on him the title of vniuersal Bishop is the fore-runner
of Antichrist

The reader (curious to vnderstand the Estates of those times, and to note the degrees and authority of this vniuersall Bishop, established in the Church) may read the Epistles of this good father, great in name, and in effect, without troubling my selfe to set them downe in particular whose intention was to shew; That who so taketh vpon him the authority and title of vniuersall Bishop in the Church, and to haue any Souereigne preheminance, presumeth about Iesus Christ, the only head of the sacred body of the Church, and by consequence he doth affirme that he is the forerunner of Antichrist. And yet after these graue and serious admonitions of Saint Gregory the great, within ten yeares after Boniface the third obtained from Phocas the Emperor the title of vniuersall Bishop, with authority ouer the vniuersall Church, as Platina the Popes Secretary doth report.

Dispute for Images.

To this quarrell for the supremacy, was added the controuersie for images, which caused infinite confusions: the Emperours and Bishops were banded one against another, and by their dissensions the people were stirred vp to seditious reuolts, the which after many Tragical cuents, were a meane to ruine the Empire in the East. It was a popular custome to erect images to those whom they would honour, as hauing deserved well of the Common-weale. Christians desiring to honour the memorie of holy men, began to set vp images euen for them also, following this ciuill custome, and did erect them in Temples, as places consecrated to deuotion. Some Bishops fauoured this new deuice in the Church, and others did impugn it. Epphanius did teare a picture in peeces, and Serenus did beate downe an image, the one in the East, the other in the West. The Christians borne and bred in this ancient doctrine of the Apostles, My children beware of Images, maintained in the Catholike Church, by succession from father to sonne, could not digest this innoation: no more could the Emperours.

Images as the
innoation.

Hence grew the dissention, the greatest part of the Bishops holding the contrary; That it was a part of the seruice of God, & a bond to retaine mens soules in deuotion with reuerence. This contention grew in the time of the Emperour Philipicus called Bardanes, who by an Edict caused them to be throwne downe, in the yeare of grace 713. the which continued to 782. vnder Constantine the second, called Copronymus, an enemy to images, who commanded them to be cast downe, contrary to the liking of his mother Irene, who not onely maintained them with violence, but also caused them to be confirmed by a Councel held at Nice a City in Bithinia, seeing that at Constantinople (where she had made the conuocation of this Ecclesiasticall Assembly) the people were resolute to withstand them. Hence grew an execrable Tragedy in the Imperiall Court. Irene seeing her sonne resolute against her defence of Images, was so transported, as (hauing seized on him in his chamber) she caused his eyes to bee put out, so as dying with griefe, she vsurps the Empire. Through this bad government, confusion so increased in the East, as in the end necessity made the way for Charlemagne, to take vpon him the dignity and title of the Emperour of the West, and to preserue the Prouinces in those parts from the disorders of the Greeke Emperours, as wee may see in the continuance of this History.

Tragical cruelty of a mo-

her sonne.

I am bound to obserue these so notable occurrents, in those times, as belonging to the subiect of my History, to represent truly both the Estate of the Empire and of the Church, when as Charlemagne vnderooke the government of the Empire, and vnited it happily to the French Monarchy. The wise reader may verifie more plainly in the Originalls, (from whence I haue drawne this Inuentory) what I haue briefly set downe here touching the occurrents of those ages, wherein the Oracle of holy antiquity was verified by the end of these strange Tragedies. The truth is lost by contending. The first simplicity of the Catholike Church, being rich in her pouerty by the abundance of truth, continued since the golden age of the Apostles, and their Disciples, was changed into rich and stately pompe: the Crownes of martirdome wherewith the first Bishops of Rome had beene honored, into a triple Crowne, which not onely hath and doth giue lawes to Emperours, Kings and Princes of the earth, but doth tread them vnder foote, dispossesse them of their estates, and declares them incapable of rule when they obey him not: and for a mark of this souereigne authority,

CHARLES the Great, or CHARLEMAGNE the 24. King of France.

From the yeare 768. vnto the yeare 814.

He Estates of France assemble after the death of Pepin, and by their consents and aduice, Charles, and Caroloman, his formes, diuide the realme betwixt them by equall portions. Charles was crowned at Wormes, Caroloman at Soissons: Writers agree not in the declaration of their portions, for that by the death of Caroloman, the whole realme came to Charles, three yeares after the death of their Father, Brothers of diuers humours, who in the end had ruined each other by this equalitie of power, which proues often an vniust and dangerous ballance in an Estate. But Gods will was to preserue so great a Monarchie in Europe, to bee a harbour for his Church, by chosing a great Prince, to vnite in him alone the power which is dismembred by the command of many Maisters.

Charles was endued with singular gifts, both of body and minde, whereunto (by the wise care of his father Pepin) was added (as a seale) the instructions of a vertuous conuersation, learning and armes. For the ground of all vertues, he was carefully instructed in religion, the which he loued and honored with great reuerence all his life time; and likewise the Churches and Pastors. Charitie, temperance, equitie, care of Iustice, and of order, to releue the people, to keepe his faith both to friend & foe, and to vse a victory modestly, were the notable effects of this excellent knowledge, as remarkable in him, as in any Prince that A euer liued. He loued learning by nature, and learned men, Paul of Pisa instructed him in the Greeke, and Latin tongues, and Aymon in Philosophie and the Mathematikes. He called these humane sciences his pastimes, and the companions of his sword, and sometimes did recreate himselfe therein. He tooke a delight in poetry, as some of his writings do witness: but especially in Histories, wherein he was exceeding well read.

His armes.

The vniuersities of Paris and Pisa, (built or enriched by him) witness the loue and honor he bare to learning. In armes he had his father Pepin for his chiefe schoolemaster, and experience doth testifie how much he profited. Before his father left him, he had great commands, and discharged them with such reputation, as the continuance of his armes, when he B was King, shew plainly, that there was neuer a souldiar that carried sword with more valour, nor great Captaine that commanded with more obedience, nor performed any thing with greater fortune, nor vsed his victories with more mildnesse, and iudgement; neither did euer King or Prince reigne with more authority, nor was more reuerently obeyed then our Charlemagne, well deseruing the name of great for his vertues. He was of a liuely disposition, quicke, actiue, and vehement: but modestie, and wisdom did season this viuacity, and vehemency with so good a grace, as if the one could not bee without the other: and this moderation of diuers humors, made him as admirable for his Iudgement, as venerable in his countenance, and person.

There appeared in him a graue sweet Maiesty, in a goodly personage, great, strong, and C patient of labour, a quicke spirit, cleere, and sound, both in apprehension, memory, and iudgement: resolution neuer failed him in difficulties, nor reply in discours: terrible to some, amiable to others, according to the cause, persons and occurrents; Vertues which purchased him so great credit, as he was beloued, respected, and feared of all men: with such obedience, as the effects of his reigne doe shew: for hauing receiued a great Kingdome from his father, he enlarged it with a wonderfull successe, God hauing raised vp these three great Princes, one after an other, Charles Martel, Pepin, and this great Charles, to preserue the Christian name in a great Monarchy, amidst the deluge of barbarous nations and the ruine of the Empire. I haue coated these his singular vertues in the beginning, to giue a D tast to the obseruation of his great and admirable actions, where there wants nothing but order, to relate them fully in so great a diuersity, the which hath ministred occasion to the obscure writers of those times, to be too breefe, or too tedious, and ofte-times to report matters very vnlkely for the greatnesse of things which they haue handled in a fabulous manner: and indeed the euents are almost incredible, and more miraculous then ordinary. Doubtlesse I could gather out of the most confident authors, and that according to the order of times, as euery thing hath changed, and answerable to the greatnesse of the subiect, that which cannot well be represented without some direction.

All the deeds of Charlemagne must be referred to that which he hath done either whilest he was King alone of France, or when he was Emperour, and had vniited the Empire to his royaltie. And in those times, there is first to be obserued what he did in the life of Caroloman in Guienne, and after his death in Italy, Spaine and Saxony, where he had great E matters to decide. This is the designe of our relation.

The deeds of Charlemagne in the life of his brother Caroloman.

CAROLOMAN was infinitely ielous of his brothers greatnesse, whom with greefe he did see beloued, honored, and obeyed of all the French, for his singular vertues, both of body and minde. This ielousie (too ordinary F a Counsellor to Princes) made him to seeke all meanes to countermince and ouerthrow the affaires of Charlemagne, who had his eyes fixed vpon Italy, as the goodly and most beautifull theatre of his valour, the true subiect to maintaine his authority, and power amongst Christians: and Caroloman did all he could to crosse his designs. And this was the estate of Rome and Italy.

A Presently after the decease of Pepin, the Church of Rome fell into great confusions, by the practises of Didier King of Lombardie, a sworne and capitall enemy, hauing corrupted some of the Cleargie: hee caused Constantin brother to Toten Duke of Neptzo (his vassall and trusty friend) to be chosen Pope, with such violence, as hee made Philippus (being already Canonically chosen) to be degraded. This better party, seeing themselves contemned by the Lombard, assemblé together, and by one common consent choole Stephen the third, a Sicilian, for Pope, who resolues to call in the King of France, and to oppose him against his enemies desseignes. Charles solicited by the Pope, sends twelue Prelats speedily to Rome, to fortifie their party, against the other: meaning at greater need to apply a greater remedy. The matter succeeded according to their desire that had intreated him, for the Counsell beeing assembled at Latran, they confirme Stephen lawfully chosen, and depose Constantin raised by disorder and violence. But Didier would not bee controuled with this repulse, and seeing that force had not succeeded, hee resolues to trye policie, and to vndermine Stephen with a good shew. Hee sends to congratulate his election, purgeth himselfe of the Anti-pope Constantin degraded: accuseth both him and his brother of ambition, protesting to liue with him in amity: and for prooffe of this his good meaning, hee desires him to be pleased with his repaire to Rome, there to conferre with him in priuate. The Pope (who neuer flies to the French but in necessity) was easily perswaded by Didier: who came to Rome, conferres with the Pope, and makes great protestation of his obedience. But this good shew continued not long.

There was a gouernor at Rome for the Emperour, called Paul Ephialte. Didier corrupted this Grecian: and as the execution of Iustice was in his hands, hee makes vse of him so cunningly, as in the presence of Pope Stephen, hee causeth him to seize vpon two of his chiefe Secretaries, Christopher, and Sergius, (accused by him of supposed crimes) and to hang them infamously. Their greatest offence, was to haue fauoured the French. This presumption proceeded farther, for he caused all the principall Citizens to bee banished, whom he noted to bee of the French faction: that hauing taken away all lets, he might be maister of Rome in despite of the Pope. Stephen discovering the Lombards practise, to his preiudice, flies to Charlemaine, beseeching him to prepare an armie against his force that did ruine him by his apparent mildenesse. Charlemagne was fully resolved: but Didier had provided D a remedy in France, by the meanes of Caroloman, to stoppe Charles his passage into Italy, making worke for him in Guienne, where there grewe a perillous warre vpon this occasion.

Rebellion in Guienne by Hunnault.

Wee haue said before, that although the Country of Guienne depended of the Crowne of France, yet were there many tumults through the practises of some Noblemen of the Country, who stirred vp the people (beeing mutinous of them-selues) to rebellion. The cause of these reuolts was the abuse of the Kings bounty, who suffered such people as they had conquered, to inioy their priuileges, and liberties, intreating them with all fauour. Eudon began first vnder Martell: Jeffroy and Hunnault his children, and heires of his discontent, had continued it vnder Pepin: Jeffroy being dead, Hunnault succeeds him with the like hatred, the which Caroloman entertained to imploy him against his brother Charles. And as ielousie, and ambition thrust him on to attempt against him, so did hee make his profit of the couctous ambition of Hunnault, feeding him with the hope of the Siegneurie of Guienne, seeing his humour was to bee a Duke, supposing to haue credit inough with the people, if hee were fauoured by one of the Kings of France against the other. Guienne was a part of Charles his portion: Hunnault layes the foundation of his desseigne, to with-draw him-selfe wholly from the Crowne of France, and to make open warre against Charlemagne, in practising the people of Guienne, to bee declared Duke by their consent, according to the right which hee pretended. The countenance of Caroloman could doe much, but the wisdom and courage of Charlemagne preuailed more, for beeing aduertised of Hunnaults practises, and of his brothers secret desseignes, hee armed with such speed, as hee surprised the townies of Poitiers, Xaintes, and Angoulesme: and by that meanes all the Country adioyning. Hunnault (who made his account with-out Charles) finding himselfe preuented, fled to a Nobleman of the Country named Loup, whom hee not onely held to bee very firme to his faction, but also his trusty and affectionate friend.

Instruction
how Princes should carry themselves in civill warre.

Charlemagne sends presently to Loup: he summons him to deliuer Hunault into his hands, A as guilty of high treason: and in the meane time he builds a fort in the midst of the Country, whereas the riuers of Dordone and Lisle doe ioine, the which he called Fronsac, as it were the front of the Sarazens, whom he had caused to feare, if these designs had succeeded. Thus getting Hunault with all his family, he doth punish him as a rebell: he pardoned Loup, and all that had obeyed him: and so ends a dangerous warre without blowes: but he grants life and liberty to Hunault, and the enioying of all his goods: leauing a memorable example to Princes, how they ought to carry themselves in ciuill warres, preuenting a mischief by wisdom and diligence, and not to thrust their vanquished subiects into dispaire, by rigour. Caroloman seeing his practises against his brother to succeed ill, B vndertakes a voiage to Rome, with an intent to cause some alteration there: yet with a shew of deuotion. His Mother Berthe (who likewise went this voiage) was honourably receiued in her journey by Didier King of the Lombards, treating a marriage betwixt her sonne Charlemagne and Theodora, Sister, or Daughter to this Didier, one of the greatest enemies of her sonnes good fortune. Yet Charlemagne, to please his Mother, receiued this wife, but soone after he put her away, as vnfit for his humours, and affaires: and so that which seemed a cause of loue, bred greater hate betwixt these two Princes. Caroloman hauing effected nothing at Rome, but onely made shew of his foolish and malicious iealousie, too apparent in this his fained deuotion, returns into France, and there dies soone after, in the yeare of our Lord 770. C

alone.

Now is Charlemagne alone by his brothers decease: who quietly takes possession of his Estates, and reteineth such of his seruants as he knew to haue bene most trusty to his brother, during their common iealousies, expecting the like faithfulness, hauing entertained them when there was least hope.

The deeds of Charlemagne King of France alone, vntill hee was Emperour.

HARLEMAGNE hauing put away his wife Theodora for suspect of incontinency, he married with Hildegard or Ildegrade, daughter to the Duke of Sucue his vassall, by whom he had Charles, Pepin, Lewis and three daughters, Rotrud, Berthe, and Gille, the nurcery of his Noble family. Caroloman's iealousie died not with him, but suruiued in Berthe his wife: who (impatient of her condition, thrust head-long with a spirit of reuenge against her brother in law Charles) retires with her two sonnes to Didier King of Lombardy, as to the most bitter and irreconcilable enemy of Charlemagne. Didier entertaines her kindly with her children, hoping to effect his designe: but this was the Leuaine of his owne ruine. His practise, together with the widowes, was to procure the Pope (Stephen being dead and Adrian a Romaine gentleman succeeding him) to confirme, and crowne the sonnes of Caroloman for Kings of France. The Lombard had two strings to his bow, meaning both to put the Pope in disgrace with Charlemagne (the easier to suppress him being destitute of French succors, whereon hee chiefly relied) and likewise to set France on fire, by the setting vp of new Lords. Didier beseecheth the Pope to grant this confirmation, to the children of Caroloman for his sake. But Adrian (well acquainted with the Lombards humour) was so resolute in denying his request, as they fell to open hatred. Didier discontented with this repulse armes and enters the sixe gouernments, with all his forces, being a Seigneury vnder the Popes iurisdiction, spoiles the Country, and besiegeth Rauenna, the chiefe City of the Exarchie. The Pope sends his Nuncio vnto him, to expostulate the cause of this so sodaine warre against his subiects, desiring him to yeeld what hee had taken, and not to proceed in this hostile manner, without any reasonable cause, vpon paine of excommunication. F

By his owne
practises.

At that instant there fell out a great occasion to increase the hatred betwixt Charles and Didier, for that Hunault (who had bene vanquished in Guienne) retired himselfe to Didier, and is not onely courtously receiued: but honoured with the charge of generall of the army,

A army, the which he had leuiued against the Pope. Didier suffered himselfe to be so abused with the persuasions of Hunault, touching the meanes to attempt against the Estate of Charlemagne, that holding Italy vndoubtedly his owne, he plotted a warre, and assured himselfe of a certaine victory in France. Thus pride and wickednesse hastens his ruine. The Pope hauing no other defence but his excommunication, not desensible against Didier's forces, flies againe to Charlemagne, as to his sacred Anchor or last hope, intreating aide from him in his necessity. Charlemagne had great reason to arme against Didier, who had alwaies crossed his affaires: fed his brothers iealousies, receiued his widow and children, labored to haue them chosen Kings of France, to trouble or ruine his Estate: entertained his rebellious subiects, and with them practised to make warre against him.

The sute and summons of the Romaine Church, was a great motiue to induce him to arme, against him who professed himselfe an open enemy to Christian religion, whereof the Kings of France had alwaies shewed themselves protectors and gardiens. But not to attempt any thing rashly, he first sends his Ambassadors to the Pope, to assure him of his good will, the which should not be wanting in his necessity: but he thought it best to try mildnesse, before he used force against the Lombard. He therefore sends his Ambassadors to Didier, and doth summon him to restore what he had taken from the Pope, and to suffer him to liue in peace. Didier (who relied much vpon his policy,) giues good words to the Ambassadors, promising to performe all that Charles demanded: but in effect he would haue the Pope accept of conditions of peace from him, and that the children of Caroloman should be declared Kings of France. These demands were found vnreasonable on either side: the treaty is broken, the French Ambassadors returne, and Didier renewes the warre more violently then before, against the Church: and hauing spoiled all the territory of Rauenna, he takes Faenza, Ferrara, Comachia, Campagna, and Romandiola, townes of the six gouernments. Charlemagne's Ambassadors informe their master, that the warre with the Lombard is ineuitable, and finde all things at their returne ready to inuade Italy: for Charlemagne being forced to suppress the rebellious Saxons, who (impatient of the French yoke) reuolted daylie, had leuiued a goodly army, the which was ready to be employed against the Lombard.

D But Charles would not attempt any thing in a matter of so great consequence without aduice of his Estates. Yet loath to loose time, he causeth his army to march, and makes his Rendezuous at Geneua (a towne vnder his obedience vpon the way to Italy) and hauing diuided his army into two, hee seizeth vpon the passages of Mont Cenis, and Saint Bernard, which are the two entrees from France to Italy. The Estates hauing found the causes of warre against Didier King of Lombardy to be iust, Charlemagne causeth his army to aduance with all speed, and ioynes nere vnto Vercell. Didier attends him there, & giues him battailes: but at the first encounter, he is vanquished by Charlemagne. The Lombard hauing rallied and fortified his troupes, receiues a new defeate, and so great a one, as he is enforced to suffer his enemy to be master of the field. An infallible entrance to his ruine. Thus hauing tumultuously trusted vp what he could, he sends his sonne Aldegise to Verona, with the widow and children of Caroloman, casting himselfe into Paui, the which he had carefully fortified, as the dungeon and fortresse of his last fortune.

He makes warre by the aduice on the Estates.

Charlemagne pursues him at the heeles, besiegeth him with all his forces in Paui, and resolves to haue it at what price soeuer. And to shew his resolution, he sends for his wife and children into France, to the end the Italians (who were doubtfull) might know his minde, & without attending any new occurrences, resolves to obey the victor. Hauing coopt vp Didier in Paui, and seized vpon all the approaches, he resolves to take Verona, which they held the strongest place of all the Lombards estate. So leauing his vnkle Bernard to continue the siege at Paui, he marcheth with part of his army to Verona.

F His resolution so successful in the beginning, and this checke giuen to Didier (shut vp as it were in prison) gaue a great alteration to the affaires of either party, amidst these people of diuers humours. The Spoletins, the Reatins, those of Ancona, of Fermo and of Osimo (as it were in spight of one of the other) yeeld to Charlemagne, and detest the wretched State of Didier, as a worthy reward of his trecherous iniustice, and violence. The Venetians (being Neuters & Spectators of this tragedy, who neuer had felt in any sort with Didier)

775. offer amity and succors to Charlemagne, who was desirous they should keepe the sea quiet, A least the Emperor should be an actor in this quarrell for Didier.

Charlemagne staid not long at Verona, before the City began to yeeld: Berthe the widow of Caroloman, being the chiefe instrument to draw them to composition, his forces being (as she said) verie fearefull. Aldegise the sonne of Didier finding himselfe vnable to resist to resolute a consent of the citizens, nor to releue his fathers misery, flies secretly to the Emperour of Constantinople. Thus Verona yeelds to Charlemagne by composition, who receiues both Berthe and the inhabitants to mercy, to whom he performs his promise: he inflicts no other punishment vpon Berthe and her children, but a gentle admonition of their vnciuill rashnesse, and inioynes them to returne into France, there to doe better, and to liue more honourably. This was about Easter, which drew Charles to Rome, B where he remained onely eight daies, to visit the holy places, and to conferre with Pope Adrian. They write wonders of the great entertainment the Pope gaue him, and of the shewes of amity of Charlemagne. He confirmed all that his father Pepin had giuen vnto the Pope, and greatly augmented it. The Pope made Charles a Patritian of Rome, a degree to mount vnto the Empire: from thence Charles came to Pauiia the which being for the space of tenne monthes pressed without by warre, and within by pestilence and famine, in the end yeelds by composition: and Didier (who had hated Charles without cause, and attempted warre rashly) falls into his hands, who shewes himselfe wise and modest, both to vnder- take a warre, and to vse the victory.

Thus Charlemagne hauing wisely vnderaken a iust warre, and ended it happily, he ruined C the Kingdome of the Lombards, carrying Didier prisoner to Lions, or to Legee, for writers speake diuersely of the place of his imprisonment. This was in the yeare of our Lord 776. A notable date to represent the tragicall end of so great a Kingdome, the which continued in Italy only two hundred and foure years, vnder Princes of diuers humors. But iniustice, tyrannie, and pride, prouoked the wrath of God against them, so as thinking to take from an other, they lost their owne: to vsurpe the liberties of others, they fell into an ignominious slavery, and their subtilty was the cause of their owne misery.

A mirror for Princes and great States, neuer to attempt an vniust and vnecessary warre, to vsurpe an other mans right, and neuer to thinke to preuaile ouer a good cause by craft and policy. Charlemagne vsed his victory with great moderation towards the conquered nation, to the great content of all the Italians, who held it a great gaine to haue lost their old master, and to be rightly free, being subiect to so wise a Lord: for he left them their ancient liberties, and to particular Princes (such as were vassals to Didier) their Seigneuries: to Aragise, sonne in law to Didier, he left the Marquitate of Beneuent. He placeth French Go- uernors in conquered Lombardy, meaning to haue them intreated with the like mildnesse, as the ancient patrimony receiued from his Predecessors. During the siege of Pauiia a Council was held at Rome by Pope Adrian, in fauour of Charlemagne, to giue him honours answerable to his merits of the Church, and namely the right to giue all benefices throughout all Christendome, was said to belong vnto him. Charlemagne being returned into France, Aldegise (the sonne of Didier) sought to disquiet Italie, aided by the Emperour Constantine, and the practises of Rogand to whom Charlemagne had giuen Friul, who re- uolted from his obedience: but all these rebellions were soone suppressed, by the faithfull care of the French Gouvernours, whom Charlemagne had left in the Country newly conquered: and Rogand being taken, suffered the paines of his treacherous rashnesse, being beheaded by the Kings commandement. Thus Italie remayning quiet to him and his (as conquered by a iust warre) in shalbe hereafter incorporate to the French Monarchie in this second race, being giuen in partage to the children of France, whilst that the good gouernment of our Kings maintaines the dignity of the crowne. But the end of this warre was the beginning of an other in Germany, whereof the Saxons were the chiefe, drawing vnto them (according to the diuersity of occasions) other people of Ger- many their neighbours. This warre continued thirty three years, not all successiue, but at di- uers brunts and seasons: the Saxons hauing still a desire, to crosse Charlemagne in his de- signe, especially being busied in many other affaires of great consequence. I will breefly re- late this warre of Saxony, reporting with one breath, what hath beene seuerally disperfed in

A in the whole history, without confusion of times or matter, following a stile fit for this histo- ry. In those times Germany was subiect to the crowne of France, although it had particular Estates, vassals to our Kings, whatsoeuer the Germanes say, who confesse but a part thereof.

The Saxons were subiect to our Crowne, as appeares by that aboue written, and namely vnder Martel and Pepin his sonne. The motiues of this warre were diuers, the impatency of a people desiring their ancient liberty, not able to beare an others command, and (as the Ger- maines say) the hatred and ialousie of a mighty neighbour, threatening them with seruitude, and a controuersie for the limits of their lands: but the greatest and most important cause B of these warres, was the diuersity of religion, for that the Saxons would obstinately hold the Pagan superstition, which they had receiued from their Ancestors, and Charlemagne vrged them to forsake their Paganisme, and to make open profession of the Christian faith: moued with zeale to the generall aduancement of the truth, and the priuat duty of a Prince to his subiects, to provide for their soules health. A thing very worthy of obseruation. Belial did then fight against Christ; Pagan superstition against Christian verity. But alas, by whome, and wherefore are these vnciuill warres at this day? Christians fightes against Christians, the most sacred signe of Christianity appeares on either side in Christian and French armies: Christians blood is spilt by Christians, through a blind fury, and want of vnderstanding in the fundamentall accord of the sauing truth. These are not onely different, but contrary C warres to those of Charlemagne: and our enraged tumults are begun, and nourished without reason, both against the good of the Estate, and Church. Vpon this controuersie of religion, the Saxons made warre eight times against Charlemagne: especially when they found him busied elsewhere, watching their opportunity, either to crosse him in his desseine, or to frustrate his attempts. At such time as he was in Italy they played the wild colts, not onely in reiecting the French command, but also making open war against those cities of Ger- many, which obeyed Charlemagne: they had taken Eresbourg from the crowne of France, euen vpon his returne, and besieged Sigisbourg, robbing, and spoiling al the country about: Charlemagne assembling a Parliament at Wormes, leuies a great army, to charge the Saxons in diuerse places. This councill succeeded happily: for hauing vanquished the Saxons twise D in one moneth in a pitched field, he reduced them to their ancient obedience, vsing his victory with much modesty, and wisdom, desiring rather to shew them the power of his authority, then the rigour of his force. The chiefe among them was Widichind, and as religion was the chiefe motiue of these ordinary rebellions, so Charlemagne seeking the establish- ment of Christian religion in Saxony with great zeale, happily effected it. Hauing vanqui- shed this Widichind by reason, and humanity, and brought him to the knowledge of the truth by his graue and wise conuersation, whome he perswaded without any violence, to leaue the Pagan superstition, which force of armes could not effect in him, nor in the Saxons: for Mens soules are not gained by force of armes, but by reason. By the meanes of this Widichind, the greatest part of the Saxons were drawne to the knowledge of the true God, and the obedience of the French monarchy: the most obstinate were forced either to obey, or to abandon the country: as in deed great numbers of the Saxons retyred them-selues into diuers E strange countries.

Thus the warre of Saxony ended (being both long and dangerous) and those which were conquered by the truth, were the true conquerers, in knowing the true God. Charlemagne hauing caused the Saxons to leaue their false opinions, was carefull to haue them instructed in the truth: to this end he appointed holy & learned men in all places, and gaue meanes to maintaine them: as the Germaine histories report more particularly. It sufficeth me (in de- claring this briefly) to shew his piety, compatible with his valour and happinesse, and for a president to Princes, to make religion the foueraigne end of their armes and authori- ties. This Widichind was a great personage both in wisdom, valour, and authority, and F by consequence very notable in the order of our subiect. From him are descended very famous races: the two Henries, the one called Oiselen or the Fowler, and the other of Bamberg, and the two Oshos, all Emperours: and like-wise the Dukes of Saxonie, the Marquis of Misnia: the Dukes of Sauoy, and also the most famous race of Hugh Capet, is drawne from this spring, by the common consent of learned writers, the

From this warre of Saxonie sprung many other in the Northerne parts, whereof I will intreat, hauing discoursed briefly of the war of Spaine, both for that it chanced during that of Saxonie, as also (beeing very memorable) for the ouerthrow of the Sarazins, who threatened Christendome like a deluge. Histories differ much touching this warre, but I will report what is most likely, by the consent of most approued writers, whereof the studious reader may iudge by conference: I beeing but a faithfull reporter.

The motiue of this Spanish warre, was more vpon pleasure then necessitie; but the zeale of religion gaue a colour and shew of necessitie, to the heroycall desire of Charlemagne, seeking to enlarge the limits of the French Monarchie by armes. So this warre of Spaine was more painfull, more dangerous, and of lesse successe then that of Italy, whereunto necessitie and dutie had drawne Charlemagne: but his wife proceeding in the action, did warrant him from all blame. The occasion which made him bend his forces against the Sarazins in Spaine, was the assurance of his good fortune, the quiet peace of his realme, the meanes to employ his souldiars, the Spaniards hate against the Sarazins, and the generall feare of all Christians, least these Caterpillers should creepe farther into Europe. This was the estate of Spaine: the Sarazins had conquered a great part thereof, and were diuided into diuers commands, vnder the title of Kingdomes: yet these diuers Kings resolu'd to oppose their vnited forces against Charles their common enemy, fore-seeing then the tempest, they seeke to preuent it, and to crosse the desseignes of Charlemagne, which beeing discouered, they caused King Idnabala, a Sarazin, to insinuate into his friendship, being a man full of subtil mildnesse. This stratageme preuailed more then all their forces. Charlemagne was thrust forwards by Alphonso, furnished the Chaste, King of Nauarre, and by the Asturiens & Galiciens (Christian people of Spain) to vndertake this warre, beeing easie, profitable, and honourable, and by consequence most worthy the valiant happinesse of Charlemagne. Moreouer this Idnabala (making a shew of friendship,) laboured to hasten him to the execution of this enterprise, from the which hee knew well he should not diuert him: but in effect it was to betray him, by the discouering of his intentions: flattering his desire to get the more credit by pleasing him. Charlemagne then well affected of himselfe, and perswaded by others, calles a Parliament at Noyon, and there concludes a warre against the Sarazins of Spain. The armie he employed in that action was great, both for the number of men, and valour of great warriors, beeing the choice of the most worthy Captaines in Christendome. Amongst the which they number Milon Earle of Angers, Rouland the sonne of Milon, and Berthe sister to Charlemagne, Renald of Montaban, the four sons of Aymon, Oger the Dane, Oliuer Earle of Geneua, Brabin, Arnold of Belland, and others: the great valour of which persons hath bene fabulously reported by the writers of those obscure times, with a thousand ridiculous tales, vnworthy the valour of those heroike spirits: proofes of the ignorance of that age, beeing barren of learned wits. They say, that Charlemagne, to make this voyage more honourable in shew, did then institute the order of the twelue Peeres of France. Being entred into Spaine, he found no Sarazin forces in field, but their citties well fortified, hauing resolu'd to make a defensiu, rather then an offensiu warre. The most renowned Sarazin Kings were Aigoland, Bellingan, Denises, Marsile, and Idnabala, which be the subiect of our fabulous tales: but the last, as I haue said, made shewe of friendship with Charlemagne, and open hatred against the other Sarazin kings: with whome notwithstanding he had most strict correspondence to betray Charles. The first Cittie he attempted, was Pampelune, in the kingdom of Nauarre, the which he tooke by force, but with much paine, losse, and danger. Hauing sackt it, and slaine all the Sarazins he found, Saragoce yeelds to him by composition, with many other small townes, terrified by the example of Pampelune. This beginning incouraged him to march on, relying on his wonted fortune: but as he passed through the Prouinces of Spaine, like a victorious Prince without any difficulty, hauing giuen a part of his armie to leade to Milon of Angiers his brother in law, it chanced neere vnto Bayonne, that Aigoland a Sarazin king, (hauing in this common dispaire, thrust an armie to field, incountred Milon with his troupes, little dreading any enemy) tooke him at such an aduantage, as he defeated him. The losse was very great, for they report it was of forty thousand men: where Milon was slaine for a confirmation of the Sarazins victorie. Charlemagne was farre off, and not able by any diligence to preuent the losse: he pacifies this amazement,

A amazement, least it should daunt the whole armie. He hastens thither, and gathers together the reliques of these discomfited troupes, keeping the conquered citties, & such as were friends in their obedience. But after this followes a second accident. Aigoland putt vp with the pride of this victorie, passeth into Gascoine, and besiegeth Agen, to diuert Charlemagne from his pursuit, and to draw him home to defend his owne country. So as Charlemagne fearing least his absence, and the Sarazins late victorie, should alter the minds of them of Guienne, being then subiects of small assurance, he returnes into France. Aigoland hauing continued some moneths at the siege of Agen, and preuailed little, but in ouer-running the country, the which he did freely (without any great resistance) euen vnto Xaintonge: the countrymen being retyred into the townes, expected the returne of Charlemagne their King. *Aigoland*s army was great and proud with the remembrance of their late victorie: so as Charlemagne returning with his troupes from Spaine well tyred, he maintained his countries more through his authoritie, then by present force, yet he fortified the courage of his subiects with his presence, and bridled the Sarazin, who could not be ignorant with whome he had to deale, nor where he was, being enuironed with enemies on all sides, and in an enemies country. The Sarazin seeming to incline to a peace, gaue Charlemagne to vnderstand, that he had first inuaded, and that his passage into France was onely to draw him out of Spaine, and to leaue to the Sarazins their conquered countries free, and therefore the treatie of an accord was easie, seeing there was no question, but to yeeld euery man his owne, and to suffer him to enioy it quietly, the world beeing wide enough for them all. But to the end this treatie might take effect, after many messages on either part, they resolute to parlee. So vpon *Charlemagne*s faith, Aigoland comes to the campe. Charlemagne either moued with zeale of religion, or making it the colour of his actions, he gaue the Sarazin to vnderstand, that he should haue his friendship, if he would leaue his Pagan superstition, be baptised, and make open profession of Christianitie. The Sarazin, although he had a goodly armie, yet not willing to hazard any thing, content with this reuenge of Charlemagne, desired nothing more then to returne quietly into Spaine. Being now in *Charlemagne*s campe, to maintaine his reputation, he makes no shew of feare, but talking to his owne aduantage (as if no force but onely reason should moue him) he enters into a serious and cunning discourse with Charlemagne, shewing, That vnecessary wars were the ruine of mankind, and that he was grieved to see so much blood spilt: That he had not begun, but followed, beeing vrged by necessitie to defend himselfe against the forces of Charlemagne. That he was not yet so abiect, nor his forces so weake, as to refuse the battell; but for that it were an infinite losse to hazard so many men, he desired to make triall of the right by some troupes, and he that vanquished should haue the right and true religion on his side; protesting to yeeld to that religion which should appeare the best by that triall. The condition was accepted by Charlemagne: the prooffe of this priuate combate was made: and the Christian troupe vanquished the Sarazin.

Thus Aigoland protests openly to be a Christian; but in heart he had no such meaning, and takes this occasion to breake the treatie. He findes Charlemagne at table, well accompanied with his chiefe followers (for then it was the custome of our Kings not to eate alone) and sees twelue poore men ill appparelled sitting by vpon the ground, neere to the table of the Noble men. He demanded, what those poore miserable creatures were which did feed apart. One answered, they were the messengers of God. He then said, their God was of small account, seeing his messengers were so miserable and contemptible: and thereupon takes occasion to retire himself, hauing lost no labour by this treatie, but qualified the force of Charlemagne, viewd his traine, and made shew of his courage and dexteritie, euen without an Ambassadour. Charlemagne, on the other side was resolute to haue his reuenge, for so notable a losse of men, and so bold an affront of the Sarazin, so as with all speed he raiseth an armie of an hundred & thirtie thousand men. A notable number for this realme and so (fraught with choler and indignation) he returnes into Spaine. His entrie was prosperous; for at the first incounter he defeated *Aigoland*s armie neere to Pampelune and for a scale of his victorie he caried away the head of his enemy Aigoland, slaine by the hand of Arnold of Belange, a noble and valiant Knight: but the sequele was not answerable to the beginning: for notwithstanding the ouerthrow of these Sarazin troupes, all the rest in Spaine were not vanquished, where there were more Kings and more men of warre, who had great correspondencie with

After the death of their brother, they gather together the reliques of their defeated troupes: they make shew of resolute men, and vow to sell this victory deere to Charlemagne, being fauoured by many good townes within the Countre. Charlemagne staies foudainly, and pursues not this victory. But God referues to himselfe a souereigne power ouer mens designes, yea ouer the greatest, and in matters of greatest consequence: to the end that all may learne to aske counsell and successe from him. It was his will that the French forces should not possesse Spaine, the which he allotted as a portion for another nation.

Thus Charles, who should haue bene all fire after his victory, tempered his heate, which caused Idnabala the Sarazin, (hauing free access vnto his campe) to make some motion of peace. He was a good Secretary of his companions mindes, what shew soeuer he made to speake of himselfe. Charlemagne (considering by late experience, that the successe of armes was variable, and that this warre was to his subiects losse, imploying both liues and goods for the purchase of an vncertaine victory, and seeing himselfe charged with infinite great affaires in his estates, to the preservation whereof reason did summon him, rather then to seeke for new) he seemes not vnwilling to hearken to the motion of Idnabala, who told him plainly, that he found the Sarazins affaires to be so desperate, as they would gladly imbrace his friendship, at what rate soeuer. The Sarzains answere (reioycing at this new accord) was soone made. The treaty being begunne, the fundamentall article of religion was propounded, the which Charlemagne makes shew to maintaine with great vehemency: but the Sarazins being obstinate, Charles is content to grant them peace, paying some great summes of money, as a token they had bene vanquished. He sends a Noble man of his Court names Ganes, to treat with them: (the people haue since called him Ganelon, as an odious name) who (being corrupted by Marfille and Bellingand) promieth them meanes to send Charlemagne into France, and to make him receiue a notable disgrace. They agree to make a composition, being in shew very honourable for Charles: to whom they promise to pay (as an homage and an acknowledgment of the peace hee should grant them) what summes hee should appoint, and so should retire with his army into France, leauing such troupes in Spaine as he pleased, to maintaine the conditions agreed vpon. Ganes discouered vnto them the necessitie of his returne, and Charlemagne great desire to leaue the smallest forces he could in Spaine. The composition made, Charlemagne departs with his army, attending a better opportunitie to end what he had begun, leauing Rowland onely with twenty thousand men, for the execution of this treaty. But to make his passage the more easie, hee commands him to lodge in a place of aduantage, in the Pyrenean Mountaines, called Roncevaux. The French army passed, marching towards France, vnder the conduct of Charlemagne, who dreamt not of the affront he receiued by this meanes.

Whilest the French army remoued, Marfille and Bellingand slept not, but gathering together all the forces they could, they lodge their troupes secretly in the hollow caues of the Mountaines, being places inaccessible and vknowne but to them of the Countre. They had intelligence from Ganes, what forces Charlemagne had left in Spaine, vnder the command of Rowland, to whom the authority of his vnkle, and the credit of the people of Spaine in the chiefe townes, was of more esteeme then his twenty thousand men, although they were the choise of all the army. Rowland had no feare of any enemy, when as returning to his garrison, he is sodainly charged by the Sarazins, farre more in number then the French. Seeing himselfe thus assailed and compass in, they defend themselves valiantly against these miscreants: but still fresh troupes issue forth on all sides, in so great numbers, as in the end the French (tired with so long and painefull a combate) are oppressed by the great multitude of Sarazins.

Rowland performed both the duty of a good Captaine, in so extreame a danger (gathering together the peeces of his shipwrack) and of a resolute souldiar, in fighting valiantly, for

A for hauing beat downe a great number in the presse, in the end he slew King Marfille with his owne hand. But Bellingand holding this victory absolutely his owne, pursues the French, so as Rowland (not able to stand) retires him-selfe a part, where hee dies for thirst, through the long and painfull combate he had endured: and altogether tyred, he strues to breake his good sword Durandill: but his strength failing him, hee dies, and with him Oliver, and Oger the Dane, Renold of Montauban, Arnauld of Beland, and other great personages, whose names remaine in fabulous tales: and the fame of their singular vertues, not onely in the Originals of true Histories, but the honor of their heroycall deeds, is ingrauen in the common beleefe of all French-men.

for thirst.

B Charlemagne aduerted of this v unexpected and strange losse, returnes sodainly, and takes reuenge vpon the Sarazins, killing an infinite number vpon the places; he cauleth the traitor Ganelon to be drawne in peeces with foure horses (found to haue bene the author of this miserable defeat) and transported with a iust disdain for this preiudiciall affront, he resolved to passe farther into Spaine for his reuenge. But the great affaires of his other estates, called him into France, and so the warre of Spaine ended with small successe, hauing troubled Charlemagne at diuers times, for the space of foureteene yeares. But God had appointed the limits of his designes, as he referues to himselfe a Soueaigne power ouer all mens enterprises, yea of the greatest. Charles made a tounge for his nephew Rowland, and honored the memory of these worthy warriors, (being in the bed of honor) with monuments. I haue
C reported this in one discourse, to represent as in a table, what hath chanced most memorable, the which can hardly be gathered without some direction in the confusion of so long & obscure reports, wherewith this history of Charlemagne is fraught. At his returne from Spaine, necessity bred diuers warres, to exercise the valour and diligence of Charlemagne, both in Italy and Germany, God fauouring him in all places. Italy (during these troubles of Spaine) had rebelled by Adalgise the Duke of Beneuents meanes, to represse the race of Didier, but it was soone suppressed by Charlemagne, to the cost of the Lombard rebels: but in the end, behold an other warre in Germany.

End of the Spanish warre

The like occasion bred a warre in Bauaria for that King Tasillon sonne in Law to Didier King of Lombardy (pressed by his wife being wondertull discontented with Charlemagne) shakes off the yoke, and flies to armes, but Charles surpriseth him with such celerity, as Tasillon was forced to sue for peace. Charlemagne grants it, imposing the yoke of the French Monarchy, but Tasillon not able to containe him-selfe, raiseth a new war in another place, as when we stop one breach, it opens by another vent. He stirs vp the Huns and Auars (a neighbour people of Austrasia, one of the Estates of our Monarchy) against Charlemagne, who suppressed them with such happy successe, as Tasillon vanquished by Charlemagne, and found guilty of rebellion, and treason, was condemned to loose his Estate according to the Salique law: and so the kingdome of Bauaria ended, the which was wholly incorporate to the Crowne of France.

Bauaria incorporated to the
rebellion.

The Huns and Auars (of whose names ioyned together, the word of Hungary hath bin deriued, and the Hungarians be issued from these vnited nations) were likewise punished by Charlemagne, and brought vnder the yoke of the French Monarchy. They had begun a warre in disquieting the country of Austrasia: Charlemagne opposed his forces, but at diuers times: so as the warre continued eight yeares, and the successe was, that all their countre obeyed him: and the Danes, the Sorabes, Abrodites, the Westfalians (all vnited in this warre of Hungary) were likewise brought vnder the same obedience of Charlemagne. The limits of the Northren region called Austrasia were so extended, as it was distinguished into two Kingdomes, noted in the Germaine tongue, to shew that the Originall of our Ancestors is out of Germany; and that our ancient Kings haue commanded there, seeing their possession is manifested, and that they haue not onely giuen a Germaine name to the country that is beyond the Rhin, but also to that on this side. I am not ignorant how much this discourse is diuersified with sundry probabilities, euery one preferring what likes him best. But, not transforming of coiectures into Oracles (as without doubt the plainest is the best) behold a true diuision of the Seigneuries which Charlemagne had in Germany, as the traces of names yeeld an assured testimony. The realme of Austrasia, which ioines vpo France, was called west-rich, that is to say the realme of the west, & that which is towards Dauby, Ostreich, that is the

798. kingdom of the East, whence the name of Austrich is properly deriued, being then of a greater command then at this day, for it contained Hongary, Valachia, Bohemia, Transilvania, Denmarke, and Poland. Then was our Monarchy great: but all these nations haue either returned to their first beginnings, or were seized on by new Lords. It was very needefull to shew the estate, that we might obserue the declining thereof, with the motiues and seasons of these diuerse changes. Thus the French Monarchy grew great by the happy valour of Charlemagne, and his children grew in age and knowledge, by the wise care of their father, who framed them to affaires, meaning first to make them succeed him in his vertues, and then after in his dominions: But man purposeth, and God disposeth. France, Italy, Germany, Spaine, and Hongary made the Romaine Empire in the West. Charles being master of these goodly Prouinces, was in effect Emperour thereof. There wanted nothing but the sollemne declaration of this dignity, to haue the title as hee enjoyed the thing, and to bee authentically inuested by a free and publike declaration of his possession. The providence of God, who gaue him the thing, procured him the title by this meanes. Leo was then Pope of Rome, against whome was raised a strange sedition, by Siluester and Campull, men of great credit in the court of Rome. Vpon a sollemne day of procession they feize vpon Leo, before Saint Lawrence Church, they strip him of his Pontificall robes, cast him to the ground, tread him vnder their feete, bruse his face with their fistes, and hauing drawne him ignominiously through the dirt, they cast him into prison, but he staid not there, being freed by a groomme of his Chamber called Albin: and hauing recouered Saint Peters Church, he intreated Vinsgise Duke of Spoletto, to deliuer him from this miserable captiuitie. Vinsgise failed him not: he came to Rome, and carried him to Spoletto. Being arriued there, he presently went into France to Charlemagne, whome he found full of troubles: yet Charles neglected all other affaires to assist Leo in his necessity. So as he came to Rome with a goodly army, to succor the Pope: where he did speedily pacifie the confusions where-with Rome was afflicted, punishing Leo's enemies according to Law. They demanded audience, the which Charles graunted them, assembling the Clergy and people, to heare, and decide this scandalous trouersie. But when as he demanded their opinions, the Prelates told him plainly, that the Church of Rome could not be iudged by any other then by it selfe, and that the Pope ought not to vndergoe the censure of any man liuing, and that he him-selfe ought to be iudge in his owne cause.

The occasion
why Charle-
magne was proclaymed
Emperour.

Charlemagne willingly leaues the iudgement seate: and then Pope Leo mounted vp his throne, where (after he had protested by oath to be innocent of those crimes, wherewith his enemies had charged him) he absolues him-selfe, and condemnes his enemies, according to his Cannon. The Pope is iudge of all men, and all things, and not to be iudged by any. Charlemagne being drawne to Rome vpon this occasion, finds all disposed to declare him Emperour of the West, seeing that with the price of his blood (opposing himselfe against the furies and incurfions of barbarous nations) he had valiantly gotten possession of the Empire.

HE Pope by this possession (acknowledging Charles for true Emperour.) crownes him Emperour of Rome, with a full consent of all the Romaine people, which assisted at his Coronation, crying with one generall voice happinesse, long life, and victory to Charles Augustus crowned the great and peaceable Emperour of the Romaines, alwayes happy, and victorious. This was in the yeare 800. on Christmas day, the thirtieth yeare of the raigne of Charles, Italy hauing suffered a horrible confusion during the space of thirty three yeares, without Emperour, without Lawes, and without order.

The

A The seate of the Romane Empire, since Constantine the Great, remained at Constantinople, a citie of Thrace, situate in a conuenient place for the guard of the Easterne Prouinces, all the West being full of new guests, who hauing expelled the Romaines, the name, authoritie, and force of the Empire remained in the East, where the State was in a strange confusion, the mother being banded against her sonne, and the people within themselves.

Constantine sonne to Leo the fourth, was Emperour, being gouerned from his infancie (with the Empire) by his mother Irene: being come to the age of twentie yeares, hee tooke vpon him the gouernement. There was then a great diuision in the East, continued from father to sonne for 80. yeares, touching Images. The Bishops would needes bring them into the Christian Church. The Emperors (with the greatest part of the people) opposed themselves. This contention had her beginning vnder Philip Bardanes (as wee haue said) continued vnder Leo Isaurus, and from him to his sonne Constantine, surnamed Copronymus: and of Leo the fourth sonne to the said Constantine. This disquieted all the East with infinite scandals.

The same fire continued in the minoritie of Constantine, gouerned by his mother: a woman of a violent spirit, who hauing vndertaken the protection of Images, held a Councell of many Bishops for the defence thereof: but the people growing into a mutinie expelled them Constantinople by force, where their assembly was held. But this woman (resolute to proceed) assembled the same Councell at Nicea a citie of Bithinia, honoured to haue harboured the first generall Councell vnder Constantine the Great, the first of that name: where it was decreed, that the Images of Saints should be planted in Christian Churches for deuotion. Charlemagne did not allow of this decree, and either himselfe, or some other by his commaund, did write a small treatise against this Councell: the which we see at this day, with this title, A treatise of Charlemagnes, touching images, against the Greeke Synode.

This cunning woman had made choice of the citie of Nicea, that the name of this ancient first Councell might honour this new introduction with the pretext of antiquitie, for there are some that confound the first Councell of Nicea with the second, and Constantine the 4. with the first. Constantine continued in the hereditarie hatred of his father and grand-father against Images, so as being of age and in absolute possession of the Estate, hee disannulled all these new decrees, and caused the Images to be beaten downe in all places: yet he made all shewes of respect vnto his mother, yielding vnto her a good part of his authoritie and command. This respect was the cause of a horrible Tragedie: for this woman transported for two causes (both by reason of her new opinion, and for despight that she had not the whole gouernement in her selfe) growes so vnkind, as she resolues to dispossesse her sonne of the Empire, and to seize on it her selfe. Thus the authoritie her sonne had left her, and the free access she had vnto his person, made way to the execution of her dessein, for hauing corrupted such as had the chiefe forces at their commaund, and wonne them with her sonnes treasure, she seized on him, put out his eyes, sends him into exile (where soone after he died for griefe) and tooke possession of the Empire. These vnaturall and Tragick furies, were practised in the East, whilst that Charlemagne by his great valour built an Empire in the West. Irene in her sonnes life would haue married him with the eldest daughter of Charlemagne: but this accident crossed that dessein.

The Tragical
death of Constantine.

After the death of Constantine she sent to Charlemagne, to excuse her selfe of the murder, disauowing it, and laying the blame vpon such as had done it without her command. And to winne the good liking of Charles, she caused him to be dealt withall touching marriage (for at that time Festruide was dead) with promise to consent that he should be declared Emperour of the West, and to resigne vnto him the power of the East. But Charlemagne would not accept thereof: the Nobilitie and people of the Greeke Empire did so hate her, as hauing suffered her the space of three yeares, in the end they resolved to dispossesse her.

In this publike detestation of this woman, the murthresse of her owne childe, Nicephorus a great Noble man of Greece, assisted by the greatest in Court, and with the consent of the people, seizeth on the Empire, in taking of Irene: whome he onely banished, to giue her meanes to liue better then she had done. He afterwards treats and compounds with Charlemagne, that the Empire of the East continuing vnder his command, that of the West should remaine to Charlemagne.

Diuision of the Empire.

806.

By this transaction of Nicephorus and the consent of the Greeks, the possession of the Empire was ratified and confirmed to Charlemagne, and then beganne the diuision of the two Empires, East and West. That of the West began with Charlemagne, and continued in his race, whilst his vertues did protect it: afterwards it was transported to the Princes of Germanie, who likewise acknowledged the Germanie stemme of Charlemagne, borne at Wormes, crowned at Spire, and interred at Aix, all cities of Germanie: and the truth sheweth, that as the Originall, so the first commaund of the French, was wholly in Germanie. Hitherto we haue represented, briefly as we could (considering the greatnesse, and richnesse of the subiect) what Charles did whilst he was King of France onely: now we must relate with the like stile, what hath happened worthis of memorie vnder his Empire.

His deeds while he was Emperour.

War in Italie.

In Saxonic.

At Venice, where Charlemagne had the repulse.

Charles diuides his possessions to his children

An order for their lawes.

The Danes revolt.

Charles loseth two of his best sonnes.

C HARLES liued fifteene yeares, after he had vniited the Romaine Empire to the French Monarchie. Grimoald Duke of Beneuent sought to disturbe Italy for the Lombard: but Charles preuented it in time, by the meanes of Pepin his sonne, a worthie and valiant Prince. Grimoald was thus vanquished, yet intreated with all mildnesse, so as being restored to his Estate, he became afterwards an affectionate and obedient seruant to Charlemagne, who was a wife Conquerour, both in his happie valour, and the wise vsing of his victorie. About the same time, the warre in Saxonic was renewed, being alwaies prone to rebellion: with the warre against the Huns, Bohemians, Sclauonians: and the second against the Sarazins. The which I haue briefly reported in their proper places: here I note them onely, to shew the course of things according to the order of times, the goodly light of truth.

He had likewise a great and dangerous warre against the Venetians, wherein he employed his sonne Pepin. Obeliers and Becur, great personages, were the chiefe Commanders for the Venetians. The Emperour and his Frenchmen received a great checke by the Venetians, who had this onely fruite of their victorie, that among all the people of Italy subdued by Charlemagne they alone were not vanquished, but had happily made head against great Charlemagne. They did greatly increase their name and reputation, but nothing enlarged their territories by this conquest, glad to haue defended themselves against so noble and valiant an enemy. By reason of this Venetian warre, Charles stayed sometime in Italy, to assure his estate. He would haue the countrie conquered from the Lombards, to be called Lombardie, with a new name, to moderate their seruile condition, by the continuance of their name, in the ruine of their Estate.

Seeing himselfe old and broken, his children great, wise, and obedient, he resolved to giue them portions, and to assigne to euery one his Estate. To Pepin he gaue Italy, to Charles Germanie, and the neighbour countries, keeping Lewis his eldest sonne neere about him, whome he appointed for the Empire and Realme of France. He sought to reduce all his Estates vnder one law, making choice of the Romane, both for the dignitie of the Empire, and being more ciuill: but the French loth to alter any thing of their customarie lawes, he suffered them as they desired: and those which had longer serued the Romanes, and loued best the Romane lawes, he gaue them libertie. So as Gaule Narbonnoise (which comprehends Daulphine, Languedoc and Prouence) do vse the written law (as the auncient Prouince of the Romans) and the rest of France obserue their customarie Lawes.

Denmarke (a dependance of the realme of Germanie, and part of Charles his portion, as wee haue said) was revolted from the obedience of the French. Charles by his fathers commaund prepares to subdue them: but God had otherwise decreed, for hereupon hee dies, to the great griefe of his father, and of all the French, who loued the louely qualities of this Prince, the true heire of his fathers name and vertues. Charlemagne mourned for his youngest sonne, when as sodainly newes came of the vniuersally death of Pepin his second sonne, King of Italie, a Prince of admirable hope, a true patterne of his fathers greatnesse.

A Thus man purposeth, and God disposeth: thus the sonnes die before the father: thus the greatest cannot free themselves from the common calamitie of mankind. Thus great Kings and great Kingdomes haue their periods. Charlemagne lost his children, and the realme her best support: for these two Princes caried with them the fathers valour, leaving Lewis their brother with large territories and few vertues, to gouerne so great an estate. After the death of these two great Princes many enemies did rise against Charles, seeming (as it were) deprived of his two armes, the Sarazins in Spaine, the Sclauons, and the Normans, in the Northerne regions: but he vanquished them all, and brought them to obedience, old and broken as hee was. We haue shewed how that Nicephorus had bene made Emperour by the death of Irene. It chanced, that as he fought against the Bulgarians (a people which had possessed a part of Thrace, neere vnto Constantinople) he was slaine in the conflict.

B He had one sonne named Siaurat, who by reason should succeed him: but Michel his brother in law seizeth on this poore young man, and makes him away, and hauing corrupted the chiefe men with gifts, he vsurpes the Empire: and least that Charlemagne should crosse his desseignes, hee seeks to insinuate with him, not onely ratifying what Nicephorus had done for the diuision of the Empire, but by a new contract doth acknowledge him Emperour of the West. Thus the affaires of our Charles were daily confirmed, but his minde (toiled with these new losses, and the painefull difficulties he had suffered throughout the whole course of his life) required nothing but rest. All his life time he held the Church in great reuerence, and had employed his authoritie to beautifie it, and bountifullly bestowed his treasure to enrich it: but this great plentie in so happie a peace, made the churchmen to liue loosely. Charles well instructed in religion (knowing how much it did import, to haue doctrine and good manners to shine in them that should instruct others:) he doth call five Councelles in diuers places of his dominions, for the gouernement of the Church. At Mentz, at Rheims, at Tours, at Chaalons, and at Arles: and by the aduice of these Ecclesiasticall assemblies, he sets downe orders for the reformation of the Church, in a booke intituled Capitula Caroli Magni, which they reade at this day, for a venerable prooffe of the pietie of this great Prince. A worthy president for Princes, which seeke true honour by vertue, whereof the care of pietie is the chiefe foundation.

D He held likewise a great Councell in the cittie of Francford, (These are the very words of the Historie) of the Bishops of France, Germanie, and Italy, the which he himselfe would honour with his presence, where by a generall consent, The false Synode of the Greekes (I coate the very words of the Originall) vntuly called the seventh, was condemned and reiected by all the Bishops, who subscribed to the condemnation. But there fell out a new accident, which drew Charles againe to armes. Alphonso king of Nauarre, surnamed the Chaste, by reason of his singular temperance, did carefully aduertise him, that there was now meanes vnto subdue the Sarazins in Spaine. Charlemagne (who desired infinitely to finish this worke, so oft attempted without any great successe) giues eare to this aduise, leauies an armie, and marcheth into Spaine, relying on the Spaniards fauour, being Christians. Alphonso meant plainly, but so did not the chiefe of his Court, nor his associates, who feared his forces no lesse then the Sarazins, and euen the most confident seruants of Alphonso doubted to be possessed of their governments by a new Master. So they crosse Alphonso in countermanding of Charles: but the lots were cast, his armie is in field, and he resolute to passe on. He enters into Spaine, where he finds so many difficulties, as he returnes into France: and so concludes all his enterprises, embracing againe the care of religion, and of the Church, as a subiect fit for the remainder of his daies. He was threescore and eight yeares old when he left the warres: so he spent three whole yeares in his studie, reading the Bible, and the bookes of Saint Augustin, whome he loued aboue all the Doctors of the Church. He resided at Paris, to haue conference with the learned: where he had erected a goodly Vniuersitie, furnished with learned men, such as that time could afford, and enriched with goodly priuiledges. He had an extraordinary care to haue the seruice of the Church supplied, as a Nurserie of the holy Munisterie. Thence grew so many Colledges of Chanoin, with such sufficient reuenues.

F Thus Charles spent three yeares happily in the onely care of his soule, leaving a goodly example to Princes, to moderate their greatnesse with pietie, their enioying of temporall goods, with the hope of eternall, and to thinke of their departure of this life in time. Thus

814. foretelling his death (whereunto he prepared himselfe by this exercise) he made his will, leauing Lewis his sonne sole heire of his great Kingdomes, and bequeaths to the Church great treasures, as more at large is contained in his will, set downe in the Historie. His Testament was the messenger of his death, for soone after he fell sick, and continued so but eight daies:
 dying happily vnto the Lord, in the yeare of grace 814. of his age the 71. and of his raigne the 47. including 15. yeares of his Empire. He was interred at Aix la Chapelle, where he was borne, and his memorie honoured with a goodly Epitaph, set downe in the Historie.

He was one of the greatest Princes that euer liued. His vertue is the patterne of Princes, his good hap the subiect of their wishes. The greatnesse of his Monarchie is admirable, for he quietly enioyed all France, Germanie, the greatest part of Hungarie, all Italy, and a part of Spaine. But his vertues were greater then his Monarchie: his clemencie, wisdom, and valour: his learning (yea in the holy Scripture) his vigilancie, magnanimitie, and singular force, be the theater of his immortall praises. And yet his vertues were not without some blemish (as the greatest are not commonly without some notable vice) for he was giuen to women, adding concubines to his lawfull wiues, by whome he had bastards. I haue noted elsewhere the number of his wiues, and children. Lewis the weakest of them all, remained alone, the sole heire of this great Monarchie of France, and the Romane Empire, but not of his noble vertues. We are now come to the top of this great building, we shall see it decline: and therein note the admirable providence of God, who amidst the confusions of this estate, hath alwaies preferred the maiestie of this Crowne.

LEWIS the Gentle, the 25. King, and Emperour of the West.

S the vertues of Charlemagne had raised this estate to an admirable great-nesse, so the small valour, or rather the vices of his posteritie, caused the declining, and (if God had not preuented) had bene the ruine thereof. His intent was only to change the race vnworthie to raigne, but not the realm, the which he hath preferred vnto this day by his providence, in the bosome of one countrie, and in it his Church: for the which he maintaines, both
 the

A the estates where it remaines, and the whole world, which cannot subsist but in regard of it.

Thus the French Monarchie beeing come to the height of her greatnesse, the law imposed upon all humane things, would haue it decline, that oflier peeces other estates might be built. Not long after the death of Charlemagne, it began to decline. The foolish lenitie of Lewis his sonne, was the beginning, the which was continued by the disordered confusions of his successors, who (in spite of one another) hastened the ruine of their house, making the way by their vices and misfortunes. This is the substance of all the Kings remaining in this second race: the which we cannot represent, but in noting faithfully the order of those confused times, during the which this barke hath bene in a manner guided without a Pilore, and without helme, by the wisdom of God, who hath miraculously preferred it, amidst so many tempests. And therefore without any tedious discourse, beeing intricate enough of it selfe, I will labour to shew (as in a table) both the continuance of this race, and the diuers mo-tiues of euents to bring Hugh Capet vpon the stage, and carefully to shew the estate of his posteritie, as the chiefe end of my desaigne.

Lewis was surnamed the Mecke, or Gentle, as well for his deuotion, (whereunto hee was more giuen, then to gouerne his estate) as also for his great facilitie: which was the cause of many miseries both to himself and his subiects. He began to raigne the yeare 815. and ruled 26. yeares Emperour of the West, and King of France. His father had not greatly imployed him in affaires, obseruing his disposition, and had married him with Irmengarde the daughter of Ingram Duke of Angers, an officer of the Crowne of Fraunce, hauing giuen him the Duchie of Guienne for his maintenance. By this wife Lewis had three sons, Clothaire, Pepin and Lewis, who acted strange tragedies against their father.

To his second wife hee married Indith the daughter of Gulphe Duke of Sueue, by whom hee had Charles, surnamed the Bald, who succeeded him in the crowne of France. Bernard the sonne of Pepin was King of Italy, as Charlemagne had decreed. Lewis (more fitte to bee a Monk then a King) was so giuen to deuotion, and so soft a spirit, as he made his authority contemptible, both within and without the realme. This disposition (vnfit for a great command) made the nations subiect to the Crowne, to fall from their obedience, the Saxons, Normans, Danes, and Brittons: and although Lewis did his best to preuent it, yet could he not preuayle, but made himselfe wholly contemptible, in attempting that which he could not effect, and (after his vaine struing) compounding of great controuersies with vnreasonable conditions. Bernard a yong man, and ambitious, was perswaded by the Bishops of Orleans and Milan, to attempt against his Vncle Lewis, and to seize vpon the realme of France which belonged not vnto him. So his ambition cost him deere, and that sodenly:
 for beeing in field to go into Fraunce against his Vncle, with an imaginarie fauour of the French, to be proclaimed King, it fell out contrarie; for both he and all his Councillers were taken by Lewis his subiects.

Lewis wonderfully moued with the presumption of this springall (as we often see milde natures fall into extremities of choller when they are moued) hauing both his Nephew and his Councillours in his power: he spoiles him of his Realme of Italy, declares him and his vnworthie, confines him to a perpetuall prison, and puts out his eyes: the like he doth to all the Bishops and Noblemen he could get: and after some few daies patience, he chopps off their heades. This act was held very straunge, proceeding from Lewis, and committed against such persons: it began to breede a generall dislike, the which was aggravated by a domesticall dissention: all which together caused a horrible Tragedie.

Lewis had indiscreetly giuen portions to his children, making them companions of his regall authoritie. After the decess of Bernard, hee gaue Italie to Lothaire, and did associate him in the Empire; to Pepin he gaue Aquitaine: to Lewis Bauaria: and would haue them all beare the name of Kings. Lewis good to all, was too good to his second wife Indith, an ambitious woman: who hauing one sonne by him, called Charles, had no other care but to make this sonne great, to the preiudice of the rest: not foreseeing that they were of power, and could not patiently endure the ielousies of a mother in lawe, nor the words of an olde man, beeing too much affected to the one of his children against the rest, at the suggestion of a mother in lawe: an ordinarie leuaine of bitter dissention in families of the second bedde.

829. Moreouer this imperious Germane, abusing the facility of her good husband, played the A Emperesse and Queene ouer all, to the discontent of the greatest, who had no fauour with Lewis, but by the fauour of his wife: they did hate and contemne him, as beeing vnworthy to raigne, suffering him-selfe so flauishly to be gouerned by a woman. This was the generall motiue of their discontent: but there were many other particularities, which grew daily vpon diuers and sundry occasions. The Bishops were most of all incensed against Lewis, by reason of the death of those men of the Church, whome he had so cruelly caused to be slaine with Bernard. So Lothaire, Pepin and Lewis (by the aduise of these malecontents) resolute to seize vpon their Father, Mother, and young Brother, to dispossesse them of all authority, and then to gouerne the state after their owne appetites, wherein they must vse force and a publike consent. Lothaire (as ring-leader of this desseigne,) leuies a great army, and calls a Nationall Councell of the French Church at Lions, supposing sooner to suppress Lewis by this meanes then by a Parliament. Lewis appeeres: hee receiues all complaints against him-selfe, and yeelds to the Censure of the Prelats, which was to retire him-selfe into a Monastery, there to attend his deuotion, and to resigne the Empire and the realme to his children. This was put in execution. Lewis was conueied to Soissons, to the monastery of Saint Medard: his wife and sonne were confined to other places, and the whole gouernment committed to Lothaire and his brethren. Thus Lewis, so much addicted to Church-men as he purchased the name of deuout, was ill intreated by them, and receiued a poore recompence for his so humble submission. The name of a Councell (venerable of it selfe) did at the first retayne men, supposing that this ecclesiasticall iurisdiction did not extend but to admonition: but seeing this tragicall attempt of the children against the father, there was no good man but stood amazed at this presumption, and pittied their poore King, being brought to such calamity. But all power remayned in the hands of the rebellious children, and the greatest of the Church were guilty of this outrage, seeking to maintaine their decree. Thus this poore Prince (to the generall greefe of his subiects) continued in prison fife yeares: for he entred in the yeare 829. and came forth in the yeare 834. But this deliury was the beginning of a new confusion. For Lothaire hauing bin forced to yeeld vnto his father, goes to field, takes him prisoner againe and leads him to the Couent at Soissons, where he stayed not long, for the French did bandy openly against Lothaire, and his brethren did abandon him, so as he was forced to yeeld vnto his father and to craue pardon. This miserable King, thus ledde for a long time, giues portions to his Children. To Lothaire, he leaues the realme of Austrasia, from the riuer of Meuse vnto Hongary, with the title of Emperour: to Lewis Bauaria, and to Charles France: Pepin enioyed Guienne without contradiction.

The Estate of Lewis his Children, presently after his death.

Lothaire as the eldest, and Emperour by his fathers testament, would prescribe Lawes to his brethren, and force them to a new diuision. As hee had exceeded against his father in taking him twice prisoner, and stripping him before he went to bed; so he sought to frustrate his will, as made against the right of the elder and the imperiall dignity, the realme of Diuision among the brethren and the cause.

A of France belonging to the eldest, and the goodliest territories of the Empire to the Emperor. Thus hee quarreled with Charles King of France: and with Lewis, who had his part in the inheritances of the Empire, in Bauaria the dependances of the realme of Bourgondy (that is to say Prouence and Daulphine) and in Italy. This was the Leuaine of these tragicall dissensions among the bretheren (as Nitard a writer of approued credit, learned, and a Prince, (for he was sonne to Angelibert the sonne of Berth daughter to Charlemagne, and employed to compound these quarrells) doth particularly describe. Behold the direction to a longer discorsie, whereof I owe but an abridgement, noted with the principall circumstances. Lothaire then armed with authority, force, malice, policy, and boldnesse, thinkes to giue his bretheren their portions: and there were great presumptions hee should preuaile, ioyning his force with the intelligences he had in the dominions of Charles and Lewis.

This common interest to defend them-selues against a common enemy, made them to ioyne together, resolute for their generall perseruation. Lothaire seekes by secret treaties to diuide them, but not able to make any breach in their vnion, he prepares force and policy. Lewis was in Bauaria, of whome hee kept good gard that hee should not passe the Rhine, to ioyne with his brother: he likewise leuies an army to surprise Charles in France. This preparation of warre did awake the vnitd bretheren, who assemble their forces, and ioyne not withstanding all Lothaires oppositions. Lothaires army was at Auxerre, meaning to passe into the heart of France. The vnitd bretheren (hauing assembled their forces neere vnto Paris, Saint Denis and Saint Germain) approach, to haue a better meanes either to treat with him, or to incounter him. First with great humility, they offer to performe what should be held reasonable, beseeching him to remember the condition of bretheren: the holy peace of the Church, and the quiet of Gods people, suffering them to inioy what their father had bequeathed, or else they would diuide France equally, and he should choofe what part hee pleased. Lothaire refusing nothing flatly, fed them with delayes, expecting forces out of Guienne, led by Pepin, and in the meane time he diuided the cities by his practises, meaning to assaile his bretheren both within and without, and to surprise them by authority and force, as he had done heretofore his poore father, presuming of the like meanes.

But the subtil was taken in his owne snare, for as Lothaire (finding him-selfe the stronger) refused these conditions of peace, laying openly, this his bretheren would neuer be wise vntill he had corrected them, behold the armies lying neere to Fontenay (after these vaine parles of peace) Lewis and Charles charge Lothaires army (already a conqueror in conceit) with such aduantage, as he was not onely put to rout, but also ouerthrowne with a notable slaughter, noted vnto this day, by the place where the battaile was fought, the which for this occasion is called Chaplay, and the straight is called by the victors name, the valley of Charles, to continue the memory of so bloody a victory, where euen the conquerours had cause to weepe, hauing shed their owne blood, although forced to fight.

Lothaire thinking to surpris his bretheren, is surprisid and defeated.

It is not now that France begins to bee indiscreet, banding against it selfe, and digging in her owne bowels, by these domestick and vnciuil dissensions. Lothaire after this defeat changed his humor with his estate, for hardly could he retire with his shame to saue his dominions. He inioyed the titulary maske of the Empire with Austrasia, yet very much curtailed and diuided to his three sonnes, Lewis Charles, and Lothaire. Of these great inheritances, there remains nothing cleere but Lorraine, of the name of Lothaire. And so the great discorsie of him whome the whole earth could not satisfie, without taking from father, and brethren, were buried in a cloister: for Lothaire (hauing remorse of conscience for attempting against his father and brethren, and to beare rule) lost the honor hee had fought with such eagernes, and (to suffer the paines hee had inflicted vpon his father) he professeth him-selfe a Monke in the Abbie of Pluuiers, and dies a Monke in the yeare eight hundred fifty and fife, taking on him the frocke, and being shauen, as the ciuill death of a King or Prince of the blood royall, according to the French opinion, which continues vnto this day, for note of the greatest paine they could suffer that were borne in this authority, to be shauen and made Monkes, and to change the crowne of France into a Monkes crowne, dead to the world.

826.

This was the Catastrophe and end of this turbulent Prince, by the iust iudgement of A God, published then in the greatest assemblies, and made knowne vnto vs by open and public writings, for a notable testimony and witnesse to all men. That whosoeuer disobeies father and mother: deceiues his brethren, troubles the peace of the Church and state, in breaking the sacred lawes of God and nature, hee dismembers himselfe by peece-meale, loosing his goods, honour and quiet, for assured gages of the horrible torments which attend him in the euermlasting prisons, appointed to tame the vntamed, and to make them suffer the infinite paines of their infinit wickednesse.

An accord
betwixt
Charles and Lewis.

Charles and Lewis were well satisfied to haue preuented their brothers designs, without any further pursuit of their victory. They seeke to confirme true concord by the settling of their Estates. Having stayed sometime vpon the place where the battaile was fought: buried the dead; released prisoners, and proclaimed a generall pardon to all that would follow their armes: they call the Bishops, to take their aduice vpon occurrents, who being solemnly assembled they exhort them vnto concord, laying plainly before them the iust iudgement of God against their brother Lothaire, least they should draw the people againe into these extremities by their dissensions. The brethren (beleeuing their good aduice) part good friends: but when as Lothaire fought to renew the quarrell, they met againe: yet this struing was in vaine: they assemble in the City of Strasbourg (then belonging to this crowne) and there make a sollemne alliance for them and their subiects, to liue together in peace and concord. The forme is double, one in the Romaine tongue, the other in Dutch, that is to say in the Germane. As for the Romaine, it seemes to be that of Langue- doc and Prouence, by the language; although there be some words which are not at this day in vse with vs, as the reader (curious of this antiquity) may see in their proper places, excusing my stile which suffers me not to dilate any further, but only to note what may be found in the originalls, touching this subiect.

This alliance made, they come to the diuiding of their parts: and to this end they appoint twelue deputies, (whereof Nitard saies hee was one) who without respect of fertility or quantity, regard that onely which was most conuenient, for the necessity and commodity of their States. I know this partition is diuersly set downe by many: and who sees not in so obscure antiquity, that it is impossible to make a true designation, seeing that in small successions there is so great diuersity? But in all this variety of opinions, it remains for certaine, that Charles the onely sonne of the second bed, (who had bene so much persecuted by the children of the first wife,) remained sole King of France: that the territories of the Empire were much decayed, nothing remayning in effect, but the name of those which lie on this side the Rhine, especially in the dependances of the Realme of Bourgogne, as Daulphine & Prouence. Daulphine doth yet cary the ancient name of the Empire, in respect of the riuer of Rofne which doth separte it from Viuaretz, a country opposite, called by an expresse name the Realme, as also for this cause Charles was called by expresse words in the designation of his portion, King of France, it confines at the one end with Lionnois, at the other with Vzege, which extends from Pont Saint Esprit, to Ville-neuue of Auignon, along the Rofne; all the said limits (being of his portion) be called by a particular name the Realme, vnto this day, especially in their leases, which retaine more plainly the traces of the ancient tongue.

An obseruation which I ought vnto my country, for the which I keepe a ranke in the Theater whereon I meane to represent the Estate of our goodly Prouinces of Gaule Narbonoise, in old time honoured with the name of a second Italy, and at this day so grossely vnknowne to strangers, as in the Theater of the world they leaue a blanke for it, like to the deserts of Affricke, although it yeelds not to any Prouince of this great and goodly Kingdome, whereof it is one of the cheefe parts, and worthiest members. So Daulphine and Prouence were left to Lewis in his partage, for the commodity of Italy, the which was given him, notwithstanding the pretensions of Bernards children.

But Lewis enioyed not long these great possessions, for the which he had so much troubled his poore father, his miserable subiects and himselfe: for he died soone after, without any issue male, leauing one onely daughter called Hermingrade, heire of all his great Estates.

A any great memory, the which was likewise extinguished in his daughter and in the diuers changes happened in these Estates. Thus the children impatient to see their poore father liue, died after many fruitlesse toiles, the one in a monastery, the other without heire to carry his name, although the imagination of a famous race, and of an extraordinary reigne, had made them forget the holy lawes of nature against their father. Charles and Lewis had made profession of more then brotherly loue, as their familiarities carefully obserued by Nitard, in eating, lying, and playing together, do testifie, leauing to the wise reader to iudge, how vncertaine the loue of brethren is when as couetousnesse and ambition creepes into their counsell. Charles married his Neece Hermingrade, daughter to his brother Lewis, to B Boson Earle of Ardennes, brother to his wife Richilde. His colour was to match his Neece with a Prince of a good house, and of more vertue, and thereby to bind Boson vnto him, but his intent was other, as we shall hereafter see. Boson tooke possession of the Countries belonging to his wife as her dowry, and calls himselfe King of Arles. A point very remarkable, to vnfold many difficulties that shall follow in the foresaid countries, and especially in Prouence, where many changes haue happened, the which we will endeauour to represent in their proper places. This was the Estate of the heires of great Charlemagne, but his posterity did worse: where the most famous memory of our Kings shalbe noted by their vices, either of body or minde, one being called the stuttering, another the bald, the simple, the cruell, the Barren, with other notes of disgrace, to shew, as it were, in a goodly table, that C all the greatnesse of this world, is but meere vanity.

brethren, or in combustions and open warre. But why should I encrease mine owne trouble and the readers great with the report of the particularities, vnworthy of brethren, and worthy of eternall forgetfulness?

A confused
reigne.

A reigne of small fame, but onely to note the confusion from whence sprong the first occasion of the fall of this race: a King of small merit, hauing performed nothing praiseworthy, for in that wherein he desired to winne the reputation of doing well, he did exceedingly ill. His greatest ambition was to seeme a good vncle to the onely daughter of his brother. He married her to Boson, as ther Lewis, with whom he had made so strict a league of loue. He married her to Boson, as I haue said: but the euents shew that he married her with an intent to gouerne her inheritance at his pleasure. Being proclaimed Emperour, he leuies a great, and mighty army, and goes in person into Italy. His pretext was to suppress the Dukes of Spoletum and Beneuent, who fought to free themselves from the subiection of the Empire, and to become Soueraignes: but his intent was to seaze vpon the strong places of Italy, and so by consequence, of that which belonged to his Neece Hermingrade. But Boson her husband discovering her vncles intent, preuented him, ioyning with the Dukes, and fortifying the Cities of Italy with all expedition, as his wifes inheritance: and then he aduertised Charles entring into the Country, that it was needlesse for him to passe any farther, and to put Italy to vnnecessary charges, seeing that he himselfe could gard it sufficiently, and the foresaid Dukes did submit themselves to reason. But being easie to iudge that Charles hauing an army in field, and a resolute designe, would not retire without constraint, Boson makes factions in France, in the heart of his Estate, to diuert him. An easie matter, both for their discontents against him, and the misery of that age, nourished in the liberty of vnciuill warres. This occasion drew Charles from this vnjust designe, for at the first brute of rebellion, he turnes head towards France, but there chanced more to him then he expected, for hee not onely left his Neeces patrimonie, but his owne life in Italy, with a notable instruction, not to loose this life for the desire of an other mans goods. Thus died Charles the bald at Mantoua, the year 879. leauing the Realme to his sonne Lewis, the which hee sought to augment with an others right.

LEWIS the second called the stuttering 27. King and Emperour.

He reigned onely two yeares, and succeeded his father likewise in the Empire, but not without opposition, for the Princes of Italy fought to be Soueraignes, and the Germanes (bearing impatiently the forepassed confusions) desired to restore the beauty of the Imperiall dignity, being greatly decayed in Italy, by such as held the lands of the Empire. They spared not the Pope himselfe, who by little and little, vsurped the Imperiall rights in Italy. These complaints being made to Lewis the Emperour, John the third Pope of Rome came into France to redresse that which concerned the Sea of Rome. He

B was courteously receiued by the King, staid in France a whole yeare, and there held a Councell at Troies in Champagne.

The reigne of Lewis was very short. The Pope was scarce gone, but he was lodged in the bed of death. He had no lawfull children but two bastards, Lewis and Caroloman both men growne, whereof the one was already married to the daughter of Boson King of Arles. His wife was with child. In the doubtfulness of the fruite which should be borne, he must provide a Regent to gouerne the realme, if it were a sonne. And although Lewis loued his two bastards deere, yet would hee not haue them Regents, but made choise of Endes or Odon Duke (that is to say gouernour) of Angers, the sonne of Robert of the race of Widichind of Saxony (of whom we haue before made mention) to be Regent of the Realme, and experience taught, that his iudgement was good. Thus Lewis died, hauing left nothing memo-

C rable but a sonne, wherein I obserue three notable things. The efficacy of the law of State, preserving the right of the lawfull heire not yet borne: The minority of a King, subiect to many confusions and miseries, and the liberty of great men in the weakness of a yong Prince, who sh boldly in a troubled streame. In this reigne, happened the Eclipse of the Empire. The first check giuen to this second race, was by a league, which dyngain shew, made the King to die in effect, and in the end carried away the crowne, burying both the King and all his race in one tombe. This Historie is very obscure, by reason of the Regents which are numbred among the Kings, during the minority of the lawfull heire: and therefore good directions are needfull in so confused a labyrinth of diuers reignes. Behold therefore the simple and plaine truth.

his wife with

D Lewis the Stuttering being dead, the Parliament assembled to resolve for the government of the realme, vntill that God should send the Queene a happy deliury: and if it were a sonne, appoint who should be Gouernour to the King, and Regent of the realme, vntill he came to the age of government. There was no Prince that made any question to the Infants title that was to be borne: or that sought to take the aduantage of the time, to aduance himselfe vnder colour of proximity of blood: but it was concluded by common consenc, they should carefully preferre the Queenes wombe, vntill her deliury. The Kings will was plaine, for he called Endes (as we haue said) to be Gouernour to his child vnborne, and Regent of the realme: but Lewis and Caroloman, bastards of France, had so laboured for voyces, as they preuailed against this Testamentary decree, and were chosen Regents by the Estates, who for confirmation of this authority, decreed they should bee crowned, yet with a profitable exception for the pupils interest, the lawfull heire of the crowne.

E A dangerous proceeding, making seruants taste the sweetness of Soueraigne command, which made the way to horrible confusion, and multiplying the authority of many masters, did greatly preiudice the lawfull heire, the which may not (without extreame danger) bee imparted but to one onely. The Queene was happily deliuered of a sonne, the which was saluted King, and was called Charles, of whom we shall speake hereafter. The day of his birth was the twelfth of December, in the year 881. But wee must now passe two and twenty yeares full of troubles, before our pupill come to age, so as to march safely in so obscure a labyrinth, we must distinctly note the diuers parcels of this interreigne.

The 28.raigne vnder LEWIS and, CAROLOMON.

Hey talke diuersly of these Kings, who in deed were no lawfull Kings, but guides to a lawfull King. A confused and obscure age, which hath left such famous persons in doubt. But we may say in their excuse, that men being weary of these confusions, haue willingly left them doubtfull, to hide the infamy of their times, or else no man durst set Pen to Paper, to represent the shamefull courses of those miseries.

Lewis and Caroloman tooke either of them a part to gouerne: Lewis the country on the other side of Loire, and Caroloman that on this side. They had the Normans, and Boson King of Arles for common enemies; and as continuall thornes in their sides, in diuers places and vpon diuers occurrents, for the ending whereof, they besiege Boson in Vienne, and resolute to take it: but presently the Normans, come to his succor. Caroloman continues the seege, & Lewis goes to incounter the Normans. But oh the vanity of humane conceptions! The Regents are frustrate of their hopes, for Lewis looseth his army, and afterwards his life, through griefe of his defeat. Caroloman on the other side takes Vienne, but not Boson: who saues himselfe in the Mountaines of Viuauez. And contrariwise, hee that hoped to haue his greatest enemy in his power, was surprised by death vnlooked for, and extraordinary, hauing ended his seege and become sole Regent by the death of his brother. But the manner of his death is diuersly obserued: some write, that running in iest after a gentle-

A gentlewoman, hee was cruell vnder a gate, whether his horse had violently carried him. Others say, that he was slaine by a boare, going a hunting: or that being at the chase, he fell downe and brake his necke. But all this notes, that the manner of his death was violent and extraordinary. So the Regency of these two bastards, gotten by force against the law, was both short and vnfortunate.

Lewis succeeded to these two brethren. Men dispute with much vncertainty what he was to Caroloman, either brother or sonne, but all agree he was an idle person. It is likely hee was the nearest kinsman, hauing seized on the authority after the death of these two Regents, but in effect the French had the power in their owne hands. It chanced as they were ready to free themselves off this Lewis, that hee died, and so they called Charles the grosse, King of Bauaria, first Prince of the bloud, to this great dignity.

CHARLES called the Grosse, or Great,

the twenty ninth King and Emperour.

An Example from a tragicall change to a worthy person.

CHARLES called the Grosse, beganne to reigne the yeare 885. and reigned nine yeares. His entrance was goodly, but his end tragically fowle. Hee was installed in the Regency with the same ceremonies that the other two forenamed, for he was crowned King, with promise to restore the crowne to the lawfull heire, and to gouerne according to the will of the States. He was sonne to Lewis called Germanicus, sonne to Lewis the Gentle, as we haue said. This neereneffe of bloud gaue him an interest, and to the Imperiall dignity, power, and meanes to gouerne the Realme well. So the eyes of the French were fixed on him, as the man which should restore their decayed Estate, after so many disorders and confusions. His entrance was reasonable happy (as at the first euery thing seemes goodly) being respected of all his subiects. He went into Italy, and expelled the Sarazins which threatned Rome, but being returned into France, he found a new taske,

of Charles his
ment.*

885. for the Normans (a Northerne people, gathered together not onely from Denmarke, but also from Sweden and other neighbour Countries, as the word of Norman doth shew, signifying men of the North) were dispersed in diuerse parts vpon the sea coast of the Realme of France: and had chiefly set footing in the Countries of Arthois, Therouenne, and other low Countries, and in Neustria one of his greatest and nerrest Prouinces, taking their opportunity by the troubles so long continued among the brethren.

Charles dies
poorly in a village.

The fruits of this memorable example.

This checke (although the losse were small) stroke a greater terror, and in the end caused an apparent impossibility, to recouer that Prouince from so great forces: so as he was aduised to enter into treaty with them, and to make them of enemies friends, leauing them that which he could not take from them. The which hee did absolutely of his owne authority, (being very great, vnitied in these two dignities) without the priuity of his Estates. So Charles yielded Neustria to the Normans, vpon condition they should doe homage to the Crowne of France. Then gaue they their name to the Country which they had conquered, ratified by this sollemne title, and called it Normandy. He likewise lost Friesland, and gaue Gisela in marriage (being the daughter of Lothar his cousin) to Sigefrid or Liffroy one of the cheefe of the Normans, thinking thereby to stoppe this storme. But thereby hee wrought his owne ruine, for this grant was found so exceeding strange, as the French, not onely greened that the Regent had done it without their aduice, but also that (in yeelding this goodly Country to the Normans) hee had dismembred the inheritance of the Crowne, which is inalienable by the law of State. And although necessity might inferre some consideration for Charles his excuse, yet the French for this respect conceiued so great a hatred against him, as they could not rest vntill they had degraded him. And as one mischeefe neuer comes alone, Charles finding himselfe thus disdained, fell sicke. This corporall sicknesse was accompanied with a distemperature of the minde, farre more dangerous, by an extreame ialousie he had conceiued against his Queene Richarda, daughter to the King of Scots, suspecting her to haue beene too prodigall of her honour. These two infirmities of body and minde made Charles altogether vnfit for his charge, which consists more in action then in contemplatiue authority, and in a season when as occasions were ministred of all sides. This difficulty and disability to serue effectually in the regencie of the Realme and Empire vnitied in one person, of whom all men expected much, and the discontent of the il government which the French and Germanes (depending of this crown) pretended, in quitting Normandie, made both the one and the other, to enter into strange alterations against Charles. At the first his great authoritie kept the boldest in awe, and his sicknesse did excuse him: but after some yeares patience, the French and Germanes by a common consent resolu'd to dispossesse Charles, and to call a more sufficient to the place, euery one according to the limits of his country. The Germanes made choise for their Emperour, of Arnoul sonne to Caroloman, the sonne of Charles the gentle, retayning the respect they bare to the bloud and memorie of Charles the magnie. Thus the Eclipse of the Empire chanced not altogether, but this change was the first motiue to alter the Imperiall dignity, whereof afterwards was framed an Estate in Germany, vnder the title of an Emperour, as we shall see. The French likewise reiect this miserable Charles, from the regency of the realme, and call Eudes or Odon Duke of Angers, named by the will of Lewis the stuttering.

So this poore Prince is dispossessed of all his Estates, and abandoned by euery man, reiect both from realme and Empire, hauing so ill provided for himselfe in time of prosperity, as he remained naked without a house, where to throude himselfe from the disgrace of this shipwrack: being banished from his Court, and driuen into a poore village of Suevia, where hee liued some daies in extreame want, without any meanes of his owne, or releefe from any man, in the end he died, neither pitied nor lamented of any, in a corner vnknown, but to haue beene the Theater of so extraordinary a Tragedie; That one of the greatest Monarkes of the world, should die without house, without bread, without honour, without mourning, and without memory, but the note of this end so prodigiously memorable. A notable patterne of the vanity of this world, in diuers circumstances: In Charles, in the people, and in the Chastisement. In Charles, to learne by his example, to carry them-

A themselves wisely, both in prosperity and aduersity. Hee wanted no iudgement, and had abundance of wealth: but he was neither temperate nor wise in his abundance, in the which the actions of his life shew him to haue beene Imperious and indiscreet, purchasing enemies in contemning those that had raised him to those dignities, hauing beene so confident in himselfe, and carelesse of the condition of mans life: and from this extremity he fell into another, in the time of his greatest afflictions, suffering himselfe to be carried away in the current of melancholy, and his soule to be swallowed vp in despaire. In the people, who worship him in the beginning, whom they deuoure in the end, and with an inexcusable malice, tread vnder foote the afflicted: and without due consideration of the true cause of affliction, they esteeme no crime greater then affliction it selfe, whereon they should haue pity, and detest the vice, the which they couer with the cloake of prosperity. But from Charles, the People, & the Rodde, let vs ascend to him that holds it, which is God, and learn to depend on him, both in wealth and woe, not trusting in our selues when wee abound, nor distrust in him, when wee are in greatest extreames: the which hee can easily releue. Doubtlesse greatnesse commeth neither from the East nor from the West. God raiseth one, and pulleth downe another, that weighing duly the vncertainty of this life, and profiting by the example of others, we may learne not to bee wise vnto our selues, but to stop our mouthes, and open our eares and eyes, to see what God doth, and heare what hee saith, seeking the true remedies of consolation, in him that neuer failes the afflicted which flie vnto him. So that great King and Prophet banished from his house, said, I haue helmy peace, for thou hast done it, and The Lord is iust in all his waies. A most reasonable warrant of Iustice, and excellent fruites of afflictions. Such was the entry and end of Charles the Grosse, at the first a King and Emperour, and in the end lesse then his most miserable subiect. After him Eudes came in place, thrust forward by them that had reiecte'd Charles the Grosse.

Behold Eudes at last, who should haue beene in the beginning. Hee beganne to reigne, or rather to bee Regent, the yeare 894. and reigned eight yeares and some moneths, but not without difficulties. For the order of the history we must carefully obserue his race, which in the end shall gaine the highest place. Wee haue made mention of Wichind of Saxony, one of the most famous personages of his time. Being greatly fauoured by Charlemagne, hee sent a sonne of his into France, named Robert or Rupert, who had great dignities. This Robert had two sonnes, Eudes and Robert, who shall soone minister matter to talke of his life. This last Robert was father to Hugh the great, and hee father to Hugh Capet, who in the end shall sit in the royall throne: we shall see by what degrees and meanes. But to vnfold many difficulties which appeare in the reading of this history, and in the diuersity of titles giuen those that are descended of Eudes race, we must obserue, that the name of Earle and Duke, were titles of gouernment, and not of inheritance, and that their gouernments were temporary, so as one and the same man (being possessed of diuers gouernments at diuers times) doth carry in diuers respects the title of Duke, and Earle of those Provinces, whereof hee hath beene gouernor: the which was vsually for a yeare, or for three. So as we finde in this house, Dukes of Angers, Paris, Guienne, and Bourgogne, according to their commands.

Eudes vnderooke the gouernment of the Realme, according to the decree of the Estates, when it had most need of a good Pilot. Hee was held to bee a good and a wise man, yet could he not please all the French that had called him to the Regency. They complaine that Eudes was well pleased to rule and to keepe the King in awe, being no more a child: and after so bad gouernment of the former Regents, such as sought to be partakers of the authoritie vnder the young King, did vehemently insist against Eudes, to haue him leaue the gouernment of the Realme: but necessitie did contradict it, not permitting him to abandon the helme in these tempests. In the end (after many clamors) Eudes authority is limited to the gouernment.

Eight yeares passed in these contentions, but now the seed of innouation was in the heart of the State, the liberty of priuate men hauing cast away all respect: all the members of the body were sicke, and the soueraigne authority shaken by a generall disorder, which in the end changed by degrees. Italy wauered, Germany was quite fallen away, as I haue said: and France was greatly troubled with diuers factions, amongst the which, the Kings part was reckoned the greater: but experience shewed it was the weakest, for Eudes kept them in awe. The King who had the greatest interest, thought least thereon, being ill aduised by them who sought to abuse his simple and tractable disposition, and to aduance themselves by his ruine. He solicits Eudes in such sort as in the end hee strips himselfe of all authority, and resignes it into the Kings hands, who knows neither how to manage it, nor how to auoide his owne misfortune, the which Eudes preuented whilest hee liued. It was not long before his death, that hee resigned all his authority of Regent vnto Charles as to the lawfull heire, the which he could not long keepe when hee was in possession thereof, according to his soueraigne desire.

CHARLES the third, called the

He was crowned in the yeare 902. Eudes gouerning with him eight yeares from his coronation, Charles remayning alone after the death of his Regent in the yeare 902. reigned seuen and twenty yeares. His reigne was miserable both in the beginning, midst, and ending. Hee ratified the accord made with the Normans, by Charles the Grosse, and sealed it with the marriage of his Sister Gilet with Rhon or Raoul (he is also called Rhoulon) their chiefe Commander, who hauing left the Pagan superstition and embraced Christian religion, purchased a great reputation in that Country, whereof hee was first called Duke. But the Normans suite ceasing, a more violent fire is kindled by confusion. All breakes forth: A league made against the King, discovers it selfe, and takes armes without shame or respect, but being the breeding of the change of this second race, we must obserue it very distinctly, and seeke out the motives thereof.

A memorable league of Robert against
the 3.

E

The league of Robert brother to Eudes, against King Charles the simple: the first stepp to the change of this second race.

The which lay smothered sixe and thirty yeares before it was fully discovered, vnder Hugh Capet, from the yeare. 923. to 976.

ROBERT Duke of Aniou, that is to say, gouernour by the death of his brother Eudes, becomes the head of this league, accompanied by many great men of France. The euent shewes that their intent was to reiect Charles the simple, as vnworthy to reigne, and to choose a new King. I doubt not but Robert affected the crowne for himselfe: but it is very likely that he couered this his designe with some goodly pretext.

The motive
of this league.

906.

The writers of that obscure age haue concealed the motiues; but as by the effects wee A know the cause, so by the event of this league when it was strongest, wee may iudge of the intent.

Charles put from the crowne.

They aduanced a Prince of the blood for King, causing Charles to quit the crowne, disgracing him with the name of simple or foolish, and declaring him incapable of so great a charge. Who seeth not then the reason, that during the minority of Charles the simple, the diuersity of masters had bred infinit confusions in the State? and that since his coronation, things were nothing repaired, although Eudes had resigned him the Regency. They pretend it was necessary to furnish the realme with a more worthie Prince, who might giue an end to these miseries. But that which chiefly moued the vndertakers, was their priuate interest, the which they cloaked with the good of the common-weale. The humors of this insufficient King offended many, too milde to some, too seuerer to others, and ingratefull to such as had best serued him.

The commentary which hath beene added to the text of the Originall is not likely, that Robert as brother to Eudes pretended the crowne, as heire vnto his brother beeing lawfully chosen by the States. But wherevnto tends all this? Eudes had left no suspicion to pretend any interest vnto the crowne, hauing beene Regent after others, and enioying it but by suffrance, resigning it willingly or by constraint vnto the lawfull heire. Truly the French mens carefull keeping of their Queenes wombe: their acknowledging the child borne after the fathers death for King: their choosing of Regents: their placing and displacing of C one and the same Regent, doe plainly shew both the efficacy of the law, and the resolute possession of the French, the which they yeilded not easily to a man with so weake a title. What then? I should rather thinke that the peoples complaint, tired with so long calamities, was their colour to furnish the realme with a more wise and profitable guide, and that they sought a Prince (as in the end they tooke Raoul King of Bourgongne, the first Prince of the blood) of which league Robert was the ringleader, as the first in dignity and most valiant in resolution, or the most rash in so dangerous an enterprise. The memory of his brothers wife and peaceable gouernment, and his owne valour, opposit to the foolish and base disposition of Charles, blemished with this name of simple, (for his folly and contemptible humors) gaue a great lustre to this enterprise, with those great intelligences hee had D within the realme, and namely with the Normans his confident friends.

Robert the heire of the league and in armes.

With this assurance hee armes boldly against Charles, promising himselfe an vndoubted victorie, by the valour of his men, and the basenesse of his enemy. Charles the simple awakes at this strange reuolt, and (distrusting his owne subiects, whom he sees risen in armes, to dispossesse him of his Estate) he flies to Henry the Third Emperour, and prepares all hee can to calme so great a storme. As their armies approach, Robert (to haue some title to make a warre) causeth himselfe to be crowned King at Rheims, by Herve the Archbishop, who died three daies after this vnlawfull Coronation. The opinions are diuers: but for my part, I doe not hold that Robert caused himselfe to be crowned, with a better title then his brother Eudes, who was neither crowned nor reigned as King, but a Regent. But all the French complained, that they needed a better King then Charles the simple, who would E loose the crowne, if it were not foreseene.

Robert causeth himselfe to be crowned King

The errors of King Charles.

He had already ratified the follie of Charles the Groffe, in continuing the vsurpation of Neustria to the Normans, who with the Kings consent were seized thereon, with the title of lawfull possession: and moreouer they were much incensed, that hee had put himselfe into the protection of the Emperour Henry, to giue him a cause to inuest himselfe King of France, as of late daies the Germans had infranchised themselves from the French Monarchy, by the diuision of brethren which had reigned, and the minority of Charles who then commanded. This ielousie inflamed the hearts both of the one and the other, and serued Robert for a shew, meaning to fish in a troubled water.

Now they are in armes. Reason and respect of the common good fights for Robert. The same reason ioynd with the royall authority, armes for Charles against these new designs. But God, (who guides the least moment of our liues, watcheth mightily for the preservation of mankind, and disposeth of Kingdomes by his wisdom) had limited this audacious attempt,

A attempt, reseruing the change to another season, and yet for the same race of Robert. Euen so, the death of him that had crowned Robert, was a foretelling of his own. The armies lodge in the heart of France, neere vnto the great Cittie of Paris, the seazing whereof was a maine point of State: but see what happens, he that thought to vanquish, is vanquished. As the armies approach neere to Soissons, striuing (in the viewe of Paris) who should do best, they ioyne. The combat is very cruell: but Robert fighting in the front is slaine, leauing for that time the victorie to Charles the Simple: and a sonne in his house shall reuiue his desceine in his posteritie, that is, Hughes the Great, father to Hugh Capet.

The death of Robert did not daunt his armie, but it continued firme vnder the command of Hebert Earle of Vermandois, sonne in law to Robert. And Charles did so ill manage his victorie, as it became a trappe for his owne ruine: for seeing these forces to stand firme, hee seeks a treatie of peace with an vnseasonable feare. Hebert embraceth this occasion, beseecheth Charles to come to Saint Quintens, to confer together. Charles (simple indeed) comes thither without hostages. Hebert hauing him in his power, takes him prisoner: and letting him vnderstand the will of the French, to haue the Realme gouerned by a more sufficient man then himselfe, he resolues to assemble the Estates of the Realme to that end, conueyes him to Chateau-Thierry, and from thence to Soissons, where he had assembled the chiefe of the Realme, chosen after his owne humor: where he makes him to resigne the Crowne to Raoul his god-sonne, the first Prince of the blood, by his mother Hermingrade, daughter to C Lewis, and wife of Boson, King of Bourgongne.

Charles taken prisoner by Hebert.

So this poore Prince is led from prison to prison, (for the space of five yeares, yet numbred in his raigne) and after he had renounced his right, he payed nature her due, oppressed with griefe, and dying of a languishing melancholy, to see himselfe so ignominiously intreated by that audacious affront, done by the trecherie of his owne vassall.

Charles dies.

He had to wife Ogina the daughter of Edward King of England, a wife and couragious Princeesse: by her he had a sonne named Lewis. This poore Princeesse (seeing her husband prisoner, and foreseeing the end of this Tragedie, by the strange beginning) takes her sonne Lewis, and flies speedily into England, to her brother Athelstan, who then raignd, yeelding to the time, and the violent force of her enemies. Thus Raoul was seated in the place of Charles the Simple, a Prince of apparent vertue, and so they account him.

Queene Ogina flies to England with her sonne Lewis.

RAOVL the 32. King, but in effect an vsuper of the Realme.

*Raoul an vsur-
per, his raigne
was vnfortun-

HE was proclaimed and crowned King of France at Soissons, in the yeare 923. and reigned about 13. yeares, during Charles his imprisonment, and after his death. This raigne was painefull and vnfortunate: Normandie, Guienne, Lorraine, and Italy, were the cause of much fruitlesse labour. He sought to suppress the Normans, and to repaire the errors of Charles the Grosse, and Charles the Simple, (who were blamed to haue suffered them to take footing in that cuntry, to the preiudice of the Crowne:) but he preuailed not, nor yet in Lorraine, nor Guienne, whether hee made voyages, with much brute and small fruite. From thence he turned his forces towards Italy, where the State was much troubled, by the decease of Boson, and boldnesse of the Commaunders: who held the strongest places, playing the kings, in refusing to acknowledge the Empire, but in name, and in effect, they commaunded as Soueraignes, imagining their governments to be hereditarie for their children. He performed some things worthy of commendation, in suppressing Berenger Duke of Friul, who hauing freed himselfe from the Empire, had vanquished Lewis the sonne of Boson, who enioyed Italy (as we haue said) as husband to the daughter of Lewis the Gentle. Raoul made a quiet end with Hugues Earle of Arles, who had gotten possession of that goodly Cittie as gouernour, seated in a fertile Countrey, and very conuenient: hee suffered him quietly to enioy the cittie and territories about it, holding it of the Crowne of France.

Thus passed the raigne of Raoul, without any great profit after so much toyle and trouble, vnder a colour to do better then the lawfull heire, wrongfully dispossed by him; Leauing no memorie but his ambition and iniustice, in a deluge of troubles and confusions, wherein the Realme was plunged after his departure to the great discontent of all the French. Hee dyed after all these broyles in the yeare 936. at Compiene. An age wonderfully disordred, wherein we may profitably obserue by what accidents and meanes great estates are ruined.

Ciui!

Necessitie obserueth vs for great estates.

A Ciuill warres bred the first Symptomes. As order is the health of an estate, so is disorder the ruine. The ieruant hauing tasted the sweetnesse of command, imagines himselfe to be maister, being loath to leaue the authority he had in hand, holding it as his owne by testament. In this resolution there is nothing holy, all is violated for rule, all respect is layd aside, euery one plaies the King within himselfe: For one King there are many, and where there are many maisters, there is none at all. The which we must well obserue, to vnfold many difficulties in the History of this confused age, wherein we read of many Kings, Dukes, Earles, although these titles were but temporary, hauing no other title but the sword and the confusion of times.

B Thus was France altered after the death of Charles the simple, by the praides of Roberts League. There was no gouernour of any Prouince throughout the realme, which held not proper to him-selfe and his heires that which was giuen vnto him but as an office. From hence sprang so many Dukedomes, Earledomes, Baronies, and Seigneuries, the which for the most part are returned to their first beginnings. Italy (giuen to an infant of France) was possessed by diuers Princes. Germany (withdrawne from the Crowne) was banded into diuers factions, so as the Empire of the West, confirmed in the person of Charlemagne, continued scarce a hundred years in his race: for Lewis the forth, the sonne of Arnoul (of whom we haue spoken) was the last Emperour of this blood. In his place the Germans elected Conrade Duke of East Franconia, the yeare of grace. 920. the Empire being then very weake. After Conrad was chosen Henry the fouler, Duke of Saxony, and after him his sonne Ortho, Princes adorned with great and singular vertues, fit for the time to preserve the West: for the East did runne headlong to her ruine, so as since Nicephorus (who liued in the time of Charlemagne) they did not esteeme them, but held them as abiects in regard of those great Emperours which liued before them, namely Michel Cæropalates, Leo Armenien, Michel the stammering, the two Theophiles father and sonne, Basile the Macedonian, Leo the Philosopher, Alexander, and Constantine a Romaine, all which had nothing of the Romaine but the name. Thus this poore sicke body languished, being torne in peeces by the infamies of these men, either of no valour, or altogether wicked, attending the last blow by the hand of the Mahometans, whose power they fortified by their vitious liues, vntill they had lodged them vpon their owne heads.

D A notable spectacle of Gods iust iudgement, who dishonours them that dishonour him, and expells them from their houses that banish him from their hearts. In these confusions of State, the authority of the Pope of Rome increased daily, by the ruines of the Empire, who thrust him-selfe into credit among Christians by many occurrents. Their dessein was to build a Monarchy in the Church, by authority, power, Seigneuries, ciuill Iurisdictions, armes, reuenues, and treasor, being growne to that greatnesse, as afterwards they sought to prescribe lawes to Emperours and Kings, who refusing it (and disputing vpon this primacie) many dissensions grew among them, and so were dispersed among the people. This is the summe of all that shall be discoursed in the future ages in Christendome, wherein we shall view the sea of Rome, the Empire and the Kingdome. I treat but of matters of State, wherevnto the subiect and the order of our dessein doth tie me, to report by degrees so long and so obscure a discourse of those ages plunged in darkenesse.

E Platina the Popes Secretary, reports a very notable accident, happened at Rome in those times, a young maid loued by a learned man (these are his words) came with him to Athens, attyred like a boy, and there profited so well in knowledge and learning, as being come to Rome, there were few equall vnto her in the Scriptures, neither did any one exceed her in knowledge: so as she had gotten so great reputation, as after the death of Pope Leo, she was created Pope, by a generall consent, and was called John the eighth. But it chanced, that hauing reapt too neere to one of her gromes, she grew with child, the which she did carefully concale. But as she went to the Basilique of Saint John de Lateran, betwixt the Colises and Saint Clement, she fell in labour, and was deliuered of this stolne birth, in a solenne procession in view of all the people. And in detestation of so fowle a fact a pillar was erected where this profane person died.

So without flattering the truth, not the Empire alone went to wracke, but also the realme and the Church, being in those daies full of confusions, in which they fell from one mischief

127. mischief to another, by the Barbarous ignorance of all good things, both in the State and Church, as the wise and vnpassionate reader may obserue in the continuance of the history plainly described. But let vs returne from the Empire and sea of Rome to France. We haue sayd, that when Charles the simple was first imprisoned, the Queene Ogina his wife had carried her sonne Lewis into England to Adelstan the King her brother. She had patiently endured all, during the furious raigne of Raoul, the vsurper, while the experience of diuers maisters did ripen the French-mens discontents, to make them wish for their lawfull Lord. After this death of Raoul, Adelstan King of England, (hauing drawne vnto him William Duke of Normandy, the sonne of Rhou) sends a very honorable Ambassage to the States of France, intreating them to restore his Nephew Lewis to his lawfull and hereditary dignity. The French with it so as without any difficulty, Lewis the sonne of Charles was called home, by the Estates of France, whether he was accompanied with a great troupe of Englishmen and Normans, as the shew of a goodly army, which might seeme to force them to that which they willingly yeelded vnto.

beyond the seas, 33. King.

Lewis a dis-
loyall Prince.

LEWIS returnes into France, hauing remaind nine yeares or thereabouts in England, surnamed Doutremer or from beyond the seas, by reason of his stay there. He beganne to raigne in the yeare nine hundred thirty five, and raigned twenty seauen yeares. A disloyall and vnfortunate Prince, hauing made no vse of his afflictions, vnworthy the bloud of Charlemagne. And thus was their ruine aduanced by the default of men, the which God held backe by his patience. He found the Estate of his realme like vnto one that returnes to his house after a long and dangerous navigation. He was receaued with great ioy of all men. Those which had beene most opposit vnto him, made greatest shewes of faithfull and affectionate seruice, to insinuate into his fauour. Amongst the rest William Duke of Normandy, but especially Hugues the great, Mayre of the Pallace, whome wee haue already noted, as the sonne of Robert the chiefe of the

A the said League. He had employed all his meanes for the calling home of Lewis into France, and at his returne he spared nothing to confirme his authority. This was the meanes to lay the foundation of a greater authority for his successors.

They must begin the new government of this Prince with a wife, to haue lawfull issue. The Emperours allyance was very needfull. Otho held the Emperiall dignity, being the sonne of Henry the fowler Duke of Saxony. He had two sisters Elrhergue and Maoye. King Lewis married the eldest, and in signe of brotherly loue he motioned the marriage of the youngest with Huges the great. Lewis had two sonnes by Herbergue, Lotharre (who succeeded him to the crowne of France) and Charles, who shalbe Duke of Lorraine and contend for the Crowne, but shall loose it. Hugues the great was more happy then Lewis, for of the youngest hee had Hugh Capet, who shall take their place, and ascend the royall throne, to settle the French monarchy, shaken much in the confusions of these kings vnworthy to raigne, or beare any rule. And of the same marriage Hugues had Otho and Henry, both Dukes of Bourgonne, one after another. Behold now vpon the Stage two great and wise personages, the King and his Mayre, whome we may call a second King: they strue to circumuent each other, the which their actions will discover: but man cannot preuent that on earth, which is decreed in heaven. At this time William Duke of Normandy, the sonne of Rhou, (who had shewed himselfe so affectionate in the restoring of the King to his dignity) was traiterously murdered by the meanes of Arnoul Earle of Flanders his capitall enemy: leauing one sonne named Richard, a young man vnder government. This vncpected and extraordinary death must needs breed great troubles in Normandy, an estate which was but now beginning. It did greatly import for the good of France, to haue this Prouince quiet. Lewis was likewise particularly bound, for the good entertainment he had receiued of William in his greatest necessity, the which tied him to his sonne.

These were goodly shewes to make him embrace this cause: so as hauing intelligence of this accident, he sends expressly to Richard and his counsell, to assure him of his loue and succour, and followes him-selfe presently to Rouan, with a traine fitte for his royall greatness, being loth to be the weakest after so strange an alteration, where the most audacious do commonly fish in a troubled streame. The colour of his coming was to comfort Richard with his counsell and fauourable assistance: but in effect, it was to seaze vpon his person and estate. He sends for this yong child to his lodging, conducted by his gouernour, a Knight called Osmond: he doth assure him with sweet words of his fatherly loue: but when night came, he would not suffer him to depart, detaining him three daies with a carefull gard. The people incensed by them that had then charge of the young Duke, mutine, and besiege the Kings lodging.

Hauing pacified this popular fury, in deliuering them their Prince, he protests to haue no other intent, but to preserve his estate. And so in an open assembly of the Citizens, receiving him to homage, hauing giuen him a discharge of his lands and Seigneuries, he doth solemnly promise to reuenge the death of William against Arnoul Earle of Flanders, and gets the consent of the Normans, to lead their Duke with him to be instructed with his sonne Lotharre, a young child of the same age. He brings him to Laon, whether Arnoul the murderer of William repaires, in shew to purge him-selfe of the murder: but in effect, to perswade him, so to seaze on Richards person, as he might enioy his estate.

Lewis being resolute in this determination (a man disloyall by nature, and louing nothing but himselfe) hee caused this poore young Prince to be straightly garded: but this gouernour Osmond, retires him cunningly out of Laon, conducting him to Senlis, to Hebert his fathers confident friend. This is he which imprisoned Charles the Simple, contrary to his faith: and now hee detests Lewis his Soueraigne Lord, who seeks to doe the like vnto one of his vassals. But we shall soone see the iustice of God aboue all, who will punish one by another, and shew him-selfe an enemy and reuenger of all disloyalty and misdeameour, both in servant and maister, and in all other, as all are naturally subiect to this soueraigne law of integrity and faithfulnessse to all men.

Hugues the great, Earle of Paris, and Mayre of the Pallace, had wone great credit with the cities and men of warre: but hee was more feared then loued of Lewis, a treacherous and reuengfull Prince, whome hee distrusted, and opposed his authority against him

942. him. Hebert was his confident friend: so in this Accident of this yong Prince, he comes A to Paris, and winnes him to promise fauour vnto Richard, or at the least makes him promise not to be his enemy.

The King likewise (knowing how much his friendship did import in these affaires) labours to winne him (such was the strangeness of that age, as the master must seeke to the seruant) the which he obtained, vpon condition to giue him a good part of Normandie. Herevpon the match was made, that Hugues should accompany Lewis to the warre of Normandy, and should enter on the one side while the King came on the other, promising to diuide their conquests according to their agreement. But this succeeded not according to their meanings, the two deceiuers were deceiued: but the greatest bare the greatest burthen. B This complot of Lewis and Hugues could not be so secret, but it came to the knowledge of Hebert, who gaue intelligence to Richard and his gouernors, Osmond and Bernard the Dane: so as they assemble at Senlis, and resolue to crosse this double dealing of Hugues, with the like policy. To this end Hebert (according to the familiarity he had with Hugues) goes to conferre with him, to put him in minde of his promise, of the right of a yong Prince vnto the which he was imployed by Lewis, and of his treacherous and disloyall disposition, who hauing im- C ploied him to worke his will, would in the end deceiue him, beseeching him to stand firme in a good cause, for his ancient and faithfull friends, and not to fortifie their common ene- my by the afflictions of another, but in defending the right vniustly set vpon, prouide for his safety and profit. Hugues (who thought it best to haue two strings to his bow) distrust- ing Lewis in his heart more then any man liuing, doth easily grant Hebert to assist Richard against Lewis, and doth confirme his promise by oth.

is deceiued.

Hebert hauing thus ingaged Hugues, and yet distrusting him greatly, whom he sees to play on both sides, returnes to Senlis, to Richard and his gouernors, where they conclude, that if Hugues ioynd with the King against Richard, they would compound with the King to his cost: and so it happened. The King goes to field with his army on the one side, and Hugues on the other to invade Normandy in diuers partes, when as Bernard the Dane, chiefe gouernor of the State for Richard, and Osmond of his person, came boldly vnto Lewis and said vnto him, that he had no need to attempt Normandy by force, when as hee might enjoy it by a voluntary obedience: for prooffe whereof, if it pleased him to come to Rouan, D he should be obeyed. But withall he aduised him to take heed of Hugues his ancient ene- my, shewing him treacherously the countenance of a friend and seruant, which hee were cir- cumuentured, but rather to accept of all Normandy with Rouan, the which offered it selfe vn- to him to receiue peace from him, and yeeld him obedience as their Souereigne Lord.

Lewis willingly giues eare to this aduice: he comes presently to Rouan, and is honorab- ly receiued, sending word to Hugues, that seeing the Prouince obeyed, there was no neede of further proceeding, and hauing not imployed him in this voluntary conquest, it was not reasonable he should participate in another mans Estate: that the publike good and reason required him to leaue Richard as hee was, vnder the obedience of the Crowne, without dis- membring of his Estate. Hugues (who pretended a good part of this rich Country) was greatly discontented with Lewis. Hauing dismissed his army, he retires to Paris, detesting E his infidelity. Hebert embracing this occasion, comes to Hugues, and according to the fa- miliarity of their ancient friendship, he laughs at him, in suffering himselfe to be abused by his approued enemy, abandoning his trusty friends against all right. The shame to haue failed of his word, and despite to haue bene deceiued, made Hugues soone resolue, not on- ly to leaue Lewis, but to embrace Richards party against him, with all his power. It was a notable stratageme, to diuide Hugues, and leaue him discontented with Lewis: but being assured of his friendship, they send into Den-marke (from whence the Normans were de- cended) to King Agrol, kinsman and friend to Richard, for succours, the which succeeded more happily then they expected.

the Normans.

Lewis is at Rouan, who doth not onely command there as Souereigne, but doth seize F on their goods, whom he doth any way suspect; deuising occasions, and holding it for a capitall crime to bee any way affected vnto Richard, fauoring his followers with the best matches in the Country, and giuing them credit and authority in the Prouince, by marria- ges: hee imposeth extraordinary charges vpon the people, already furcharged with the feeding

A feeding of to many horsemen. To conclude, he doth all a man may doe, that hath no other countellor but his greatnesse, and that seeke his owne ruine by his blind couetousnesse.

In the meane time Agrol armes in Denmarke, and in the end comes into Normandy with a goodly army: the King likewise brings his forces to field. Richard, who had the chiefe interest, is at Senlis in safety, and Hugues at Paris, a looker on. Agrol before he enters into open hostility, sends his Ambassadors to Lewis, to let him vnderstand, that the reason which had drawne him into Normandy with his army, was to maintaine the right of his cousin Richard, who had not deserued to bee spoiled of his Estate, vpon no other cause but his minority, who (although he had no father,) yet should hee not bee destitute of Kinsmen B and friends. And therefore he intreated Lewis (rather then to come to the doubtfull euent of armes) to suffer Richard to enioy Normandy, as his father and grand-father had done. And this he did to haue the right on his side.

Lewis bold in deceiuing, and a coward in danger, charged with the wrong hee had done vnto a pupill, seeing himselfe abandoned by Hugues, whom hee had discontented out of season, and not trusting much the other Noblemen that followed him, hee makes a very milde answer to Agrol: and after some negotiations, hee yeelds to a parlee with him, as the chiefe mediator of Richards rights. Being in field, and conferring together vpon this occasion, behold an vnexpected accident falls out. Hee which had bene the cause of the Earle of Flanders quarrell, and by consequence of the murdering of William, the father of C Richard, was there present with the King. Our histories say, it was Ellorn Earle of Montre- uill. A Dane (an old friend of Williams) knowes him, hee chargeth him therewith: and as they grow to choller, he kills him. Then both parties fell to armes: the French charge the Danes, but they finde themselves too weake: all are disperfed, and with this vprore the Kings breake off their parlee. Lewis goes to horse, the which being strong-headed, carries him among the thickest of the Danes. Behold hee is now prisoner in the hands of some souldiers: but as in this tumult the guard was neglected, he escapes: yet in the end he is taken againe, and led in triumph to Rouan. Thus the murder supported by Lewis, was the cause of his imprisonment: and hee seeking to wrong a pupill, did releue him with his owne person, in exchange that he had restrained him against all right.

prisoner, at a parlee.

D The Queene Gerberge greatly troubled for her husbands imprisonment; flies to Otho the Emperour her brother, who (preuented by Hugues his other brother in law; and seeing the wrong Lewis did, to disquiet a yong Prince in the possession of his estate) refuseth to helpe him: so as necessitie inforced Gerberge to vse Hugues (to her great griefe) to be a me- diator for the deliuey of the King her husband. Hugues intreated by the Queene his sister in law, deales at length in this accord, but vpon good termes; that the King should yeeld to Duke Richard all the Duchie of Normandy, and for a surplussage that of Britanie, to hold them freely without retention of souereignty or homage: the which was much more then the pupill required, who would willingly haue done homage to the King, as to his souereigne Lord, and haue yeelded him faithfull obedience. Behold the issue of Lewis his deceite, being deceiued by a poore yong man, whom hee thought to circumuent; ve- E rifying by a notable example, that whosoever seekes to take away an other mans right, loo- seth his owne.

conditions.

Behold Richard restored to his Estate, where hee carrieth himselfe with such equity and moderation, by the wise aduise of Bernard and Osmond his Gouernours, as hee winnes the loue of his subiects, and by their counsell, he takes to wife Agnes or Emmet, the daughter of Hugues the great, for a requitall of the good office hee had receiued from him in his ne- cessity. This alliance of Hugues with Richard, increased Lewis his iealousie against him, so as he resolued to imploy all his forces to suppress him. He goes to the Emperour Otho his brother in law, informing him, that Hugues practised to depriue him of the realme: and that he would speedily attempt it, if he were not preuented: with whom he so preuailed, through F this common iealousie of Princes (who impatiently doe see any other to grow great by them) as hee leuiued a great army, the which ioynd with that of France, and besieged Rouan: but with such vnhappy successe, as the Emperour (hauing lost both his Nephew and a great number of his men) aduised the King to compound with Hugues his brother in law, and to leaue Richard Normandy in peace, according to their former treaties.

955. So hauing labored to reconcile these brothers in law, hee returned into Germany. This A counterfeit reconciliation, was but a breathing of the peoples miseries, which they suffered by the dissention of Princes: but there was no firme friendship, for Hugues trusted not Lewis, but kept aloofe in his great City of Paris, leauing the King at Laon, beeing then the chiefe seat of his royall abode.

Hugues, by this cunning proceeding, kept himselfe out of Lewis his hands, who on the other side dissembled: and seeing that force could not preuaile, he watched all oportunities to surpris his enemies: amongst the which he hated none so much as Hebert Earle of Vermandois, both for that which hee had done against his father, and his late proceedings against himselfe. Hee gouerned this dislike so wisely, as in the end Hebert was hanged, and this was the meanes: Lewis pretending to loue Hugues, shewed a good countenance to all B such as were affected vnto him, especially to this Cont Hebert, whom hee fauored extraordinarily, protesting to trust him in all things: the successe was answerable to his plot. He calls an assembly of his vassalls at Laon, and fortifies himselfe to bee the strongest: thether he calls Cont Hebert, of whose counsell (in shew) he made great esteeme, and writes his letters vnto him, that he would vse him. Hebert growne familiar with Lewis, and sent for by him, comes to the assembly, fearing no enemy. Lewis beeing master of the City, reading a letter after diner in the great hall, he cried out. It is truly sayd, that English men are not very wise. The Noblemen about him desirous to know the cause of this speech: hee fained, that the King of England had demanded his aduice by this letter: What hee should doe to C a subiect that had called his Lord into his house, vnder colour of good cheere, had seized on him, and caused him to die shamefully: Hebert answereth with the rest: That hee must die infamously. The King replies vnto him presently. Thou hast condemned thy selfe by thine owne mouth, thou wicked seruant, thou didst inuite my father to thy house, with a shew of loue: being there, thou didst detaine him and cause him to die cruelly. The company stood in shew amazed, but in effect ready to execute the Kings pleasure, not able to contradict so manifest a truth: for the information of the death of King Charles the simple, was notorious to the world, so as presently, by Lewis absolute command, Hebert was taken away, deliuered to the executioner, and hanged in view of all the world, the place being neere vnto Laon, (noted by so memorable an execution) is called Mont Hebert vnto this day. D And thus the treachery of Hebert (after a long delay, when he least suspected) was punished by the treachery of Lewis: and hee himselfe after all these exploits died at Rheims, in the yeare 955. hated and detested of the French, leauing to Lothaire his sonne a crowne neere the ruine, and to Charles his yongest, the fauour of his elder brother, for a poore portion, as we shall declare hereafter.

of France.

E began to reigne in the yeare 956. and reigned thirty one yeares, performing nothing that was memorable, but that hee was heire to his fathers treachery and misfortune, and the last but one of his race. Hee was a forerunner of the change, which happened to his posterity. He renewed a league with the Emperour Otho the second, who had succeeded his father Otho the first, with an intent to reuiue the enterprise of his father Lewis, against Richard Duke of Normandie, either by policy, or else by open force. He sought twice to surpris Richard, a good and a wise Prince, with a shew of good meaning: but hauing attempted all in vaine, in the end he vsed open force, and was shamefully repulsed and beaten. Thus hee spent some yeares vnprofitably in this wilfull passion against the Normans, bringing infinit confusions into France, both by his owne forces, and by theirs, against whom he vndertooke this voluntary warre.

These miseries are set forth at large, by those writers which liued in that age. This breefe will serue for the matter, according to our stile, to shew, that these calamities, bred E onely by the passion of an ill-advised King, thrust the subiects into furie and dispaire, and then into hatred against him, beeing vnworthy to bee respected, hauing so little regard of publike peace. The generall Estates assemble for the redresse thereof. The Normans suffering as well as the French, demand nothing more then peace, and Duke Richard, notwithstanding his treaty with Lewis the fourth, offered to hold of the crowne of France, so as his subiects might liue in quiet.

These honest, profitable and necessary offers, augmented their hate against Lothaire, who sought warre without any cause, although he were vnfortunate, alwaies mutinous, and alwaies beaten. To this phreneticall passion of his fruitlesse quarrells against the Normans, a new fantasie possessed Lothaire, to breake the league with the Emperour, and to make warre with the Germaines, for the possession of Lorraine, (anciently called Austrasia) the which he sayd belonged vnto him by right, time out of minde. Hee sought by ill government to repossesse that which lay farre off, being vnable to keepe that which he had in his possession. Hee engaged Regnier and Lambert, the sonnes of the Earle of Mons in this action, promising to diuide the conquest: and did so contemne his brother Charles (whom A his father had recommended vnto him) leauing him no portion but his fauour, hoping this liberty should breed more loue in him, and also the reuerence of a brother tyed to his eldest, should make him respectiue to the publike authority) as he fled to the Emperour Otho for helpe. Otho (embracing this occasion) determines the sute which Lothaire would commence against him, in respect of Lorraine: inuesting Charles therein, who soughte relesce of him for his brothers discontent: but Otho restoring Lorraine vnto him, took from it great Seigneuries giuen to the Bishops of Cologne and Liege, with condition also that the same should depend of the Empire. Hereof grew great jarres betwixt the French and the Germanes, with so violent a rage, and passion, as they were rather furious robberies, then iust and well gouerned warres, Charles the brother of Lothaire, carried himselte very indifferently, as if he had beene no Frenchman but a Germane, and was wedded to the Emperours passion with such vehemencie, as if all his good fortune had depended thereon, and had vtterly renounced France as a capitall enemye. Moreover, the ordinary traffick from France to Germanie, was a daily cause of discontent to the French: to whom Lorraine was an ordinary passage for their commerce: so as diuerse persons receiuing daily, and vpon diuerse occasions, discourtesies from Charles Duke of Lorraine, the French conceiued a hatred in their hearts against him, which burst out in a seasonable time, for the vtter ouerthrow of all the good hap where-vnto God had called him, the which hee could not gouerne by his indiscretion and cruelty.

But the prouidence of God, making way for his decrees, would expell them from the C Crowne, which had banished all faith, valour, humanitie, iustice, and other royall vertues, and disposed the people to these changes, by their default, who had the principall interest to entertaine their loues by equity and good vsage: Lothaire hated of all men, dyed in the yeare 964. leauing behind him an execrable memory of his actions, and Lewis his sonne for a finall conclusion of his race, as an outcast of great Charlemagne.

Hee was likewise called idle, hauing done nothing worthy of memory, but in leauing the place to a better Prince, and more worthy then himselte, whom God, the protector of the Crowne of France, had reserved for this estate, in so great necessitie: for as God had decreed, that out of the house of Hugues the B great, should issue a great King, which should reparaire the errors of this bastard race of Charlemagne, so likewise hee had prepared the meanes, both for the father to lay the foundation; and for his sonne Hugh Capet (appointed for this dignity) to finish this goodly building, as it appears in the following discourse.

Charles Duke
of Lorraine
here presented, rejected from the crowne,
and,
Hugh Capet
chosen King
of France.

The date of this change
vnto the third Race.

THE royall throne of France (remaying void, by the death of Lewis the 5.) did visibly call Charles Duke of Lorraine to the Crowne (of whom we have before made mention) as the first Prince of the bloud royall, to whom I say the fundamentall law did adiuage the Crowne, for want of heires males, lawfull sonnes of Kings. Charles was son to Lewis the forth, brother to Lothaire, Vncle to Lewis the fift the last King. But it chanced otherwise, for Hugh Capet, sonne to Hugues the great, Mayre of the Pallace, Earle of Paris and also Prince of the French, carried it from Charles, being advanced to the crowne by the free election of the French, assembled in Parliament, according to the ancient and inuolable customes of France. By whose decree Hugh Capet, was chosen king, and Charles Duke of Lorraine rejected from the crowne. This election being confirmed by the blessing of God, who had maintayned the possession (thus made lawfull by the consent of French nation) in the successiue posterity of Capet, who happily preferred the French Monarchie vnto this day, against the sundry violences of strangers.

This change happened in the yeare 987. in the moneth of Iuly. But as this action was one of the worthiest that euer chanced in this Realme, being an estate vnder which our Ancestors haue liued, and we do liue at this day, so this gouernment hath continued 619. years. Yet all this is handled, by our ordinary writers, with such obscure breuery, as if Hugh Capet had fallen out of the clouds, or bene suddenly bred in one night, like vnto a mushrome. The wise reader, which seekes the truth, must giue me leaue to dilate my stile, to shew him by degrees, the breeding, continuance and feeling of this new royalty, in the house of France, transplanted into the house of Capet, as I could collect it by the curious search of the Originalls, and as the traces of truth could direct me in so crooked a Labyrinth, ynknewne to the greatest part of our French nation. What I haue here described, is faithfully drawne out of diuers authors which liued in those times. I haue only fitted my report to be the more intelligible, and will simply represent what passed in this change, not giuing my censure, but leauing it free to the vnpartial reader.

Wcc

A We haue said in the second race, that Lewis the fift sonne to Lothaire, dying without heires males, had buried the royaltie with him: for Charles Duke of Lorraine, (whome the lawe of state preferred to this dignitie) had by his actions made himselfe vnworthie of this great honour. He had recourse to the Emperour Otto, and had taken the oath of fealtie and allegiance to be inuelted in the Duchie of Lorraine. So by this homage he had renounced all the interest he could pretend to the Crowne of France. Moreover, he had aggravated this error by an irreconcilable hatred: for (being Duke of Lorraine) he had shewed himselfe a passionate enemy to the French, in maintaining the Germanie faction against them, who had not long before withdrawn themselves from the obedience of our Monarchie. It is also likely, that many priuate men were moued with the interest of this generall quarrell, by reason of the situation of Lorraine, the ordinarie passage from Fraunce into Germanie, Prouinces of mutuall commerce.

The reason
why Charles
was rejected.

These priuate iniuries, bred in the end a generall discontent, the which was increased by such as had a priuate interest in the wrongs they pretended to haue receiued. The feeling of these bad practises, acted so lately by Charles against France, both in generall and particular, did incense the French against him. But the example and cries of them of Lorraine, added to their experience, confirmed their resolution, to stop his entrance to the Crowne: for Charles (being rash & a wicked man, bearing a Kings mind vnder a Dukes title) did infinitely oppress his subiects of Lorraine, for the supplying of his prodigall expences: hauing as little iudgement and temperance to intreat the of Lorraine mildly, as he had reason to gouern himselfe.

C The president of these newe subiects (whome hee enioyed but by sufferance,) preuailed much with the French in this new accident: for what could they with reason conclude of his vsage against them, who should be his naturall and necessarie subiects? being yet terrified with the memorie of that which they had suffered vnder Lothaire his brother.

This was the preparatiue of Charles his downfall, wrought by himselfe, to deprive him of that authoritie wherunto God had called him. These were the causes which made the French resolute to withstand Charles of Lorraine with all their force, in his pretention to the Crowne of France. But how then? Charles being rejected, the realme had need of a King, vnable to subsist without one, no more then a bodie can without a head.

D Thus the end of the one is the beginning of the other, and necessitie gaue the people this first aduice to change, thrust forward with the onely consideration of their quiet and profit. But the Nobilitie growne great by the disorders of troubles past, had yet more interest in this change, for the preservation of their goods and honours. They could not liue all equall. This equall command is a plague to the French: they had deuoured one another without a great commander respected of them all, for, so many Prouinces, so many petty Kings, which had neuer yeilded one to another without a Controuler.

command, the ruine of an estate.

In this estate they could haue no recourse but to Hugh Capet, being accompanied with all the commendable vertues that might make a man worthie of a great command: with authoritie, power, vnderstanding, courage, wisdom, equitie, mildnesse, dexteritie, valour, and credit, both within and without the realme.

Hugh Capet
held not vnworthie of the Crowne.

E We haue before spoken of his father Hugues the Great, the sonne of Robert Duke of Angers, who was the head of the League against Charles the Simple: shewing, that he not only maintained himselfe after the death of his father Robert, but also built his designes vpon the same foundation, vnder the reignes of Lewis the 4. and Lothaire, Princes hard to be circumvented. They feared him more then they loued him: yet he vsed their authorities to his owne good, and did so wisely prevent the practises of these two malicious and reuengefull Princes, as he maintained his authoritie firmly by the means of his great commands. Being Duke of the French, he had the command of armes: as Mayor of the Pallace, he held the helme of the affaires of State: and being Earle of Paris, he had the chiefe credit with the people, who had their greatest trade in the Capitall Cittie of the Realme. This was the fruite which the respect of these offices brought him, being well gouerned by his wife dexteritie. And although these Kings loued him not, yet the alliance he had with them, as brother in lawe, but especially vertue countenanced by his so great credit, was the cause they not onely made shewe to loue him as their allye, but also to respect him as one of the chiefe pillars of the State.

The wise proceeding of Hugues the Great his father.

987.

But to these offices and dignities, he added the friendship of the chiefe Noblemen of the Realme, beeing very carefull to entertaine their loues. Richard Duke of Normandie was one of his most confident friends, whom he had gratified, maintaining him in the possession of his estate. He receiued requirall of this good office with interest, in the person of Hugh his sonne, to seate him in the royall throne, as our Historie shall declare. But all these aduantages, were not onely crowned with a goodly and great offspring, but also with a sonne endowed with singular graces both of bodie and mind. Hee had sixe sonnes and two daughters, with such successe, as he made perfect the worke his father had begun.

The offspring of Hughes the Great.

He was called

He was named Hughes, and by surname Capet, either for that he had a great head, or that beeing young he was accustomed to catch at his companions cappes, as a preface of that he should do to Kings: Otho and Henry, two other sonnes of Hughes, were Dukes of Bourgoigne one after another: his other sonnes were aduanced to Ecclesiasticall dignities, the one Archbishop of Tholouse, the other of Rouan, and the third dyed young. One of his daughters was married to the Duke of Normandie, the other to Fredericke Earle of Metz. He had taken his first wife from England, the daughter of King Edward, and sister to queene Ogina, the wife of Charles the Simple, mother to Lewis the fourth: and although he had no children by her, yet did he carefully preferue the friendship of this allyance, and before his death he chose a wife out of this great house, for Hugh Capet his eldest sonne, the which was Adelais the daughter of King Edward.

Thus he fortified his greatnesse by all meanes, the which raised his posteritie to the royall throne, purchasing credit both within and without the Realme, by all meanes fit to establish a great family. These were the ordinarie proceedings which humane policie (beeing the gift of God, and a branch of his wisdome in those that he will blesse, leauing the wretched plunged in their wretchednesse, by their owne indiscretion) doth vsually prescribe to wise and carefull men. But Hughes the Great had another aduantage, which surmounted all these his great meanes, or the force of his friendships and alliances, hauing a sonne capable of iudgement for great attempts, fit for the time, brought vp, and instructed by himselfe.

To conclude, all things were so disposed in France, as they must necessarily receiue him for King. Necessitie, the generall consent both of great and small, and a meanes to preferue the Crowne from ruine, the which he alone could effect. But if the French were forward in seeking to him, Hughes was so much the more encouraged to embrace so great and famous a dignitie. And in the execution of this generous desseigne, he carried himselfe with so great wisdome, moderation, and dexterity, as we may well say, that God called him, as it were from heauen. There remained nothing but an orderly proceeding to that which reason presented vnto them.

proceeding to assume the Crowne.

A Parlement called at Noyon
for the election of

Hughes beganne with the greatest, who had a speciall interest to preferue what they held. He treated mildly with them for the common necessitie. The condition was, To leaue them all that by inheritance, which they held of the Crowne by title of office, and they to do homage, and acknowledge him for their lawfull King. Thus was the accord made betwixt the Nobilitie of France, and Hugh Capet, profitable for great men, necessarie for the people, honourable for Hughes, and beneficial for the Realme: for by this meanes the realme was maintained in one bodie, vnder the authoritie of one absolute Commaunder. Hughes was well furnished, hauing a sonne capable of the realme which was hereditarie. The better sort had what they could desire for them or theirs, and the people remayned in peace after so many miseries. Things beeing thus disposed of all sides, the Parliament assembles at Noyon, whither they runne from all parts: and both necessitie and desire to winne his fauour, to whome reason should assigne the Realme brought all the cities, and made such hast thither as they sought to settle their priuate estates by this publike authoritie. Hugh failes not likewise to call all his friendes, to reape the fruite so long sought for with so great paine and trauaile, both by himselfe and his father, and now to employ them as in a day of battaile.

The assembly was great, by the concourse of all the Prouinces and Citties of the Realme, which repaired thither. It was the more famous, for that in shew the French offered the Realme to Capet, as if hee had not affected it. As things passe in this sort, Charles Duke of

A of Lorraine, well aduertised of the Frenchmens intent, and the desseignes of Hugh, labours to prevent him: and being resolu'd to employ all his forces, he begins first by admonitions, but so ill seasoned, as it made the way more easie for Capet: for hee sends his Ambassadors to the assembly of the States, not to intreate them to receiue him into their fauours, and so to the Crowne, according to his hereditary right, but to summon them, That if they did not speedily obey, hee would reduce them to obedience by force. The French already incensed against Charles, and hauing placed their hopes in Hugh (being present, and soliciting for himselfe, assisted with his best friends) fell into so great a rage against Charles, by his rough and importune speeches, as hardly could the law of Nations restraîne them from doing some affront vnto his Ambassadors, for their indiscretion.

his Ambassadors to the States, and

B Then the Estates inact by a sollemne decree, That for as much as Charles had shewed himselfe a friend to the enemy of France, and a sworne enemy to the French, so likewise did the French renounce his friendship, declaring him incapable of the benefit of the Law, both for that hee gaue the first cause, as also not being bound to acknowledge him for King, that is an enemy to the State, (their oth binding them to a King which is a father, iust, wise, milde, and temperate.) And therefore, betwene God and their consciences, without any alteration of the fundamentall law, they renounce him, and declare that their intention is to choose a King which should provide for the quiet of France.

Is reiecte
from the
crowne.

C They deliuer this declaration to Charles his Ambassadors, commanding them to auoide the Realme presently. Thus Charles his reiectiō, was the raising of Hugh Capet, for presently the generall estates (assembled in one body, and representing all the Prouinces of the Realme) declare by an authentike and sollemne decree, That being necessary to choose a King for the preferuation of the Crowne of France, destitute as well by the death of Lewis the first, as by the apparent treachery of Charles Duke of Lorraine, That in equity, according to God and their consciences, the Estates did choose Hugh Capet for King, promising to obey him, and his, as their lawfull King, according to the law of State. This is the ground of Hugh Capet's royaltie. There was no need of any Preachers to perswade the people, nor to send to Rome for the Popes dispensation, as Pepin did. The people were fully perswaded in their mindes, and a fitt occasion was offered, that without any iniurious change (as that was in the person of Chilperis) they might supply the place (beeing voyde) with a better King, and more profitable for the common-weale. This Acte was made at Noyon, in the moneth of May, in the year 987. and to giue more authority to this famous decree, the same Assembly goes to assist at the Coronation of Hugh, who was annointed and crowned King the third of Iuly, after his election.

Hugh Capet
of France.

Crowned at Rheims.

Hugh Capet being thus chosen and crowned King, hee studied by all meanes to let the French vnderstand by the effects, that they had made a good choise, as the successe of his raigne, and of his posterities will shew in the following discourses. From Rheims hee went to Paris, well accompanied, where hee makes his entry, to the great applause of all the people. Hee employes his first endeauours, to send them all home well satisfied, who had giuen him so notable a prooue of their affection. But euery one being returned to his house: behold Charles of Lorraine reiecte'd, assembles forces, and with part of them begins to ouerrunne Champagne, dooing all acts of hostility: and within few moneths after, hee himselfe comes to field with a great armie of Germanes, Lorraines, and Bourguignons: and hauing taken Rheims at his first approach, hee passed on towards Paris, as to the head or heart of the Estate, and enters into Picardy, where hee seizeth on the townes of Soissons and Laon, all by the practises of Arnulphe the bastard sonne of King Lothaire, and Archbishop of Rheims: a man both cunning and head-strong: from thence hee runnes euen to the gates of Paris, filling all the country with fire and feare.

Charles of Lorraine begins war and sur-prieth townes.

F Hugh sleepees not, but knowing how much it did import to possesse the people with a good conceit of him, and to stoppe the courses and spoyles of Charles, (who of purpose tormented the Parisiens, to breed some innouation) hee gathereth together what troupes hee can, attending the rest which hee had sent for, and with them hee goes presently to field: but it chanced that Charles (being fatte stronger then Capet) did easily defeat him: so as hauing cut his troupes in peeces, hee had almost surpris'd Hugh in the sight of Paris, where hee saued himselfe with much paine and danger. These beginnings did as much amaze the people people ( who had so cheerefully chosen Hugh ) as it putt vp Charles already a conquerour, A and a peacefull King in his owne conceit : who being retired to Laon in great triumph, sends new letters to all the Prouinces of France, perfwading them to acknowledge him for their lawfull King, vaunting of this happy beginning, as a gage of the felicity which did attend him in his reigne. But he had not cast vp his accounts with him who holds the euents of things in hand, for the contrary fell out to that he had conceiued.

Hugh is nothing dismayde at this first repulse, these summonings of Charles make him to use all hast, and prickes them forward with whome he had diuided the Realme, hauing a particular interest in his reigne, according to their election: All men fly vnto him: Charles (supposing that Hugh ment to yeeld, and that these assemblies were made to haue the better conditions) had disperfed his army about Laon, and retained the least part within the city: B and with this assurance, that all necessities should abound, hee had no care to make vse of his victory, when as sodainly Hugh appeares with his army before Laon: and (hauing stoppt all the passages) he beseegeth it: all the Lorraines smal troupes which were found disperfed in the villages thereabouts, were easily taken & disarmed, and the city was presently summoned to yeeld in the Kings name, and to deliuer vp Charles of Lorraine, guilty of high treason, and enemy to the French, vpon paine of fire and sword.

Charles flies to intreates and teares. The inhabitants complayning of him, as the cause of their misery, resolute (with the aduice of Anselme their Bishoppe) to obey Hugh Capet, as their lawfull King, and to deliuer Charles into his hands. The which they did with his wife C and children. This happened in the yeare. 991. and so the controuersie bewixt Hugh, and Charles of Lorraine for the crowne was decided in lesse then foure yeares: Hugh being a conqueror goes to Orleans, and leades Charles with him, and the remainder of his miserable family, inflicting no greater punishment on him, then perpetuall imprisonment, where he was well kept with his wife, vnto his dying day, in the which he had both sonnes and daughters. There are diuers opinions vpon this point. Some say they died all there, others say, that they reepled the State of Lorraine, and transplanted their race vnto the Princes that rule there at this present.

But howsoeuer, as the Romaines had expelled the Gaules, and they them-selues were afterwards driuen out by diuers nations: and the race of Pharamond ( which had dispossessed D them ) was displaced by Pepin; so Hugh Capet expelled that of Pepin, with a better title then Pepin, being lawfully called by them which had the right: and the presumptiue heire was iustly degraded for his fault: so as no man can with reason say, That Hugh Capet was an usurper, seeing he had so sollemne and lawfull a calling, by a decree of the generall Estates of the Realme, to whome the application of the Soueraigne Lawe belongs, as Nangius an auncient writer doth testifie. For what auails it the legitimation of his royalty, to say, that Hugh Capet came of the race of Charlemagne by his Mother Anoie, daughter to Otho Duke of Saxony and Emperor. In this regard she could not be of Charlemagnes race (the which without doubt, sayled in Lewis the forth, the sonne of Arnoul) neither would it auile him anything to bee the sonne of a daughter of France, seeing the Distaffe may not lawfully succeede. This victory added an incredible reputation to Hugh Capets vertue, the which was without doubt E in great extremity, and made him an easie way to purchase obedience in his new Kingdome.
He began by homage, as the seale of authority, to that end, he calls all Dukes, Earles, Barons, Noblemen and Gentlemen, to come and take the oath of aleageance. They runne of all hands, only the Earle of Flanders (that Arnould which had bene the first brand of those wars in Normandy) plays the mutine. Hugh hauing called him to doe homage, and noted his contumacy, goes to field with his forces, to compell him thereunto. Having seized on the greatest part of his country, the Earle flies to humility, and by the mediation of Richard duke of Normandy (whome he had so much wronged in his youth) makes his peace with Hugh, yeelding him the homage which hee had denied, with promise to obey him.

Hauing thus fortified the authority of his Soueraigne command, he passed vnto the go-uernment of the realme, and to make this voluntary obedience (so well begun) more pleasing to his new subiects, he calls an assembly of the cheefe of the Realme, and giues them all to vnderstand that his desire was to haue their aduice, for the well gouerning of the State. Necessary spake, and his proceeding did winne the most violent. Hauing renewed their homages,

A he sets downe the order of the twelue Peeres of France, and protests vnto them all, that he will not doe any thing of importance either in peace or warre without their aduice. So as in yeelding, he did aduance himselfe with a wife and victorious modesty. By the most ancient institutiō, the cheefe charge ouer armes, belonged to the Mayre of the Pallace, to the which Martel added the authority of Duke of France. But these two great charges, gaue a sufficient testimony, how much this great authority did import, to counter-balance and checke the soueraigne authority of Kings: and Hugh him-selke was both a witnessse and iudge of that which he had done in the execution of this charge, being in a manner royall. He therefore resolues to suppress it, and to bury it in an honorable tombe. He fees many competitors, and takes thereby an occasion to discover his intent, declaring to the greatest of his nobility, how happy he was in his raigne, hauing the choise of so many persons worthy of this great dignity: but finding himselfe bound to all, he knew not to whom he was most indebted: and was so affected vnto them all, as he could not say, to whome he wished best. And therefore to satisfie all his good friends, he had bethought him-selke of an expedient. That his sonne (whome nature had giuen him, and France had nourished and brought vp for her feruice) should be the person, to content all his friendes in the execution of this charge, which should be with the title of a royalty.

All the Noblemen (which would haue endured it of an other impatiently) embraced this speech willingly, the which preuented all ialousie, and cured the cheefe sore. So with one consent it was decreed, that Robert sonne to Hugh Capet, should bee his Lieutenant general, C and to that end should be anointed and crowned King: as he was at Rheims in the yeare 991.
three yeares after his fathers election. A wise Prince, and of a temperate disposition, a well seasoned plant for the fruitfull continuance of this latter raigne, of whome it is said, that he was a sonne without forwardnesse, a companion without ialousie, and a King without ambition.
So Hugh effected, 3. things by this wise proceeding. Hee tooke away the breeding of future dangers, by restraining of so great a power: he suppressed all ialousie, and assured his owne estate in the person of his sonne.

But in burying thus honorably the name and apparent shew of this dignity, he confirmed an other, to reape the same frute: for it is a resolute maxime, that in a royalty, the first mo-uer of an estate, must be fortified with some neere instruments, with whome he may communicate some beames of his authority, to impart them to other inferiour motions, according D to their order. The Constable in old times, had no command but ouer the horse, either as great maister, or as generall vnder the charge of the Maior, as the name doth signifie. Hugh amplified this dignity, & in suppressing the name of Mayre, he gaue that authority to the other, for the which the Mayraltie had bene in old time instituted, referuing the frute, and preferuing France both from danger and feare of so great power, which might aduance the seruant aboue the master: yet this authority of Constable is very great, soueraigne ouer armes, vnder the Kings good pleasure, to command the men of warre, to take knowledge of their faults, and either to punish, or to pardon offences at his pleasure, to order battailes, to dispose of all things that concerne the souldier: and finally he keeps the Kings sword, for which the Constable doth him homage. Moreouer vnder this dignity Hugh appointed Marshalls to execute the Constables commands, as cheefe hands, and so by these two goodly institutions, the charge ouer armes continued in great credit, vnder the great light of the royall Maiesty.
He likewise fortified by new decrees the royall homages of Baron and Arrierbaron, instituted by Charlemagne: and to conclude, he made all those military orders, wherein France surpasseth all other nations, to be reduced to their ancient institution and right vfe. And as good lawes spring from bad manners, so Hugh (hauing carefully obserued the errors of former raignes) endeouored to redresse them, and to prevent the like inconueniences. The most dangerous error had bene the multiplicity of many soueraigne maisters, one King being sufficient for F a whole Realme, as one Sunne is for all the world. He therefore decrees, that hereafter the title of King should not be giuen but to the eldest, who should haue soueraigne power, and commaunde ouer his brethren, and they should respect him as their Lord and father, hauing no portions but his good fauour, as for the lands which their elder should assigne vnto them for their portions, they should hold them of the Crowne, to do homage, and to be augmented and diminished as the Kings good pleasure. The aduancements of Kings bastards had much interested the State, onely be resicted from the crowne, but also from the surname of France, the which was before al- lowed them. To him like-wise are due the goodly ordinances of Iustice, and of the treasor, wherein without doubt France excels, so as they be well executed, according to the institutions of that golden age. Thus by these wise decrees, he preuailed more then all the armes of his Predecessors, in preserving a great Monarchy vnto this day: supported with these goodly Lawes and ordinances, wherein (without flattering the truth) we may see by the effects that which the most learned Academicke doth represent but in discourse, touching the true and perfect pattern of a well gouerned State, vnder the fatherly authority of a King, reueren B ced by the hereditary Law of his race, with the free consent of the people, confirmed by the Estates, counterballanced by the authority royall, determined by the liberty of those which owe him voluntary obedience. The continuance of ciuill warres had bred such disorders in all parts of the realme, as it was not without cause, (if men which liued in these miseries) said that God had sent Hugh to restore the French Monarchy, and they auouch predictions, and prophecies of this raigne, as Oracles. Doubtlesse this masse of building, was too huge to continue long against so great a storme. God made vse of it for a time, as he had wisely decreed, that is to say, to deliuer the west from the blasphemies and furies of Mahomet, and there to preserve his Church. But it was necessary this power should be limited within his bounds, to the end it might be well gouerned, and in the end, giue some rest vnto Christen- C dome. This happened in his raigne, as if the building had then taken a firme and sure foundation.

Warre had raigned too long, and ruined the poore subiects to enrich men of warre, who being seized of the strongest places, had without doubt deuoured one an another, and ruined the realme, if a greater authority had not shewed it selfe to maintaine euery one in peace vnder the reuenance of the Lawes, in the bosome of one common country. This confused warrelike season, had more need of a wise man to saue what was gotten, then of a valiant man and active to make new conquests. Such was Hugh Capet, a wise Prince, aduised, experienced, resolute, neither dull, nor a coward, (as he made prooue in the beginning of his raigne against the rebels.) And whereas he parted with the Crowne-lands so easily, to such D as were seized thereon, seeming thereby to haue blemished the greatnesse of his State, it was like vnto one which had much land lying wast, and had let it to farmers at an easie rent, yet remaining alwaies master thereof with power to seaze on it againe at his pleasure: else al had bin lost for want of good husbandry, in so great and confused an abundance: for Hugh Capet leauing to the possessors that which he could not take from them, assured the Crowne lands by certaine homages, and preserved the royall authority throughout the Realme. And that which was profitable and necessary for the State, proued the most easie, for the gouernours of the provinces and strong places, hoping to hold that which they had in hand, desired rather to obey a King with any title auailable to them and theirs, then to play the petty kings at their pleasures, & commaund absolutely alone for a while, and ouer few, and be in danger E to lose all as vsurpers. A notable prooue of the Frenchmens humors, borne to obey a king, & not able to subsist but vnder a royalty. The French had no lesse power then the Germaines, to make an electiue common weale, as they had done, but their humor forced with an hereditary royalty, without the which they could not subsist. Thus Hugh Capet had settled his raigne with so great wisdom and authority, and was so fortunate in the successe, as we may iustly say, he restored the Realme of France, when it was almost ruined, hee raigned nine yeares, four alone, and five with his sonne Robert, in great peace, beloued and honoured of all men.
France (as after a long and tedious winter) puts on the new face of a pleasant spring. All men honoured him, as the meanes of their assured rest. His most vsuall retreat was to Paris, the which was greatly augmented and beautified in his raigne, whereas other Kings before F him remained in diuerse places, at Aix la Chapelle, Compiene, Laon, Soissons and elsewhere, according to occurrents and their humors.

We haue sayd, that Arnulphe bastard to Lothaire, was the onely man which had fauored
Charles of Lorraine against Hugh Capet. The history notes this man to be peruerse, and dis-loyall, hauing deceiued both Charles of Lorraine, and Hugh Capet, who had giuen him the

A Archbishopricke of Rouan, in recompence of the seruice he promised him against Charles, 995.
to whom notwithstanding (contrarie to his faith) he gaue meanes to cease vpon the citties of Rheims, Laon, and Soissons. Hugh taking this presumption for a preiudice to come, learning by what had passed, how much the name of a bastard of France might import, for a colour to disquiet the State, and what danger there was of trouble, in the beginning of his new raigne, not yet well settled, he therefore resolues to suppress Arnulphe: but respecting his qualitie, he assembled a nationall Councell of the French Church, in the Cittie of Rheims.
This assembly deposeth Arnulphe, as guiltie of treason, and a troubler of the publicke quiet, and they substitute Gilbert in his place, who had beene Schoolemaster vnto Robert.
B Afterwards Hugh confines him to Orleans with Charles, there to end his daies in rest.
Pope John the 12. very ill satisfied with Hugh, for that he had not appealed to him for his cofirmation in this new royalty, disanuls this decree of the Councell at Rheims, excommunicates the Bishops which had assisted, restores Arnulphe, and depriues Gilbert from the Arch-bishopricke of Rouan, and to temper this sharpe and rough proceeding with some sweetnes, he doth inuest Gilbert in the Archbishopricke of Rauenna. But we shall presently see, that this was a meanes to raise him to the dignitie of Pope. Hugh doth not for all this contend with Pope John, but hauing restored Arnulphe, he tooke from him all meanes of troubling the State to his preiudice. It is that Pope John, of whom Platina writes so plainly, as the wise reader may finde in the originall it selfe: where he shall reade with admiration, not only the depraued manners of that man, raised to so great a dignitie, whome he disgraceth as a C monster, tearing him most lewd, most wicked and most pernicious. These are his verie words: but also the confusions which rained in those times: for we reade of nothing but partialities and factions, one to expell another, and all to ouerthrow the authoritie of the Emperour of Rome. All these practises were not made without bitter and long contentions:
as the historie shall note the occurrents: and this my Inuentorie shall be but a simple direction to the Originalls, whereas (the pure truth speaking more freely) the reader may peruse it without passion.

Here beganne the great iarres and contentions betwixt the Emperours and Popes. The ancient custome of the Catholike Church, practised from Constantine the Great, the first D Christian Emperour, was, That the Emperour should be President in the election of all bishops, euen of the Bishop of Rome. The Popes would not allow the Emperour should hold this prerogative ouer them, since the time that Boniface the 3. tooke vpon him the name and preheminence of Vniuersall Bishop: but were chosen without licence from the Emperour. John had held the Pontificall sea by vnlawfull meanes, and did leade a dissolute life, to the discontent of many: for the redresse whereof the Emperour Otho comes to Rome, and vpon complaints, (hauing laboured to reclaim this man to his dutie whom he found incorrigible) in the end he calles a Councell within Rome, where by a decree of this Assembly John the 12.
was deposed, and Leo 8. substituted in his place. But the Emperour is scarce gone out of Rome, when as behold new factions. Leo the 8. being chosen by his order, is expelled by disorder, and Benedict the 5. seated in his place. Otho returns and restoreth Leo, who vpon this E occasion made a decree: That in executing the ancient rule of discipline, which giues the election to the people and Clergie, The power to choose and consecrate the Pope, and to rule things belonging to the Apostolike sea, and confirme the Bishops, should belong vnto the Emperour, as the head and first moderator of discipline. So the remedie was well expounded, but not well applied: for after the restitution of Leo, they number seuen Popes, John the 14. Benedict 6. Donus
2. Boniface 7. Benedict 7. Gregory 5. and John 15. which were one after another placed and displaced by feditiion, either expelled, or imprisoned or strangled: vntill that Gilbert Archbishop of Rauenna (of whome we haue spoken) came to be Pope, being named Siluester the
2. He was brought in after so strange a manner, as I haue horror to reade Platina, who saies, F it was by deuillish arts. But the wise reader may view the rest of this troublesome report in the author himselfe, altogether vnreproueable, being a confident seruant to the Popes: and so may ease vs of this tedious toyle. Such was the Empire and the sea of Rome, amidst these horrible confusions, whilst that our Capet labored to repaire the breaches of this new kingdome. Hauing raigned peaceably nine yeares, he died the 22. of Nouember in the yeare 996.

He had him by Adelars the daughter A of Edward King of England in whome he was so happie, as not onely to see him of age, but also crowned King, and well married. He raigned both alone and accompanied with his son, beloued and honoured of him and his subiects, if euer father and Prince were. A patterne of a great Statesman, comming to the last fit of a desperate disease, whereunto he applied such seasonable remedies, as he might well be called the Restorer of the French Monarchie. But from him we must ascend to God, the true gardien of this estate, meaning to preserue it by his care and wisdom, who gouernes changes by his wise prouidence, and giues vertues and succeffe at his pleasure.

The Monar-
che of France
of greater continuance then euer any.

Now we begin a new raigne, a wiser, more happie, and longer, then the two precedent, B whereof the one continued but three hundred and twentie yeares, and the other two hundred thirtie eight: and this vnto Lewis the 13. now rainging, hath continued 623. yeares, so counting the date of it, first beginning from the yeare 420. making of all these particulars one grosse summe, from the yeare of our Redeemers comming into the world, we shall find in all 1610. yeares inclsuue. A terme which no State euer attained vnto. It is true, that the bounds of this Monarchie shall not be so large, as vnder Charlemagne, yet better limited: and although it seemes that Hugh Capet (in yeelding the propertie of the Crowne lands vnto the Gouernours of places) did diminish it: yet in effect he did augment it, in assuring the Crown by this good husbandrie, beeing extraordinarie, yet very conuenient in such extreame necessitie; and since, all that which seemed to be dismembred, is returned from whence it came. C We must therefore set before our eyes, all this great Monarchie, imparted to diuers Lords, and the royall authoritie ouer all, as the head ouer the whole bodie, which hath diuers members: giuing life and force to euery part, to exercise his proper function: we shall see in order (as things haue fallen out) the greatest part of those Prouinces which were made hereditarie by this conuention of Capet, returne to the Crowne againe. The which I will labour to effect, so long as the light shall guide me in the diuersitie of these changes.

We shall now enter into a more temperate raigne then the two former. We shall not see so many armies in field, so many victories, nor so many conquests; neither shall we see so many audacious and infamous outrages, so many murders and parricides; so many vnnaturall cruelties of children against the father; of brethren against brethren, of husbands against D their wiues, and of wiues against their husbands: we may well note and obserue diseases, but neither so dangerous nor so tedious, as haue beene played on the theater of horrible tragedies in former raignes. Doubtlesse as the bodie and mind haue their proper diseases, so hath the estate of mankind. Man cannot be alwaies sound, nor alwaies pleasant: his bodie and mind haue their passions in their seasons, according to the degrees which God hath prescribed them by the course of nature. Likewise the changes are remarkable in all this Monarchie: but this raigne iudiciously considered, we may admire the notable proofes of Gods prouidence, who would fortifie this estate, for the preseruatiō of his Church in Europe, whereof France is a notable member, and doth import much to all other nations. The Historie therefore of this third raigne is most worthie of memorie: for the vse whereof we may obserue three famous parts, to helpe the iudgement and memorie. The first from Hugh Capet E to Philip of Valois: where began the controuersie of the English against the French, long and lamentable for the pretension to the Crowne of France. The second from that raigne, to Henry the third, the last King of that branch of Valois. The third begins at Henry the 4. the first of the most noble race of Bourbon. This Inuentorie shall faithfully and briefly quote the particularities of these last raignes, to send the Reader to the whole Historie, to the which we leaue him.

An order for the vse of this third raigne.

ROBERT

ROBERT alone of that name, the 37.
King of France.

The Raigne of Robert long &
hipple.

ROBERT began to raigne alone, in the yeare 996. and raigned 33. yeeres. He had three sonnes, Hugh, Robert, and Henry, by his wife Constance, the Daughter of William Earle of Arles. Following the example of his father Hugh, he desired to assure the Crowne in his house, installing his heire in the right purchased to him and his, by a decree of the States. So he crowned Hugh his eldest sonne at Compeigne, in the yeare 1028. But God (who was wiser then Robert) determined to call Hugh to a better crowne, for soone after he dyed: being dead, Robert continued in the same desseigne, to assure his estate in his house: and ob- serving a more royall disposition in the younger, then in the elder, he preferred vertue before the prerogative of elderhip: causing Henry the younger to be crowned in his life time: de- creeing by his will, that Robert should content himselfe with the Duchie of Bourgogne, do- ing homage for it to the Crowne of France.

Robert prefers
Henry his younger sonne to the Crowne
before the elder.

Robert dies,
his disposition

So having happily disposed of his affaires, and raigned with the generall content of his subiects, he dyed in the yeare 1031. beeing threescore yeares old. A Prince very fitte for the time, being wise, resolute, peaceable, and continent. But Pietie was the Crowne of all his vertues, and the knowledge of Diuinitie seasoned with learning one of the flowers of this goodly Crowne: for he is commended to haue bene very deuout, and to haue loued both Diuinitie and Humanitie. They sing hymnes of his inuention, and namely, that which is to the honour of holy Martyrs, which begins, O constantia Martyrum mirabilis, the which bearing resemblance with the name of his wife Constance, he was wonderfully pleased with the humor she had to be honoured with his writings, beeing then greatly esteemed throughout the world.

Wise Kings and of long life happy for an estate.

There is nothing more dangerous in an Estate then the change of diuers masters: as ex- perience hath taught in former raignes. So God, who meant to confirme the Monarchie in this Race, gaue a long and a happie life to their first Kings, issued from Capet, without any sudden

A sudden change from reigne to reigne. For Robert reigned three and thirty yeares: Henry his sonne as much, Philip his sonne nine and forty yeares, Lewis the seuenth forty foure, Le- wis the ninth called Saint Lewis as much. All wise Princes, moderate, valiant, peaceable and happy. As good houses are settled, euen so Kingdomes are confirmed. As when one good husband succeeds an other, adding wealth to wealth, new vpon old, houses then grow great: euen so the long life of these good and wise Princes, was continued with much hap- py successe, as we shall see in euery reigne.

This in particular is remarkable in the reigne of Robert. We haue sayd, the realme was diuided, as it were to many masters. As there is small respect amongst equals, who seeth in France? But Robert did so firmly gouerne the helme of this great barke in the midst of the tempestuous seas of French humors, as hee controulled all such as sought to free them- selves from the crowne: whose authority by this meanes was great, by the obedience which he forced all them to yeeld that would plaie the mutines. He entertained the amity his fa- ther had with Richard Duke of Normandy, confirmed by alliance, and for that there was iea- lousie betwixt him and Otho Earle of Chartres, hee could wisely make his profit of them both. In the beginning of his reigne one Gautier gouernour of Melun told the place to the Earle of Chartres about named, according to the manner of confused times. At the complaint of Bourchard (to whom the towne belonged,) the King commanded Otho to re- store it vnto him, who refused to obey. Robert sets the Normand against him, who han- dles him in such sort, as in the end the Earle humbles himselfe vnto the King, and deliue- rs vp both the place and marchant, who was hanged.

Robert main-

rity.

He suppresseth the seditious.

Henry brother to Hugh Capet was Duke of Bourgogne, by the deccasse of his brother Otho. Henry then died, and so Bourgogne returned to the crowne. But passion perfwad- ing Landry Earle of Neuers to make a benefit of his right of neighbour-hood, and time in- uiting him to imbrace this occasion to fish in a troubled water, hee seized on Auxerre by in- telligence. But he was decciued, to thinke this a time wherein all things were lawfull: for Robert goes presently to field with his army, and besiegeth Auxerre, where this ill-aduited Landry was: but the Inhabitants open their gates to the King, and deliuer Landry into his hands. All the Auxerrois obey, except Auallon, which after a few daies yeelds, and in the end all Bourgogne. Landry guilty of treason, suffers an easie punishment for his rash- nesse. Having confessed his fault, hee obtainer pardon of Robert, promising all future obedience.

Thus Robert beeing master of Bourgogne, hee giues it to Robert his eldest sonne. But Robert doubly interessed (his younger being preferred, and hee hauing a very small part in the State) was not pleased with this portion. Bourgogne, was then distinguished into a Duchie and County, whereof the County belonged to the Empire, and the Duchie to the Realme, according to the diuision made by the Children of Lewis the gentle. At that time Henry the second Duke of Bauaria, surnamed the holy, held the Empire. Lorraine was the ordinary cause of debate betwixt France and Germany. Robert (to end this contro- uersie) meetes with Henry at a place called Enol, vpon the riuer of Cher, and made an ac- cord with him, the which continues to this day. At that time Goshelon brother to the Earle of Ardenne held Lorraine.

Lorraine.

Herevpon the hatred betwixt the Duke of Normandy and the Earle of Chartres kind- led in such sort (by the yeelding vp of Melun) as they assembled their friends on all sides. The Normand calls his farthest friends to his succors, Logman King of Sweden and Olane King of Norway his kinsmen. But Robert pacified this quarrell in time, by his wisdom, shewing by the effect, how much authority imploied in time may preuaile, and that wee must speedily quench a small fire, the which neglected burnes a whole forest. There were great peronages in all Prouinces with hereditary power, according to the grant made by Hugh Capet. In Normandy Richard the third, in Aniou Jeffroy Grisegonelle, in Guienne William, of the race of Pepin sonne to Lewis the Gentle, in Languedoc Cont Mathew, in Champagne and Touraine Odo, all great and valiant men, with other worthy peronages throughout the Realme: all which were rash men and of high attempts, but the name and roiall authority of Robert, contained all these great and courageous spirits within the bounds bounds of their duty & publike respect. And so this reigne passed quietly without any great tumults. Leaving a lesson for Princes, to ioyne wisdom with authority, and valour with mildnesse: it being as great a conquest to preferue his owne, as to get an other mans, and to vanquish mens mindes by reason, as by force. A patterne in these two reignes, of the meanes to restore an Estate, dismembred by the disorders of ciuill warres.

HENRY the first, the 38. King of France.

Henries reign.

HENRY, being in possession of the realme during the life of his father, succeeded him in the year, 1031. and reigned 33. yeares. He had two sonnes, Philip and Hugh, by Anne the daughter of George, or Gautier the Sclauon King of the Russians, & one daughter, the which was married to Robert Duke of Normandy, sonne to that Richard of whom we haue discoursed.

The beginning of his reigne, was rough & vnquiet, and the end more milde and successful. But Henry in the preservation of this Estate, did nothing degenerate from the wisdom & dexterity of his father. The cause of this hard entry, was the brothers portion, apparently vnequall and preiudiciall, although a wise father had so decreed it. Queene Constance, mother to these two Princes brethren, nourished this dislike, supporting Robert against Henry, that is to say, the elder against the yongest, as oftentimes mothers haue the like humours, to loue one more then an other. The cause was plausible, that it was against the law, use, and customes of France, that the yonger should be preferred before the elder in a royalty. The parties were great for Robert, Constance mother to the King, Baldwin Earle of Flanders, and Odo Earle of Champagne, a buisie man and rash. For the King, the royall maiesty, the will of his father, the forces of the Realme, and (amongst all) those of Robert Duke of Normandy. The armies approach ready to fight, when as behold Robert (for whose interest the question was) beeing a Prince of a milde and quiet disposition, giues his mother and friends (who had brought forces to his aide) to vnderstand, that hee would not bee the

brethren.

ther.

A cause to shed Frenchmens blood: and that Bourgongne should suffice him, seeing his father had so decreed. Vpon this declaration of Robert, Queene Constance changeth her minde, and sends backe her troupes, imbracing peace with her children. The armies were dismissed, and an agreement ratified betwixt Henry and Robert, who liued like brethren and good friends: That Bourgongne should remaine to Robert and his successors, with the title of a fealty to France, (which they call Peere) and to be Deane among the Peeres. Thus Robert of France enioyed Bourgongne, and left it hereditary to his heires successiue, vntil the reigne of John, in the year 1360.

But the Countries of Bourgongne and Normandy were the cause of much trouble in those times, during the which he kept the stakes, not onely as a spectator, but as an vsurper. This Odo Earle of Champagne (who had incensed his brother against him) lookt for a good part in Bourgongne, & had already won Robert to promise him the towne of Sens, who euen vpon the accord making had seized thereon: but being easily expelled by the Kings authority, he runnes an other course, to loose both himself and what he had, supposing to vsurpe an other mans Estate.

He held vnder the Crowne, Champagne, Touraine and the County of Chartres. He had two sonnes, Stephen and Thibault: yet he sought to ioyne Bourgongne to his other Estates, which was the cause of great troubles. We haue before made mention of Boson the husband of Hermingrade, daughter to Lewis the sonne of Lewis the Gentle, who had the Realme of Bourgongne and Italy. He had two sonnes, Ralph and Lewis. Lewis was ouerthrowne by Beranger Duke of Friul, who easily seized on that, which remained in Italy, and of Prouence; as lying nere, and of easie access: Ralph had the rest of Bourgongne, the County, Sauoy and Daulphine, for the Duchy of Bourgongne remained to the Crowne of France. From this Ralph, sprong Lewis; and from Lewis another Ralph, who liued during the reigne of Henry, being old, without children, and ill obied of his subiects.

He had two sisters, the one married to Conrade surnamed the Salique, Duke of Francony, who was Emperor: and another to the Earle of Champagne, father to this Odo, who seekes to perswade Ralph his vnkle to make him his heire, as sonne to his eldest sister: and imploies the fauour of many subiects, who desired rather a neighbour then a stranger to be their Prince. But Ralph preferred Conrade before Odo, and sent him his testament, his crown, and Scepter, instituting Henry his sonne and his Nephew his heire generall. Conrade made warre in Hongary. Odo imbraceth this occasion, and (seeing him thus busied) he enters into Bourgongne, where he takes certaine cities: the rest hold at Conrades deuotion, being called to the inheritance: but these designs were soone cut off. For behold the Emperor Conrad returns with a goodly and victorious army, who not onely recouers againe the Cities of Bourgongne that were lost, but also takes some in Champagne, so as Odo doth with great difficulty hold Troies: he is forced to seeke by humble petitions to his vnkle, who giues him his owne, and forbids him to take from another. The Earle being thus suppressed, Conrad parles with King Henry, and ratifies the ancient accords, for the diuiding of Bourgongne, whereof we haue spoken.

Odo Earle of Champagne, seekes to seize vpon the County of
Bourgongne.

From that time, the Germanie Emperours challenged the right and title of the realme of Arles, which the Emperor Charles the first shall alienate; and shall be soone diuided into sundry principalities, as wee shall shew in their places. Thus the Realme of Bourgongne had an end in the posterity of Boson, the Emperor Conrade being forced to goe into Italy; after all these treaties, to redresse the confusions which grew dayly. Behold Odo reuiues the warre more furiously then before, and enters Lorraine with a strong army, but his enterprise fell vpon his owne head. For Gothelon Duke of Lorraine (confirmed by the Emperor) defeats him, burying his ambition and his life in one graue, and thus much for Bourgongne.

Normandy gaue no lesse cause of employment to Henry; Robert Duke of Normandy had mainteyned the hereditary loue of his father with the King, greatly relying vpon his friendship. Having resolved a long and dangerous voiage to the holy Land, he intreated him to affect the protection of William his bastard sonne, whom he had made his heire, excluding his lawfull children. This testament seemed vnreasonable to all men: but Robert had settled his Estate before his departure, appointing him good Governours, and putting the strongest places, and treasure into their hands: so as William remained Conueror after his death which, 1061. which happened in this long voiage beyond the seas. But this was not without great difficulties, in the which Henry kept the stakes, ballancing both parties with his authority. William remaining the stronger, Normandy had some rest, beeing freed from men of warre by this occurrent. A gallant troupe of warriors, weary to liue at home; and desirous to see the world, led by Robert and Guscard valient Gentlemen, seeking their fortunes, came into Italy: where they are imploied in priuate quarrells, and there get so great reputation, as by their example, they drew many to the same voiage: and an other notable swarme of braue fouldiers are led thither by Tancred, a man very famous for this aneigne, the partialities of Italy giue them occasions and meanes to feize vpon Pouille, Calabria, and Sicilia, as the history describes at large, this briefly may suffice to note the Estate of this reigne. Thus Henry passeth his reigne amidst these troubles, beeing too light to shake the body of an Estate, following the example of his Grandfather, and Father, hee causeth Philip his sonne to bee crowned King, beeing but seuen yeares old: and gaue him Baldwin Earle of Flanders for Tutor and regent of the Realme. He liued little after his Coronation, the which he hastened by reason of his indisposition, and so hee died siue and fifty yeares old, in the yeare 1061. Beloued and lamented of all his subiects, whom hee intreated with much mildnesse some yeares before his death: the beginning of his reigne being disquieted with the feare of ciuill dissention, and the end crowned with a plentiful rest.

Happy success of the Norman in Italy.

PHILIP the first, the 39 King of France.

Baldwin Regent in Philip's minority.

According to King Henry's decree, Baldwin Earle of Flanders, tooke vpon him the gouernment of young King Philip's person, (already confirmed by his coronation,) and of the affaires of the realme with quietnesse: hauing the reputation of a good and wise man, although hee were not pleasing to them all. For certaine Noblemen of Gascony did crosse him, charging him with ambition, as if he would make himselfe a King, like to other Regents, whereof the memory was yet fresh in all Frenchmens mindes. But

A But his integrity and wisdom (preserving his credit with the greatest part of the French) gaue him meanes to subdue the rebellious Gascons, who made this their pretence, to fish in a troubled streame, during the minority of the yong King.

Baldwin doth not winke at this repulse, neither doth he suffer it to passe unpunished, hee armes wisely, with a shew to goe against the Sarazins, which sometimes did ouer-run the frontiers of France, bordering vpon Spaine. This zeale hauing moued many to accompanie him, hee punished the rebels in Gascony, and prevented many which beganne to mutine in sundry places of the realme, as shall appeare in the future reignes. It is the ordinary ebbing and flowing of worldly things, in the impatience of the French, neuer to liue

B long in one estate. Wee haue now passed about seuentie yeares in peace, in these three reignes: this Prince shall adde forty nine more of great tranquility to this realme. But setting before our eyes the horrible confusions in other parts, it doth shew vs plainly the occasions, whereby the disease grew in the State, which in the end bred to long and dangerous a feauer by ciuill warre. For why doth a history represent vnto vs the effect knowne vnto all men, if it touch not the causes and motiues of these great euents, the which succeed not presently, but by degrees, as a clocke which carried by contrary motions strikes the houre at the time appointed amongst all the minutes. This iudgement is necessary for the right vse of what we reade. The Kings minority passed quietly by the wise gouernment of Baldwin, who hauing accompanied his pupill to the age of fifteene yeares, leaves

C him his temporall realme in peace, and seeks an eternall crowne in heauen: being greatly lamented of the good, leauing a memorable example of a good tutor to a King, and a wise Regent of a realme. Philip takes in hand the helme of the Estate, beholding from a safe harbour the stormes of other nations, which exceed in pernicious furies, not foreseeing the seeds cast by himselfe in the bosome of his owne realme, and that his example giues liberties to his subiects to the like disorder.

A wise Prince, but disloyall, taking couetousnesse and ambition for his Councillors, seeking onely his owne profit, and contemning that plaine simplicitie, which had purchased so much happinesse to his father and grand-fathers, and to himselfe a respectiue credit with all the French, and immortall praise to his posterity. A looking glasse for Kings and Princes

D without any deceit, wherein they may view the true causes of the happinesse of their Estates. Flanders, England and Italy, began first before that France entred, who shall act a long and tedious part vpon this stage. Baldwin of whom we haue made mention, left two sonnes, Baldwin and Robert, with their mother Richilde. Their vncke Robert the Frison pretended the inheritance to belong vnto him: or at the least the gardianship of his Nephews. Richilde and the States opposed to both his demands; so as they grew to words, and then to warre. King Philip (as their soueraigne) ought to be Iudge to compound their quarrells, but he labors to kindle them, seeking his owne profit in these garboiles. Robert the Frison procures him with promises to do what he pleased. He winnes him and gets a promise to be succoured against the right of his Nephews. But Richilde mother to these pupills, knowing the Kings humour, goes vnto him to crosse Robert's designs, who brought nothing but words. This woman brought money with her good behauiour, and wonne him against

E Robert, who discontent with the King, assembles his other meanes, goes to field with his army, and gets part of the Country: Richilde flies to Philip, who comes himselfe with a very great army, and enters Flanders. His meaning was to make a benefit of their common quarrell. But it fell out otherwise, by his prouidence who doth pul downe one and raise vp another, alwaies iustly, although the causes bee vnknowne vnto vs. Robert defeats the King and his Nephews. After this victory hee is receiued Earle of Flanders without any discontent of the King for the distressed pupills: who relying no more on him, fled for succor to Thierry Bishop of Liege: who makes an accord. That Robert the Frison should haue

F the Earldome of Flanders, and giue his Nephews some recompence. After this peaceable possession of the Earldome of Flanders, Philip became a deere friend to Robert, forgetting the good offices hee had receiued from his tutor; measuring friendship by profit. Such was then the State of Flanders. England had a greater change: wee haue sayd that Robert Duke of Normandy had instituted William his bastard sonne his heire; and that hee had gotten possession of the Duchy, but behold a greater happinesse attends him. 1261. King of England hauing receaued much kindnesse from him, and knowing him fit for the gouernment of the realme, names him his heire by his testament, by vertue whereof (notwithstanding all the policy and force, that Harould, brother to the Queene could vie) William is receaued King of England, and crowned in a sollemne assembly of the English, homage is done vnto him, as to their lawfull Lord: and this great dignity continued in his posterity. Phillip sees this new increafe of power impatiently, yet can he not prevent it, for God hath prepared it as a rod to correct this realme, by the three sons which William left to succeed in his Estates, Robert, William and Henry. Ambition is the Lewaine of these warres, it shewed it selfe soone after the birth of this new power growen to the Dukes of Normandy, (whose first breeding wee haue seene in the second race) by the increafe of the realme of England.

Contentions in Italy betwixt the Emperour and Popes.

The Popes usurpation.

Strange contentions betwixt the Emperour and Pope.

Robert and Henry the sonnes of William, come to the King at Conflans vpon Oise. As they play at Chess with Lewis the sonne of King Phillip, there fell some contention among these young Princes, and from iniurious words, they fell to blowes: Lewis called Henry the sonne of a Bastard, Henry struck at him with the Chess-board, and had slaine him if Robert had not itayed him. This blow being giuen, Robert and Henry made all hast to saue them-selues in Normandy: where they incensed both heauen and earth with their complaints. From this light beginning, grew all the troubles which disquieted these two Estates during foure hundred yeares, vpon diuers occasions. Robert and Henry being escaped, the fathers so embrace the quarrell for their children, as they fall to armes. Phillip goes to field, and takes Vernon depending of Normandy. Robert goes out of Normandy and doth seaze vpon Beauuois. King William parts from England, and lands in France, with a great and mighty power, and inuades Xaintonge and Poitou. Behold the first checke of a dangerous game. Phillip moued with these losses, enters into Normandy with a great and mighty army: but hee cures not one wound in making of another. William on the other side, ouer-runnes and spoyles all the Country, euen vnto the gates of Paris, where hee entred not then, but his posterity did after him. Hee dyes soone after, but the quarrell suruiued in his children, who augmented this hereditary hatred in many sorts.

While they beganto weaue this web, Italy was in no better estate, being full of horrible combutions, and the cause was so much the more lamentable, for that the mischief came from them, from whome all good was to be expected. Wee haue formerly spoken of the diuisions growne betwixt the Emperours and the Popes of Rome, for their prehem-nences. In all ancient times the Popes were subiect and to bee summoned before the Emperour, who had authority to create them, and to depose them that were vnworthy of their charges: to call Synods, and to confirme all things which concerned the outward gouernment of the Church. The Pope on the other side maintaines, that all this authority was his, as vniuersall Bishoppe, hauing power to bind and loose, and to iudge of all men, and all causes, as the soueraigne Iudge of the Church, not to bee iudged by any man: and so to dispose absolutely of all matters, as well Ecclesiasticall as Ciuill, as Monarch in the Church, not onely armed with power of excommunication to damne rebels, and authority to remit finnes: but hauing also the temporall sword, with soueraigne authority ouer Emperours, Kings and Princes of the earth, to place and displace, and to dispose of their estates.

Hereafter we shall finde in euery raigne, some memorable example of this soueraigne authority. This raigne giues a very notable one. After the death of the Emperour Conrad called Sigismund, Henry the third of that name, (hauing happily gouerned the Empire) left it to his sonne Henry the fourth yet uery young, so as the Popes during this weakenesse of the Empire, had meanes to fortifie them-selues: and so embracing this occasion, Gregory the seauenth called Hildebrand, did prohibite the Emperour all authority ouer the Clergy, and forbad (vpon paine of excommunication) to haue any recourse vnto him for the collation of benefices, or for any thing else that depended on the Church. Henry moued with so great an affront, lets Gregory vnderstand, that this his decree was contrary to the ancient orders, and the vse of the Catholike Church. Vpon this reffusal, hee lets him know,

A that he will maintaine the rights of the Empire, and complains to the Clergie of Rome in an open assembly. Gregory calls an other, wherein he doth excommunicate Henry and all his adherents, and sends forth his Bull into all parts, whereby he declares him excommunicate and degraded of the Empire, and in his place causeth Rodolph Duke of Sueuia to be chosen Emperour.

Thus there growes two factions in Italy, and in Germany, one for the Emperour, and the other for the Pope: behold two armies leuiued of these factions, ready to shed Christians blood: nine battailes were giuen vpon the quarrell of these prehem-nences. In the end, Rodolph the new Emperour is taken and slaine by Godefroy of Bouillon, who followed the Emperour Henry the fourth: who after this victory, assembled a great Councell at Bresse, where as Gregory the seuenth is excommunicated, and Clement Bishop of Rauenna appointed to succeed him, they conduct him to Rome with an army, and take the City after a long siege; whereas the new Pope is sollemnly installed, and Henry the fourth Emperour restored by the decree of Clement. But this was not all, those which were opposite to the Emperour, chose in this place of Gregory, Vrbain the second, and their party growing strong, the confusions increased, opposing one Emperour against another, Herman of Luxembourg to Henry, and after him Egbert Marquis of Saxony: the which were taken by Henry, and slaine one after another. Vrbain hath other practises against Henry, he animates his owne sonne by his first wife against him, forcing all the lawes of nature. And as Henry had suppressed the practises of this his eldest sonne, Pope Paschal who succeeded Vrbain the second succeeds him euen in the like monstrous practises, incensing his other sonne Henry, whom the father intended to make Emperour, relying on him as his child, beloued aboue all the rest. So this sonne (bewitched by ill counsell) found meanes to seaze on his Father, depriuing him first of the Empire, and then of his life. The Pope added to this death a new disgrace, causing by his thundering Bulls, the body of Henry to be digged out of his graue. These were the fruites of their serious contentions, for prehem-nence not onely vnkowne to the ancient Church, nor practised by the Apostles, but expressly forbidden by the holy mouth of the sonne of God.

The Pope incenseth the sonne against the father, who takes from him both his Empire and his life.

The Popes malice against the Emperour being dead.

The Popes one after another (troubled with the crosses) had recourse vnto our Philip, so had Henry the fourth, being a prisoner to his son: but the respect of his common friends, made him to keepe the stakes, and to be a spectator of these lamentable confusions. And yet many orders were erected by the Popes; amidst these disorders, that of the regular Chanoinnes, for a difference of the secular; the Chartreux, Templers; Benedictines, and Carmelites. Thus Philip a witness of others miseries, reignes peaceably, during this age full of confusion, both in Church and State.

The Emperour had reduced these Realme of Bourgongne to the Imperiall iurisdiction, distinguished as wee haue sayd: but during these disorders, the whole body was dismembred, and reduced to an other forme; as when one is wearie of an old garment. The industrie of such as held the Cities and Country in their possession, made foure peeces of this garment. The one was for Otho of Flanders; which is the Countrie about Besancon, with the title of an Earledome; whereof it carries yet the name. The other for Berald of Saxony, who enioyed Sauoy. The third for Guigne the fatte Earle of Griefuauaudan, who from little, grew so great in the confusions of times, hauing taken the chiefe Townes of the Country, and in the end Grenoble the capitall City, as hee became absolute Lord of all that Prouince: the which hee called Daulphine, in fauour of his Sonne, who hauing married the Daughter of the Earle of Albion and Viennois, named Daulphiné, would carry the same name, holding himselfe honoured by so worthy an alliance. The fourth peece is Prouence, one of the goodliest and richest, both for the fertilitie of the Country, and commoditie of Ports, most conuenient in all the Mediterranean Sea: this was fallen into the hands of Berengers successors, by the meanes before specified.

The beginning of the States of Daulphine, Sauoy, Prouence, and Franche Comtee.

So the Empire lost the command of these foure Prouinces, which fell to foure diuers Lords, leauing yet in Daulphine some traces of the ancient name; without any effect, for they yet call it the Empire in their common language, as wee haue said else where.

Voyage to the holy land.

The motives of this enterprise.

The names of
such as went to the holy land.

But as during the reigne of our Philip these confusions were notable, so that great and renowned voyage to the Holy Land, made by our Argonautes Christians, is worthy to be carefully obserued. The proiect was to deliuer the Christians of Asia, tormented by the furious tyranie of the Mahometaines, and to repeople the land, the which God had honoured with the first fruites of his Church. This zeale of Christians was commendable. I would to God they had at this day changed their disordered passions, glutted with their owne blood, into so holy a resolution, vnting their mindes and forces against the common enemy of all Christendome. The occasion was giuen by a French Gentleman called Peter the Hermite, who hauing long trauelled in the East, and seene the miseries of the Christians among the Barbarians, the manners of the Leuantins, and the commodities and discommodities of the Prouinces of Asia, neere to the Holy Land: hee laide a plot with Simcon Patriarck of Ierusalem, to sollicit all Christian Kings and Princes, to imploy their forces for the conquest of the Holy land. The euent was answerable to the proiect: for beeing come to Rome to Pope Vrbain the second, hee did so well lay open the Estate and importance of this action, as beeing satisfied by him, hee resolved to inuite all the Kings, Princes, Potentates, States, Comonalties, Lords and Gentlemen of Christendome therewith. To this end hee calls a Councell, at Clermont in Auvergne, where hee assisted himselfe, and induced the whole assembly by his perswasions, with so great efficacy, as they resolved neither to spare their persons nor Estates, in the execution of so important a worke.

Godfrey of Bouillon, sonne to Eustace Earle of Boulogne vpon the sea, beeing Duke of Lorraine by his vnckle Godfrey the Crooke-backe, the sonne of Goshelon, a great and a generous Prince, offered himselfe the first to this expedition, and was chosen chiefe of this famous action. The Emperour and all Christian Princes, promised to contribute their meanes, some their persons. A troupe of all the selected Nobilitie of Europe, did willingly consecrate themselves. The most apparent were Eustace and Baldwin, brothers to Godfrey, Hugh the great, Earle of Vermandois, brother to Philip King of France, Robert the Frison Earle of Flanders. Robert the second sonne to William the Bastard, Duke of Normandie and King of England. Stephen Earle of Blois and Chartres, Aimar Bishop of Puy, William Bishop of Oranges, Raimond Earle of Tholose and Saint Gilles, Baldwin Earle of Hainault, Baldwin Earle of Rethel, Bohemond Duke of Apouille, Garnier Earle of Grez, Harpin Earle of Bourges, Ysaard Earle of Die, Rambaud Earle of Oranges, Vvilliam Earle of Forest, Stephen Earle of Aumal, Hugh Earle of Saint Pol, Rorron Earle of Perche, and many others, worthy to be registred in this Historie, I haue onely noted such as I could finde out.

All Europe was moued with this voyage, France, Germany, Italy, England, Scotland, Hongarie, Denmarke and Sueden: Spaine onely failed, beeing at that time much troubled to keepe their owne country from the Sarrazins, who were lodged euen in their bowels. France did contribute more then all the rest of Christendome. The zeale which moued these generous and valiant men, made them to hazard all, Dukes, Marquises, Earles, Barons, Knights, and Gentlemen, sold and ingaged their Seigneuries, to furnish themselves in this affected voyage, at what price soeuer. Godfrey of Bouillon, chiefe of the army, sold the Seigneury of Bouillon, to Aubert Bishop of Liege, and Metz to the Inhabitants: Robert Duke of Normandy, ingaged all his lands to his brother Vvilliam King of England: Herpin Earle of Berry, his Earledome to King Philip. A sale farre more honorable for the sellers then for the buiers.

There was a quarrell betwixt the children of Tancred the Norman (of whom wee haue spoken) who by his valour had conquered Sicilia, Calabria and Apulia) growne from light beginning. It seemed to be immortall, the question beeing betwixt wilfull Kinsmen; but this zeale did so pacifie their quarrels as they brought about twenty thousand braue men to the army, with their owne persons. In euery Towne there was nothing but men making their prouisions, the waies were full of souldiars, horses and baggage, which repaired to the Rendezvous; the Ports, Hauens, and seas swarmed with ships and vessels, to transport our generous Argonauts, they beeing guided with this holy zeale, to settle the

A State of Christians in the Holy Land. The number of the army is diuersly reported. Some write they were fixe hundred thousand fighting men, others restraine it onely to a hundred thousand. The first number were more likely, for what were that in Europe, but for our wretched dissensions? But that which they adde is to be considered. That many else well affected, were kept backe by reason of the dissensions betwixt the Emperours and Popes: so as Germany (a great nurserie of men of warre) sent very few: and Italy fewer, being dispensed with all by the Pope, who had ingaged others. See the ordinary fruites of home-bred quartels, the which fortifies the enemies of Christendome. Some writers of iudgment adde, that Pope Vrbain did cunningly vse the Christians zeale, to weaken the Emperour and his Partisans, that he might preuaile with more facility, causing them to march in this action, and retaining such as were at his deuotion. This is their opinion as the wise reader may verifie in their places. The sequell will shew that this voyage did nothing mortifie the quarrell, betwixt the Emperour and the Pope, the which was reuiued after a tragicke manner. We follow the traces of truth as euery thing hath succeeded. Here wee discourse of the beginning and motives of this warre, we shall see the end and issue of this great preparation. Let vs returne to the hauen to our Argonauts, the trumpets sound, they are all ready to set saile.

Godfrey diuided his army into three fleets, making the Rendezvous at Constantinople, whether he had sent his Ambassadors to Alexis Emperour of Greece, who entring into ialousie of so great an army, made some difficulty to grant him ports: yet in the end he yeelded, and gaue him an honorable entertainment. The departure of these Christian adventurers was in the year 1096. the first day of Aprill. Behold our Latins arriued in safe port, (thus hereafter we shall call them, to distinguish them from the Greekes being Christians, and friends: and the Turkes Leuantins enemies) They vndertooke no small worke, neither went they to take possession of an empty inheritance, the Turkes and Mahometains their enemies, were Lords of Asia, from the realme of Pontus (towards the Mediterranean sea) vnto Hellespont: after they had expelled the Greekes, ouerthrowne the forces of the Caliphes of Babilon and Egipt, and had seized on Palestina, Iudea and all the rest of the Kingdom of Israell, from the entry of the holy Land vnto Libanus: Ierusalem was in their hands. Their Estate (springing from weake beginnings) encreased daily. Soliman Belchiarac was their fift Sultan or Emperour, who quickned with so hot a sommoms of Christians, assembled his forces together, stood vpon his gard, and prepared to fight.

Godfrey (taking the aduice of Alexis, Emperour of Greece, who made shew to imploy all his meanes to aduance the common cause) resolved to passe vnto Chalecdone, and beginning with the cities of Asia to make his passage more easie. He had sent Peter the Hermit before, the first trumpet of this warre, with Gautier (who was a better souldiar) and some troupes to discouer the Country, but both together making scarce one good Captaine, suffred themselves to be beaten by the Turkes: so as Godfrey sends in their place one called Reynauld or Raimond, who makes profession to know the Country, but hee speeds worse, suffering himselfe to be beaten by the Turkes, and to saue his life, hee renounced the Christian religion, abandoning all that had followed him to the slaughter. This was foretelling of ill successe. The army marching by Asia the lesse, first they besieged Nicomedia the lesse, and take it, then they attempt Nicea a City of Bethunia (famous for the first generall Councell which was held against Arius). The Sultan had thrust Mahomet into it, one of his brauest Captaines, yet was it taken by assault by the Christians after two and twenty daies siege. The Sultan had his army in field, the which approached to fauour the besieged, and to saue the remainder of this ship-wracke, and likewise to hold the Cities in obedience, which stood amazed. Nicea being yeilded, there were some skirmishes so fauorable for the Latins, as Soliman retires his army to the mountaines, and leaues the plaines and Cities to Godfrey, who putt vp with this happy successe, and leauing a good gard in Nicea, he passeth through Bythinia and comes to Heraclea, the which yeelds presently, and then goes on with such successe, as in lesse then foure yeares hee subdued all the goodliest Prouinces of Asia, that is to say Lycaonia, Cilicia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, Siria, Mesopotamia and Comagene, as the wise reader may see in the Originalls of the whole History without making of any particular relation in this discourse.

se King of Ierusalem.

These happy and gainfull conquests strooke as great a terror into Soliman and the Leuantins, as it purchased honour and reputation to Godfrey and the Christians: so as hauing taken Antioche, Tripoly, and other renowned Cities; they came into Iudea and to Ierusalem with a victorious resolution. Thus Ierusalem is besieged with such diligence and resolution, as after eight and thirty daies it is taken by assault, and all the Turkes cut in peeces.
The poore inhabitants without armes are carefully preferred, to purchase a double victory to the Latins, of valour in fighting well, and of clemency in sparing the vanquished. The city wonne, the Latins assemble in Councell, and with one common consent choose Godfrey of Bouillon King of Ierusalem. All the royall ornaments were taken and accepted by him, except the crowne of gold, the which he would haue of thornes, like to that of our Sauour Iesus Christ, to augment the price of gold and pretious stones dedicated to his crowne by a holy humility, and a religious acknowledgement of the victory, which the Sonne of God hath gotten by his blood, to giue vs in Heauen the Crowne of immortall life. This famous act chanced in the yeare 1099. in the month of March.

Hauing put Godfrey and the Christians in possession of the Holy Land, let vs returne into France to our Philip, not without griefe to see the dissention betwixt the Emperour and Pope, who were nothing reconciled by the voiage to the Holy Land. The increase of this new power, purchased in England to the Sonnes of William the Conquerour, gaue him no small occasion to looke to his affaires, and the rather, for that this new King of England had begon to make a breach in his Estate, taking Xaintonge and Poitou Countries very important, beeing members of one of the principall Prouinces of his realme, foreseeing also that Normandy would bandy it selfe against France without all respect.

The sonnes of William King of Eng-
land.

William had left three sonnes of great hope: William surnamed Rufus King of England,
Robert Duke of Normandy (whom we haue left in the holy Land) and Henry Earle of Maine withall his treasure. Philip therefore to secure his Estate (following the example of his Ancestors) caused Lewis his sonne, (whom hee had by Berthe, daughter to Baldwin Earle of Flanders) to be crowned King. There was a scandalous breach in this marriage, for Philip falling in loue with Bertrude the wife of Fouques Earle of Aniou, puts away Berthe, and afterwards (hauing reiected Bertrude,) he received Berthe againe, beeing mother to King Lewis, to whom hauing resigned the crowne at Orleans, hee died at Melun in the yeare of grace 1109. of his age seuen and fifty, and of his raigne forty nine, hauing reigned long to settle his Estate, but not without a leuaine of much trouble to come, hauing degenerated from the vertues of his grand-fathers and father. Hee was disloyall, couetous, louing nothing but his owne profit, pittifesse, ygrate: and one who sowed dangerous seeds of much mil-chiefe, which began to bud in the reigne ensuing.

Philip dies.

1110.

LEWIS the sixth, called the grosse
the forty King of France.

As we foresee a storme by the clouds that rise, by the darke mists of the thick ayre, pierced through with sparkles like the shining of a close fire, and by the motiues of the water, driuen with a violent and suddaine winde, euen so there bee sinnes and fits in an estate, which foretell the alterations which shall insue: the which fall not all at one instant, but the subiect being gathered together, in proceesse of time, breakes forth when it can no longer hold. There is this difference betwixt naturall things and those which belong to man, for that men can well discern what the weather will be, but hee is blind in that which concerns himselfe, and neuer beleeueth vntill hee feelles the blow, falling into the danger which hee flies, by his owne fault, neuer wise but after danger. France had inioyed peace about an hundred years, vnder these forepassed reignes: she now growes weary. This reigne is a preamble to a mornfull song, which shall make them to weepe that reioyced in the fruition of so long rest. The name of royall authority held all those great men backe which had any interest therein, the wisdom of Capet, Robert, Henry and Philip, had so bridled them, as they willingly obeyed.

The estate of
this reigne.

Now they are of an other humor. The Duke of Normandy (who since Capet had beene obedient and well affected to the crowne,) seeing himselfe strengthened with the Realme of England, hee frames all his practises to ouerthrow this order, by rebellions and tumults.
Lewis had scarce performed his fathers funeralls, before the fire of rebellion kindled in di-uers parts of the realme: and (as if the Kings youth had beene a blemish to his dignity,) e-uery one will play the pettie King. The places neere vnto Paris beganne these first reuolts, by reason of the many great families thereabouts. Corbeil had an Earle, Chartres an other, Piseaux in Beaufe had one, Crecy had his Lord, Marle his, Pomponne his, and so diuers other Seigneuries had euery one their particular Lord. But as a disease stirres vp all the humors in a weake body, so all that were discontented with Lewis, gather together into one head, to afflict him vnder the countenance of the King of England.

The French
begin to fal
from their obedience.

1109. They were for a time suppressed, yet this was but to open a veine, and not to cure the feuer. A Guy of Crecy, the Lord Pisceans, Lancelin Earle of Dammartin, Thibaud Earle of Champagne, and Bryce, Péau of Louvre in Paris, Atilon of Montlehery, and Philip the bastard of King Philip, all ioyntly play the mutines and rise against their King. At the same instant, Henry King of England goes to field, his priuate quarrell was for the towne of Gisors, seated vpon the riuier of Epre, on the confines of Normandy. But this small proceffe was soone ended, for Lewis hauing defeated the English nere vnto Gisors, he forced Henry to retire, and afterwards punished all these rebels, increasing his reuenues by their confiscations.

Rebels suppressed and punished.

But the quarrell betwixt the Emperour and the Pope, did hatch a more dangerous proces for France. We haue said that Henry the fifth banded against his father Henry the fourth (who had associated him in the Empire) and had cast him into prison by the Popes Council, where this poore man died for greefe. Henry the fifth wonderfully troubled in conscience, and vexed with daily reproches, that hee had violated the Imperiall rights, resolved to haue his reuenge of Pope Pasfall, the author of this cruell and vnkind Councell. To conclude, he armes, and that with so great a resolution, as in few daies, hee assembles threescore thousand foote, and thirty thousand horse: with this army he goes into Italy, and hauing taken and spoiled Nouarre, Pontremolo and Arezzo, hee comes a Conqueror to the gates of Rome, the which were opened without any resistance.

The Emperour greued for his ill vsage of his father.

The Emperour comes to Rome and forceth the Pope to take an oath.

The Emperour degraded by the Popes decree, in a Councell, at Rheims.

Being entred the City, and causing the Pope and Colledge to assemble, hee makes knowne vnto them the rights of the Empire, as Pope Leo the eighth had acknowledged them to Otho the second Emperour, and before him Adrian to Charlemagne, according to the decree of the Councell at Rome, contained in the sixtie third distinction: and to conclude, he forced him to take the oath of fidelity, as to the true and lawfull Emperour, and then returns with his army. Pope Pasfall extremely moued with this affront, calls a Councell, wherein he protests to haue bene forced by Henry, so by consequence pronounceth, that whatsoever he had promised was of no force, and after all these toyles hee died. Gelasius succeeded him both in place and hatred against the Emperour Henry: but being too weake of himselfe, neither hauing any such friend as the King of France (according to the triallo often made, time out of minde) he comes into France, but he died at Cluny: and in his place Calixtus, sonne to the Earle of Bourgongne was chosen Pope. The reputation of the place from whence he was descended was great, so as he being a Frenchman, easily called a councell in France, to the great satisfaction of the French. It was held at Rheims, where by an ecclesiasticall decree, he declared Henry an enemy to the Church, and degraded of the Imperiall dignity.

As this ignominious decree did moue the Emperour, so did it minister matter to the King of England his brother in law, to imbrace all occasions to annoy Lewis his capitall enemy: for seeing this Councell had bene held in France, and consisted chiefly of the French Church: it was very apparant that the Kings fauour was very preiudiciall to the Emperours affaires. The English failes not to harpe vpon this string to the Emperour, being already incensed by the thing it selfe: promising him all his meanes, and encouraging him to enter France on the one side, whilst that he came on the other with all the forces of Normandy and England. The party was not small, neither had Lewis small cause to feare, being incourted by two such enemies. But God shewed him the rod, and reserved the punishment for another season: for as the Emperour was going to field, the Germane Princes (foreseeing the misery of a warre undertaken lightly vpon despight, and weighing the importance of neighbourhood) gaue him to vnderstand that hee ought not to attempt war against the King of France, without declaring vnto him the causes of his discontent. Hee therefore sends his Ambassadors to this end. Lewis doth wisely answer him, that hee is exceedingly sorry, to see the two great Pillers of the Church so shaken by these diffentions: and that it was to bee feared, the whole building would bee ruined. So as being a friend to both, hee desired greatly to bee a mediator of concord, and not to carrie coales to increase the fire, too much kindled already, the which ought to bee quenched for the good and quiet of all Christendome. This Ambassage was pleasing, and preuailed so much, as the Emperour disarmes, and was content to make Lewis a mediator for an accord betwixt him and the Pope, to the great grieve of the King of England, who expected a long

The French King and the Emperour reconciled.

A long continuance of this iarre. The composition was made at Wormes, very beneficiall for the Pope, in the yeare 122. whereby Henry grants him the installing of Bishops, and other benefices. This did ease the fore, but not cure it: as the sequelle of the Historie will shew. While that Princes haue leisure to contend, the poore people dye for hunger in many places of Europe. This famine was exceeding great in Flanders, who then had for their Earle, Charles surnamed the Good, for his good disposition, and great charitie to the poore. Hee fought by all meanes to releuee them. But as barrenesse was one of the causes of this famine, so the cruell couetousnesse of the rich, was a great hinderance to the commoditie of victuals: whereby there grew as remarkable an act, as the successe was strange, the particular report whereof, the reader must pardon in the brieuenesse of our stile.

There were three breethren at Bruges, of the chiefe of the Countrie, the which had gathered together a great quantitie of graine, and would not sell it, expecting a greater dearth, which might cause a greater price, that is Bertholphe VVendestrat, Prouost of S. Donas, and Chancellor of Flanders: Lambert and Boussard VVendestrat brethren: and another rich Burgesse called Lambert, one of the chiefe of the Cittie. This dignitie of Prouost and Chancellor was so great, as he supplied the Princes place in his absence. Vpon the peoples complaint, the Earle decrees, that all the graniers of these great houses should be opened, and the corne sold to the people at a reasonable rate. The Commission was giuen to Thamard, Almoner of the Earles house, as a thing befitting his charge: he causeth the graniers of these rich Bourgeses to be opened, the corne is sold to the people, and the money deliuered to the owners. The people being releueed by the couragious care of Thamard, commend him. The VVendestrates and Lambert (greatly discontented with this sale, wherein they held themselves interested) cause many indignities to be done vnto him. Lambert is directly accused by informations, being a very audacious young man, and the VVendestrates were touched therewith. The Earle offended with these audacious attempts, repaired them by Iustice: threatening Lambert, that if he continued, he would seuerely punish him.

There was also another complaint, made by an old Abbot against the Prouost, to whom the Earle spake roughly, commanding him to restore vnto the Abbot what he ought him. These free admonitions of the good Earle Charles, did so alter the proud and trecherous minds of these Cittizens, as they resolved to kill him: his milde facilitie giuing these wicked spirits both courage to attempt, and boldnesse to execute. And the end is answerable to their wicked desseigne. As the good Earle Charles went ill accompanied in the morning to his deuotion, to the church of S. Donas, on Ashwednesday, behold a troupe of young mad men, led by this Lambert, comes vnto him (being vnarmed on his knees in a Chappell) the Priett attired in his ornaments at the Altar (the Earle holding forth his arme to giue his almes to a poore woman) and without any warning, they beate him downe with their swords, and kill him, and so forcing all to giue way, they seeke for Thamard, whom they find and massacre, with so great a furie, as they leaue him vpon the place hewed into many peeces. Their troupe increaseth, and they flie to the Pallace, where all are amazed: and finding it without guard, without keyes, and without any gate shut, they enter it with horrible cries, they kill, sacke, and spoile: and running from thence into the cittie, they commit the like in those houses which they knew best affected to the good Earle Charles. This furious crueltie was accompanied with an ouerweening indiscretion, as if they had made some goodly conquest, they braue it, and play the masters without feare of any punishment. The people exceedingly grieued to see these barbarous cruelties against their good Prince, whom they loued as a father, durst not speake a word during this furie, whereas this troupe of murderers commaunded absolutely. But the wisest Cittizens fled to Lewis, as to their Soueraigne Lord. Lewis comes to Bruges with great speede: these butchers attending their miserie, shut themselves into the great tower of S. Donas. Lewis doth first burie the bodie of this good Earle honourably, (the which had lien without interring) and then doth punish the murderers and their Complices rigorously.

Trecherie against the good Earle of Flanders.

The Earle of Flanders and his Almoner murdered.

Crueltie in the city of Bruges.

Lewis King of France punishes the Rebels.

But this is not all. He must prouide for the Earledome, remaining without a Lord, by the death of Count Charles deceased without children. There wanted no pretendants, William of Fronsonne to Philip of Flanders, the second sonne of Robert the Frison. King Henrie of England (who desired greatly to ioyne this goodly Countrie with his Normandie) Stephen of Pretendants for the Earledome of Flanders.

1117. of Blois Earle of Montreuell and Bologne: Baldwin Earle of Hainault, and William the sonne of Robert called Court-hose, brother to the King of England, but his sworne enemy, hauing vsed his father ill, and kept him prisoner.

Lewis was soueraigne Iudge of this controuersie, Flanders depending on the Crowne of France. He assigned all the pretendants to repaire to the cittie of Arras: signifying, that his intent was to do them iustice, but in effect he inclined to fauour: adiudging the Earledome of Flanders to the last, that is, to William of Normandie, to bind him with more strict bonds against his kinsman. On the other side, the Flemings assemble at Ypre, and chose William of Leo, Lord of Ypre: The king aduanceth with his forces to Ypre, to prevent this popular election, where he enters the stronger, and forceth William to renounce it. From thence he goes to all other good Citties: where by his authoritie, he causeth William of Normandie to be receiued for lawfull Earle, and puts him in solemne possession by a publike act. But his fauour had ill bestowed this goodly inheritance of an vnworthie man, whose furie depriued him presently. Lewis hauing installed him, returnes into France. William in steade of winning his new subiects by equitie and mildnesse, begins to oppresse them after a rigorous and imperious manner: by infringing of their priuiledges, ostentations of his authority, taxes, subsidies, new impositions, and by all other meanes which Princes (that seeke to loose their Estates) hold to torment their subiects. Hee had so farre exceeded, as the Citties without any wauering resolute to prouide a better Earle, and to this intent they seeke a head.

The memorie of their good Earle, makes them to cast their eyes vpon him that hath most right to this inheritance, as the neerest kinsman, which is Thierry sonne to the Duke of Holatia, and of Gertrude daughter to Robert the Frison. The Flemings intreate him to come into their countrie, promising him all assistance to conquer the State. Hee comes, and is receiued with an extraordinarie ioy by all the people. All the Citties assemble, to acknowledge him by order, and dismisse William of Normandie, who seeing a flat repulse by this people thus freed, repaires to Lewis for succour in this extremitie. Lewis failes him not, his armie marcheth with great speed: he himselfe comes in person, and is receiued into Arras: from thence he adiournes Thierry, to come and answer before him as his Soueraigne, by what warrant he carries himselfe for Earle, this summons is made vnto him at Ypre, whether hee had retired himselfe. Hauing condemned him by default, he approacheth his armie to Ypre, to vex the inhabitants. Thierry fallies forth with a notable troupe of men: they ioyne, the fight is fierce, but the checke falles vpon Thierries forces, who with much adoe, saues himself in Aloft.

William pursues him, and approacheth the towne, summoning the Inhabitants to obey and to deliuer vp Thierry as an Vsurper. But he was not aduised that one with a Crosse-bow, shot an arrow at him, and pierced him throw the arme. Behold, he is wounded, and within two daies he dies. Thierry and the Flemings sent presently to Lewis to beseech him to receiue the into fauour, wherby he may be assured of their faithfull seruice. Lewis consents, and confirms him: and hauing caused him to take the oath of fidelitie, and receiued his homage after the manner of his Ancestors, he returnes into France. But Flanders continued not long in quiet, as we shall see hereafter.

To these stirres of Flanders, were added some garboyles in Bourbonnois and Auvergne, Archibauld Earle of Bourbon was decessed, leauing one sonne of the same name, but a young man, and a brother called Haman, who abusing the time in the weake minoritie of his Nephew, would make himselfe Master of Bourbonnois, pretending the Earledome to appertaine vnto him by the death of his elder brother, to whom hee must succeed in order, as the youngest of the house. The mother and friends of Archibauld, opposed against Haman, the right of representation (innolable in France in great houses) which is, that the sonne of the eldest brother, represents the father, and without doubt succeeds in all his rights, to enioy the, as if he himselfe liued; for that the Father reuiues in the Sonne. Haman building his chiefe interest vpon force, would not admit any reason that made for his nephew: so as the matter was brought before the King, who by the aide of his Councell, declares Archibauld the lawfull heire, and puts Haman from his pretensions, commaunding him to leaue the possession of Bourbonnois free to his Nephew. This Archibauld did afterwards marrie his daughter Beatrice, to Robert Earle of Clermont in Beauuois, son to the king S. Lewis, and of this mari-

A age by the royall stemme, is descended the most famous race of Bourbon, the which at this day doth happily enioy the Crowne and Realme of France. But Haman (who held some places in Bourbonnois) would not leaue the possession, refusing to obey the Kings commaundement, relying vpon the fauour of Eustache Earle of Auvergne, who sought to free himselfe. There was a priuate subiect of complaint against him, hauing displaced the Bishop of Clermont against the Kings will. These occasions drew the King into Bourbonnois, where hauing besieged Haman, he ended this controuersie in fauour of Archibauld. The affaires of Auvergne were more difficult, by reason of William Duke of Guienne, who imbraced the cause for the Earle of Auvergne, pretending that he was his vassall. This quarrell seemed to take a long course, but it was pacified by this meanes. Lewis had sixe sonnes, Philip, Lewis, Henry, another Philip, Peter, Robert, and one daughter, Constance. He had crowned his eldest sonne Philip, who dyed by a strange accident: going to take the aire on horsebacke, a hogge passed vnder the belly of his horse, the which being feared, did shake this young King so violently, as he threw him downe, and so brused him, as within few daies after he died. This vncexpected death hauing much troubled Lewis, made him to prouide for the rest of his children: and the libertie of time among so many of his subiects (which did checke his authoritie by their great nesse) moued him to looke more carefully thereunto, to make him great, whome he had appointed his successor in the realme about the rest. Lewis was his second sonne, whome he resolved to crowne King in his brothers place, and to marrie him. Guienne is one of the worst members of this estate, the Dukes were yet of the remainders of great Charlemagne, as we haue seene. William was then Duke, and had but one daughter to be heire to this great and rich countrie. Lewis resolves to take this Daughter for his sonne, and so to end all strife. This Daughter was called Ellenor, she was giuen in marriage to Lewis, which was called the Young: to distinguish him from his father Lewis, with whom he reigned. Lewis expected a great aduancement by this alliance, but the euent will shew, that he had not reckned with God about. As for his other children, he leaues them to the discretion of the eldest, whome hee had resolved to make their superior, both in authoritie and power, that they might depend onely vpon his fauour. He made Henry his third sonne, Bishop of Beauois, the other Philip Archdeacon of Paris: Peter Earle of Courteney, Robert Earle of Druex, and married his onely daughter Constance to Raimond Earle of Saint Gilles, and Tholouse: which shewes that it was a great house; as we shall note in our Theater of Languedock: but the course of the historie shall make vs see plainly, that this alliance did not warrant Raimond from the miseries that fell vpon him after this raigne. Lewis the Grosse hauing thus prouided for his estate, died aged 61. in the yeare of Grace 1137. the 25. of October, leauing one sonne settled in his Realme, with an apparent peace, yet breeding great troubles for the State, hauing reigned

LEWIS the 7. called the Young, the 41. King of France.

The estate of
this raigne.

HE began to raigne in the yeare 1137. and raigned 43. yeares. This long raigne was nothing happie, and contains nothing in it that was memorable, but that the foundation was laide for a long calamitie for Fraunce. The subiect was the more notable, for that the mischief came fro thence, from whence good was to be expected, which was from the heire of Guienne. In hope and expectation, a gage of rest, but in effect a Leauen of lamentable confusion, which had almost ruined this Monarchie, and transported it vnto Strangers. The estate of Guienne beeing thus seled, and some mutiners suppressed (who in the beginning of this raigne had freed themselves, vnder colour of the Fathers weake old age, and the irresolute youth of the Sonne) Fraunce continued in great quiet, and the accord made betwixt the King, Henry the 5. Emperour, and the Popes, had pacified the dissention, which had troubled all Christendome. But the affaires of the Christians in the East, were not answerable to their happie and victorious beginning, so as all the kings and princes of Europe, were called by extreame necessitie vnto their succours. Such was their estate, as all things fell out happily in Asia to Godfrey of Bouillon, and that the taking of the Holy Land and Ierusalem, did seeme an absolute conquest to the Christians: but the Turkes on the other side slept not: they enter Palestina with an armie of fixe hundred thousand men (as the Greeke Historie of those times doth witnesse) Godfrey fights with them, the combat was great, and the issue happie for the Christians, if the death of that great and famous Prince had not followed soone after, and too soone for the affaires of Christendome, which began greatly to decline by his decease.

Godfrey of

Baldwin his brother was chosen in his place. A Prince valiant enough, but vnfortunate: At his first entrie, he very indiscreetly charged a great troupe of Sarrazins, where hee was beaten with so great dishonour, as euen then he lost both courage and authoritie: although during his reigne (which was seven yeares) Tyre and Apamea, (which they call Raphanea) notable Citties, were added to this new kingdome of the Christians. Fouques Earle of Aniou (his sonne in law,) succeeded him: but he was scarce in possession, when as he was slaine in hunting

A hunting with a fall, leauing two children, Baldwin and Amanlie, and the affaires so dilmembred, as they could no longer stand, pressed within by diuisions, and without by a daungerous warre: so as all these goodly Prouinces gotten with so great facilitie, were through these ciuill dissentions among Christians, lost within few daies. Behold, new Embassadors from these young Princes, and all the great States in Asia, to the Pope, Emperour, and King of France, imploring their aides, else they were vndone, to the shame of Christendome, and triumph of those miscreants. Lucius the 2. was then Pope. Conrad of Sueuia Emperour, and Lewis King of France. S. Bernard (whom they called the Mellifluous Doctour, for his sacred and diuine eloquence) liued then, hauing wonne great reputation with the French, for his doctrine and holinessse. The Pope employed him much, to perswade the King to embrace this action, and to succour their afflicted brethren. Lewis resolues easily, his zeale beeing strengthened by the perswasions of this holy man. Conrad of Sueuia tooke the like resolution, so as they are both well affected to employ all their meanes to crosse the desseignes of these miscreants, and to settle the Christians affaires in the Holy Land: when as behold, a great mischance which had almost hindered all their resolutions.

The Christians
lose all in the East.

The Emperor
and King of France resolue to succour the Christians.

Alberic Archbishop of Bourges beeing dead, the Pope without the Kings priuitie, (to get footing in France of his absolute authoritie, which he had so much disputed with the Emperour) advanced to the Archbishopricke of Bourges, a fauorite of his named Peter, and sent him with his Bulls to take possession of the place. Lewis (who had alwaies supported the Sea of Rome in all their quarrels; and had seene his father readie to enter into a deadly warre with the Emperour vpon this occasion: who moreouer prepared himselfe at the Popes periwasion, to employ, not onely his treasure, but his owne person, in a voyage to the East, for the common good of all Christendome:) was mightily discontented with this his proceeding, as if he purposely meant to braue him at his owne doore. It is a priuiledge time out of mind, due to the Kings of France, that they admit not any to Ecclesiasticall dignities, preferred by the Pope, or chosen by the people, if he be not pleasing to themselves. The reason is apparent, to auoide either disloyaltie, ignorance, or ill life, in such as are advanced to these dignities: our Kings hauing right to be Soueraigne ouer-seers of the Church. The King would not allow of Peter thus advanced to this dignitie, although the Chapter of Bourges had giuen their consent to the Popes decree. Peter beeing reiecte, had recourse to Thibaud Earle of Champagne, and to the Earle of Blois, men discontented with the King, and onely fit to be opposed. But to this difficultie there was added a greater at the same instant. Raoul Earle of Vermandois had put away his wife Gilbert, the daughter of Roger Lord of Chateaubriant, vpon suspicion that she had beene prodigall of her honour, without any proofes to conuince her. But ielousie made him to see that plainly, which was concealed to others: so as he put her away, and tooke Peronnelle, the bastard Daughter of William Duke of Guienne in her place, beeing aduowed sister to Queene Elenor, and her decre friend. Gilbert complains to the Pope, beeing reiecte (as she pretended) without cause, and demands iustice. The Pope commaundes Raoul to receiue his wife againe, and to put away Peronnelle, as vnlawfull, and (for not obeying) doth excommunicate him. The King intreats the Pope for Peronnelle, but hee preuailes not: for he sends Tues into France as his Legat, to reuiue the first censure, not only against the Earle, but also against the Bishops which had consented to the diuorce of Gilbert, forbidding them any more to exercise their charges. The Earle Thibaud had vnder taken to haue the Pope obeyed; to the great dislike of the King, as it were attempting it of purpose to offend him. Lewis moued with this affront, went against Thibaud: and at the first takes Vitry, and not onely sackes the towne, but in disdaine of the Pope, caused the Churches to be spoiled: and many beeing fled out of the villages, to saue themselves from the furie of the disordered troopes, had retired themselves into a Temple, as to a place of safetie: Lewis giues such libertie to his souldiers, as they set fire of the place, and burne fifteene hundred persons men and women. The horror of this Massacre offended all good men, but especially Lewis, who was so much grieved as he could not be comforted. Misfortune is good for somthing. Lewis loathing the voyage to the East, for the foresaid occasions, was easily confirmed by S. Bernard, who had perswaded him to yeeld all succours to the afflicted Christians, for a reparation of so execrable a fact, committed by his commaundement, vpon so many poore innocents: and likewise he embarked Conrad the Emperour and the Germanes. These two great great Princes, carried with one zeale, and vntited in one will to this worke, make great preparations for the voyage. Conrad armes three score thousand horse, and an infinit number of Foote, and he himselfe is chiefe of this goodly armie, taking the way of Hungarie to Constantinople, through the countrie of Alexis his brother in law, Emperour of Greece: he arrived some moneths before Lewis; for the Emperour parted in Februarie, and Lewis went to field in May, and takes the same course the Emperour had done.

The Kings armie was nothing inferiour to the Emperours: and so much the more remarkable, for that Queene Elenor desired to accompany her husband in the voyage: so as after the King and Queenes example, all France thought to flie into the East. They sent a distaffe and a Spindle to all those that were fit for armes, if they marched not with this troupe of braue Warriours. Conrad arrived first at Constantinople: and so he returned much sooner into Germanie. Having passed into Asia by the Bosphorus of Thrace, it was likely that all should yeeld to so mightie an armie: but it fell out otherwise then he had desseigned. All the Citties wonne at the first voyage were almost lost; and the Christians ill gouernement was so well knowne, as the Turkes made head in all places. The Emperour measuring his triumph by the number of his men, contemned the enemy, and was negligent in his proceedings: hauing referred the prouision to Alexis Emperour of the East, his brother in law, he found little bread, and store of enemies in all places. So as what by hunger and the sword, scarce the tenth part of his men come to his friends in the Holy land, where he found them all amazed.

Lewis (warned by *Conrad*s example) did somewhat better in the beginning: for beeing refreshed at Constantinople, and other Citties of Greece: he passed the channell into Asia happily, where hauing beaten the enemy, he came without losse to Athalia and hauing cauled his Fleete (which was at Rhodes) to come to the friend-Ports of Palestina, he arrived by land safe with all his troupes at Antioch, where he was honourably receiued by Raimond Earle of S. Gilles his brother in law. In the meane time the Emperour besiegeth Afcalon alone, but preuailes not. Lewis arriues at Ierusalem, whether Conrad comes likewise. After they had visited the places of deuotion, they resolute to besiege Damas in Syria, a Cittie very important of the commerce for Iudea; but after a long and fruitlesse siege, all are dispersed. The Emperour who came first, returnes first: the King stayed not long after him. There were foure yeares spent in this fruitlesse voyage, with much paine and cost, and not onely without fruit, but it also tooke away the terror of Christian armies in these miscreants, and left the affaires of Asia in farre worse estate, then when they came. There was yet another inconuenience. The Emperour Alexis (a friend at their entrie) shewed himselfe an enemy to them both at their departure. Conrad saued himselfe as well as he could, more fearing the trecherie of the Greekes, then the crueltie of the Turkes. Lewis prouides in time to haue the Fleete of Sicile come for his conuoy, else had he lost both himselfe and his treasure, the which had bene a meanes for the Greekes to make their peace with the Turkes, and open war against the other Christians, beeing better then themselves. This shamefull & preiudiciall departure, was hurtfull to the whole Christian Church. But there was a greater losse for Lewis, very troublefome to himselfe, and preiudiciall to all France: for Queene Elenor his wife, (who made profession to go visit the holy places) suffered her eyes to be abused with an vnchaste and filthy lust, which tainted her honour, and the King her husbands heart with an outrageous ielousie. This woman accustomed to the liberties of Time and Place, had so abandoned her selfe to the pleasures of the East, as the stench of her incontinencie was publike to the whole world, before her husband had any notice thereof: her impudencie did so farre exceed, as shee would dishonourably haue stayed in Antioch, and left her husband: presuming to cloake her shame with a shew of Religion: saying without blushinge, that she could be no more the wife of Lewis, to whom she was Cousin in the fourth degree, preferring the loue of a Iester, named Saladin, of the Sarazin race, before the greatnesse of a King of Fraunce, her lawfull husband. Lewis beeing much diquieted, perswades this woman to returne, (a heauier burthen to his minde, then to his shippe,) beeing returned to his house, he frees himselfe with all the speed he can. And whereas he should haue cast this insatiat woman into the Riuer, beeing no more his wife, and retained her Dowrie iustly gotten the playing bankrupt of her honour: he calles a Councell at Bau-

A gency to haue her diuorced, the which was granted, vnder colour of far-fetched consanguinitie. But his desire was to be freed from her. So retaining two Daughters, borne vnder the vaile of their marriage, he restores vnto Elenor all her Countrie of Guienne, that is, he puts into the hands of his furious enemy a Torch to set his whole Realme on fire: for as soone as she sees her selfe freed from the subiection and feare of a husband, she stayed not long to acquaint her selfe with Henry King of England, and Duke of Normandie, the greatest and most capitall enemy that Lewis had. So hee obtained Guienne by the voluntarie Cession which Lewis made, to haue the better and more conuenient meanes to annoy him and his whole Realme.

B Moreouer, Lewis payed dearly for so great a discommoditie, for the Pope would not giue him a dispensation to marrie againe, without a great summe of money, to bee employed in the warres of the Holy Land: and to finish this worke, he tooke to wife Constance, the daughter of Alphonso King of Galicia, being a weake friend, and farre off. This marriage was not greatly conuenient, neither for his owne quiet, nor the peace of his subiects. This subiect of deadly rancor, encreasing the hatred of these two neighbour Monarkes of France and England, burst forth soone after by dangerous effects. The benefit of the new purchase of Guienne, was the cause of that perillous warre, the which had so long, and so lamentable continuance. William Duke of Guienne, Grandfather by the father to Queene Elenor, had married the onely Daughter of the first Raimond Earle of Tholousa, who had ingaged the said Countie to Raimond Earle of Saint Gilles, who since also called himselfe Earle of Tholousa, beeing seized of the sayd Countie, and enioyed it so quietly vnder the Kings obedience. Henry King of England offers the money to Raimond to redeeme it, and demands the Earledome as his Wiues right: Vpon his refusall, hee armes, enters into Quercie, takes Cahors, spoiles the Countie, and besiegeth Tholousa. Lewis (intreated by Raimond) runnes to quench this fire: Beeing arriued, and the two Armies readie to ioyn, a peace was made betwixt the two Kings, by the marriage of Marguerite the Daughter of Lewis, with Henry the eldest Sonne of Henry King of England: but for that shee was very young, and not yet marriagable, shee was deliuered into Henry the Fathers hands, vntill she were of fit age to marry.

Lewis had now buried his wife Constance, who left him but two Daughters, without any heyres male: so as beeing desirous to haue a successor, hee made no delay to marry, and tooke to his third wife, Alix the Daughter of Thibaud Earle of Champagne, his vassall, and newly reconciled, but not greatly affected vnto him, vntill that time. He had a Sonne presently by her, whom he called Dieu Donne, or giuen of God, as an acknowledgement that God had sent him, at his and his subiects prayers: This is he that shall succeed him. I should beginne to describe his raigne, but order commaunds mee to relate what happened, during the raigne of Lewis, in the neighbour nations of England and Italie, wherein Lewis had great crosses.

Henry King of England had two sonnes by Elenor; Richard and Groffrey: and by his first wife hee had Henry, who was made sure to Marguerite of Fraunce, of whom wee haue spoken. The Father caused him to be crowned, to settle him in his life time, and tyed the English vnto him by homage. A young Prince, ambitious, audacious, ill aduised and rash, who cannot long containe himselfe with the taste of this new authoritie, but will play the King with his Father. And although his Fathers admonitions restrained him for a while; yet this ambitious humour still burst forth: So as the Father from milde admonitions came to threatnes, the inscience of this young Prince increasing daily: some yeares passed whilest this fire lay smothered, very long for young Henry, to whom the Fathers life seemed too tedious, and the children of the second wife grewe by the care of Elenor their mother. Henry the Father discontented with his Sonne, and fearing that in consummating the marriage betweene him and the Daughter of France, the young Prince would grow proude, augmenting his traine and State, and (through the fauour of King Lewis his father in Lawe) attempt something preiudiciall to his authoritie; Hee delayed the accomplishment of his marriage, although the Virgin were of more then sufficient yeares to marrie. To this mischief was added another more shamefull, for that Henry the Father caused this Princess to be carefully kept, the which should be his daughter in Lawe, fearing lest his Son should take her away, and marry her. Elenor falls into ielousie, as if Henry had

THE title of Augustus given to Philip, is worthie of his person and raigne: who not onely preserved the French Monarchie, amidst so many sorts of enemies and difficulties: but enlarged it with many Prouinces, (diuided to diuers proprietaries by Hugh Capet) and vnitied them to the Crowne: for this cause he was also called Conquerour. The beginning of his raigne was a presage of happinesse, for there appeared in his face a great shew of a good disposition, inclined to pietie, iustice, modestie, being strong, quicke, vigilant, valiant, and actiue. Hee did consecrate the first fruites of his raigne, to purge the corruptions which raigned among the people: blasphemies, Playes, Dicing houses, publike dissolutions, in infamous places, Fauernes, and Tipling houses. Hee made goodly lawes which our age reads and scornes, doing the contrarie with all impunitie: but whilest he raigned they were duly obserued.

The Iewes banished out of France.

The Iewes were mightily disperfed throughout the Realme, who (besides their obstinate superstition, vsed excessiue vsurie, and were supported for some great benefit, by the Pope and other Princes and States, whereas they haue libertie at this day, to liue after their owne manner. Philip expelled them, although they obtained a returne for money: yet in the end they were banished out of all the territories of the French obedience, and so continue vnto this day. This was a small apprenticeship, and an entrance of much more happie paine, the which he should vndergo, both within and without the Realme, in great and troublefome affaires, as a famous subiect worthie of his valour. England, Flanders, and Asia, prouided varietie and change of worke to employ his raigne, the which continued fortie foure yeares; but the change of his intricate marriages troubled him more then all his affaires, as the progresse of our Discourse will shew.

In the beginning there was emulation who should be nearest to gouern him. Philip Earle of

A of Flanders, and the Duke of Guienne were competitors. The one as Vnckle to the young Queen Isabel his wife, and named by his father Lewis: the other as his neereft kinsman, and both the one and the other had great meanes to preuaile: but Richard was the stronger, as well by the Kings fauour, as by the forces of England, of whence he was an Infant, and wel-beloued by Henry his brother, who then raigned. Behold, the King is embarked against the Earle of Flanders, by the aduice of his Councell: The subiect of their quarrell was for Vermandois, which the Earle enioyed: the King demanded it, being no longer his, by the deceate of Alix dead without children, and therefore must returne to the Crowne: From words they go to armes. Their troopes being in field and readie to fight, a peace was made, B with this condition: That Count Philip should enioy Vermandois during his life, and after his decease it should returne to the Crowne. But this peace continued not long among these Princes. The King could not loue his Wife Isabel; it seemes this was the chiefeft cause of the dislike the King had against the Earle of Flanders her Vnckle. In the end he put her away, in the yeare 1188. from which time Philip loued Richard Duke of Guienne.

But this good agreement continued not long, by reason of another controuersie betwixt him and the English. Marguerite the Daughter of Lewis the 7. sister to Philip, married to Henry of England, as we haue said, dyed then without children. Philip doth presently redemand his Sisters dowrie, which was the countrie of Vexin. The King of England is loth to leaue the possession, so as they fall to armes, and the mischief increased by this occasion. Henry first sonne to old Henry dyed: Richard Duke of Guienne his brother, (who might haue compounded this quarrell) being called to the Crowne, embraceth the action with all eagernesse. And to crosse Philip by an important diuersion, (like to old Henry) auoides the blow in Normandie, and enters Languedoc by Guienne into the Countie of Tholousa, renewing the old quarrell he had against Count Raimond. Philip being assailed in two places, is nothing amazed: hauing leauied an Armie with all celeritie, he enters the English pale. Where he suddenly takes Chasteaucatx, Busancas, Argenton, Leuroux, Montrichard, Montforeau, Vandosme, with other townes: and passing on, he batters and takes Mans: and hauing waded through the Riuer of Loire, he presents himselfe before Tours, which yeelds at the terror of his forces. Old Henry amazed at the sodaine valour of this young Prince, faints, and oppressed with griefe, dyes at Chinon, in the yeare 1190. leauing his Realme to his sonne Richard, but not his Malice: for presently after his Coronation, he concludes a peace with Philip vpon a cause very honourable to them both.

Warre with England,

Philip of France, and Richard doth not glad make a peace

The Christians in Asia declined still. The Pope perswaded the Kings of France and England with many reasons, and the zeale of the common interest of Christendome, made them resolute. They became good friends, with an intent to make a voyage together to the Holy Land, to the incredible content of all their subiects. But whilest they prepare for this voyage, let vs passe into Asia, to visit the afflicted Christians. After the fruitlesse returne of the Emperour Conrad, and of Lewis King of France, things went from bad to worse, hauing caused the Christian forces to loose their reputation with the Turkes, being growne proud with this vaine shew of Armes. Baldwin dyes after the fruitlesse attempts of these great Princes: Amalric his Brother succedes him, who toyled himselfe in Egypt, against Sultan Sarracon, and Saladin his successor. He was releued by the comming of Frederick Barbaroussa, who failed not to performe what he had promised to Pope Alexander. But the Christians found small comfort in his comming. The forces of the Empire (which were great) being disperfed by the death of the Emperour. Amalric likewise dies, who leaues one Son named Baldwin both young and a Lepar, so as hauing voluntarily resigned the charge, finding himselfe unfit, he did inuest his nephew Baldwin, the Sonne of William Longsword, Marquis of Monferat, and of Sibille his sister: and considering the weaknesse of his age, he appoints Raimond Earle of Tripoli for his Tutor. Hence sprung a horrible dissention among the Christians: F for Sibille (by whome the right came to Baldwin her sonne, after the death of Marquis William) was married to Guy of Lusignan, who was seized of the young Infant. Hee is now his Tutor by force, the childe dies, and Guy of a Tutor becomes a King, (not without great suspicion of treacherie against the Infant) and in the end they fall to warre. Euery one doth strengthen himselfe for this goodly Realme; and they are incenied with greater furie, then when they ioyntly made warre against the Infidelles. Guy seekes for succour

Then was Tripoly deliuered into his handes, and the Earle Raimond found dead in his bedde, when as hee should haue raigned: to teach all men how to trust Infidelles. Saladin passeth on, hee beseegeth, takes, and sackes Ierusalem: and in this amazement, Ptolomais, Azot, Baruth, and Affalon yeeld vnto him. These victorious conquestes of Saladin, were accompanied with great mildnesse to the people whome he had subdued; that by this wise course, the Miscreant might encounter the Christians disorders, by a notable example of vertue. Moreouer, there happened another Tragical confusion: Alexis a young man of fiftene yeares, sonne to Emanuel the Emperour, (issued from that Alexis, of whome we haue spoken in the beginning of this Easterne warre) was cruelly slaine by his Tutor Andronicus, and he himselfe afterwards by Isaac, and the people of Constantinople, who had called him to the Empire. Such was the sicke estate of the East, when as our Kings were solicited to goe and visit it, in the yeare 1190.

Philip calles a Parliament at Paris to settle his estate: they dissuade him from the voyage, but zeale transported him, and made him fight and contend with impossibilities: So great efficacie this resolution had to goe to this warre, which seemed to bee the gaine of their soules health, as the Historie saith, great charges were imposed vpon such as went not the voyage, to pay the tenth of all their reuenues, both spirituall and temporall, called for this occasion the Saladins Tenth. Richard King of England came with many Dukes, Marquises, Earles, Barons, great Lords, and an infinite number of young Gentlemen. The Kings sweare a brotherly and inuiolable League: but the continuall and priuate entercourse by the way, bredde a familiaritie; and this familiaritie engendred a contempt, and contempt hatred, as the course of this Historie will shew. A notable lesson for Kings and Princes, to teach them how farre they should conuerse familiarly. Hauing crossed the Seas with some difficulties, in the end they come into Syria. The losse of the Crosse made them to besiege Acon, the which they take very valiantly, after great losse of their men: but the Crosse would not be found, As the Originall saith.

The Plague fell among their troupes, euery one talkes of returning. Philip speakes first, pretending indisposition. Richard made some difficultie, least that Philip in his absence should indeauour to attempt something in this territories of Fraunce. Philip hauing assured him by oath, returnes, and passing by Rome, comes safe into Fraunce: Hauing left the greatest part of his forces in the East, vnder the command of Odo Duke of Bourgoigne. Richard remaining alone, was better obeyed of the Armie, and atchieued great and memorable exploits against Saladin, beeing alreadie amazed and astonished by the taking of Acon. Hee fortified Gaza and Iaffa, hauing re-peopled them with Christian Colonies, and vanquished Saladin in battaile: From thence he resolved to besiege Ierusalem; but as hee was kept from this enterprise by reason of the Winter, so was hee forced to leaue Asia, vpon this occasion, and returne into England. During his voyage and Philips, there had passed some vnkind speeches, by reason of Alix Sister to Philip, and the wife of Richard, who in great disdain said: That he had neuer toucht her: and that she should neuer come neere him, blaming her, as if he had beene prodigall of her honour, by a monstrous incest with his Father. Notwithstanding all shewes of friendship at their parting, yet this did sticke in Philips stomacke, who at his returne found his Sister Alix at Saint Germaine in Lay, whether she was retired, expecting his returne, who failed not to seeke all meanes of reuenge: Richard had left his brother John in England to gouerne the State in his absence. Philip solicites him, and promiserh him all his meanes, with his sister Alix (beeing vnworthily reiectet) for a gage of his loue. But Elenor the mother of these Princes, kept John in awe from ioyning openly with Philip against his absent brother, yet could she not restraine John from giuing his word to Philip, who failes not to ceaze couertly, seeing his faith plighted, and the reuerence of the cause which held Richard from his house, would not suffer him to worke openly. So hee takes Gisors by intelligence, and all the other Townes of Vexin, which were in controuersie. These newes gaue Richard iust cause to resolve vpon his returne: but it cost him deare, for Saladin (whome he had kept in awe since the taking of Acon) well informed of his necessitie and resolution, makes him to buy a truce for five yeares at a deare rate: yeelding

Anding him vp all that had beene taken since the comming of the two Kings into Asia, and so the Bloud, Time and Cost, spent in this conquest, were lost in an houre by the ill gouernment of our Kings.

Richard hauing left the absolute command of the affaires of Asia, to Henry Earle of Champagne, takes his way for England; but as hee came to Vienna, in Austria, hee was knowne and staied, first by Leopold Duke of Austria, and then by Henry the Emperour, for some discontent he had against him. Thus Richard was retained 22. monthes, and not deliuered but for a ranfome of an hundred thousand pounds sterling, which was then a great and notable summe. This was the successe of that long and dangerous Easterne voiage, crossed with so many toiles, takings, and yeeldings vp; and with such troublesome consequences for both Kings and both Realmes; for the quarrell ended not vpon King Richards release out of prison as wee shall see. Richard being returned into England, hee sought all meanes of reuenge for the wrongs he supposed to haue receiued vnworthily of Philip in his absence and calamity. But let vs returne to Philip, he had put away Isabel, and taken Alix the daughter of the King of Hungary, who liued not long with him. She being dead, he tooke Gelberge sister to the King of Denmarke, whom likewise he put away, and in her place married Mary the daughter of the Duke of Morauia. After a long and bitter controuersie vpon the repudiation of Gelberge, the King remaining obstinate in his resolution, yet in the end hee receiued her againe, beyond all hope, and ended his daies with her, sending backe Mary with honorable meanes to liue in this kind of solitary life, in manner of a widow. But our Inuentary may not excuse it selfe vpon the breuity of the stile, without reporting the manner which Philip held in receiuing Gelberge after so long and obstinate a tute. The King of Denmarke pursued vehemently in the Court of Rome; for the honour and quiet of his sister reiectet Philip not able to auoide the decision of the cause: And yet resolute not to receiue Gelberge, prepares his Aduocates to shew the reasons which had moued him to puther away. The cause was to bee pleaded before the Popes Legate in the great Hall of the Bishops palace at Paris; thether they runne of all fides. In this great and sollempne assembly, Philips Aduocates pleaded wonderfully well for him against his wife, but no man appeared for her. As the cryer had demanded three times if there were any one to speake for Gelberge, and that silence should bee held for a content: behold a young man vnknowne, steppes forth of the presse, and demands audience: It was granted him with great attention.

King Philip assisting, euery mans eares were open to heare this Aduocate, but especially Philips, who was toucht and rauished with the free and plaine discourse of truth which hee heard from the mouth of this new Aduocate, so as they might perceiue him to change his countenance. After this young man had ended his discourse, hee returnes into the presse againe, and was neuer scene more, neither could they learne what hee was, who had sent him, nor whence he came. The Iudges were amazed, and the cause was remitted to the councill. Philip without any stay in Court, goes to horse, and rides presently to Bois de Vincennes, whether hee had confined Gelberge: hating imbraced her, hee receiues her into fauour, and passed the rest of his daies with her in nuptiall loue. By Isabel hee had Lewis, the eighth of that name, whom (during his life) hee employed in affaires, and left him the crowne, but the peace of his house was blemished by these crooked changes, whereby wee may obserue by the disquieted minde of this worthy Prince, that there is nothing absolutely perfect in humain affaires. He which could surmount the insolencies of his enemies, could not vanquish his owne passions. He that could get elserwhere, could not preserve that which was most pretious, that is, the peace of his house, and of his bed: and which is more then that of his soule: who could not liue quietly amidst these continuall debates bredde and nourished in his bosome. This was the banquet which was prepared for him at his returne, after so many broyles passed in the voyage of the East. Flaunders and England ministred him matter of troubles al his life time, and he requited his enemies with the like, ouer whom he had victorious aduantages. Baldwin Son to Baldwin Earle of Hainault & Namur, called the fourth, & of Marguerit of Alsatia heire of Flanders, by the decess of her brother Philip, (dead of late in the East), was then seased of these goodly Seigneuries: wherunto he had added Vermandois, the which he pretended to belong vnto him by a certaine agreement;

Moreouer Philip caused Baldwin, to doe homage (as his vassal,) for Flanders and other Lands of the low countries, noted by that name at Paris, according to the solemnities required: from thence he marcheth into Normandy, takes Gisors and the Country of Vexin, giuing it for a dourie to his sister Alix being put away by Richard; whom he had married againe to the Earle of Ponthieu. But sodenly there are complaints from England, That Philip did breake his promise. Hee replies. That seeing his sister was nothing to Richard, there was no reason hee should enioy her doury. But this quarrell must proceed farther. Richard receiues his brother John into fauour, and pardons what is past, so as hee will serue him faithfully against Philip, and bee no more seduced by his practises. It chanced moreouer that Otha of Saxony, the sonne of Richard's sister, was chosen Emperour, in his absence, being then in England, from whence he presently departs, assisted with his vnckles meanes, the which hereafter shall import him much. Richard seeing how much Tholouza did import him for his countries of Guienne, enters into a strict League of friendship with Raymond Earle of Tholouza, then a widower by the death of Constance, Aunte to Philip, giuing him Joane his sister in marriage, the widow of William King of Sicilie.

of England.

All these were preparatiues of great warre against France. And could Baldwin Earle of Flanders be well satisfied being intreated as we haue seene? Richard ioynes with him. They resolute to make warre against Philip in diuers places, hauing assembled their forces, Baldwin enters into Artois, Richard into Vexin (countries then in controuersie) where by reason the warre should begin, seeing the processe was bred there, Philip without any amazement prouides for Artois, sending forces thither vnder the command of his Sonne Lewis. Hee himselfe marcheth in person against Richard, who besieged Corceele, the which hee releued in despite of him. Richard not able to hinder these succors, takes his way into the Country of Beauuoisin and spoiles it, Philip doth the like in Normandy. All tends to trouble, by the wilfulness of these two Princes: when as the Pope (some say Celestin, others Innocent the 3.) sends his Noncio to exhort them to peace. This perswasion staied it not, but onely made a diuersion of their armies: for Richard supposing that Philip could not auoide the blow, being ingaged in Normandy, he marcheth into Berry, and being assisted with all his forces of Guienne, besiegeth Yssoudun, hauing wasted and spoiled all the country. Philip hauing besieged Vernon (although the name bee diuerly coated Vernon, Vernueil or Aumale) hee leaues the towne and flies to Richard to draw him to fight: who finding himselfe to weake retires from the towne and Philip returnes to his siege, and wins the towne, notwithstanding all the attempts of Richard, who now takes breath to seeke his reuenge; but God had otherwise disposed, with whom all Princes ought to account for their actions, who laughs at men when they vex themselves most. During his aboade at Limoges, he was aduertised that one of his men at armes had found a great treasure in the ground. This souldiar fearing to be ill rewarded by Richard, flies to a small towne of Limosin, which the History called Caslac or Cailus, held by the French: although it were of the Prouince of Guienne, then belonging to the English. Richard besiegeth it, but as hee approached too nere the walles, hee was wounded with an arrow in the left arme. His desire to follow this siege, makes him to neglect his wound, which impaires not being drest: he takes the towne, but the man saues himselfe, hauing hidden his treasure, so as Richard tooke not the treasure which hee hunted after, with a desire so vnfeemely for a great Prince, but instead of taking gold, death surprised him, who leauing his life vpon so light an occasion, leaues a notable example of the vanitie of this world, in the lightnesse of humane spirits, who suffer themselves to bee transported with couetousnesse, a miserable counsellor both to great and small. This death did somewhat temper the bitternesse of their dissentions, but it did not quench it betwixt France and England.

John had right to succeed in the Realme of England, as brother suruiuing the King deceased; but Arthur Duke of Britany, sonne to Jeffrey the other brother: as wee haue said, pretended the Crowne to belong vnto him, as the sonne of the elder, Elenor their mother being 1123. A being yet liuing. John was receiued by the English, so as being in possession, hee had the better and stronger title. Philip fauoured Arthur, but he meant to make his profit of the brothers deuision, and to keepe the stakes. Being sought vnto by John the new King of England (who had then nothing of greater import then his friendship,) he conculdes a peace with him, vpon condition: that John should yeeld vp all that his brother had taken in Berry, & neuer pretend any thing of that which Philip had taken in Vexin in these latter warres: and that Elenor (Mother to John) Duchesse of Guienne, should doe homage to the King for that Prouince, as depending of the crowne of France. This accord is ratified by a new alliance, the which encreased no loue. Lewis the sonne of Augustus, takes to wife Blanche the daughter of Alphonse King of Castill, and of John's Sister, being his Niece. In the meane time Philip fauours Arthur vnder-hand, who (assisted by his meanes) takes the cite of Tours to his great content. Arthur doth him homage presently for the countries of Touraine, Aniou and Maine, and so passeth on and takes Mirebeau, where Elenor his Grand-mother was, resolving to proceed, but the Almighty GOD stayed his course. For John comes, besiegeth and takes Mirebeau againe, and Arthur his Nephew likewise.

The cause of
a cruel war.

John declared

Pope Innocent
interposeth his authority.

Elenor extreemely afflicted with these diuisions, dies for griefe, and John puts his Nephew Arthur (whom he held prisoner) to death, to extinguish all controuersies, for the title of the Realme: although this death were cloaked as accidentally false out for sorrow. Hence sprung a cruell warre: Constance the Mother of Arthur Duchesse of Britany, demands Iustice of Philip, as her Souereigne: Philip adiornes John, and (for not appearing) hee condemnes him as guilty of the crime imposed, and felony, in disobeying of his commandments. He proclaimes him an enemy, and doth confiscate all he held of the crowne. This sentence is seconded by open force, to make the execution thereof more easie: The Britans and Poiteuins, (wonderfully greued with this cruell fact) arme and come to Philip. So John abandoned of all, flies to Pope Innocent the third, accusing Philip of the breach of his faith, in making warre against him. Innocent the third declaring that the breach of faith belonged properly to his authority, and so by consequence, carrying himselfe for Souereigne Iudge of the controuersie betwixt the two Kings; commands both the one and the other, to lay aside armes, and to suffer the Churches in peace: threatening to curse his realme that should disobey his authority. Philip shewes, that hee hath neither broken his faith nor peace with John: But that hee being his vassale, had slain his Nephew, in the territories of his obedience, as it appeared by good proofes, so as it was not reasonable the holy authority of the Church, should serue as a defence or support for his impunity in so detestable a crime, seeing the punishments of subiects and vassals, appertained to the Prince by all diuine and humane lawes. But there were new complaints to the Pope against Philip: that finding himselfe oppressed with warre, hee imposed certaine tenths vpon the Clergy, to ease the people, who complained of their burthens. Hee did not exact this of the Church by his owne decree, but had assembled a Nationall Council at Soissons to that end. The Pope said, this was done against his authority, and not only threatened Philip with his censure, but also all the Clergy that had assisted at this assembly: Philip lets him vnderstand; That (touching the Clergy of the Realme) it was necessary that out of their abundance they should helpe to beare the charge for their common preferuation: the which he would discharge when as the necessity ceased. And hauing thus sent backe the Popes Noncio, he pursues John, so as in few daies he becomes maister of all Normandy, the which had bene diuided from the crowne since the yeare of our Lord 885. as wee haue sayd.

Normandy being thus reduced to obedience, with an admirable celerity, Philip takes doth likewise yeeld vnto him. John vpon this alarum comes to Rochelle, and from thence passeth into Aniou, but in vaine. Hee takes and vnpeoples Angers, and seeks to seize vpon Britaine, being well garded through the care of their Duke Guy; so as hee knowes not which way to turne him: when as sodainly behold new occasions in Flanders, the which he feedes all hee can to kindle new troubles, whereby hee hopes to finde some rest: but his death shall seale all these toyles, as due punishments for his blind couetousnesse and horrible paricide.

He seekes all meanes possible to trouble Philip with the ruine of France: Flanders ministers A matter by this meanes. We haue formerly spoken of Baldwin Earle of Flanders & after hee had done his homage to Philip, he resolues to passe into Asia to succor the afflicted Christians. He had two daughters, Joane and Marguerit, the which hee left in the gard of Philip Earle of Namour their vncle, with the Kings good lyking; who required the eldest to giue her in marriage to Ferrand of Portugall to the dislike of the Flemings; and in the end hee tooke her himselfe, when as he hoped for profit. John employing all his meanes, he first vseth this instrument to oppose him against Philip in his ayde. Otho the Emperour his Nephew ioynes with him in such sort, as France was in great danger of ruine, by so great forces, in so resolute an enterprise.

A dangerous league against
Philip.

Philip takes counsell for his passage into England finding so good successe in his affaires. Ferrand hauing openly in counsell dissuaded this attempt, shewing it to bee both vniust and impossible, he made many of the chiefe to wauer, ouer whom Philip commanded with great respect, and among the rest, Reginold Earle of Bologne, of whom hee had great need, for his descent into England. Holding him in suspence, he sought to make triall of his faith, offering him a French Garrison, the which hee refused; whereupon Philip comes to Bologne, where the people giue him entry, and Count Regnault (discouering himselfe) retires into Flanders to Ferrand. The league was great against Philip, beeing incountred by two so great enemies, neighbours and vnited: but Otho the Emperour swaid most, hauing promised to assist John his vncle with all his meanes in this warre. But the issue of this great league was not answerable to their designe. Philip foresees this storme, and resolues to preuent it. He goes to field, seizeth vpon Cassal, Ypre, and Lisle, and takes assurance of the Cities of Gant and Bruges, employing his sonne Lewis in these exploits, hauing meanes thereby to be in sundry places, by so faithfull a Lieutenant. On the other side, Count Ferrand falls vpon Tournais, and hauing taken Tournay, he crosseth *Philip*s designe: John hauing sent an army to sea, defeats the Kings Fleete at Dam, and hauing passed into France, he recouers Poitou. In the meane time, the Emperour Otho comes downe with a great and mighty army, in the which they number a hundred and fifty thousand foote, and a notable troupe of horse, not specified. There were great Capitaines on either side. Against the King were Ferrand and Regnold resolute men, who had fury and hope to incourage them. Otho the Emperour brought his honour with the Imperiall Eagle in the view of all Europe. John hauing intelligence of some stirres in England, returnes with speed, leaving his army to his confederats, and prouiding to send vnto them vpon all occasions. On *Philip*s side, his greatest aduantage was in his owne person, which did glister like the Sunne. Lewis likewise was there; Odo Duke of Bourgongne, and the Earle of Saint Paul held the first ranks. The common souldiars were nothing inferiour to their enemies in courage, and they surmounted them in number and expectation of victory: for who would doubt, but the greatest number should vanquish. But the souereigne Iudge of victories had otherwise decreed; whom Philip had called on, in this extreame danger. He sought to incounter his enemies apart, but God had prepared him a greater triumph in a greater Combate. The armies were betwixt Lisle and Tournay, where there was a Riuer to bee passed by a bridge. Philip takes it, and whilest the army passed in their ranks, hee sleepes; being awaked, they giue him intelligence, that the Emperour had passed the Riuer at a Foard, meaning to charge him behind. Philip when he had praied vnto God (a circumstance very profitably obserued in the history) meaning to preuent him; he causeth those troupes to turne head which had passed the Riuer, and that with such celerity, as they came vpon their enemies backs. The combate was furious on either side, vnder the most famous ensignes of the world.

Philip in danger of his life
in the battail.

On the one side, was the Eagle holding a Dragon in his Talents: on the other side, the Auriflambe or standard of France. The Germanes, Dutch and English, shot at the King, the French at the Emperour, the King was in extreame danger, ouerthrowne vnder his horse, the which was slaine, and rescued by Hugh of Marneil. The fame of which fact, is more honorable to his posterity, then the Lordship of Ville-bois which was giuen him by the King, in recompence of so worthy a seruice. The Emperour Otho hauing fought valiantly, was in great danger, and had fallen into the Kings hands, as the Earles Ferrand and Regnald did, hauing performed as much as Great and Valiant Capitaines might doe. But God would

A would punish (both in the Emperour and in them) the rashnesse of an vnecessary warre. The slaughter was great on either side: blood vniustly spilt through ambition and couetousnesse were reprochfull causes of a voluntary losse. The signes of an absolute victory remaine to our Augustus. The field, ensignes, yea and the Imperiall Eagle, (the which was torne instead of tearing) the chiefe commanders, the Campe and the dead bodies. Philip added Clemency to this victory of his valour, dismissing all the baser prisoners, and honoring the Nobility with good vsage, and their liberty. He retained Ferrand and Regnald prisoners, whom hee accused of ingratitude and rashnesse, to haue rebelled without cause against their Lord and benefactor, he led them in triumph to Paris, where hee made a stately entry, drawing them chained in litters, and condemned them to perpetuall prison. Regnald B to Peronne and Ferrand to the Louvre at Paris. All France made bonfires, for this happy successe: and Philip built a Temple in honour of the holy Virgen which hee called Victory, nere to Senlis. By a decree of the Parliament at Paris, the Earledome of Flanders was adiudged vnto the King as forfeited, who gaue it againe to Jane the heire of the said Earledom, being not guilty of her husbands treachery.

Ferrand and Regnald prisoners led in triumph.

This memorable victory called the battaile of Bouvins chanced in the yeare 1215. the five and twenty day of Iuly. To make his triumph absolute, Philip gaue free passage to the Germanes; and Otho the Emperour being returned to his house, willingly resigned the Empire, and died of a pining griefe, which neuer left him after that shamefull flight, hauing willingly sought his owne misery: in supporting wrong against right, and serching danger, to perish in danger. A notable example which shewes; That victories come from the eternall, that mortall man dies before his time by his owne rashnesse, and that no vniust warre can be successfull.

The Emperour
dies for griefe
of his losse and dugrace.

But what shall become of John the onely motiue of this warre? while the Emperour, and the Earles of Flanders and Bologne (great Princes whom hee had imbarcked) bee at warre; he remaines at home free from blowes attending the euent. Seeing his confederates thus defeated, he feares the whole storme will fall vpon him, what doth hee? hee plaies at Double or Quit, and flies to Innocent the fourth as to his Sanctuary. And being forced to saue his Estate in this extremity, he resolues to giue him a good part. The Popes hatred, with the power of France, was the last end of his downe-fall. The Pope had excommunicated him, not onely for the parricide of his Nephew Arthur, but for the ill vsage of his Clergy. To purchase to difficult an absolution, there needed a great satisfaction. Hee therefore sends confident men in all hast so Innocent the fourth, humbly beseeching him to pittie him in his calamity. That if it would please him to receiue him into grace, and protect him against the King of France, he would bind the realme of England and Seignoury of Ireland, to hold of him and his successors, and in signe of obedience to pay him a yearly tribute of a thousand markes of siluer. This franke offer caused *John*s Ambassadors to bee well entertained. Innocent sends his Legat presently to absolue him, to passe the contract, and to receiue the homages of fealty, as well of himselfe as of his subiects. John is absolued, and hauing laide his Crowne, E Scepter, Cloake Sword and Ring; (the royal ornaments of a King) at the Legats feete; hee doth him homage for his realme of England, kissing his feete as his tributary; and binds the English to the like duty by a sollemne oth. Hee was also willing to discharge that which he had taken from his Clergy. This shalbe the meanes to make him loose both his estate and life. This hapned in the yeare 1215. These things beeing performed in England, the Legate returns into France, and denounceth vnto Philip in the Popes name. That hee should suffer John to enioy his realme of England in peace, and freely to possesse the lands which hee held by homage of the Crowne of France. Moreover that hee should satisfie the great complaints which the Clergie of his realme had made against him, restoring that which hee had exacted from them during the warres, vpon paine of excommunication, if he did not presently obey. Philip promisseth to submit himselfe: and before the Legates departure, he frees the Clergy F of his realme of the tenths which hee had exacted for the charge of the warres, according to the decree of a Nationall Councell held at Soissons.

John makes the realme of England tributary to the Pope.

John doth homage to the Popes Legate:

John liues at peace in England, for that which concerned Philip: but see, he is the instrument of his owne misery. Being exhaust of meanes, through the long and chargeable warres, wherewith England had beene afflicted; hee had bound himselfe to the Pope, to restore 1217 restore vnto the Clergy, all such summes of money as he had extorted from them, curing A his troubles: and for want of payment, hee sees an excommunication ready, the which was reuoked, but vpon condition of obedience. Thus freeing the Clergy, hee sur-chargeth the people: and pressed by the Pope to satisfie his command, he oppresseth his subiects, by extraordinary impositions, and tyrannicall exactions, adding force to his commands. So as it fell out, that as he could not helpe the one without hurting of the other, and that the people hate him commonly that wrongs them: behold the English make strange complaints in Parliament against John, who doth incense them the more by his rigorous answers. The English seeing themselves reiectd by their King, flie to extraordinary remedies, and being denied iustice by him that should giue it, they seeke it elsewhere, choosing a King in the place of a Tyrant. France was their onely refuge in these extremities, and therefore they fend the chiefe Noblemen of the realme to Philip, to offer him the Crowne of England, promising to obey him as their lawfull King. Philip (who desired nothing more) makes shew to refuse it: pretending both the truce made with John, and his word passed to the Pope, but vnderhand he sends them his sonne Lewis, his faithfull Lieutenant, giuing him a traine fit for his person in so great an exploit.

John's oppression of his subiects, the cause of his ruine,

The English reiect John and offer the realme to Philip.

Lewis of France receiued by the English.

The Pope sends to Philip for John.

The Pope sends to Philip for John.

King John dies for griefe.

Our English chronicles say that he was poisoned by a Monke.

The English change their opinion.

Lewis hauing taken hostages of the English (for assurance of their faith,) he passeth into England, being receiued of them all with great ioy, as the Prince from whom they attended their health and quiet: He makes his entry into London, which was the Rendezvous of his most confident friends; and by their example many Cities come and offer him obedience. In the meane time, complaints come to Philip from Pope Innocent, as if he had broken his faith; and threats, if hee did not repaire it. Philip denies any breach of faith. They bee (sayd he) the discontents of the English against John, whom they accuse to haue slaine Arthur their lawfull King: and hauing free liberty to make a new election, they repaired to his Son, who was of age to gouerne himselfe, for whose errors he was not answerable. But attending the end of this sute, let vs returne to England. John held strong places in Winchester (whether he had retired himselfe) Windsor or Windsor, Norwich and Douer, hee had likewise factions in other Cities. Lewis (hauing receiued homage from many of them) commandeth his army to march, to reduce the Cities to obedience, who for the most part receiued him willingly. Norwich yeelds without any dispute: from thence he goes to Douer, (hauing attempted the Captaine by means of his brother, whom he held prisoner) he resolues to take it by force, and in the meane time hee besiegeth Windsor by some Noblemen of his party. John sleepest not, he makes a vertue of necessity, employing all his means to leauey men, and to keepe what remained. But behold an accident which ends both his sute and his life. One of his Capitaines brings him certaine troupes to releue Winchester, where he attended the siege, but they were charged by Lewis his men. John seeing his people to perish, some by the sword, and the rest drowned, flying to saue themselves, oppressed in his conscience, not able to endure the reuenging furies of his Nephews bloud vnjustly spilt, hee falls to a despairing griefe, and shortly after dies, suffering the punishment of his iniustice and cruelty. Leauing a notable example and president to all men, neuer to hope for good by doing euill, although the offender grow obdurate by the delay of punishment. This was after eightene yeares patience, during the which John reigned with much trouble, a slaue to his furious passions, the which is a cruell and insupportable commander.

Thus the decree of Gods iust iudgement against John the parricide, was put in execution in the yeare 1217. But this death of John did not settle Lewis in his new royalty, as it was expected. The discontent of the English dies with John, and the loue of their lawfull Prince reuiues in his Sonne Henry. God limits the bounds of States, which mans striuing cannot exceed. The sea is a large ditch to deuide England from France: the Pyrenei Spaine, and the Alpes Italy, if audacious ambition and couetousnesse would not attempt to force nature. The English (pleased with his death that made them to languish) cast their eyes vpon their lawfull King. The Pope interposeth his authority for Henry against Lewis, Who desirous to preserue what he had gotten, prepares his forces, when as the losse of his Fleete (comming from France to England) makes him to change his resolution, yeelding to reason and time: restoring another man his right and estate, to keepe his owne at home the surer

A surer and later. Thus Henry the third, the sonne of John, was receiued King of England, and Lewis returned into France, but John's posterity shall be reuenged of the Children of Lewis, with more and heavier blowes then hee had giuen. Lewis (being returned into France) findes worke at home, to employ him in warre, which hee sought beyond the seas. The occasion was to make head against the Albigeois, of whom wee will discourse in his life, and not interrupt the course of this reigne. It is now time to finish this tedious relation of Philip's actions, and to shew the conclusion of his life. Hee did confiscate the Earldome of Auvergne, and vnitd it to the crowne, taking it from Guy, being found guilty of Rebellion, this was his last act. All the Stanford shires daies were consecrated to make good lawes, for the well gouerning of the realme. At Paris hee did institute the Prouost of Marchants, and the Sheriffs for the politique gouernment thereof: hee caused the cite to be repaired, being before very noysome, by reason of the dirt and mire: hee built the Halls and the Louvre, being beautified since by Henry the second with a goodly pavilion, and the rest of the new lodging: Wherein King Henry the fourth did ad a Gallery of admirable beautie. Hee walled in Bois de Vincennes, and replenished it with Deare and with diuers other sorts of wilde beasts: hee finished that admirable and sumptuous building of our Ladies Church, whereof the foundation was onely laide vnknewen by whom.

1219. The English receiue Henry the sonne of John, and dismisle Lewis of France.

Auvergne vnitd to the crowne.

Philip's actions.

Lands vnitd to the crown.

Philip's testament.

Hee made lawes against Vsurie, Plaiers, Iuglers and Dycing houses. An enemy to publicke dissolutions, and a friend to good order and iustice. He releued the people ouer-charged by reason of the warres. He restored vnto the Clergy all the reuenues he had taken from them during his greatest affaires. And thus hee imploied this last act of his life to gouerne the Realme, to the which hee had vnitd a good part of that which was alienated by Hugh Capet. That is all Normandy, a good part of Guienne, the Earldomes of Anjou, Touraine, Maine, Vermandois, Cambresis, Vallois, Clermont, Beaumont, Auvergne, Pontheut, Alanson, Limosin, Vandome, Dampmartin, Mortaigne & Aumale. Wee shall hereafter see, how the rest of the crowne lands returned according to the diuers means which God gaue by the good gouernment of our Kings.

Philip imploied his peaceable old age in this sort, when as God did summon him to leaue his Realme to take possession of a better. Hee was very sicke of a quarraine ague, which kept him long languishing in his bedde, giuing him meanes to meditate vpon his death, and to prouide for the Estate of his Realme; leauing a good guide, whom hee had leaue and meanes to fashion, yet could hee not make him the perfect heire of his vertues and happinesse. Although Lewis his sonne were not vicious, yet had hee nothing excellent to make him apparent amongst other Kings. Hee would not crowne him in his life time, being taught by the late and neighbour example of the ill gouernment of England, betwixt the Father and the Sonne, finding his forces to faile him by the continuance of this Feauer, hee made his will; In the which hee delt bountifully with his seruants, according to their deserts: hee gaue great Legacies towards the Christians warre in the East, and to the Templers, who were then held in great reputation, to bee very necessary for the garde of Christendome: hee gaue new rents to Hospitals and to very many Churches.

And so hee died in peace, the yeare of our Lord 1223. the first of Iuly, at the age of fifty and nine yeares, beloued and lamented of his subiects. He was fifteene yeeres old when hee beganne to reigne, and gouerned forty and foure yeeres: he left two Sonnes, Lewis and Philip, and one daughter called Marguerite. Vnhappy in his house, and very happy in his reign. His minority was reasonable good, but his age was very reuerend, crowned with all the contents a mortall man could desire in this mortall life, hauing left many testimonies of his vertues, to make his memory deere and respected of his posterity. His Estate peaceable: his heire knowne and beloued of his subiects, and of age and experience to gouerne himselfe, and to force obedience. A Prince rightly called Augustus, whom wee may number among the greatest. He was most religious, wise, moderate, valiant, discrete and happy, a louer of iustice, of order, and of policy, friend to the people, enemy to disorders, dissolutions and publicke violence: charitable, liberall and iudicious to giue with discretion. To conclude, the pattenne of a great King; by whom our Kings should take example, 1219. example, to learne how to gouerne the helme of an estate, in the tempests and stormes of A many toiles and confusions, and by the managing and successe of his reigne, to gather this goodly poesie, or rather to take this passport for the confirmation and greatnesse of Kings: That a veruous King is in the end happy, howsoever he be compassed in with difficulties. But before we enter into a new reigne, order requires that wee obserue the estate of the Church and Empire. Fredericks humility to the Pope, had somewhat calmed the violence of these factions, and his voiage to the holy Land, to performe his full obedience, seemed to bring a perfect peace to Christendome: when as behold a new cause of troubles.

1. Rate of the Empire.

The Pope opposeth against the Emperour.

The Emperour murdered by O. who succeeded him.

The heads of Guelphs and Gibelins.

The Popes soueraine authority ouer Christendome.

Orders of religious men.

Frederick going for Asia, had with the consent of the Princes of the Empire, confirmed his eldest Sonne Henry Emperour, but he being dead, and his Sonne Henry to succeed him, Pope Innocent opposed an other Emperour, which was this Otho, of whom wee haue spoken, and did excommunicate Henry in hatred of his Father Frederick: Otho ambitious of command, caused Henry to be murdered in his chamber. But it chanced, that hauing committed this fact, hee went to receiue that disgrace in France, which was his death: and Frederick the second succeeded him, so as he liued when as our Augustus left the crowne to his Sonne Lewis.

In the meane time the Guelphes maintained the Popes faction with all vehemency, and the Gibelins that of the Emperour. The cities swelled with these humours, which distracted their mindes into sundry factions, whereof grew those cruell contentions, euen in their owne bowels, the which haue continued long with irreconcilable hatred. At Rome, the Prisins and Sabelles against the Colonnos, Frangipans, Cesarins and others. At Florence, the Medicis, Ricci, Bondelons, Amidees, Cerchis, against the Stroffis, Salusati, Passis, Albrecci and Donati. At Genoa, the Fisques, Grimaldi, Fregoses, against the Spinolas, Adornes, Dories and so at Bologna, Milan, Ferrara, Mantoua, Luques and others cities, which by these dissensions haue lost their liberties, and are fallen into the hands of diuerse Princes. Venice was wise in these deuisions, preserving her libertie against both factions, whilst the rest dismembred, and ruined one another. The Popes had still an eye vpon France, to confirme their authority there, as they had done in Sicilia and England, not ceasing vpon every light occasion to censure it, or to threaten it with their censures. But our Kings by the wise counsell of their Parliament at Paris restrained them: not suffering them to vsurpe any thing ouer their royall prerogatiue, and the libertie of the French church. But howsoeuer (the Imperiall State beeing made subiect to the Pope) the way was easie to draw all the Kings and Princes of Christendome to obedience: and to aduance their throne about the rest. Their great reuenues, and the shew of their stately and sumptuous traine, kept the people in obedience: but the deuoute respect of religion (the strictest bond to tie soules) was the fundamentall support of this soueraine authority: the which not beeing limited within the bounds of mortall life, without doubt struck an vnauoidable terror into mens consciences, ouer which it had power. So as the Popes gaue law to all men, and whosoever obeyed not what they commanded, hee was excommunicated by this spirituall authority of the keys, which they say doe open and shut Paradice, binde and loose sinnes. This beleefe E setled in the mindes of Christians, bred a great deuotion and respect in them, and did minister daily new meanes to encrease it. At that time sprang vp many orders of religious Friars and Monkes, & out of Saint Bernards schoole (very famous in those times) from this streame grew two branches. One was called the poore in Lions, the other the humble of Italy: which liued of almes, and conuersed with other men, expounding the Scriptures, and reprouing the abuses of the church, with the like zeale and liberty as we see at this day in the writings of Saint Bernard.

This free and plaine reprehension displeased the Pope, who suppressed these two orders with his censures: and confining the disciples of Saint Bernard to Cisteraux, hee confirmed foure new orders of religions. The Franciscans instituted by Francis an Italian, the Iacobins by Dominick a Spaniard: Carmelites by Albert patriarche of Ierusalem, and the Augustins by Innocent the third. The Vniuersities of France, Germany and Italy, were carefully entertained, by meanes of great reuenues of the church, to settle and augment the Popes authority, the which was mightily encreased, by the diligence and dexterity of such as instructed the youth, easie to receiue such impressions as were giuen them, especially their teachers, hauing

A hauing great power ouer their soules. Such was the estate both of the Empire and of the Church, when as Lewis the eighth entred the royall throne, after the deceale of his father Philip Augustus. 1223.

ploded him confidently but with small successe. He desquieten England, but reaped no fruite. E That which is most remarkable in his reigne; Languedoc (one of the goodliest and ritcheest Prouinces of the French monarchy) began to returne to the crowne, from the which it was dismembred by Hugh Capet, and left as an inheritance to the Earles, the meanes was by the ruine of Count Raimond chiefe of the Albigeois. The Albigeois take their name of a diocese in Languedoc, whereof the head is Alby: the 22. Bishoprike of this large Prouince, but this name was common to the whole party, for that a priuate impression (deuided from the common beleefe of Christians, which hath caused them to be held for heretikes) tooke it beginning with this people of high Languedoc, and so was dispersed into other Prouinces. In this difference of religion we may obserue diuers humors, iudgements, and censures. In so great an vncontenty I will report plainly what is written by the most approoued Authors, not giuing any Iudgement (the which belongs to the reader) neither will I shew my selfe passionate in a matter which I report as an interpreter, or truchman. Platina the Popes Secretary. In those daies (saith he) sprong vp an heresie at Tholoufa, the which (by the care of Pope Innocent) Saint Dominick suppressed, with exceeding great dilligency, with the helpe of Simon Montfort, for they were inforced not onely to vse disputation of words, but armes also, 1223. The opinion of the Pope as to the virtue. also, so great credit had this heresie gotten. Paulus Emilus saith. The vertue of Dominik was A very apparent, in beating downe the heresie of the Albigeois. This infection tooke first footing in the Earldome of Tholoufa (of whom the Albigeois depend) and had infected the neighbor Cities. They called our Popes the Bishops of the wicked, and our Church the Synagoge of hell. They contemned mariages: and held that for holy which is execrable. To ioyne themselves carnally with women without order. They are held enemies of all good men. Pope Innocent decreed a holy war against them & sent his Legats into all parts to exhort them to make war against so execrable a sect. But the Lord of Haillan (to whom this history is much indebted) saith. Although they held bad opinions, yet that did not so much incense the Pope and great Princes against them, as the liberty of their speech, blaming the vices and dissolutions of Princes and of the Clergy, yea taxing the Popes life and actions. B This was the chiefe point which made them generally to bee hated. King Augustus incensed by the Clergy of his realme (who charged the Albigeois with all kinds of heresies, for that they blamed and detested their vices) intreated Pope Innocent to interpose his authority.

The Earle of Thouloufa was the head of this faction of the Albigeois, but hee was not alone. The Earle of Foix and of Cominges, Gaston of Foix and Roger of Cominges, (very renowned men in their time) were of that party: and Alphonso King of Arragon had ioyned in the same cause with them. The Countreies of Languedoc, Dauphine, Guienne, Gascony and Prouence were full of them. Tholoufa, Carcassonne, Alby, Castelnau and Castres in Albigeois, Narbonne, Beziers, Saint Gilles, Arles and Auignon, are directly noted in this history. The first subiect of this tumult was the dislike the people had of the Clergy, discontented with their leude and disordered life: from discontent grew contempt, and in the end a quarrel, and so open war. The Clergy thus contemned fled to Pope Innocent the third, who sent the Cardinal of Saint Maria in Porticu, and Nicholas Bishop of Thuscum with Preachers, who went through all the Country, but prevailed nothing, for that the Earle did visibly fauor this contempt of his subiects, being transported with the like humor. Vpon the Legats report, Pope Innocent decrees a sentence of excommunication against Count Raymond, and sends Peter of Chasteauneuf his Legat to publish it, but he was slaine. Innocent wonderfully displeased with this murder, sends Gallon for his Legat, and by him doth command King Philip to arme against Count Raymond and his subiects, as against heretiks and sworne enemies to the Church, and doth likewise command Odo Duke of Bourgogne and William Earle of Neuers to ioyne in this warre. The assembly was held at Paris, whether repaired a great number of the Clergy, and there they resolved vpon a Croisade as against infidels. The Arch-bishops of Tholoufa, Roan and Sens: the Bishops of Lisieux, Bayeux, Chartres, Cominges, Coferans, Lodeux, Beziers & many Abbots contributed first great sums of money, to quench the fire before it passe farther, Simon Earle of Montfort neere vnto Paris (a braue and valiant captaine, issued from a bastard of Robert King of France) is chosen generall of this army, this was in the yeare a thousand two hundred and ten. The army enters into Languedoc, where the Kings name was respected as their Souereign, but the cities would not open their gates to their enemies army, who (they said) abused the Kings authority. Vpon their refusal Simon threatens to besiege them; Beziers was first attempted, and with such cruell successe, as hauing taken it, the blood flowed by the losse of threescore thousand persons: and in the end it was spoiled, sacked, burnt and made desolate. All other townes being terrified, yielded at first summons. Carcassonne held out, but it was taken by composition. That the inhabitants should depart all armed, onely their priuy partes covered, and halts about their neckes. Castelnau likewise would not obey, yet in the end it yielded, and Simon caused fifty men to bee burned aliue. Alby obeies without force. Lauaur by the resolution of Gerarde the Lady of the place, did resist, but the towne was taken by force, and this woman cast into a well: Amaury a gentleman of the country, (who had maintained the siege against Simon), was hanged. By these fearefull examples, Castres, Rabastens, Gaillac, la Caussade, Puy Laurence, Saint Antonin, and Saint Marcell yielded. Cahors followes, but Moissac being obstinate, was taken and spoiled. This sodaine execution amazed Count Raymond, who hauing excused himselfe touching the Legats death, and being so nere allied vnto the King his brother in law, he attended nothing lesse then an army against him: yea hearing of the leauy, and seeing it to march, hee feared not that which 1215. In the reign of Philip Augustus. Count Raymond and his confederates delated by Simon of Montfort. A which was put in execution against his subiects. He conceived it had beene onely to countenance the sermons of Saint Dominike who accompanied the army with a notable number of Clergy men. Being awaked with so great a losse, hee seekes out all his meanes and friends to oppose them against Count Simon of Montfort, who was wonderfully feared by reason of so victorious a successe. King Alphonso of Arragon, and the Earles of Cominges and Foix, bring him great troupes. Incouraged by these examples to their preferuation, Raymond imploies all he can, his army (as they say) consisted of an hundred thousand men. As this army of the Albigeois by Count Raymond, goes to field to recouer their lost townes, Simon opposeth himselfe courageously with farre lesser forces, and yet ouerthrew these great numbers with little losse. Alphonso was slaine in this defeat, the taking and sack of Tholoufa followed, where there died twenty thousand men by the victors sword, the cities of Rouergue and Agenois (terrified with this seuer proceeding) yielded obedience vnto Simon. This hapned in the yeare 1215: the place of the battaile is diuersly reported, at Muret or at Mirebeau. After this strange and ruinous defeat, Count Raymond (seeing himselfe spoiled of his possessions) retires into Spaine to the Estates of King Alphonso, attending meanes to repaire his affaires in better season. In the meane time Simon doth promise himselfe the property of all Raymonds estates, the which he had gotten with his sword: but for that it was apparent, that the King of France would hardly grant so goodly a Prouince, taken from his kinsman, to one of his subiects. Simon therefore flies vnto the Pope, by whose authority this warre was chiefly managed, and from whom hee attended his chiefe recompence, hauing laboured for him. Innocent the third, finding that Philip (who would not desist in his pursute against John King of England, notwithstanding his interdictions) would not bee moued now by his simple authority, to leaue so important a peece: hee assembles a great counsell, meaning to force the King to yeeld vnto his will. The Patriarkes of Ierusalem and Constantinople were there in person, & those of Antioche and Alexandria sent their deputies, there were seuentie Archbishops, foure hundred Bishops, and a thousand Abbots and Priors. The Emperors of the East and West: the Kings of France, England, Spaine, Ierusalem, Cipres, and other Kings, Princes and great estates had their Ambassadors. By a decree of this notable assembly, Count Raymond was excommunicated with all his associates, and his lands adiudged to Simon of Montfort, for his seruice done (and to doe) to the Catholike church. Philip could not gain-say this decree confirmed in a manner by the consent of the whole world. He therefore receiued Simon to homage, for the Prouince of Languedoc, whereof he tooke peaceable possession: but he did not long enjoy it: for seeing himselfe inuested, he began to oppresse his new subiects. An eele is lost with ouer griping. The people of Languedoc finding themselves oppressed with this insupportable burthen of Simon, they resolved to call home their Count Raymond, who was retired into Spaine, to seeke some means to recouer the possession of his estate. His case was not desperate, for hee enjoyed the Earldomes of Viaretz, Venaission, and the city of Auignon; places kept by his subiects during these occurrents, whether Simons forces were not yet come. Raymond (being called by his subiects) returns into Languedoc, accompanied with a notable troupe of Arragonois, being discontented for the death of their King Alphonso. The whole country banded against Simon, hating him as an vsurper, and detesting him as a tyrant, for doubtlesse vniust & violent things cannot continew. Whilest that Simon seekes to bridle the cities of his new conquests, leaping from place to place, with an infinite toile, behold Raymond is receiued into Tholoufa by intelligence, and with great ioy of the inhabitants. Simon abandons all the rest, and flies thither: but he finds a stop, for coming to the gates of the city, as he approached nere the walles to parley, he was hurt in the head with a stone, whereof he died. The example of Tholoufa made the greatest part of the subdued cities to revolt. Simon of Montfort left two sonnes, Guy and Amaury: vpon the reuolt of Tholoufa, the one seizeth vpon Carcassonne, the other of Narbonne, but Guy was slaine in Carcassonne by the Inhabitants, who were the stronger. Amaury hauing fortified Narbonne, repaires to Philip Augustus, beseeching him to succor him in his necessity. Philip held the Wolfe by the eare: for as on the one side hee desired this goodly Prouince for himselfe, rather then for the children of Simon of Montfort, so was he also restrained by the authority of the Pope and counsell. He therefore sends his sonne Lewis into Languedoc, to reduce the country to his obedience. But he had scarce taken any one castle, when as his fathers death calls him home.

Lewis dies.

So as Count Raymond and his subjects of Languedoc had time to reuieue their spirits, and recover many places gotten by Simon. The King of England would neither assist nor send to the coronation of Lewis, although he were held as Duke of Guienne. This occasion moued Lewis to warre against him; whereby he got Niort and Rochel: and Saury of Mauleon Gouvernour for the English, retired to his seruice. This losse made the warre more violent. Richard Earle of Cornwaile, brother to Henry King of England, passed into France with a goodly army, and hauing taken Saint Maistre, Langon and Reolle (townes seated vpon the Riuer of Garonne) and defeated some French troupes, hee made way for a truce, which was fauorable for both parties: But especially for Lewis, being desirous to settle matters in Languedoc, the which troubled him, for the daily proceedings of the Albigeois: yet was hee loth to labour for another. For this reason he treats with Amaury Earle of Montfort, touching the right he had to that Country: with whom he preuailed the more easily, for that hauing lost the greatest part of the Prouince, hee was not able to hold the rest with the Kings dislike, to whom he resigned it, by order of a decree, made by the Pope in the Councell of Latran: and in recompence he made him Constable of France, with the consent of Pope Honorius. Hauing compounded with the children of Simon Montfort, hee resolved to win Count Raymond to his deuotion, and to perswade him to lay aside armes, where hee did see the euents to be very doubtfull. His intent was to vnite this rich Prouince of Languedoc to the crowne. But reason which saith that no man thinks his owne too much: the respect which great men do vsually beare one to another, & the alliance which the house of France had with the County of Tholouza, were great restraints for the couctousnesse of Lewis. But howsoeuer, he determined to make himselfe the stronger, and to prescribe them a law. To this end he leuied a great army, fortified with his Edicts, by the which he thunders against these poore Albigeois, as Heretikes and Rebels. These Edicts were of force, whereas his authority was respected. Count Raymond (considering with himselfe the cruell beginning of this warre, and the continuance of the like misery in these second armes, fearing to imbarke himselfe the third time with a people against his King) is easily perswaded by Lewis to reconcile himselfe to Pope Honorius. Thus Raymond leauing to oppose himselfe, yeelds to Lewis, and perswades the Earle of Cominges (the chiefe agent of his designes) to the like obedience. Thus both of them abandon the people, and goe to Rome, they make their peace with the Pope, and leaue the Albigeois to the mercy of Lewis, who seeing them without a head, imbraceth this occasion to their ruine. High and base Languedoc was wholly in his power, by Raymonds departure. Auignon remained with many other places in the County of Venaissin, and in Prouence. Hee besiegeth Auignon and takes it, from thence he passeth into Prouence, whereas all yeelds to his will. The Counties of Viuairet, and Die yeeld without blowes, and many families were made desolate, by the rigour of these Edicts, which did forsake both bodies, and goods. The house of Montfort, one of the greatest of Viuairet, hauing followed the Albigeois party (being cursed) makes his peace, by means of the towne of Argentiere, giuen to the Bishop of Viuiers, who enioyeth it vnto this day. These poore miserable people were dispersed here and there, and such as remained in the country, were forced to acknowledge the Pope, as souereigne pastor of the Church. This heate was for a while restrained, but the seeds were not rooted out: as wee shall see in the following reignes.

Lewis hauing thus subdued the Albigeois, gaue order to suppress them, if they should rise againe: appointing the Marshall of Foy of the house of Myrepolis, to command his forces, and leauing the Lord of Beauieu for Gouvernor and Lieutenant generall of Languedoc, he tooke his way towards France. But coming to Montpensier in Auvergne, he died in the year 1225, the 27. of October, leauing foure sonnes by his wife Blanch. Lewis which succeeded him: Robert Earle of Arthois, who died in Morea; Aiphonse Earle of Poitiers, and Charles Earle of Aniou, who shall be Earle of Prouence, and King of Sicilia and Ierusalem. In this year the Flemings were much disquieted by means of an Impostor, who said he was their Prince: but he receiued condigne punishment for his rashnesse, and by his death this error vanished, wherewith many had bene bewitched. Lewis the eldest sonne of France, succeeding his father, goes now to sit in the royall Throne.

LEWIS the ninth, called Saint Lewis, the 44. King of France.

THE pietie and good disposition of this Prince, consecrated to the happie memorie of his posteritie, represented vnto Fraunce goodly first fruites: but his age (not yet capable to gouerne the helme of this Monarchie) suffered him onely to take the first and most pretious gage of his lawfull and hereditarie right: for being but twelue yeares old, he was crowned at Rheims, but his mother Blanche (a wise and couragious Princesse) tooke vpon her the gouernement of his person and Realme: according to the decree of Lewis the eight, who knowing her capacite, had appointed her for Regent. He began to raige in the year 1227. Blanche had much honour in the education and instruction of her Sonne, the which purchased her the free consent of the Estates (assembled at Paris) to be admitted Regent: but this was not pleasing to the Princes of the blood: who pretended this prerogative to appertaine vnto them; and not to a woman and a stranger borne. From these discontents, sprung two warres in France, in the beginning of his raige, the which were suppressed, not onely by the discretion of Blanche, but also by the wisdom and valour of young Lewis, who then played his part with so good successe, as he purchased great credit in his youth.

The heads of this faction were Philip Earle of Bologne, Vnckle to the King by the fathers side: Robert Earle of Champagne: Peter of Dreux Duke of Brittanie, and Robert Earle of Dreux his brother: Princes of the blood, valiant and factious men, who had imbarked many of the Nobilitie, vnder a goodly pretext. That it was not reasonable a Spanish woman, (abusing the Kings minoritie) should gouerne the Realme at her pleasure, and by the Councel of Spaniards, whom she advanced, reiecting the Princes, keeping backe the Natural French from all preferments. But that which was most to be feared in this occurrent of affaires, was that Raymond Earle of Tholouza, who had so great a subiect of discontent against the King (being spoiled of the greatest part of his estate) should ioyne with that partie, and drawe his cousin the Earle of Prouence into the same quarrell: men which were neither dull-witted nor goutie-handed, and who were nothing altered in minde, although they had made a good good shew, yeelding to necessity: the which Blanche preuented happily, winning Count A Raymond (who now began to rise in Languedoc) by the marriage of Joane his only daughter with Alphonso the Kings brother, & Earle of Poitiers, vpon condition that Raymond should enioy it during his life, and that after his death the said Alphonso should succeed in the right of his wife, and if they had no issue, the Earldome with all the dependances, should returne to the crowne as to his first beginning. Thus Languedoc shaken at the first by armes (as we haue said) was honorably vnited to the crowne of France, by this accord, as the history will hereafter shew in the reigne of Philip son to our Lewis. By the like meanes shee drew Robert Earle of Champagne vnto her, a very factious man, and did not onely thereby weaken the party of these discontented Princes thus disioyned, by withdrawing the most sufficient man they had, but also she imploied him against them. There remained a Triumvirate, the which she deuied. They made a good shew, but Blanche did cunningly counterminie them, disco- uering their actions euen within their Cabinets, where shee found access by money. In the end their practise must breake forth. The Earle of Bologne fortified Calais, and the Duke of Britaine with the Earle of Dreux, did purposely demand some of the crowne lands, which they knew well, that Blanche would not yeeld vnto, as Inalienable; whereby they might pre- and some colour to rebell. They now goe to armes, and at the first seize vpon Saint Iames of Beuron and Belesme. Blanche flies to the Maiesty of the King, and threatnes these armed Princes to proclaime them rebels, and guilty of high treason, if they obey not. The confede- rate Princes answer: That they most humbly beseech his Maiesty to giue them free access to complaine of his Mother, who abused both his name and his authority. Blanche admits them, being well aduertised by the Earle of Champagne, that their intent was (vnder colour of this parley) to seize vpon the Kings person. Their desire was to haue this meeting at Ven- dosme, but they had laide their ambush nerer to surprize him by the way. They had aduanced their troupes to Corbeil, when as the King parted from Paris: being arriued at Montd'ehery, newes came that the troupes marched to surprize him. The King retires to the castle (then being of some strength) and Blanche giues it out that the King is in a manner besieged; The Parisians arme speedily, and goe in great troupes to fetch their King, to make the Leaguers thereby more odious, and to confirme the Queenes authority.

These Princes being thus discovered, depart from Corbeil, and enter Champagne in hat- red of the Earle, who had forsaken them to follow the Kings party: But Lewis taking him into his protection, and marching towards them with his men at armes, all their delignes came to nothing: And yet they had imbarcked the Duke of Lorraine and the King of Eng- land in this quarrell. Lewis hauing expelled them Champagne, followes his course, takes Angiers without any contradiction, belonging then vnto the Britans, and from thence hee marcheth into Britany. Terror opens the gates of all the townes. The Earle of Dreux leaues his brother, who (seeing himselfe abandoned of them all (but first of iudgement) confesseth his fault, and doth homage to the King for Britanie: and by this rebellion, hee gets the name of Mauslerck, hauing so ill imploied his time, as to suffer himselfe to bee vanquished by a child and a woman.

These troubles thus pacified (to the dishonor of the Authors) the yong King won great re- putation, and his mothers wisdom was generally commended, who thought it fit that her Sonne should be seene of all his subiects. As he went this progreffe, hee receiued homage from all his Nobility, and ordeined many things according to occurrents. It chanced that hauing erected Poitou to an Earldome, and giuen it to Alphonso his brother: Hugh Earle of Marche, (which lies within Poitou,) would not acknowledge Alphonso for his Lord: his wife Isabell, Mother to King Henry of England, (who had bene first married to King John) was the motiue; scorning to subiect herselfe to an Earle of Poitou. This ambitious passion was the cause of great warre: First shee drew in the Earle of Lusignan, vnder the same pretext (for that there had bene Kings of Ierusalem and Cipres, issued out of this Noble house) and afterwards the King of England. The first tumult not preuented, had almost surprised Lewis within Saumur, and this woman transported with pride and hatred, sought to make him away either by poyson or sword, kindling the warre in England by hired preachers. In the end, after the two armies had made great spoile in Poitou, Xantonge and Angoulmois, both of friend and enemie, a peace was concluded

A with the English, vpon condition, that La Marche should remaine in Fraunce. This was the end of that feminine rage, ridiculous in the issue, but lamentable for the poore people, who alwaies pay for the folly and malice of Princes.

Prouence was gouerned by the Berengiers (as we haue said) since the ouerthrow of Lewis the sonne of Boson: and then in the hands of Raimond Berenger, a fierce and cruell man; who had so incensed his subiects, beeing impatient and turbulent of themselves: as they had re- course to Raymond Earle of Tholoufa his necest kinsman, to install him in their Earles place, with whom they would haue no more correspondencie. Beeing readie to arme, the felicitie of Lewis pacified all. Raymond Earle of Prouence had foure Daughters, Marguerite which B was wife to our Lewis the ninth, and Queene of France. Elenor which was married to Henry King of England: Sancha to Richard his brother Duke of Cornewalle, and Beatrice which was to marry: Daughters of great happinesse: hauing had three Kings, and a Royall Prince. The Earle of Prouence would hardly haue bene controuled by Lewis, but GOD (who meant to plant a generall peace in France, by the hand of this good King) buried Raymond with his rage in one Tombe, taking him out of the world, whome a whole world could not containe. Lewis after the decease of Raymond, pacified the Prouencals, in marrying his brother Charles Earle of Aniou, with Beatrice the Daughter of their Earle, to their great content: adding (in fauour of this marriage) Maine to Aniou. And since this Charles was King of Sicily. Robert the younger brother was Earle of Arthois. By this meanes his brethren remained satisfied. Alphonso beeing Earle of Poitou and Tholoufa, by his portion and marriage. Charles Earle of Prouence and Aniou, and Robert Earle of Arthois, and the Realme continued in happie peace.

These things thus happily performed by Lewis, hee employed his care in the reforma- tion of the Realme, beginning first with his household: then did he plant Religion and Iustice (the principall Pillars of a State) for the good and ease of the people. He led a life worthy of a King, louing and honouring Religion with much zeale and respect, taking delight in the reading of the holy Scriptures, the which he caused to be Translated into the French tongue, which I haue seene in a Gentlemans custodie, carrying this title. Hee did greatly honour Clergi-men, beeing worthie of their places, and was a seuerer Censor of them that did abuse it, whom he charged to liue according to their Canons, and to shew themselves patternes of good life to the people. That they should be preferred to Ecclesiasticall dignities ac- cording to order, in all libertie, and should enioy their reuenues without lette. That the exa- ctions and insupportable charges imposed by the Court of Rome (these are the words of his Edict) on the Realme of France, by the which it was mightily impouerished, and which hereafter might be leauied, should not in any sort be letted without apparent cause, his ex- presse commaund, and the approbation of the French Church. He had a good soule beeing iust, sober, modest, temperate in his eating and drinking, in his talke, habits, and conuersa- tion, neither melancholicke, nor exceeding merrie: circumspect, of a good iudgement, stay- ed, charitable, moderate, vigilant, and seuerer in the obseruation of that hee had decreed. And as the Prince is the rule of his house, he either chose seruants of his owne humour, or else his seruants framed themselves vnto his disposition: so as he had his Treasurie replen- ished to giue to such as deserved. Hee payed his seruants well, yet hee gouerned his treasure in such sort, as his Officers could hardly steale from him, and such as offended he punished with so exact a seueritie, as the rest feared to commit the like. The orders for his treasure are registred in his Ordinances, where you may see them at large. Hee loued and cherished learning and learned men, and delighted to reade and heare good Workes: fauouring his Vniuersitie of Paris, and drawing the Parisians to loue Scholers: so as in his time the Vni- versitie of Paris had great prerogatiues, as the eldest Daughter of our Kings. The Realme was corrupted with the iniustice and extortion of former raignes, by the sale of offices: be- ing most certaine, that what we buy in grosse, we must sell by retails. He did therefore expressly prohibite these sales, and supplied such places as were voide, according to the merits of persons, after due examination, to draw good men, and of vnderstanding, to ap- ply themselves to studie. He punished the abuses of Iudges seuerely, as appears by his or- ders made to that end. And that which caused him to be much honoured, he gaue free audi- ence to his subiects complaints, & especially at Bois de Vincennes, where he tooke delight, & often 1227 oftentimes (beeing set vnder a Tree very simply) like a Father giuing his Children counsell. A He was a capitall enemy to suites, commanding the Iudges expressly to doe speedie iustice; so as suites were then laid aside, and compromises did end an infinite number of controuersies. But his chiefe care was in sparing, for to ease the people: abating the taxes and subsidies imposed on them by his Predecessors: and he did so husband the publike reuenues, as he had sufficient for his traine and his great affaires, and yet a surplussage to releue poore Widowes and Orphelins, to feed and instruct Children, marrie their Daughters, cure the diseased, and the remainder was to build Churches. There are many in this great City of Paris and about it, built or repaired by him. But he said, that the chiefe Stones of Gods Temple were liuing, and they must rather beautifie the Church with good manners then rich walles: words which he had learned out of S. Bernard. But these Christian-like vertues were lodged in a royall brest, fit for the gouernement of this royall estate, Heroike, Valiant, Wife, and Active. Yet Lewis was more inclined to peace then Warre, louing better a good and fruitfull rest, then the doubtfull and turbulent euent of Warre. God likewise sent a greater peace to his realm, then vnder any king that euer liued: and with so great authoritie and obedience, as there was neither great nor small, but held himselfe most happie to obey so good and happy a Prince. He was likewise well garded, for all his subiects were his gard, and he enioyed the peoples hearts by good vsage. The people called him Father, the Nobilitie their Head, Religion her Defendor, the Church her Protector, the Lawes their Gardien and Tutor, and Armes their Mars, by the terror whereof he kept the most rebellious in awe, both within and without the Realme: For after the pacification of the former troubles, suppress in the Spring, there was not any tumult within the Realme, neither durst any one mutine against him.

But to crowne these blessings of GOD, the peace of his house was ioyned to the publike. Blanche his Mother had her humours; extremely louing the sweete of commaund: but shee resigned the Regencie to her Sonne, when as he came to age, and discharged her selfe in open Parliament, to the great content of all men. Lewis and his subiects loued and honoured her much, beeing generally well respected for the good education shee had giuen the king her sonne, and the happinesse of her wife gouernement. Queene Marguerite (the wife of Lewis) was much beloued and respected of her husband, but not so by her Mother in lawe Blanche, beeing zealous of the loue which Lewis did beare her, and of the credit shee had in his fauour, and generally throughout the Realme: but shee could wisely beare with the humours of her mother in Lawe, for the loue of Lewis: a wife and a mild Princeesse, wholly of her husbands humor, whose continencie is commended to haue loued none but this woman, by whome hee had five Sonnes, and foure Daughters, the gages of their inuoluble loue. To this good gouernement was added, the strict loue and amitie hee had with his brethren, and the respect they bare vnto him. Worthie considerations of our Historie, and considerable in our corrupted age.

The manuscript of these miserable Albegeois adds, That euen as the Pope would haue continued his persecution against them, and that the Marshall de la Foy (so called for that he was as it were the chiefe Champion of the immortall warre decreed against the Albegeois) prepared for a new search to roote out the remainders. Lewis would not allow of it, saying, that they must perswade them by reason, and not constraine them by force, whereby many families were preferred in those Prouinces. They called them Valdenes, either for that the greatest part of them retired into the Vallies and Mountaines of Sauoy, Viuairetz, Dicis, and Prouence, where the chiefe seed was preferred at Merindol, Lormarin and Cabrieres, or of the name of Peter Valdo, one of their most renowned Doctors, or that the Valleis of Piedmont haue preferred the families, from father to sonne vnto this day.

In those times also liued Gulielmus de Sancto Amore, a Doctor of Paris, and Chanoine of Beauuois, exclaiming both by word and writing, against the abuses of the Church: and namely, against this planting of Monkes. Pope Alexander pronounced him an hereticke, and armed Thomas Aquinas and Bonauenture (men of violent spirits, and well reade in Aristotles Philosophie) against him, but hee prevailed against these reprobours. The writings of either part make mention, and the issue of their controuersie is apparent. France enioyed a perfect and plentiful Peace, when as Italie and Germanie were afflicted with cruell and tragicall diffentions, by the implacable quarrells of the Popes and Emperours, as if they had beene hired

A to multiply the miseries of Christendome by their importune hatred. The subiect of the old quarrell continued: the Popes would haue Italy, and the Emperours would not yeeld it. Rome (which had beene the head of the Empire,) was then the seat of of their pontificall authority, belonging wholly to the Pope, the Emperour hauing no more command there. This usurpation had beene gotten by degrees, but they pretended the like of the whole country, first they would seize vpon what lay neere vnto Rome, then vpon Calabria, Appulia and Abbruzzo, euen vnto Lombardy the which they left to the Germanes, French, and Venetians, to contend for, hoping in the end to carry it, after a long strife of the contenders, who should leaue the possession more easie to their successors. To conclude, in the end the Imperiall soverieignty beeing banished out of Italy, it was dismembred by diuers Lords, and the realme Naples and Lombardy were made the subiect of long and bloody warres, betwixt the French, Spaniards and Venetians. This reigne was a witness about thirty and three yeeres of these disorders, by excommunications, depositions, armes, taking & lacking of cities and countries, vnder the Empire of Frederick the second, who opposed himselfe against Innocent the third, Honorius, Celestin, Innocent the fourth, Gregory the ninth, Popes, with such pollicies, treacheries, and vnkinde cruelties, as I am ashamed to set to view these scandales of Christendome, whilest that our diffentions doe settle a free Empire for the blasphemies of Mahomet in the East. As the Popes proiects were to become absolute masters of Italy, so their ordinary course was to flie vnto France when they felt themselves the weaker to vse their meanes in necessity, and to vsurpe vpon them by all occasions, as we haue seene, and shall see by that which followes.

To Otho the Emperour (who wilfully went to seeke his owne ruine in France) succeeded this Frederick the second, grand-child to Frederick Barbarossa, of whom wee haue spoken: A generous, wise, and learned Prince, who beeing scarce seated in the Empire, (hauing giuen Innocent the third the Earledome of Fondi in the realme of Naples, to bee proclaymed Emperour) when as Honorius successor to Innocent the third, caused a part of Tuscane and Apulia to bee surprised by certaine Noblemen of the country, esteeming the conquest the more easie, for that Frederick was newly aduanced to the dignity, hauing neither courage nor power to oppose himselfe against his surprises, and euen in the fresh memorie of so many affronts which the Popes had done to his predecessor Frederick. But hee was ignorant of his disposition, being resolute not to suffer the Imperiall dignity to be any thing blemished by him. Frederick goes into Italy, with an army, recouers what had beene taken, and punisheth the rebels.

Honorius, seeing himselfe the weaker, flies to his accustomed meanes. To his fulminations and Ecclesiasticall terrors (these are the very words of the history) against the force and subtilties of the French. Hee did first excommunicate Frederick; then hee flies to France, and doth stirre vp Henry the sonne of Frederick against the father. Frederick beginnes with the most dangerous, for beeing seized of this disloyall sonne, who would haue taken and deprived him of his dignity, hee confines him to perpetuall prison, by a decree of the Princes of the Empire.

He had happily made a league with Lewis the eight, father to our Lewis; and had renewed it with himselfe, on whose faith he relied much; but Charles of Aniou Earle of Prouence his brother, would be doing, being desirous to get something. Hee was easily perswaded with the hope of these goodly Realmes of Naples and Sicilia, which the Pope offered him as the fruites of his labours: so as in the end hee shall come to his aide, and beeing King of Sicilia shall expell the race of Frederick. This tragedy must continue long, they vse craft vpon craft, and whilest one is preparing an other is put in practise. The zeale of the holy land was the Popes ordinary colour to coniure the stormes raised by the Emperours; and in sending them farre off, to haue better meanes to compasse their designs at home, without controule. John of Breyne King of Ierusalem comes, and preuailes so much, as Pope Honorius, promiseth to absolute Frederick the second, so as hee will make a voyage into the East. Frederick accepts thereof, and presently makes leaues in Germany for an army: whilest that hee assembles the Estates of the Empire at Cremona, to assure the affaires of Italy in his absence. The place and subiect of the assembly displeased Pope Honorius, who accuseth Frederick that by his delaies hee suffered the Christians to goe to ruine in Asia, whether 1219. whether he had promised to go, and doth excommunicate him againe. This doth hasten A Frederick; hee parts with his armie (but without taking leaue of the Pope) and arriues suddenly at the Holy Land; where he strucke such a terror into Sultan Saladin, as hee demands a Truce, and obtaines it vpon condition; That he should restore Ierusalem and the Holy land to Frederick; and all the Christian prisoners without any ranome. These conditions duly performed, Frederick victualleth Nazareth, fortieth Ioppa, and the other Citties of Iudea, beeing in a good way to settle the Christians affaires. As he labours thus with a commendable successe; the Pope displeased at Fredericks departure without his blessings, and holding it done in contempt of his authoritie, proclaimes him excommunicate, and forfeits his estates. He presently seizeth vpon the Realme of Naples, and raiseth factions in all the Citties of Italy, to cause a reuolt against the Emperour. Fredericke (mooued with these newes) leaues Asia, and beeing returned into Italy, he employes the Princes of the Empire to make peace with the Pope, forgetting the priuate wrongs he had done him, and obtains absolution, giuing him eleuen thousand markes of Gold to pacifie him. But this accord lasted little, yea it turned into an implacable hatred, which augmented the factions, shedde blood, made Citties desolate, buried Frederick and his posteritie, and in the end banished the Imperiall authoritie quite out of Italy.

The popes barred against the Emperour irreconcilable

Vpon this accord Innocent dies, and leaues Gregorie the ninth, his succesor in the same quarrell against the Emperour. Frederick (hauing satisfied the Pope for his priuate interest, and payed very dearly for his authoritie) said, that he could not passe away the Rights of the Empire: beseeching Pope Gregorie to leaue things, as they had beene before his going into the East, that the Citties of Italy (which had freed themselves by this occasion) might acknowledge the lawfull authoritie of the Empire. Gregory the 9. is wonderfully mooued with this proposition, and forbids Frederick vpon paine of a new Excommunication to make any more question thereof, but to leaue the Confederate Citties in their libertie. This was to giue a lawe to the Emperour: to subiect his authoritie to the Popes command: to giue leaue to the Imperiall Citties to rebell, and to authorize their rebellion. Frederick much discontented with this answer, and seeing plainly that this was the last farewell of the Imperiall authoritie in Italy, (as without doubt it was) he employed his wit and all his means to preuent the practises of Gregorie the 9. who without any dissembling, sought to suppress the Imperiall dignitie in those parts. Frederick tries all meanes to crosse the Pope, he solicits the Gibelin faction throughout all the Citties of Italy, he leaues a mightie armie in Germanie, and enters into Italy, with a horrible waste: Taking, sacking, and spoiling the reuolted Citties, and filling all places with fire and blood: Milan, Genoa, and diuers townes of the Duchie of Spoletum, were thus strangely spoiled by violent force, without any mercie, where in Frederick exceeded the boundes of a iust punishment, the which must be in the Magistrates hands, as the rod in the Fathers, and the razour in the Surgeons, to chastize and not to ruine, to cure, and not to kill. He shall soone receiue his reward, by his hand who strikes two stroakes with one stone, and doth alwaies well when men doe ill, Gregorie stodee at a gaze at Fredericks first entrie, not much mooued with the shedding of so much blood, and the sacke of so many Citties ruined, for his quarrels sake: but when he sees Fredericks conquests to increase, he straines his wit to find out remedies to stoppe so dangerous a deluge. He raiseth some troupes which he calleth Holy, but they were too weake to withstand so great a force. He therefore flies to Councils (the firme bulwarkes of his authoritie,) hee makes a Bull of Excommunication, proclaimes him a capitall enemy to the Church, and laies open the causes by a publicke Declaration. Fredericke continuing his armes, answers the Popes writing by an Aduocate of Capua, called Iohn de Vignes: and so giues in exchange words for wordes. But Fredericks forces had preuailed without a better remedie. Here-upon Pope Gregorie dyes: Celestin succedes him, who within few daies after his election dies, and leaues the Chaire to Innocent the fourth, with this quarrell not yet determined. Innocent in the life of Gregorie was a Gibelin, and by his death (beeing chosen Pope) hee becomes a Guelphe, as great an enemy to Frederick, as hee had beene a friend, a cunning and circumspect man: who politickly wrought the meanes to vndoe Frederick.

Gregorius enemy to Frederick being chosen Pope.

After his election hee sends his Nuntio into Fraunce, to exhort our Lewis to succour him,

A him, according to the ancient proofes of the most Christian Kings to the Holy Sea, and to assure him the better, hee giues him to vnderstand that hee is resolved to come into France, as the most safe retreat of Christendome now afflicted. Hee comes and calls a Councell at Lions, whether hee cites Frederick, but vpon so short a warning, as he could not appeere. Frederick (hauing sent his Ambassadors to the councell, to require a lawfull time, and to aduertise the Pope of his coming) beginnes his torney to performe his promise.

Being arriued at Thurin, he hath intelligence giuen him that the Pope had condemned him as contumax, excommunicated him, and degraded him of the Empire. But this was not without the consent of the Princes electors of the Empire, who after mature deliberation proceeded to a new election.

The thundering Bull of excommunication and deposition is no sooner published, but the Princes Electors choose Henry Lanegrave of Thuringe for Emperour: vpon the receipt of these newes, Frederick staies at Thurin, and hauing sent to found the Germans mindes, hee findes strange partialities, the greatest part of the Nobility banded against him and resolved to reiect him. Thus he felt the force of the Popes power. The prooue of this resolution was at hand, for as Henry of Thuringe (the new Elected-Emperour) approached to Vlmes, to force them to yeeld to his obedience, and that the partisans of Frederick would not receiue him, hauing beseeged the city, hee was wounded with an arrow, whereof hee died shortly after: wherevpon the Princes Electors of the Empire did presently choose Walham Earle of Holland for Emperour, and at the same time the faction of the Guelphes of Pauiia being banished, found meanes to re-enter the city, where they made a horrible and bloody massaker of the Gibelins, with more then ordinary fury vsed in ciuill mutinies.

The Emperour Frederic in this vncertainty of his affaires, being in Italy with his army, he flies to the nearest. Hee beseegeth Pauiia, and for that hee would not hazard his forces (whereof he might stand in neede, if Germany fayled him) he resolved to blocke it, and builds a Fort which he calles Victoria, but he reckoned ill without him that giues victories; measuring the issue too confidently by the proiect. Thus God confounds the enterprises of men, when they attribute that to them-selues, which belongs to his power. This done, Frederick (leauing his Bastard Encius to command the seege) takes his way to Lions, where the Councell was yet remayning: with an intent to repayre his affaires, but he is not farre gone, when as newes comes vnto him, that the inhabitants had made a great sally, and forced and razed his Fort of Victoria, with great losse of his men.

He returnes to Pauiia, takes it by force, and did execute that which the outrage lately committed, might moue a Choloricke man vnto, being halfe desperate: but this surprize repaired not his Estate, for in all the cheefe cities of Italy the Guelphs faction was the stronger, through the authority of the Councell of Lions, which had wonderfully disgraced Frederick: first by Excommunications, and then by a ciuill deposition. Frederick seeing himselfe distressed of all sides (as in great afflictions one mischiefe calling another, the greatest is to be faint hearted) he suffered himselfe to be so oppressed with griefe, as he falls into a burning fauer and dies, burying in one graue, his life, his Desseignes and his imperiall dignity, whereof at that time he was deprived. Thus Frederick dies, leauing Italy and Germany in great combustion: and Conrade his Sonne, the Succesor rather of his miseries then of his enheritance, for seeking to effect that which his Father could not doe, and to preserve the Realmes of Sicilie and Naples to his successors, he lost his life and both Realmes, hauing trusted Manfroy his Fathers Bastard too much: who poisoned him, notwithstanding he had appointed him Tutor to his Soone Conradin, not knowing by whose hand he died. Manfroy seeing himselfe in possession by this title, giues it out that Conradin was dead, and vnder this goodly title to be the nearest kinsman of the lawfull Lords. He tooke possession of these two Realmes. The stronger alwaies preuailes in an Estate. Manfroy was master of Naples and of Sicilie, although Conradin had the right, and to assure the possession of what he had gotten, he alies himselfe with James King of Arragon, giuing his daughter Constance in marriage, to Peter his eldest sonne. This was in the yeare 1255. a remarkable date, for so long a quarrell. Manfroy could not be heire to Fredericks estates, but he must withall succeed in the hatred the Popes did beare him; the subiect of discontent remayning in those (who then held the Sea of Rome) did excommunicate Manfroy, as a disturber of the Church and of Italy, but finding himself too weake for the execution of his decree, he cast his eyes to the place, from whence his predecessors had alwaies drawne assured and timely succors. Lewis our good King of a contrary humor to their turbulent passions, was a spectator of these disorders: but so indifferent, as although the councill of Lions had bene held by his consent: yet had he done his best endeavour to quench this fire kindled betwixt the greatest persons of Christendome. He could not be moued by the authority or perswasions of Pope Vrbain, to take away an other mans estate, being well content with his owne. But Charles Earle of Prouence perswaded by his owne disposition, thrust on by his wife Beatrix (desirous to be called Queene like to her other sisters) and drawne headlong by the shew of these goodly Crownes, suffereth himselfe to bee easily transported at the Popes intreaty. Hee armes, drawes vnto him a great number of French Nobility, comes into Sicilie, giues battell to Manfroy; defeats and kills him, making him to suffer the punishment of his cruell and wicked purchase which he enjoyed not full ten yeares. For Charles Duke of Aniou became maister of these two Realmes in the yeare 1265. and Manfroy was confounded in his vniust desseigne. After the death of Frederick the 2. and the violent elections of Henry of Turlinge and William of Holland, (feare retayning some, and fury thrusting on others) the Empire was in effect without an Emperor, being without a guide, by the furies of ciuill confusions, like to a great shippe at sea beaten with the wind and waues, without Sailes, without Helme and without Pilot. Pope Vrbain pretending then, that in the vacation of the Empire, the gouernment belonged to the Sea of Rome. He created Charles of Aniou Vicar of the Empire, and gaue him Tuscane, vpon condition to succour the Sea of Rome against the Gibelins and Suenians. So at one instant Charles of Aniou was possessor of the two Realmes of Sicilie and Naples, and the gouernment of the whole Empire. But these two great dignities purchased by the Popes bounty, must bee countenanced by his vertues, and this was the meanes.

Conradin the Sonne of Conrade was not dead, as the Impostor Manfroy had giuen it out: but hauing bene patient during these tempests, hee had so well managed his hereditary meanes, as finding himselfe strong, he sought to recouer his Realmes vsurped by Charles Duke of Aniou. Hauing incensed the Gibelins throughout all the Citties of Italy, to draw them to reuolt, he leuies a goodly Army, with the helpe of his friends, and comes into Italy, hauing in the meane time bred an alteration in Sicily, where many Citties were taken, and Nocera in the Kingdome of Naples. Conradin accompanied by many Noblemen, which hunted after his doubtfull fortune the chiefe whereof were Frederick Duke of Austria, and Henry the Sonne of the King of Castile. Charles of Aniou besieged Nocera, where Conradin resolved to charge him. Hauing prouided for the siege, he goes to encounter Conradin, and hauing drawne him to fight by a stratagem, he defeats his Army, takes him prisoner, and with him Frederick of Austria, and Henry of Castile, with a great number of the Nobility. This goodly and absolute victory, leading the Commanders prisoners in triumph, should haue bene seasoned with the wise clemency of our Lewis. But Charles of Aniou his Brother had no portion with him in this excellent vertue: whereby we haue seene, that Philip their Grand-father, in well vsing a victory, did purchase the name of Augustus, and consecrated to the honorable memory of his posterity. For Charles (hauing these great Princes in his power) by the Councill of Pope Clement the fourth, beheaded the two first bathing the Scaffold with the blood of twelue of the greatest Noblemen of the Army: and coopt vp Henry of Castile in a Cage of Iron, to make him die hourelly, causing him to bee carried through all the citties of Apulia & Beneuent, in a most ignominious sort. A reuenge which shall coit France deere at the Cilician Euen-song.

But we haue wandred enough in the confusions of Italy; Let vs now returne into France, F and to our Lewis. Lewis beheld the tempestuous estate of Christendome a far off: which was the more incurable in Germany and Italy, for that the sick refused phisicke, and that darkenes came from them, whence light should haue proceeded. He carried himself very coldly in the heat of these deuisions, the which he could not redresse, But seeing his realme in peace, and his authority firmly settled in the loue of his subiects, and the amity of his bretheren: fore-

A fore-seeing also, that by the wildome of his Mother, he might salue the incommenience of his absence, he resolved to succor the Christians afflicted by the miscreants, both in Affricke and in the East. Phillip Augustus with the Emperours (which had passed thither one after another) had nothing repaired their decayed Estate: and the mischiefe came from the Christians themselves, one opposite to another, the which gaue great aduantage to their enemies, as if they had purposely sought to fortifie them. The Empire of the East was in a horrible confusion, dilinembred by home-bred deuisions, which drew in the French and the Venetians.

One Alexis Ducas called Murzenophile, hauing him-selfe strangled another Alexis B called the young, and caused one Nicholas (another Competitor in the Empire) to be slaine, in the end hee is strangled himselfe. The Theodores, Ducas and Lascars (being the greatest families) contend for the Empire. In the end Constantinople is taken by the French, and Baldwin Earle of Flanders (of whom we haue spoken) is chosen Emperour: so as the Empire of Greece is transported to the French, and deuided with the Venetians, who at that time carried away the Isle of Candy. So as at one instant there were three Emperours in the East: Baldwin Earle of Flanders at Constantinople; Theodore Lascaris in Natolia in the City of Nicea: and the third was Alexis Comnene at Trebisonde, commanding ouer Capadocia and Caledia. All this shall be a prey to the enemies of Christendome: But let vs returne to our Frenchmen, who leaue the certaine, to runne after the vncertaine. They C scarce held this shadow of the Empire three score yeares. Baldwin of Flanders was slaine: Henry his Brother dyed soone after: Peter of Auxer his Father in law succeeded, rather in his miserie, then in the Empire: for going against Theodore Lascaris the other Emperour, hee was taken and afflicted with the imprisonment of two yeares: In the end he lost his head vpon a Scaffold, leauing the shadow of the Empire to his Sonne Baldwin, too young to gouerne a masse of affaires so confused: So as by the aduise of Pope Gregory, John of Breynne was giuen him for assistant. This John of Breynne (of whom we haue spoken) was a French Gentleman of meane calling, who by his valour (hauing taken the city of Tyre) became a Prince, and after in the confusion of times (as the most sufficient of these poore afflicted Christians) was chosen King of Ierusalem: the which was not yet in his possession: so as finding himselfe too feeble for so weighty a burthen, he allyed himselfe with this Frederick the D second, Emperour, who hath filled some leaues in our discourse, and made his peace with the Pope, vpon condition; That hee should succour and ayde the Christians in the East. Frederick hauing recouered Ierusalem, by the truce hee made with the Sultan, (as we haue sayd) left it to John of Breynne his Father in Law, and returned into Germany, to make the end which wee haue before set downe. On the other side, as Christian Kings and Princes laboured what they could to repaire this their decayed estate, Andrew King of Hungary (the sonne of Bela) assisted by the Dukes of Austria and Neuers (whose names are not specified) went into the East with a goodly Army, and (to make worke for the Christian enemies) he besieged Damiera in Egypt, where being succoured by John of Breynne, after a long E siege hee takes it, but it was soone after recouered by the Mammelucks.

Lewis therefore vndertooke this voyage of the East, when as extreame necessity called him to succour the afflicted Christians. The Popes, Innocent the third, Honorius and Gregory, had one after another vehemently perswaded him to this voyage: but the affaires of his realme had stayed him from attempting rashly, to settle the generall estate, and ruine his owne particular: yet being fallen extremely sicke, he resolved to delay it no longer, preparing for this expedition vpon his recovery. He assembled his Estates, and by their free consent, left the Regency of the Realme to his Mother Blanche, who was gladly receiued of all F men, vpon the conceit of her first gouernment. He parts, accompanied with Alphonso Earle of Tholouza and Poitiers, and Robert Earle of Arthois his Bretheren, Hugh Duke of Bourgonne, William Earle of Flanders, and Guy of Flanders his Brother, Hugh Earle of Saint Paul, and Gautier his Nephew, Hugh Earle of Marche, the Earles of Salbruke and Vaudoume, of Montfort, of Dreux, and Archibauld of Bourbon, (very renowned in the course of this Historie, being Father to the Mother of our King now raigning,) the Lord of Ioinville, (who hath worthily written this Historie,) Hugh Brun and his Sonne:

1260. Gaubert of Aspremont, William Morlet, William of Barres, men of great esteeme in their A times; the Lords of La Voute, Montlaur, Turnon and Crusol, men of account in the country of Viarez, inrolled with Count Raymond, who dyed vpon the point of their departure, and the rest passed on. This was in the yeare 1258. about the twenty yeare of the raigne of Saint Lewis. The army consisted of two and thirty thousand fighting men. Queene Marguerite his Wife bare him company in his voyage, but more faithfull then Elenor was to Lewis the seuenth, the Countesses of Tholoufa and Arthois did also goe with their husbands, after the Queenes example.

Blanche his Mother bare him company to Lions, where Innocent the fourth attended him. From thence he went to Marseilles, where he embarked with the Geneuois that were hired by B him. His departure was the 25. day of August, to the best voyage vnder heauen. He arrived happily in the Iland of Cipres, held by Guy of Lusignan, where (attending the rest of his Army) the plague wasted many of his men, euen of the chiefe of his Court, Archibald of Bourbon, John of Montfort and others dyed. The fame of his Holinesse moued the king of Tartaria to send his Ambassadors vnto him, to offer him his friendship, and to acquaint him with the desire hee had to become a Christian. Lewis sends him Preachers to instruct him in the Christian religion: But the Tartarians vnderstanding that the Christians liues were not answerable to their profession, they returne without any better fruite then the shame of their ill life, whose doctrine was so famous. At the reliefe of Cipres, Lewis had conference with the Christians of Iudea, where they resolved to recouer the city of Damiette, C as most rich, and very important for their state. The Mammelucks sought to hinder Lewis his descent, but to their great losse, and also of their Commander the Satrape of Canope.

Behold Lewis is nowlanded, and from thence he goes to Damiette, the which hee speedily besiegeth, yet not with so great fore-sight, but the stranger garrison (hauing made shew to yeeld at the first summons) had meanes to make a boale in the night, and to saue themselves. This happy taking of Damiette, gaue sundry Counsels both to Lewis and to the Mammelucks: To Lewis to pursue his victory, to the Mammelucks to defend themselves, and the rather, for that soone after the losse of Damiette, Meledin Sultan of Babilon died, leauing his Sonne Melexala for his successor: a young man of great hope. The proiect of Lewis was to pursue his victory, and to keepe his enemy busied in attempting Caire, the capital city of Egypt, anciently called Memphis, but the ignorance of these strange places where he was, not onely deprived him of the fruite of his first conquest, but gaue Melexala meanes, not onely to preferue him-selfe, but to defeat Lewis his army, and to take him prisoner. Whilest they attend Count Alphonso his Brother with new forces, and spend too much time vpon the passage of Nilus, behold the miscreants forces-flie into Egypt from all parts, to succour the yong Sultan, from Arabia and Siria. The ieaousies betwixt the Satrapes of Hala and Damas, were by this occasion conuerted into vnion and firme loue, to expell a common enemy, whose victory would proue their generall ruine. Lewis engaged beyond Nilus, in an enemies country, where hee must either vanquish or die; behould a great and mighty army of enemies against him assembled from all parts. Lewis a braue and E resolute Commander, desired nothing more then to imploy the first fury of the French in bataille, incouraged by the happy successe of Damiette. But Melexala (who was within his owne country, and prepared rather to defend him-selfe then to assaile) resolved to weary Lewis his forces, the which he knew would bee more annoyed by the foggy aire where they were lodged, and by the want of all kind of victuals, then by his sword. The successe answered his desaigne: the Campe is presently full of diseases, and those contagious. The common souldiers, the Noblemen, and in the end the King is sicke: all is disordered with this infectious sicknesse. The Gards and Sentinels stand in feare, all are amazed. Melexala well informed of their Estate, surchargeth them with an other discommodity, hee takes from them the passage of Nilus, by the which victuals came from Damiette to the Christians Campe. And to braue these poore sicke men (who had neither hands to fight, nor feete to fly) hee sends troopes hourelly to their trenches to prouoke them, and cuts them in peeces that goe to forrage. Lewis who lay in his bed extreamely sicke, had nothing but courage to maintaine life, and zeale to die in this holy warre, in the which hee had embarked him-selfe very inconsiderately. And not to giue his enemies all aduantages to

This poore maimed troope was easily beaten by a fresh and strong enemy. The Kings breethren were taken. Lewis beeing then prest daily by Melexala to yeeld, he giues care to a composition (which till then he had reiecte) seeing him-selfe a prisoner without hope of recouerie. The conditions were very hard in so great an extremitie. That Damiette should be restored to the Sultan, all prisoners freed, and eight thousand pounds of gold payed to the Mammelucks to redeeme his life, the which they held as it were in their hands. Lewis payes B he was deliuered: but before he returned into Fraunce, he paid the Summe and tooke his pawne, hereof it comes that in the Tapestry of Egypt you shall alwaies see the Host and the Pixe for a memoriall of this worthie victorie. Attending the payment of this summe (very great for that age) Lewis fortified the Citties of Iudea, and redeemed prisoners and relikes, beeing loth to returne into Fraunce with empty hands. But these newes were presently brought thither with an incredible celeritie. All things seemed to inuite fooles and ambitious men to innouations: but God had fetled so great a loue in the hearts of the French to their good King, as they come all ioyntly to his mother, wonderfully perplexed for her Sonnes losse, (a griefe which caused her to die) with as great obedience and respect, as if hee himselfe had beene present in his greatest prosperitie. Priuate houses, publike places, and especially Churches were full of sorrow, teares and voves, for the distresse of their good af- flicted Prince, for the which all sounded out with prayers and deuotion. Their priues were as open as their hearts, to furnish whatsoever was needfull for their Kings ranfome, or his returne, so much was he beloued and wished for of al men. The money is speedily provided, sent and deliuered to the enemy: and Lewis returned into his realme five yeares after his departure, bringing with him Marguerite his deere spouse with the conceit of the same chastitie she had before. But after his absence he neither found his realme so well ordered as he had left it; nor his neighbour State in any better peace. He beganne by the reformation of his owne, making constitutions concerning the Church, Iustice, and the reliefe of the people, against publicke dissolution, Blasphemies, Stewes, Dicing-houses, Playes, and other enormities. He made orders for Marriages, Debts, Impositions, Offices, and Benefices the which are contained more at large in the originall Historie, this was in the yeare. 1251.

The fruites of his voyage and affliction, was that he became a better man: hauing increased in zeale, modestie, wisdom and diligence, better beloued and respected then before his departure: and generally had in great admiration, for his good life and constancie in the midst of greatest dangers, as a miracle among Kings: he found his mother Blanche wanting in his house, beeing dead a little after the imprisonment of her Sonne, surcharged with age and the griefe of so great an affliction. Lewis hauing ordered the confusions sprung vp in his absence, he employed the rest of his time and authoritie, to pacifie quarrels growne among his neighbours, as the Generall Arbitrator among Christians.

England did offer a notable occasion: The English were reuolted against King Henry, E vnder the command of Simon of Montfort, a man of great credit, for some discontentments touching their priuiledges. By the countenance and conduct of this commander, their complaints are conuerted into open warre, in the which Henry and his brother Richard are taken prisoners. Lewis exhorts the English to concord, and doth not seeke to nourish the diuisions for his owne benefite, as his father Lewis had done: Edward Sonne to Henry that was prisoner, giues them another bataille, in the which Simon of Montfort was slaine, yet his faction dies not, but the warre was reuiued vnder the command of Guy the Sonne of Simon. Lewis employed his authoritie so happily, both with Guy and the people (who held his pietie for his owne benefite) that hauing perswaded his brother, Charles king of Sicily to make Guy his Lieutenant (and as it were companion in the conquest of Tuscanie) hee was a meanes to restore King Henry to his authoritie, and the people to their libertie with a generall content. Flanders presented him another subiect, Marguerite Countesse of Flanders (issued from Baldwin father to Jane the wife of Ferrand, as wee haue said) had children by diuers men. lawfull matrimonie, by Guy of Dampierre a gentleman of Champagne. The two first were the eldest and strongest in credit, whereby must needs grow great troubles among a stirring people, as we haue seene a great combustion of a smaller fire.

Lewis pacified this quarrell without force as the Soueraigne Iudge: assigning the Earle-dome of Haynault to the first, and Flanders to the last, and so ended a suite which in shew, seemed infinite, and should immortalize a dangerous dissention: holding those children for legitimate, which could not be reiected without troubling the lawfull equitie of the coun-trie. According to the rule, that a common error makes a iust title. But Languedoc was reade to rise vpon the controuersie of the Earles of Tholoufa and Rossillon, both parties were strong, his brother Alphonse on the one part, and James King of Arragon on the other: B
The question for those lands was the cause. This great family had diuers branches, and by this occasion diuers diuisions, and so diuers names were giuen to this Prouince, now called the Earledome of Tholoufa, sometime S. Gilles, sometimes Beziers, and otherwhiles Narbone, as we shall declare in the Theater of Languedoc. Lewis decreed, that James King of Arragon should enioy the Countie of Rossillon, and all the rest should remaine to his Brother without controuersie, the which was obserued by them and their successours. Thus this good Prince laboured happily to compound controuersies in notable actions, beeing carefull to pacifie all sutes among his subiects, and happily he might haue preuailed in reconciling that great diuision betwixt the Emperour and the Pope, if zeale to releue the afflicted Christians, had not made him to abandon his owne quiet, with all his good workes, C to transport his treasure and life into Africke, and there to leaue them among the Barbari-ans. All declined in the East, Mohamet preuailed so, both there and in Africke, as Europe was threatened by their neighbourhood. Spaine as the neereft, and Prouence, and Languedoc by the easie aboard of the Mediterranean sea. Lewis not able to liue without seeking the aduancement of the Christian Religion, resolues a voyage into Barbarie, against the aduise of his State, and contrarie to his owne experience: a zeale which shall succeed ill for himself and his whole realme, whom he cannot excuse of indiscretion. Thus he inrouled himself the second time, and his Son Philip likewise which shall succeed him, with Peter Earle of Alanfon, and Iohn Earle of Neuers, surnamed Tristan. He left the Regencie to Simon of Neele, and D Mathew of Vendosme, of whose fidelitie hee relied much. Before his departure he made a league with the King of England, to whom he had done many good offices in his great ne-cessitie. It was agreed: That the English should pretend no interest to Normandie, nor to the Earledome of Aniou, Maine, Poitou, and Touraine: and as for Guienne, he should enioy the countries of Quercy, Limosin and Xaintonge, vnto the River of Charenton, all which Countiees he should hold by homage of the Crowne of France, and in this regard he should be Vassall and Leage-man to the King of France. For confirmation of this accord, Edward his Sonne enters into societie of Armes with Lewis, for the voyage of the Holy-land, to march at the same time. This accord was made in the yeare 1269. and their departure was the yeare after 1270.
the first day of May. He parted from Aigues-mortes, and not from Marfeilles, as some haue written, and for that there was no good port vpon the Mediterranean sea, hee caused the towne of Aigues-mortes in Languedoc to be built, and compassed it with goodly walles, which speake yet of him, and with chanel for the commoditie of the shoare, the largest is called The great Lewis, by his name. Edward takes his courfe for Asia, and Lewis for Affricke:
the French armie consisting of forty thousand fighting men: that of England is not specified. The voyage was short and vnhappy for them both, but especially for our good Prince.
Lewis had scarce lost the sight of shoare, and discovered the Iland of Sardinia, when as both he and his whole Fleete had almost perished in a storme. A presage of a mournfull successe.
In the end he lands in Affricke (a countie worthie to loose that ancient name among vs, and to be called Barbarie, for the barbarous and vnforgotten successe it brought.) Lewis F resolues to take Carthage, a new cittie built vpon the ancient name, and held for a strong garrison of the Barbarians: he takes it, but with great paine and losse. From thence he goes to Tunis, a strong and well garded Cittie, resolute to haue it at what price soeuer. But man purposeth & God disposeth: for as Edward, son to the King of England, turned backe fro his voyage of the East, hauing passed but to Malta: & Charles King of Sicilia going to ioyn with

A him, to set vpon the Barbarians of Affricke altogether. In a manner at the same time as they arrived all at Tunis, the plague had deuoured a great part of the French army, and taken away many Noblemen. And to encrease the mischief, it enters the Kings pavilion, and strikes Lewis, although some say it was a flux. But whatsoeuer it be, our Lewis is extreamely sicke: and feeling it deadly, hee calls for Philip his eldest sonne, whose age and vertue preferred him to the crowne. Hauing giuen him goodly admonitions, and exhorted him to serue God, to liue virtuously, and to gouerne his people fatherly vnder the obedience of his lawes, which hee himselfe must first obey: hauing recommended vnto him the loue of his brethren, and intreated all the Nobility about him to obey Philip, he yeelded vp his soule to B God, to take his true rest in heauen, leauing all his followers in great heauinesse: being the most perfect patterne of a good King, that euer was read off in history. He only wanted the happinesse of a good writer, although these small gleans which we finde in the writings of the Lord of Ioinuille make his vertue admirable. A Prince borne for a testimony to that obscure age, and for ours which is corrupted: to be a president to all Kings and Princes of rethe fifty sixe yeare of his age, hauing receiued this mortall crowne in the yeere 1226. and the immortal in the yeere of our Lord 1270: the five and twenty of August. Of Marguerite the daughter of Raymond Earle of Prouence, he had foure sonnes, and foure daughters. A Prince worthy of so great a husband, the sole wife of one husband, and hee the only husband of one wife. His sonnes were Philip surnamed the Hardy, King of France, Peter Earle of Alanfon, Robert also Earle of Alanfon (succeeding his brother Peter deceased D without children, and hee likewise died without any issue) and Robert Earle of Clermont in Beauuoisin. His daughters were Blanche Queene of Castile, Isabel Queene of Nauarre, Marguerite Countesse of Brabant, and Agnes Duchesse of Bourgongne. So as of his foure sonnes there suruiued but two, Philip and Robert. From Philip the third, called the Hardy, his eldest sonne, are issued successiuelly either from Father to sonne, or from brother to brother, or from the neereft kinsman, to the next of blood, Philip the fourth, called the Faire, Lewis the tenth, called Hutin; Philip the fifth, called the Long, Charles the fourth, called the Faire, Philip of Vallois, Iohn, Charles the fifth, Charles the sixth, Charles the seventh, Lewis the eleventh, Charles the eight, who dying without children, the law calles the children of Lewis Duke of Orleans, the sonne of Charles the sixth, to reigne one after another. Charles

Duke of Orleans, and Iohn Duke of Angoulesme, for Lewis the sonne of Charles reigned vnder
E the name of Lewis the twelfth, who dying without issue male, the law takes the other branch of Iohn of Angoulesme, so as it sets the crowne vpon the head of Francis the first his onely sonne, and from Francis the first, to Henry the second his sonne, and so in order to Francis the second Charles the ninth, Henry the third his children successiuelly from brother to brother. This direct line ending in Henry the third, the last King of the house of Vallois: the law calles the second sonne of Saint Lewis, named Robert, who giues the royall branch to Bourbon; Out of the which is issued Henry of Bourbon, the fourth of that name, King of France and of Nauarre, and Lewis his sonne now reigning: but wee will set downe his genealogy distinctly in the end of the royall race of Vallois. It sufficeth to haue noted F the order of the following reignes, returning to the course of our history. Thus Saint Lewis the ninth liued, and thus hee died, the honour of vertue in our Kings, leauing Philip his eldest sonne for his successor.

PHILIP

PHILIP the third, called the Hardy,
the 45. King of France.

The authority of Lewis was so great, as neither his absence nor his death, could alter any thing in the Estate of France. Being dead, D Philip his eldest Sonne was proclaimed King in the army, and (as the time would permit) was receiued with a generall applause of all men: as he in whom the Fathers vertue and authority was yet liuing. The army in the meane time is fortified with the Fleetes of England and of Sicilia, so as the Barbarians seeing the whole country in armes and on fire, they demand a truce, and obtaine it vpon condition.

That they should suffer the Christians (which were dispersed in diuers parts of Affrick) to liue in peace. But that which did most presse Philip, was his returne into France. So as he gathers his troupes together (the remainder of the plague; and of the vnciuill vsage of that barbarous Country) and parts from Affrick into Sicilia, where his losses encrease: for his wife Isabel dies there, and his vncl Alphonfus, with his wife the Countesse of Tholoufa, die soone after at Bologne, without any children, so as according to the contract of marriage, the Earldome of Tholoufa should be incorporate to the crowne. An other sinister accident chanced to Richard the Sonne of Henry King of England (to the end the English might likewise reckon their gaines in this voiage:) for being arriued at Viterbo a Citie of the Popes, walking in Saint Lawrence church, suspecting no enemy: behold this Guy of Montford the sonne of Simon (of whom we haue spoken) kills him in the presence of all his followers, and drawing his sword, he makes his way to the Church doore, where finding a horse ready, he: flies into Tuscane: whereat neither the Pope, Philip nor Charles, were any thing moued. This murder thus neglected, shall bleed hereafter. But these were not all the occurrents which Philip had in his returne home.

Pope Clement the fourth (borne in Languedoc) being dead, the Cardinals loth to yeeld one vnto another, dilagree in the election of a new Pope, and continued in this contention, two yeeres, nine moneths, and one day, as Platina reporteth. Our Philip and Charles his vncl intreate the Colledge of Cardinals to make an end of so scandalous a dissention. The Queene Isabel dies.

Great contention for the election of a new Pope.

A The respect of their admonition was not fruitlesse: For the Cardinals resolute, that not any one of the Colledge that had assisted at this tedious controuersie, should be Pope. Thibaud of Plaisance Archdeacon of Legee, (being absent in the voyage of the East) was chosen, and called Gregorie the tenth. In the end Philip returnes into France, to the great content of his Subiects. Hauing interred the dead, his Father, Wife, Vncl, Ante and Couline, he disposed of the affaires, and of matters of Iustice, according to the instructions and example of his Father Saint Lewis, famous amongst all our Kings. And then he married with Mary the Daughter of Henry Duke of Brabant: hauing three sonnes by Isabel his first Wife, Lewis, Philip, and Charles. But here we shall not finde the happinesse of our Saint Lewis, for this second marriage was blemished with a sad and foule suspect. Lewis the eldest Sonne of King Philip, dyed with apparant signes of poyson. This mischiefe encreased by the ieaousie is had of Queene Mary his Mother in lawe: and Peter de la Broche (chiefe Chamberlaine to the King, and principall Intendant of his Treasure, being the Queenes fauorite) is accused for this fact, who being prisoner, confesseth the crime, and accuseth the Queene, as hauing poisoned Lewis by her command. Moreouer, as one mischiefe commeth not alone: La Broche is found guilty of Treason, by his owne Letters, giuing intelligence to the King of Castile, of the estate of France, being then no friend to this Crowne. This crime alone was sufficient for his death, being hanged: leauing Mary in trouble by his accusation, and by the strange euent: a notable example of the inconstancie of the Court, and the vanity of the world. Mary denies the fact by oath. The King desirous to bee satisfied, proceeds strangely. For want of common prooffe, hee resolues to learne the truth by a Sorceresse: to whom he sends a Bishop and an Abbot. This Witche remained in Holland, and was Subiect to the Duke of Brabant the Queenes Father. The Bishop and Abbot at their returne, faile not to absolve the Queene by her report, but they free her not from the generall ieaousie of the French, nor in the Kings conceit, who after this accusation, did neuer enioy any rest in his house. These were the beginnings of the raigne of Philip, whose progresse and end shall be nothing better. His Vncl Charles King of Sicilia, shall crosse his life with many toyles, and end it with perplexity. But let vs obserue euery thing in order.

Lewis eldest sonne to Philip poysoned.

As by the decease of Alphonfus, and Ioane his wife (being dead without Children) the Countie of Tholoufa came to the Crowne: so Philip failed not to take possession thereof, as one of the most important peeces of his Estate: but hee found some alterations there, through the priuate quarrels of his Subiects. The Earle of Foix hauing a notable quarrell with Girard of Casbonne, had taken his house from him by force, Girard fled to the King for Iustice, but the Earle trusting to his Fortes and the mountaines, deluded the Kings commandements, who knew well how to hunt him out of his Rockes, and to send him prisoner to Beaucaire with his wife and children, there to digest his fellony, and to teach more mighty Vassals and Subiects, what it is to dally with their Soueraigne. Hauing tamed him with a whole yeares imprisonment, and drawne from him proofes of a serious confession of his fault, he grants him liberty, his Earldome, and his fauour, making good vse of him in his affaires. But the quarrell of Nauarre was of greater consequence. Henry King of Nauarre Earle of Champagne and Brie, had married Isabel the Daughter of Robert Earle of Arthois, brother to Saint Lewis, and at that time dyed, leauing one onely Daughter his heire named Iane, with his Widow, to whom hee had appointed the regencie of his realme. After the decease of Henry (which was in the yeare 1274. at Pampelune) the Nobility were greeued to be governed by a Woman, shee flies to Philip as to her neere Kinsman. The King sends Eustace of Beau-marais, a Knight, to assist her with his Councell, the which encreased the discontent of the Nauarrois, who take Armes, and besiege the Mother, the Daughter, and this new Councillor in the Castle of Pampelune, hoping to become Maisters thereof, and to settle the gouernment at their pleasures. Philip hastens thither, releues the besieged, punisheth the Rebels, setteth the Gouernement, furnisheth the Forts, and sends Ioane the heire of Nauarre into France, with the good liking of the Nauarrois, by the assurance which Philip gaue them to make her Queene of France, in marrying her to his eldest sonne. Nauarre continued thus without any alteration wholly at Philip's disposition, whose authority was confirmed in all those Prouinces, and his name grew great throughout all Spaine.

The Countie of Tholoufa annexed to the Crowne.

Troubles in Nauarre.

This worke thus easily ended, an other taske began, which brought much misery to this reigne.

1274. raigne. The French affaires succeeded not well at Constantinople; wee haue shewed into A what extremity the successors of Baldwin Emperour of Constantinople were brought, and now behold the last act of this borrowed Empire. Baldwin the sonne of Robert, in the life of John of Breynne his Father in Law, made head against his enemies; so as hauing employed all his meanes, and exhausted his treasure, he flies to Frederick the second, his Brother in Law, but in vaine: and this was the period of his ruine, for his absence gaue his enemies meanes to attempt, and his fruitlesse labour was a prooue of his weaknesse at his returne. Michel Paleologus a Lord of the Country, great both in meanes and courage, after the death of Theodore Lascaris, (of whom wee haue spoken) had so managed this occasion, as Baldwin could scarce enter into Constantinople, to provide for the safety of the city, when he was besieged by Paleologus, and so hardly prest, as he saued himselfe with difficulty in the Ile of Negropont, and from thence went into Italy, leauing Constantinople with all this imaginary Empire, threecore years after the taking thereof by Baldwin the first. Thus the Greekes are repossessed vnder the government of Michel Paleologus, who in the end seized on the Empire of the East. But the comming of Baldwin into Italy, was the cause of a long and painefull taske, wherein our Philip was so farre ingaged, as he shall leaue his life there, and cause much trouble to his subiects. His Vncle Charles King of Sicilia, shall bee the motiue, but his owne disposition shall thrust him forward. Philip was a great vnderfaker, and oftentimes of other mens affaires; as the whole discourse of his life will shew; whereby it seemes the title of Hardy was giuen him. Not so discreet therein as his Father, who carried himselfe alwayes coldly, a newter in his neighbors diffentions, but when he found meanes to reconcile them with mildnesse. Let vs now retorne whence we parted. Baldwin thus dispossessed of Constantinople, flies to Charles King of Sicilia, a Frenchman to a French; but hee had a more strict gage, his daughter bertha whom Charles had married after the death of Beatrice Countesse of Prouence. Moreouer, he addressed himselfe to one, whose spirit was neuer quiet but in Action. A strange man, he was Earle of Prouence, King of Naples and Sicilia, Vicar of the Empire, and Senator of Rome, holding Tuscane at his deuotion, and almost all Italy: in as great reputation as any Prince of his time, & yet not satisfied. Baldwin arriued presently after this shipwrack, perswading him to hope for better; he tries all meanes to leaue a goodly army to go into Greece; & to restore him with the rest of the French Nobility to their Estates D. and Seigneuries, whereof Paleologus had dispossessed them: not foreseeing how much more necessary it was for him to gard his new conquests of Sicilia and Naples, and to keepe his credit in Italy, in well intreating his new Subiects, and embracing pollicly the Italians loue. As Charles deuised the meanes to attempt, so his enemies sought the means to preuent him. They were not small nor few in number. Pope Nicholas, Peter King of Arragon, and Michell Paleologus Emperour of Constantinople, but there wanted a Solicitor. There was one found out, which proued a notable instrument. John Prochite, one of the greatest men of Sicilia being dispossessed, he employed his whole study to recouer his Estate, by expelling of Charles his capitall enemy. Pope Nicholas a Frenchman, borne at Troyes in Champagne, had called Charles to these goodly Kingdomes: and contrariwise Pope Nicholas an Italian, borne at E. Rome, plotted this Tragedie to dispossesse him, although his successor Martin borne at Tours, did fauour him, seeking to restore him againe to his possessions, but it was too late. Such is the ebbing and flowing of the fauour of the Sea of Rome, subiect to receiue diuers persons, and by consequence diuers humors. Peter of Arragon had married the daughter of Manfroy, whom Charles had dispossessed of Sicilia (as we haue said) and therefore had reason to attempt any thing against Charles for the recouery thereof, holding his title, better then the Popes gift. Michell Paleologus sought to preuent this storme which Charles prepared against his new purchase, and therefore had reason to employ all his forces against him. But that which did most preiudice Charles, was his carriage, and his officers, towards the people of Naples and Sicilia, whom he discontented by all kindes of excesses, impositions, rigorous exactions of money, insolencies against their wiues & daughters, and outrages against their persons. This vniust and vnchast liberty, which exceeded in the manners of our men; bred a iust choller against them, in the minds of this poore Captiue people, which made them to seeke all meanes to shake off their yoke, and to be reuenged. But they had chiefly offended the soueraigne Judge of all the whole world, who neuer suffreth such iniquities vnpunished, although

The French expelled Constantinople by the Greekes.

Philip's disposition.

Why he was called Hardy.

Charles King of Sicilia a turbulent Prince.

A party made against Charles King of Sicilia.

A although he forbore for a time. Behold the party is made against Charles from many places, and executed with incredible celeritie.

John Prochite hauing priuate conference with Peter of Arragon, and knowing the secrets of his heart, goes to Constantinople to Paleologus, of whom hee was well entertained, and obtained what he desired, for the King of Arragon; which was the charges of the Army the which was presently to be employed. This plot was laid by Pope Nicholas, a capitall and open enemy to Charles, from whom he had taken all he could. By the aduice of Pope Nicholas, Prochite (attired in the habit of a Fryar,) goes into Sicilia, (being well acquainted with all the passages) to incense the Sicilians mindes, the which he performed so cunningly, B as there wanted nothing but force: the desseigne was to murder Charles with all the French; and to seaze vpon Sicilia, and all the rest for the King of Arragon; the cuent is answerable to the proiect. The King of Arragon leuies an Army in the view of all the world, but with this supposition, that it was to succour the afflicted Christians in Asia & Affrick, especially after the death of Saint Lewis, who had but stirred vp & not suppressed the Barbarians. Philip who was then at Tholousa, sent to Peter of Arragon, to know his intent, and to offer him his meanes. Hee answers, that it is to follow the steps of Saint Lewis, a Prince of immortall memory, and to helpe the poore afflicted Christians, resolving to set vpon the Affricans as the neereft: but that his meanes were short, and therefore he desired him to succour him in this great necessity. Philip prouides, with an affection worthy of the publike zeale, and sends him money, vnfurnishing himselfe to supply his enemies want. In the meane time Peter of Arragon, and John Prochite loose not an houre, but they employ all instruments & meanes. His Army arriues vpon the coast of Bonne in Barbary, called in old time Hippon, and hauing burnt all the country neere the Sea coast, hee takes Port in the Island of Corsica. John Prochite sleepes not, hauing laid his plot with the chiefe men of Sicilia, at Palermo, and Messina, where the conclusion was of the whole practise, and a conspiracie made throughout the whole Country, very attentue to their deliery; he begins the game in seazing vpon Charles his Gallies and Ships, which lay disperfed in the ports of Sicilia, all was easily effected without paine or danger, and this was a signall to the Army.

In one day and one houre all Sicilia riseth in Armes against the French, both Citties, Sicilian Townes and Villages. All are massacred, men, women, young and old, all ouer-floues with bloud. This popular fury armed with a shew of iust reuenge, spares nothing of the French name. This was done in the yere of our Lord God, one thousand two hundred eighty two, on Easter day at siue of the clock, when as euery one was sitting at supper on this solemne day. Charles was wanting (being the chiefe oblation of this solemne sacrifice,) but the vnderakers had changed their first resolution, to watch a time to kill him with the rest, fearing least his presence should hinder the execution of their desseigne. He was in Tuscane, doubting nothing of this rebellion, which at the first brute must needs amaze him, but he recalled his spirits, and sought for remedie. Pope Nicholas his great enemy was dead, during these preparatiues. Martin the fourth borne at Tours, held the Sea after him, of another disposition, French by nation & humour. But it was too late, the last peale was wrong to the Sicilian euen-song, he could not preuent it. This massaker thus performed by the Sicilians, a signall being giuen, behold Peter of Arragon appears in the view of Sicilia, to behold the sport more couertly, giuing daily some aduise to Prochite, and to the chiefe of the Sicilian tumult, yet loth to imbarke himselfe rashly with the humor of a people as soone pacified as moued. But being assured that the people (hauing cast the chance) grew daily more resolute, & that they wished for him as their deliuerer: not to loose their good-will, and to giue way to his enemies practises, he casts himselfe into the Port of Palermo, where he was attended by all the Sicilians in great deuotion. Charles in the meane time doth what he can; he doth aduertise Philip his Nephew of what had hapned, assembles forces in his neereft territories, sends into Prouence, to gather what he could together in all his ports, & besiegeth Messina by sea and land. The fury of the French is great in their first heat, and had preuailed, if the Sicilians only had withstood them. But the Arragonois was strong and resolute in his first credit, and the Sicilians in their desire to be freed of the French. So Charles is forced to leaue the Island to keepe the maine land, and Peter of Arragon was ioyfully receiued by the Sicilians, and crowned King of Sicilia in Palermo, in the yere 1282. the eight of May.

Behold

Peter of Arragon leuies an Army to invade Sicilia.

Sicilian Euen-song.

All the French slain in Sicilia.

Peter of Arragon enters into Sicilia. Charles of Sicilia repul'd at Messina.

Peter of Arragon crowned king of Sicilia

Behold the beginning of a tedious quarrell which shall continue long betweene the French and the Arragonois, and shall cause many widowes and Orphelins, bringing nothing but miseries to them all. A proceffe betwixt Kinfmen, and Allies, for Isabell the first wife of Philip King of France, was sister to Peter of Arragon, with whom hee had liued in great loue, and had three goodly gages, Lewis, Philip, and Charles. Oh miserable ambition, and cruell couetousnesse, the rootes of all mitchiefes, which make men vnkinde, deprives them of reason, teares out their bowels, and fills the world with a deluge of all sorts of calamities! Two great Kings and old, which should and might liue in peace, now entering into their graues, they lay the foundation of a new life, by their new conquests, as if they should liue hundreds of yeares: And not content to be sick themselves, they infect our Philip with their contagious disease, who imbarques both himselfe and his children in this quarrell. But the yeare shall not passe before they bee all intombed, and Pope Martin with them, who in stead of casting Water, brought Wood and Oyle to this Fire, hee shall bee bound vp in the same bundell, to be cast with the rest into the graue, but let vs returne to our discourse. The quarrell betwixt these two Princes, begins by reproches. Charles complains of Peter; That during the Peace, hee had against all the rights of neighbourhood, affinity, honesty and friendship, against the law of Nations, and duty of Kings, vsurped and inuaded by detestable fraude, by theft, and treacherie, vnworthy of a Prince, and an honest man, the realme of Sicilia, giuen him by authority of the holy Sea, as a holy gage of the Church. Peter answers: That Charles is the vniust vsurper, hauing violently taken the Lands of the Empire from Manfroy the lawfull heire. That hee could not bee ignorant of his right, hauing married Constance his daughter, by whom hee had Sonnes, to whom he could not denie the duty of a Father, without wronging of Nature.

The Pope supports Charles against Peter.

Philip succours his vnkle Charles.

The Sicilians seeke to make their peace with Charles.

Thus he opposeth the authority of Nature to the Popes power, right to wrong, and reason to passion. Moreouer to this law of nature he ioines faith, the ground of humane society, being called and desired by a people vniustly wronged in their goods, liues, and honors. Should he then contemne their teares, being bound to succour them? Hee hath therefore done what he ought, a lawfull heire against an vsurper and a tyrant, for poore people oppressed: resolute to continue so great a worke, worthy of a Christian King, perswading himselfe that God, who had giuen him a good beginning, would send him a happy ending, leading Sicilia free and peaceable to his posteritie. And thus one for another. Here-vnto Pope Martin the fourth did adde his thundrings, supporting Charles his cause with as great vehemencie, as his Predecessor Nicholas had laboured to plot this practise against him. He sends a Legat to the Sicilians to let them vnderstand that they were excommunicated, and their goods confiscate. The Legat deliuers his Commission freely, & cites all the people to Rome with an expresse inhibition to all Priests, not to communicate any Sacraments vnto them vnder great paines: So all the Churches in Sicilia were shut vp by the Popes command. The same thunderboulte is cast against Peter, he is Excommunicated, degraded, and his realme of Arragon accursed, but from words they fell to blowes. Charles resolute to hazard all, intreats Philip his nephew to succour him with his best meanes in this his great necessitie. And the better to ingage him, he giues Catherin (the daughter of his sonne Charles the lame) in marriage to Charles the yongest sonne of Philip, and in consideration of this marriage giues him the Duchy of Aniou. Of this marriage shall issue Philip of Vallois, who shall be King of France 43. yeares after. All France armes for this warre: Philip employes all his meanes, Peter Earle of Alanson the Kings brother, Robert Earle of Artois his nephew, the Duke of Bourgongne, the Earles of Bologne, Dampmartin, and Iogny, with an infinit number of the Nobility, repaire from all parts of the Realme: Charles sending men expresse with priuate letters, to all his friends to inuite them to this warre. And to keepe Paleologus in Constantinople, he workes with the Christians of Asia, and with the Ilands of Cipres, Malta, Rhodes, and others to make warre against him, and likewise hee sought to disquiet Arragon, by meanes of the Nauarrois, Philip remaining at Toloufa for that purpose.

Behold the Arragonois in great perplexity, charged on all sides, both with spirituall and temporal armes, but that which troubled him most, the Sicilians (excommunicated by the Pope, and amazed at so great forces as came to Charles from all parts) not onely grew cold, but also sought to make their peace with Charles. To this end they goe to Rome to Pope Martin,

A Martin, of whom they craue pardon with an extraordinary humility, for the History noates that their Deputies beeing on their knees, cryed to the pope, Qui tollis peccata mundi misereere nostri. A title belonging onely to Iesus Christ. This deuout respect, had in a manner drawne the Sicilians to Charles his obedience, wherein doubtlesse hee had preuailed, if hee would haue embraced the occasion, for pope Martin had perswaded them to yeeld, but without a French garrison; Whereunto Charles would not condescend, seeking to haue them at his discretion. Peter was not quiet in minde amidst all these difficulties, hauing the Pope in front, the people ready to reuolt, Philip watching ouer his Realme of Arragon, and an army in the port of Naples ready to land.

He findes an expedient for all these difficulties, to stay all these forces, to quiet this storm of Sicilia and to escape all dangers, after a manner in few worthy of commendation, for the reputation valour and bounty of so great a prince. He giues Charles to vnderstand that hee lamented the common misery of so much people, whom hee did see in danger for their priuat quarrels, that it were much better to end it betwixt themselves by the sword. That if he were an honest man, a fouldiar, and a King, hee was ready to fight, with him, and Sicilia had onely the aduantage in one thing, hee was more cunning then Charles, and his intent was to circumuent him, as indeed hee did. Charles willingly accepts the combat. The manner is determined by a common consent. That either King should take a hundred choise horse, and that the conquering troupe should purchase Sicilia to his King.

A Combate appointed betwixt two Kings.

Bourdeaux is chosen for the place of combat, the day is appointed. All Europe flies to this Theater, to see an end of so notable a quarrel, by such an extraordinary meanes. Charles comes to the place at the prefixed day with his troupe chosen out of the brauest Gentlemen of the army. Peter appears not, nor any one for him. Hee is called, hee is summoned, they protest against him, but there is no newes of him. So after all these tollerne protestations, euery one retires with laughter: but Peter was otherwise imploied; he assured Sicilia by his wiues meanes, whom he sent thither, prouiding to fortifie the weaker places, both of Sicilia and Naples equally threatned. The heate of the French is cooled, by this intermission of time, by the hope of an accord, and by the departure of so great a multitude disbanded to see this fight; the Sicilians had taken breath, and Peter stood firme to chooſe his best aduantage. The French (being out of hope to see this controuersie ended by combat) returne to armes, (but with lesse courage,) To make warre in Sicilia, they must approach, and they must land. Roger of Lore a banished man of Apulia, Admirall of the Arragon fleet, had the gard of the landing: Charles the lame, sonne to King Charles, offers to land, but his fleet is defeated, and he taken prisoner.

Peter fortifies himselfe in Sicilia.

Charles King of Naples dies.

Philip makes warre against Peter of Arragon.

Warre in Arragon.

Charles wonderfully perplexed with this losse, runnes from citie to citie in his Realme of Naples, seeking to raise new forces; when as death calls him to his rest: the which in his life time hee would neuer enioy, hauing giuen to many, and receiued himselfe infinit troubles without any fruite. In his youth his enterprises were happy, but in his age very vfortunate. Robert Earle of Artois (by the decease of the father, and imprisonment of the sonne) remains Tutor to the children of his father in law Charles the lame, and Regent of the Realme of Naples: but Peter of Arragon keeps Sicilia (at that time lost) for the French. After the death of Charles of Aniou, behold Peter of Arragon is assailed with a new partie. Pope Martin the fourth doubled his excommunications against him, as a capitall enemy of the Church, and inuested Charles the yongest sonne of Philip King of France in his realme: hee absolues the Arragonois from their oath of obedience, and proclaimes a holy warre, as against a sworne enemy of the Church. For the execution of these threats, Philip employes all his meanes to raise a goodly army, vowing to bee no more circumuented by Peter of Arragon. James King of Maiorica and Minorica ioynes with him an enemy to Peter, who had spoiled him of his Estate, so as there were foure Kings in this army. Philip King of France, and his eldest sonne Philip King of Nauarre. Charles his sonne inuested in the Realme of Arragon by the Pope, and James King of Maiorica. The army was faire, and the Frenchmens courage great, being very resolute to reuenge the massacre of the Sicilian Euen-song: the ridiculous scorne of the combat, and the imprisonment of Charles. The red scarfe, the marke of the holy warre, against one excommunicated, and their courageous 1286. courageous resolution, to bee reuenged of a cruell enemy, who had shed bloud by treason, A appears in these troupes brauely armed. All this promised a great victory to Philip, who commanded his army in person. But the issue will shew, that being a Conqueror he lost the fruits of his victory, and in the death of three great personages, shall bee scene the vanity of this world. Philip enters the countie of Rossillon with a goodly army: all obeies him, except the cities of Genes nere to Perpignan, the which he besieged, and it was well defended, but in the end it was taken by the French. Peter was come out of Sicilia to defend his fathers inheritance: he fortifies all hee can against Philip, and the difficulty of passages, seemed to fauor him; but the resolution of the French surmounted the steepenesse of the Rockes.

Peter of Arragon defeated. The passages are forced, Peters army is defeated, and hee saues himselfe with difficulty by these inaccessible places. The army enters the countie of Emporias. Pierrelate yeelds in one day: Gironne is besieged, and as Peter comes to succour it, the French encounter him, and overcome him, who hardly saues himselfe in Ville-franch, extreemely amazed with this happy beginning of Philip. What followed? hee that was accustomed to deceiue all the world by his inuentions and policies, could not by any meanes deceiue death, transported with griefe, sorrow, impatiencie, and dispaire, hee dies the fiftene of August, in the same yeere with his enemy Charles. The brute of Peters death makes Gyrone to yeeld presently, beeing a very strong city, and promisseth Philip an assured possession, not onely of the Realme of Arragon, but also of Sicilia, where in shew they could not resist: when as behold other occurrents, which mans reason could not preuent. Philip assuring himselfe thus of the peaceable possession of the Realme of Arragon, minding to free himselfe of a needlesse charge, hee dismisseth the Gallies of Genoa and Pisa, the which hee had hired, and for that the plague was crept into his Campe, hee had dispersed his forces about the cities of Gironne and Perpignan, whether hee retired himselfe very sicke, with an intent to pacifie the whole countie, hauing recovered his health, and taken some breath.

He dies,

Roger Admirall of Arragon, (of whom wee haue spoken) ignorant of Peters death, was parted from Sicilia, with an intent to bring him succours against the French flecte. Beeing arriued at Genoa (a newter cittie, and of free acceffe for both parties) hee is informed both of the death of his Maister, and of the Estate of Perpignan, and beeing there, of this new accident, hee takes a new aduise. In steed of returning into Sicilia, hee hires the Gallies of Genoa and Pisa, dismissed by Philip & resolves to enter the port of Perpignan, where hee had intelligence, that Philip remained without any great garde, and the port to bee without defence. Hee arriues so happily, as without any opposition hee giues a signall to the people of his arriual, who sodenly rise and kill the French in the houses and streetes.

Philip set vpon vnwares and in danger.

The death of Philip.

Philip lay sicke in his bed, and the French souldiars had no thought of Roger. The King made a vertue of necessity, hee encourageth his men with a sicke and feeble voice and they behaued themselves so valiantly, as they expell Roger out of Perpignan, and Philip held the city, who was so distempered with this alarm, as his sickness encreased dayly, and hee died the fiftenth day of October, hauing suruiued Peter but two monthes: In the same yeare 1286. and in the same moneth died Pope Martin the fourth, to shew vnto great princes the incertainty of their great designs.

His children.

Thus liued, thus reigned, and thus died Philip the third, surnamed the Hardy, hauing reigned fiftene yeeres, and liued forty, a great vndertaker, leauing no memorable act to his posterity, but a good example, not to deale in other mens affaires. Of his first wife Isabel hee had Philip and Charles remaining. Charles was Earle of Vallois, of Alanson, and of Perche, father to Philip of Vallois, who in his course shall succeed to the crowne. Philip his eldest sonne was King of France: of the same marriage hee had one daughter, Mary who was Dutchesse of Austria: By his second wife Mary, hee had Lewis Earle of Eureux, and Marguerite Queene of England. The estate of the Empire (after a long confusion of diuers Emperors, and the interregne) had some rest: the Popes being buied in the warres of Sicilia. Raoul of Auspourg a good and a wise prince, was chosen Emperour after these disorders: imploying himselfe carefully to cure the wounds of Germany, and held the Empire from the yeare 1273. vnto 93. The estate of the Church appears by that which hath bin spoken in this reigne. This onely is particular; That a Councell was held at Lions by Gregory the tenth, where it was decreed; That to auoide the tediousnesse of the Popes election, the Cardinalls should

A should assemble at the Popes death, and keepe the Conclau, neither going forth, nor conferring with any one, vntill the Pope were chosen. The which is practised at this day. In those dayes dyed Thomas Aquinas, a very subtile disputer, Bonaventure, Iohn Duns called Scot, and Gabriel Biel (famous men in those daies) suruiued him. 1286.

PHILIP the fourth, called the Faire, the 46. King of France.

HE found his authoritie respected within the Realme, as well for his age, as hauing governed the State with dignitie vnder his father Philip. A good Prince, ludicious, and of a noble mind, and (the which was not the least point of happinesse in this life) he was well married with Joane Queene of Nauarre, whereof he rooke the name of King, before the decale of his father, enioying her as a sweet companion of his complexions. Hee had three sonnes by her, goodly Princes of bodie, and excellent spirits, Lewis, Philip, and Charles, which shall be Kings successiue one after another; but all so ill matched, as it was his griefe to see his childrens houses infected with three Strumpets, and put away without all hope of issue: hauing seuerely punished the corrupters of his Daughters in lawe, and confined these insatiate maisties into Monasteries. Hee had also one Daughter of the same bed, named Isabel, who was married to Edward King of England, leauing vnto France a heauie and dangerous Leuaine of horrible confusion, by the meanes of her sonne, a fatal scourge for this Realme. Philip after the decale of Joane, married Constance the Daughter of Charles King of Sicily, a faire and a young Princessse, whom he left great with a sonne, the which was borne eight daies after his decale, and suruiued him but few daies. He began to raigne in the yeare 1286. and died in the yeare 1315. hauing reigned twentie and nine yerres. The entrance of this raigne was goodly, but Flanders, Guienne, and the Pope, gaue him (vpon diuers occasions, and at diuers times) many great and painefull crosses. He loued Iustice and Learning, wherein he was well instructed, for that age: so as he did consecrate the first fruites of his raigne, to honour both the one and the other: as also the Muses did honour 1293. honour him with a goodly Oration which is read in the Originall of this History, for a commendable memory to posterity, of the vertues of this great Prince. The Parliament was not tied to any place, but changed according to the necessity of Prouinces. Sutes were most commonly iudged definitiue by the Bayliffes and Seneschals, and the greatest causes were decided souereignly in the Kings counsell, who gaue free audience to their subiects. Philip hauing obserued (by the experience of former reignes,) that it was very necessary to haue iurisdiccions distinctly limited, left a Souereigne power to his Parliament at Paris (a part of his royall authority) in ciuill and criminall causes: and the better to gouerne it, hee appointed a sufficient number of presidents and counsellors, with his aduocate and proctor, (which number hath bene since augmented according to occasion) and for the greater countenance of this dignity, he placed it in his chiefe cite of Paris: and to that end he caused that great palace (one of the most admirable buildings vnder the coape of heauen) to be built by the meanes of Enguerand of Marigny Earle of Longueuille, Superintendant of the treasure of France. He first ordeined but two sittings of the Parliament in the yeere, the which necessity hath made ordinary vnder Lewis Hutin his sonne, who also erected an Exchequer at Roan.

The Parliament of Paris erected.

The palace built.

Colledge of Nauarre.

Cause of the warre in Flanders.

The cause of quarrell in Guyenne.

Occasions to renew the war with the English.

Other Prouinces had their Parliaments at diuers times, and vpon diuers occasions: with like affection hee fauoured his Vniuersities of Paris, with all manner of priuiledges: hauing his wife Joan a companion of the same humour, whom hee suffered to build in her name that goodly Colledge of Nauarre, where at this day in this iron age, wee may behold with admiration, the great bounty of our Kings in commendable and vertuous actions. These goodly beginnings (in the first frutes of a sound peace,) were crossed with many difficulties, both within and without the realme. Flanders gaue the first subiect. This country is one of the chiefe Seigneuries of this Monarchie, and in the yeere 1225. this lawfull subiection was acknowledged at Melun by the Earle of Flanders. In the beginning of this reigne, Guy Earle of Flanders came to doe his homage to Philip, who required to haue the cities of Flanders to ratifie this peace of Melun, the which was performed, but vnwillingly by this rich people, who still complained vnto Philip, that his parliament at Paris did infringe their priuiledges, for the which hee wisely provided: but the great security of these rich cities must needs bee the cause of their owne afflictions, as it chanced often, that a rich people, being too far, seeke wilfully their owne ruine. Guienne did likewise much trouble Philip, and these two quarrells were intricate one with another, like vnto diseases which come together, according to the times and occasions when they chance. The King of England was Duke of Guienne since the marriage of Eleanor, as we haue seene: but many difficulties haue fallen out: the accord made by the King Saint Lewis, specified by vs, had limited the Seigneuries of Guienne to the English, the which hee should hold by homage of our crowne: but hee could not limit his desire, being watchfull vpon all occasions, to free himselfe from the subiection of France. Let vs follow by degrees, the actions and the order of times, in the comberfome report of these new stormes, falling out diuersly, and in diuers places: like as in a time inclined to raine, a cloud dischargeth it selfe by planets in diuers parts.

The force and neighborhood of England increased the quarrell, and caused a continuance by diuers accidents. Edward the first of that name, son to Henry the third, liued then in England, & Count Guy in Flanders. Edward came likewise into France, & did homage to the new King for the Duchy of Guienne, and other lands which hee held of the crowne, as Guy had done for his. It chanced that certain English ships scouring along the coast of Normandy, made a great spoile of the subiects of France. Philip vpon their complaints, intreats Edward to cause restitution to be made of that which had bene vnjustly taken by his subiects. Edward neglects it: so as Philip cauteh him to be adorned, to yeeld a reason of this attempt, as vassall to the crowne. He appears not, and so by sentence he is declared guilty of felony, and of high treason, and to haue forfeited his interest in all his Seigneuries of France. For the execution of this decree, Arnoul of Neele constable of France is sent into Guienne with an army, in the yeere 1293. a notable dare to coat the first letter in this Inuentary of a very long processe, although with some intermission, yet so violent, as it had almost ruined France. The Constable doth his exploit, he taketh Bourdeaux the chiefe city of Guienne, & then

A then most of the other townes do willingly yeeld obedience vnto the King. Rions and some other castles well fortified by the English hold good, to serue as a Leuaine of this warre.

Edward seeing himselfe thus assailed, armes by sea and land. By sea hee sends an army vnder the conduct of Robert Tiptot: by land he sends some forces vnder the command of John Breton, to preterue that which remained in Guienne: and to fortifie himselfe with friends in the doubtfull euents of so important a cause, hee makes a league with Guy Earle of Flanders, and for confirmation thereof, hee demands his daughter Philip for his eldest sonne the Prince of Wales, the heire apparent to the crowne of England, which the Earle accepts willingly. And to omit nothing that might auaille him, hee enters league with Henry Duke of Bar, giuing him Eleanor his daughter in marriage, and with Adolphe of Nassau Emperour, both hauing pretensions against France. The Duke of Bar demanded Champagne of the King, by the rights he pretended, and enters it with forces. Philip sends Gualter of Crecy the Lord of Chastillon vpon Marne against him with a goodly army, who on the other side (entring into Barrois) makes a diuersion, and forceth the Duke to returne to defend his owne against Gualter. The Emperour after a brauing manner giues notice vnto the King, that hee will make warre against him, to recouer the lands belonging to the Empire. Philip makes no other answer, but sends him a packet well sealed vp, in the which was a white paper fouled like a letter, without any writing. This scoffe was a great defie, as indeed the braueries of Adolphe had no successe. The Earle of Flanders was the neereft and most dangerous enemy to prejudice Philip, who had ioyned himselfe to the King of England, by so strict a bond as the marriage of his daughter. Philip hauing three great enemies in front, tries his wittes to stay them. The most dangerous was hee that dealt vnder-hand, that is the Fleming: who made a good thew to Philip, and yet treated with his most dangerous enemy, but policy did circumuent policy. The King findes meanes vnder-hand, to giue him notice that hee would gladly see his daughter, whom hee had christened, and was called Philip by his name, before hee led her into England. Guy brings her with him to Paris: being arriued, he is committed prisoner by the King: the cause is made knowne vnto him by such as had commandement to arrest him. That being his vassall, he had presumed to alie himselfe with a capital enemy to the crowne, giuing him so precious a gage as his daughter. Guy obtaines leau to speake with the King. He executeth himselfe, but his daughter remaines as a pawne with the Queene, to be married at the kings good pleasure. His daughter (although kindly entertained by the King and Queene) was full of greefe, lamenting daily, as if this honourable garde had bene a more cruell prison. The Earle intreats Philip to send him his daughter: hee answers him plainly, that hee tooke her not to restore her. Herevpon Guy takes occasion to complaine of the great wrong hee pretended to bee done him by Philip, who detaines his daughter forcibly without reason.

Philip seizeth vpon the Earle of Flanders daughter.

The English in the meane time make open warre in Guienne. Philip foreseeing that this was the beginning of a great storme (meaning to lay the burthen vpon him that might doe him harme) sends a goodly army into Guienne against the English, vnder the conduct of two great Commanders, his brother Charles Earle of Valois, & the Constable of Neele, to molest the enemy in diuers places. Rions and Fronfac, townes vpon the riuer of Garonne, (then strong, but now ruined) are besieged, and after many difficulties, yeeld vnto the King, and in the end Saint Seuer, but with more paine. Edmond, brother to the King of England is defeated at sea, and returning into England, repaires his Navy. But striving afterwades in vaine to besiege Bourdeaux with new forces, hee goes and dies at Bayonne, then belonging to the English.

The English affaires succeeded ill.

Thus all things succeeding ill for the English, hee seekes all meanes to fortifie himselfe. Hee flies to the Emperour Adolphe, the chiefe instrument of his hope, and sends him money to leauy an army. To Pope Boniface the eight, beseeching him to remember the priuate bond hee had to the preservation of England, whereof hee was protector. Guy Earle of Flanders ioynes openly with the English in this societie, to make warre against Philip with all his forces. But from these light beginnings sprung diuers occasions which troubled these great Princes. The Fleming is the chiefe aduancer of this tragedy, and shall haue his share in it.

1296. Hee calles a great assembly in the city of Gramont, in the yeare 1296. at the feast of A Christmas, where Adolph the Emperour, Edward King of England, the Duke of Austria, John Duke of Brabant, the Earle of Iuliers, William of Iuliers his sonne, John Earle of Holland and of Haynault, Robert Earle of Neuers, Villiam, Henry and Guy of Flanders, John Earle of Namur, and many other great personages meete, and with one consent resolute to make warre against Philip. The colour was to maintaine Guy Earle of Flanders, vniuersally afflicted by Philip, who had violently taken and stolne his daughter against the right of Nations, and detained her: refusing obstinately to restore her to her father. It was decreed that Guy should beginne by force, and be well seconded by the Emperour and the English, in case of necessity. But before they come to armes, Pope Boniface should make the first point by the luster of his authority. All things threatened Philip with much trouble, but the end will shew that the attempts of man are all but vaine. Boniface (according to the intent of their league) sends his Nuncio to Philip, which was James bishop of Metz, to exhort him to doe iustice, both to the Earle of Flanders and to the King of England, protesting that hee desired nothing more then peace betwixt Christian Princes. Hee sent the same Nuncio vpon the same subiect into England, but with an other intent then hee made shew of vnto Philip, casting wood and oyle into this fire, in steed of water to quench it. But for that this Pope must appeare in many acts of this Theater, wee must obserue his disposition, by some sufficient and not suspected testimony. Platina the Popes Secretary: Being (saith he) a Priest, Cardinall of Saint Martin of the Mount, hee affected the pontificall dignity with such vehemency, as hee omitted neither ambition nor fraude to compass it, and moreover hee was puffed up with such arrogancie, as hee contemned the whole world. Hee reports also, that hee vsed a notable policy to circumuent Celestin, being chosen to the dignitie of Pope, a simple man and vnfit for matters of State, hee suborned some one to talke to him in the night like an Angell, perswading him to leaue this charge if hee would bee faued: hee preuailes by his practises, and wrought so by subtil deuises, as hee was chosen Pope in his place. Being Pope, hee desired nothing more then to kindle the warre betwixt the Guelphes and the Gibelins, then called blacke and white, by a name and marke of a faction. Platina coates a singular prooffe of his disposition, nothing inclined to procure peace among Christian Princes. Prophet Archbishop of Genoa, affecting the Gibelin faction, kneeled at Boniface seete on Ashwednesday. As the Priest is accustomed to say: Memento homo quia cinis es, & in cinerem reuerteris, hee sayd (changing the wordes.) Memento homo quia Gibilinus es, et cum Gibilinis in cinerem reuerteris, casting the ashes into his eyes, where as they are accustomed to cast them on the head, in signe of humility and submission. Boniface thus inclined to the peace of Christendome, that is to say (as the Lord of Haillan writes) more puffed up with glory and vanity, then good zeale to the peace of Christian Princes, hee commands Philip by his Nuncio, to restore to the English and Flemings what they demanded, and for not obeying, hee cites him to appeare at Rome vpon paine of excommunication. Philip a wife and a valiant prince, although hee were discontented with this course, yet hee sent an honourable Ambassage to Rome, by the Archbishop of Rheims, and the Earle of Saint Paul, to lay open his right before the Deputies of the King of England and the Earle of Flanders, who were then at Rome to complaine as beeing wronged. All parties beeing heard, Boniface decrees that Philip (as the fountaine and cause of all the miseries and inconueniences which had happened) should yeeld to Edward and to Guy al they demanded, both in Guienne and Flanders, charging the Archbishop of Rheims to signifie this Bull vnto the King, vpon paine of excommunication for not obeying. This was the first blow giuen by Boniface against Philip: The other Sceane of this tragedie shall represent an other act. But what doth Philip after these great threats? He prepares for deeds, not suffering himselfe to be daunted with words, and tries his wit to finde out meanes to maintaine himselfe against so mighty enemies, not holding it fit nor worthy of a King of France to be terrified with these comminations from Rome, employed without reason against his lawfull authority. So seeking for all helpe hee resolues to be ready for all cuents, holding words insufficient to calme this storme. He laies great impositions (which they call Maletoist) vpon his subiects for the leuying of souldiars, and imposed great tenths vpon the Clergy.

A But in the search of this remedie, he was incountried with two difficulties: on the one side, his Subiects furcharged with the exaction of these great summes, beeing almost in despair, were readie to rebell in diuers places, especially in the greater Citties: And on the other side, Pope Boniface thundered against him by new Comminations and Censures: forbidding the Clergie to contribute any thing. This Prince crossed with these difficulties, continues his course resolutely, as a great worke requires a noble and vndaunted spirit: but before hee enters warre against Guy Earle of Flanders, he sends the Archbishop of Rheims, and the Bishop of Senlis vnto him, to aduise him not to enter into a voluntarie warre. That the King was as carefull of his Daughter as himselfe, to marrie her honourably according to her qualitie: That he did nothing vnworthy of a good King, or a good God-father, in not suffering his subiects to allie themselves to his capitall and deadly enemies; the which hee spake not for feare of the Earles forces, or of his friends, but for the care he had of his subiects, not to see them runne headlong into ruine, and therefore he presents him the choice of Peace or War. Count Guy answers; that he is resolute to recouer his right by force from the King, seeing he might not haue it by reason.

Philip hauing tryed mildnes in vaine, comes to force. He had a goodly armie, wherof he takes the one halfe, and giues the other to Robert Earle of Artois his cousin. He turns the head of his armie against Lille, and besiegeth it, whilst that Robert defeats the Flemings at Furnes, and takes the Earles of Iuliers and Albemont, with many other of great account, and sends them prisoners into France. So continuing his victorie he takes the Townes of Cassell, Bergues, Saint Vnoch, Furnes, and all the West part with an incredible celerity. The King hauing taken Lille, he enters victoriously into Bruges. At this sodaine checke, all the rest of Flanders stands amazed. This happie beginning did shake the desseignes of the confederate Princes, so as without any more delay, they sue for peace. Ambassadors come presently vnto him from the King of England, demanding a truce, the which he granted, comprehending the Earles of Flanders and Neuers: vpon condition they should put their controuersies to compromise: And so he returned into France, leauing Raoul of Neele his Constable, Gouvernour of the Countrie of Flanders. This was the first voyage of Philip into Flanders, in the yeare 1297. All things seemed to be thus mildly pacified, but the progreffe will soone shew, that Philip had no meaning to receiue the Earle of Flanders into fauour: for the truce beeing newly expired, Charles Earle of Valois enters into Flanders with the same victorious armie, where he takes Bethune, Douay, Cortray, and all the rest of the Countrie of Flanders, except Gand: whether the Earle Guy was retired with his children, beeing disappointed of succours from his allies and confederates. England is quiet, and the Emperour Adolphe is no more to be scene, who had made this poore Earle to weare the bable. And the Gantois make their peace with the King, keeping their priuiledges. But what shall become of the Earle? he yeelds himselfe absolutely into the hands of Robert earle of Artois, with promise, that by his intercession he should be restored into the Kings good fauour, and so into the possession of his estate. Vpon this promise of Robert, Guy accompanied with his children, Robert, William, and Guy, and his Nobilitie that were most confident vnto him) comes to Paris, but his hope was soone turned into a languishing sorrow: for both himselfe, his children, and all his followers, were dispersed into sundrie places vnder sure guards, as the Kings prisoners: from whom they could draw no other answer, but that he had passed no word to his brother, and that they were his prisoners by a iust warre. Philip without any further delay passeth into Flanders with a goodly troope, to take possession of the Earledome, as proprietarye and chiefe Lord, and to vnite it to the Crowne, by vertue of a sentence, wherby the person of Count Guy was found guilty of high treason, and his lands were confiscate to the King, as to his Soueraigne Lord. He comes to Gant, where he is receiued with pompe, as Prince and Lord, he receiued their homage, and makes them many good lawes for the gouernement of the Countrie, appointing James of Chastillon, Lord of Leuse and Conde, for Gouvernour and Lieutenant Generall, and so returnes to Paris. Then were garrisons presently placed, and Cittadels made in all the Townes, as conquered by the sword, they are charged with contributions, taxes, and impositions one vpon another, to finish the buildings, and to nourish the Souldiars, with such other things as depended thereon. Such was the libertie and confusion of militarie discipline. On the other other side, there were complaints and popular mutinies for the exactions made by the kings command. These popular discontents did sodainly cause a new confusion. A people ought to be intreated with much mildnesse, be they either newly conquered, or reduced to their old obedience. This ill vsage gaue all the better Townes occasion to revolt. Bruges began, and is followed presently by the rest, but they must seeke means for their preferuation, to maintain themselves against the forces of Philip, which vndoubtedly would fall vpon them. They assemble at Bruges. The first difficultie is to prouide a Commander. John and Guy of Namur breethren (sonnes to Guy Earle of Flanders) were ioyntly chosen by a generall consent, and come to Bruges. There all the Citties (Gant excepted) make an offensive and defensive league, against the king of France for their Earles deliuerie. The Dice are cast, all breaks out into a furious sedition. At Bruges the French are slaine by their hosts, Count S. Paul (who went thither to pacifie these troubles) escaped hardly: Furie had found them out Commanders fit for their humours. A wretched weauer, suborned and counterfeited, mutinous and full of words (named Peter) is one of their chiefe Colonels, accompanied with like Ruffians: and the other Commander a Butcher of like qualities to this Tribune. But as the bader fort begin these rebellions, so great men end them. Philip of Flanders (sonne to Guy) beeing a prisoner, flies from Apouille (where he was well appointed) to succour his Father and Countrie, beeing readie to suffer shipwracke. The Nobilitie of the Countrie (who feared the furie of this mad enraged multitude) ioyne easily with him. The popular state (seeing how needfull the armes and direction of Gentlemen was for them) seeke all means to haue their fauour. The cause is plausible, the deliuerie of their good Earle, and the libertie of their Countrie. Flanders beeing thus on fire, Philip was in no lesse perplexitie, resolving to employ all his forces, to suppress this mutinous nation. In few daies hee leuies an armie of 40000. men, with exceeding diligence, and he himselfe is in field as General. And yet all this dies like a fire of straw, and breedes euents not foreseen by him, who in shew was the stronger, but in the end he prooues the weaker, and beares the blowes: for he was scarce entred into Flanders as farre as Boileduc, but he talks of his returne, pretending the vnseasonableness of the time, yet the cause was apparantly knowne to bee otherwise: and some thought that he feared a reuolt at home. So this great shew preuailed little in Flanders, and bred an infinit charge to France. This was the successe of Philip's second voyage into Flanders, with much bruit and no fruite. This his sodaine retreat incensed this mutinous people more, and gaue courage to their Commanders, to be the more resolute against Philip, by the renewing of a mutuall alliance: and made Philip seeke to reparaire the error which he had (in his owne conceit) committed, in not employing so goodly an armie against the Flemings: he raiseth another armie of fortie thousand men of the companies already leuied, vnder the command of Robert Earle of Arthois his Cousin, accompanied with Arnoul of Neele, Constable of France, and many great personages. The diuers humors of both parties, were a foretelling of the issue of these Armies; for the Earle of Artois marched against the Flemings, as against a base people, easie to be vanquished, and this humor of the Generall, crept into the Souldiars mindes, as going to an vndoubted victorie, and not to a doubtfull combate. Contrariwise, the Flemings marched carefully to defend themselves against great warriours, for the defence of their libertie against them that were greatly incensed, and vnder a wife and graue Commander. They choole for their Leader John of Namour, with his breethren Guy and Philip (sonnes to the Earle Guy prisoner) accompanied with many Noblemen, that were good fouldiers, and sworne enemies to the French, leading a people very resolute for their owne preferuations. The armies meet neere the towne of Cortray, in a place called Groeminge. The Earle of Artois would by all means draw the Flemings to fight: who fought onely to defend themselves, and therefore had chosen a place to campe in, strong both by nature and art, lying close with their battalions. This their countenance not to fight, made Robert of Artois the more resolute to force them, contrarie to the Constables aduice. The great numbers of the French did at the first terrifie the Flemings, but (their minds seasoned with the former considerations) they were encouraged by their Leader John of Namour. Robert therefore hauing commanded his Horse to charge their Squadrons furiously, the Flemings withstood them as courageously, and hauing disordered them, they forced them to retire vpon their owne foot, who were placed with so great a con-

A a contempt of the enemy, as if they were not to fight, but to gather the spoiles of vanquished men. The horsemen thus disordered, passe through their bands of foot, the which thus diuided, abandon their ranks, and then their Armes. Some fight here, others flee there; but the horse & foot being in rout, they could not ioyne againe. The disorder was generally; some defend themselves courageously, but there remaine no squadrons to fight in grosse. Their multitude is a hindrance vnto them: the Flemings encouraged with this successe, are the more eager in killing, for that this defeat of our men was vnexpected, and this multitude being victorious is flattered vpon the French, (as vpon dead carcasses) without mercy, glutting themselves vpon the, whom before they feared. Of this great armie there hardly escaped 300. all are pact together great and small. Not one Commander escaped, and very few Noblemen. Robert Earle of Artois cosin to the king of France, Generall of the army; Arnoul Lord of Neele, Constable of France; James of Chastillon, Gouvernor of Flanders, John king of Maiorca, Godfrey of Brabant, and his son the Lord of Viezon, the Earles of Eu, la Marche, Damartin, Aumale, Auge, Tancarville, and many other great personages which were the offerings of these cowardly spirits. They number 12000. Gentlemen slaine in this battell, by this enraged multitude. A notable president, not to contemne an enemy, which teacheth what a furious people well led may do: and especially that victories come from heauen: for here the lesser number vanquished the greater, and the weak the strong. This victorie called of Cortray or Croeminge, was followed with an absolute reuolt of all Flanders against the French. It hapned in the yere 1302. the 11. of Iuly. John of Namour remaining their gouernour in the absence of their imprisoned Earle. Philip received a great check in this battell: but he had more bottomes to vntwist. All the threats of Edward king of England, and of the Emperour Adolphe vanished: only Pope Boniface the 8. shewed himself obstinate in his hatred against Philip. A discourse worthy to be carefully described. In the hottest of these Flemish affaires, Boniface did excommunicate Philip, and curse his realme vpon this occasion. The Christians estate was lamentable in the East, the Tartarians increased daily. Cassan king of Tartars, allyed with the king of Armenia a Christian, made a great profession of loue to the Christians: and for that the Mamelus held Iudea and Ierusalem, he desired to draw the Kings and Princes of Christendome to their aide. To this end he sends an Ambassage to Boniface the 8. and to Philip king of France, to intreat them both to employ their authorities and means in so good a worke. Boniface failes not to embrace this occasion, he not only exhorts Philip to succor the Tartar, but also commaunds him proudly and imperiously vpon paine of Excommunication. This Bull was giuen and deliuered to a sufficient man, named Stephen an Arragonois, whome hee had made Bishop of Apamiers, a Towne in the Countie of Foix, which they commonly call Pamiers, and had erected this new Bishoppricke in the Archbishoppricke of Tholousa, without the Kings priuie or consent, who acquitted himselfe of his charge so stoutly, that when as Philip presented vnto him the greatnesse of his affaires, so as hee could not obey the Popes command, hee answered with a bold face, That if the King would not obey the Pope, he would depriue him of his Realme.

E The subiect, the manner, and the person (aduanced thus against his will,) did so moue and stirre Philip (grieved and disturbed with this late losse and overthrow, as if the Pope would insult ouer him for his bad and vnfortunate successe) that he imprisoned this Bishop. Pope Boniface transported with choller, sends to him againe one Peter a Romane borne, (Archbishop of Narbonne) with sharper Bulles, to summon him to undertake this voyage of the East: to commaund him also not to touch the reuenues of the Clergie: to reprehend him sharply, for that he had presumed to lay hands vpon the Bishop whome hee had sent; and to enioyne him to send him presently backe in full libertie. His charge extended to no other censures, in case he disobeyed not in the principall. The Archbishop executed his charge boldly. Philip shewed him with great modestie, the impossibilitie of this voyage: the reasons which had moued him to leuie this Tenth of the Clergie, and so to intreat the Bishop, hauing spoken vnto him without any respect. The Archbishop replied with more arrogancie. That he was ignorant of the Popes authority, who was not onely the Father of Christian soules, but also Soueraigne Lord and Prince in temporall things. And therefore by that authoritie he did excommunicate him, declaring him vnworthy to raigne, and his realme forfeited to the Church of Rome, to inuest whom he pleased. Moreouer, hee brought 1302. brought another Bul, directed to the Prelats and Noblemen of France by the which he did A acquite and dispencc all Frenchmen from their oath of obedience to Philip. And a third, by the which hee did cite all the Prelats and Diuines of the French Church, to appeare before him at Rome: disannulling all indulgences and priuiledges granted to the French, by any Popes his predeceffors.

land.*

The Earle of Artois disdainig this affront, takes the Bull and casts it into fire, saying.
That no such dishonor should euer befall the King, to submit himselfe to any such conditions. Philip amazed at these bold affronts, refers the whole matter to his Councell, who conclude to send back the Popes two Nuncios to Rome, and to forbid the Prelats of France to goe, or to send any money to Rome: beseeching Philip to proceed in the affaires of his Realme, and not to stay in so goodly a course. This done, Philip raiseth new and great forces B to returne into Flanders. At his entry the Flemings were defeated at Arques neere to Saint Omer, in a straight passage. Guy of Namur befeeing Xiricxe, was ouerthrown by the Kings Nauy, assisted by sixteene Gallies of Genoa, vnder the command of Renier Grimaldi: and being taken, is carried to the King, beeing in his army betwixt Lisle and Douay. After this fortunat beginning, many cities yekled to the French, the rest fearing the euent, stood amazed, the fume of their victory beeing euaporated; so as the first heat being cold, they intreate the Earle of Sauoy to bee a mediator to Philip for a truce, whereby they might obtaine a peace, after so many miseries. Philip of Flanders and John of Namur brethren, were great perswaders thereof, for the naturall desire they had to free their poore father so long time a prisoner. But Philip thirsting after reueng for his losse at Courtray, refuseth it. Hee C aduanceth and defeats the Flemings at Aire and at Tournay. There chanced in the end that notable incounter at Mons in Penelle, where they were wonderfully beaten, to make them loose the taste of the battaile of Courtray, yet Philip was in danger of his life, and bought this victory dearely: and the Flemings (like men in dispaire) assembled together from all parts, although vnder hand they did sue to Philip for peace: the which in the end they obtained, at the instance of John Duke of Brabant, vpon these conditions. That the Souereignty remaining to the King, and the Flemings enioying their liberties, the Earle Guy and all other prisoners, should bee set at liberty, without ranfome: and the Flemings should pay eighty thousand pound sterling, for the charges of the warre, & the castles of Lisle, Douay, D Cassell and Courtray, should bee deliuered into the Kings hands as a pawne, vntill the end of the payment, and that hee might beat downe what hee had built in the castles of Lisle and Douay, deliuering them to the Earle, as to their lawful Lord. That the Flemings should raze the walls and forts of fise principal cities, Gant, Bruges, Ypre, Lisle and Douay, and neuer to build them againe. That the King should make choise of three thousand men at his pleasure, in Bruges & thereabouts, that were culpable of the seditions and murders committed, a thousand of them to bee imploied beyond the seas, and two thousand on this side, & that the Flemings should furnish six hundred men at armes, to serue the King one whole yeare, where he pleased. And for the performance hereof, the cities should bee bound, and should forsaite threescore thousand Liuers for non-payment, for the effecting whereof, E Deputies should bee appointed. During this treaty, the Earle Guy and his daughter Philip, (the subiect of this troublesome reuolt) died, to the great greefe of Philip, who sees himselfe frustrate of all meanes to shew his clemency and bounty. But when these articles were brought vnto the cities, the people did mutine with great impiency, so as the Deputies perswaded Philip to moderate those which were most greuous. The demantling of the townes, (except Bruges, where the reuolt began, and the banishment of the men, conuer-ting it into a pecuniary fine; and a great summe to an annuall pension prefixt to easie payments.) Thus the accord was made. Robert, William and Guy brethren, the sonnes of the Earl Guy of Flanders, were deliuered with all the prisoners, but we shall see that in the execution therof there was much trouble. During these hard and rough proceedings, Edward King of England hauing received a checke in Guienne, was quiet, fearing Philips resolution in grea- F test dangers: whereof hee could wisely free himselfe: in the end an accord is made by the marriage of Isabel, hee left to his posterity, a heauy pawne to pretend a title to the whole Realme. Philip had his reueng of the Emperour Adolphe, who had so boldly braued him in the beginning of this quarrell, vnder colour of demanding the lands of the Empire, lying in
the

A the Countries of Bourgongne, Daulphine and Prouence, beeing in old time the Realme of Arles, but then in the power of diuers Lords, (as we haue said) vnder the kings authority.
The King of England, and Earles of Flanders had great cause to complaine of him, hauing receiued two hundred thousand Crownes to make warre against Philip, the which hee im-ployed in the purchase of Thuringe, and taking possession of that goodly Countrie, so vnusu-ally gotten, beeing sold by an vnaturall Father, who would disinherit his children. This filthie trafficke (aggrauated by the complaints of the King of England, and Earle of Flanders) made Adolphe of Nassau very odious and contemptible, beeing issued from a noble and worthie race, but this Act against the poore children, made him vnworthie of the Empire, from which he was depozed by a decree of the Electors, and Albert of Austria seated in B his place, who pursuing him with warre, slue him (as they write) with his owne hand, in an incounter neere vnto Spire. But Pope Boniface the 8. (Philips greatest enemy) remained yet vn pacified, who still continued his choller against him, in a season when as he thought him to be drawne drie, both of men and money: for they write that this warre of Flanders had wasted aboue three hundred thousand Frenchmen in eleven yeares, during the which it continued. We haue seene how he vied him by his Nuntios: this last Act will not only shew the continuance of his spleene, but shall also represent a bad Catastrophe in this Tragedie, the which shall light vpon the head of Boniface, sought for by himselfe. Albert of Austria was no sooner chosen and installed Emperour by the Electors, but Boniface applyed his wit to winne him against Philip, supposing to preuaile against him, as Gregorie the ninth had done
C against Frederick the second. Hee proclaimes him Emperour, and inuests him king of the Realme of France, giuing him both the title and armes: and taking occasion to sowe diuifion in the heart of the Realme, by meanes of the Clergie, who by reason of their reuenues, had great power in the State, and for the interest thereof, great wil to preferue them: He did also write his letters to Philip in this manner:

Boniface Bishop, seruant of the seruants of God, to Philip King of Frenchmen. Feare God, and obserue his commaundements; we will thee to vnderstand, that thou art subiect to vs, both in spirituall and temporall things, and that it belongs not to thee to giue any pre-bend or benefice. If thou hast the keeping of any of them beeing vacant, thou must reserue the profits of them to the successors. If thou hast giuen any, we iudge thy gift to bee voide, D and do reuoke all that hath beene done, and whosoer beleueeth otherwise, we iudge them heretickes. Giuen at Latran, the fourth of the Nones of December, the 6. yeare of our Popedom.

*He writes arrogantly
to Philip.*

Philips answer to the Pope.

The King answers him thus:
Philip, by the grace of God King of France, to Boniface, calling himselfe the Soueraigne Bishop, little or no health. Let thy great folly and rashnesse be aduertised, that in temporal things we acknowledge none but God for Superiour, and that the gift of prebends beeing voide, belongs to vs by our royall prerogatiue, and the fruites that grow thereby, the which we will defend by the sword, against all them that shall seeke to hinder our possession, esteeming them fooles and without iudgement, that shall thinke otherwise. These are E the very words drawne out of the originall. But Philip (to prevent the plots of Pope Boniface) assembled the Prelates of his Realme at Paris with all speed, and hauing represented vnto them the wrong which Pope Boniface had done him by his decree (from the which he had appealed as erroneous) he makes them to renew their oath of fidelitie. He thanks the King of England, in that he yeeldeth not to the perswasions of Boniface: who would haue incensed him against him, and in the end he seekes to stay the violent course of his furious practises. There was a Gentleman following the Court whose name was Felix of Nogaret (borne in Seuennes, a mountaine countrie of Languedoc, of the family of the Albigeois, as in that countrie there were many reserved from father to sonne, since the grant made them by Saint Lewis) whome Philip held fit for the execution of this charge: there was likewise a guide found out very fit to accompanie him. Boniface had ill intreated the Colonois;
F one of them named Sciarras (flying the Popes furie, and seeking some rest) had beene taken by pirates, and redeemed by a friend of his at Marseilles, and so brought into France. They could not choose a more fit instrument to tame his arrogancie, who presumed to controule Kings, and to depriue them of their Estates (as Platina saith.) The pretext of *Nogaret*s voyage to Rome was apparent, to signifie Philips appeale from the Pope vnto a Councell, and 1304. to find the meanes to leuie men vnder hand, for at that time the Realme of Naples obeyed A the French, whither Philip had conueyed 60. thousand Crownes, by the banke of the Prutisci, Merchants of Florence, to furnish this leuie. The Pope was retired from Rome to Anagnia, a Towne of Abruzzo, (where he was borne) by reason of the troubles at Rome, whereas the Gibilin faction was growne the stronger. There were likewise in Anagnia many corrupted by the filuer of France, by such means as Sciarras gaue vnto Nogaret, so as hauing drawne in 300. Frenchmen well armed, and wonne many of the Citizens vnto him, the castle (whereas Pope Boniface was lodged) was seized on, and at the same instant the cittie gates (with that terror which doth vsually amaze men) surprised.

Anagnia seized on and taken by the French.

Then the French crie, The cittie is wonne: No man dares appeare. In this confusion the castle gates beeing seized on by French souldiars, Felix of Nogaret beeing armed, (accompanied with Sciarras, Colonois and many others) enters the pallace-hall with their naked swords, Boniface is not much amazed, but hastily attires himselfe in his pontificall robes, and presents himselfe vnto his enemies. Nogaret begins to say vnto him: The good and noble King of France hath sent me hither, to tell thee that he appeales from thee to the Councell. But the Pope hauing not the patience to attend the end, Thy Grandfather (said he) condemned for the heresie of the Albigeois, was iustly punished by fire, a worthie reward for his wickednesse before God and man. I doe not therefore wonder if I be thus traiterously surprized by thee an hereticke, but I willingly beare what happened to that good Pope Siluerius. Nogaret replies, I will lead thee then to Lions, where a Councell shall iudge of thy abuses. But as Boniface would haue replied, Sciarras more hardie then Nogaret, gaue him a great blow with his gantlet on the face, which made him to bleed much. The Pope cried, and he struck againe, so as Nogaret (hauing no commission to proceede so farre,) drew him out of the Colonoises pawes, and hauing retired him into his chamber (howling and blaspheming like a desperate man) he led him to Rome. But Boniface through this accident entred into so cruell a frenzie, as he gnawed and eate his owne hands, and so died piteously the 35. day after, to whom the common report registred in Histories made this Epitaph:

Boniface dies tragically.

He entred his Popsdome like a Foxe, he reigned like a Lyon, and dyed like a Dog.

Platina addes this Commentarie. Thus died Boniface, who laboured to keepe the consciences of Emperors, Kings, Princes, and generally of all men in awe, more by terror then by religion: who sought to giue and take away kingdomes, to expell and restore Princes at his pleasure: most greedie to gather gold by what meanes soeuer. Let princes therefore both spirituall and temporall learne to gouerne their Clergie and subiects: not arrogantly with insolencie and outrage (as this of whom we speak) but holily and modestly, as Christ our King and his Disciples and followers, who desired to be beloued not feared: whence iustly proceeds the ruine of tyrants. He writes also of him: That he nourished diuisions among the Italians, and especially betwixt the Geneuois and the Venetians. Behold the testimonie of Platina, and the Catastrophe of the Tragedie which pope Boniface the 8. had plotted to ruine the King and his Realme. Philip aduertised of the heauie end of him who had practised to ruine both him and his estate, presently sends his Ambassadors to the Colledge of Cardinals, beeing much amazed with this accident, protesting that he gaue no such commission to Felix of Nogaret, (to whome notwithstanding he gaue in recompence the Baronnies of Caluiffon in Vauage neere vnto Nismes) but onely to intimate to pope Boniface, his appeale from him vnto the Councell, desiring them to expect all friendship and succour from him. The Cardinals reuiued from their great amazement by this kind message from Philip, stood yet long irresolute in the election of a new Pope, fearing to do any thing vnpleasing vnto the King. In the end they choole one Nicholas a Cardinall, who had assisted Philip co-fins in the voyage of Hungarie (famous among the popes by the name of Benedict the 11.) He reuokes the Excommunication giuen out by Boniface against Philip and his people, and restores the priuiledges of the Vniuersitie of Paris, whereof he had deprived them in disdain of Philip: but he liued not long, and the Cardinals desire was to accommodate themselves wholly to the kings will: they therefore by a generall consent choole Clement, borne at Bazadois in Gasconie; of the house of the Vicounts of Tartas, and Lords of Vseste, where he built a goodly castle called Villandrant, as the Lord of Haillan doth testifie (an vnreproachable witness) beeing of that countrie. This Clement was the first of seuen French popes which held

A held the Sea one after another, vnto Vrbain the 6. vnder whom the Italians recovered it againe with much trouble. These seuen Popes were Clement the first a Gascon, John 23. of Cahors in Quercy, Benedict the 12. a Tholousan, Clement the 6. Innocent the 6. Vrbain the 5. Gregorie the 11. all foure Limosins one after another. Such power had this proceeding of our Philip. Clement the 5. beeing chosen Pope, he came into France, and the King receiued him at Lions, accompanied with the Kings of England and Arragon in great pompe. The Pope was on horsebacke, and the King with his two brethren on foote, holding the reins of his horse. He was crowned in the Temple of Saint Mar, where they had built a great theater for so goodly a spectacle: but the presse of people was so great, as the scaffold brake, and the multitude fell one vpon another. The Pope, Kings, Princes, and Noblemen were all on the head, the Pope in the foote, and the Duke of Brittainne slaine, with a great number of Noblemen and common people that were smothered vnder these ruines. The Popes crown of gold: but the life of men was inestimable. Thus this feast gaue no cause of ioy, but was famous to posteritie by this notable accident, and by the translation of the Popes seate from Rome to Auignon, in the yeare 1305. vnto the yeare 1379. vnder Vrbain the 6. This was the first act of Clement the 5. being arriued in France. In the meane time the Flemings practised new troubles, refusing to performe the conditions of peace, and their Earle Robert gathered together men and money on all sides for the warre: whereunto Philip (tyred with the long miseries which had wasted his Realme) was vnwillingly drawn. Yet he giues charge meanes to leaue an armie, appointing Charles of Valois his brother for Generall, accompanied with Lewis his eldest Sonne, and a great number of the Nobilitie. But the difficulty to recouer money was so great, as the King was forced to grant a truce to Robert Earle of Flanders, the which was more auailable for him then France. This did greatly displease these two princes (who had the chiefe places in the Armie) complaining of Enguerand, as if he had purposely crossed this leaue, with a pretext of want of money: when as he himselfe was rather corrupted by the Flemings. They smothered this dislike vntill Philip death. Who countenanced Enguerand (as his good and faithfull seruant) against the ordinarie complaints of these Princes of the bloud. But after long delayes, Flanders continuing still more obstinate in their rebellion, and Robert seeking but to gaine time, necessitie forced Philip to the Warre, and want of money held him backe: yet both the one and the other were apparent. For the redresse whereof hee finds an expedient, to call an assembly at Paris of all the Citties of his Realme, and there to represent vnto his subiects the great necessitie of his affaires, to induce them thereby to contribute meanes for so important a Warre, beeing both necessarie and honourable. The assembly was held in the Court of Parliament, (a solemne place) where the King assisted with all his Councell. Enguerand of Marigny made the speech, as the man which had the managing of his affaires. The Prouost of Paris made offer of any thing the cittie of Paris could doe, that the example of the capitall cittie might draw Liuer or Franke, of all merchandise and wares: but when it came to the execution, there were daily seditions and mutinies in Picardie, Normandie, Orleans and Lions, whither Philip sent Lewis his eldest sonne to pacifie them. But oh the vanitie of this world! Philip had liued with much paine, he had passed his apprenticeship in his fathers troubles, crossed with the warres of Guienne and Flanders, he had giuen and receiued infinit losses, shaken with the pricking thorns of Boniface, who sought to ruine both body and soule, in excommunicating him and seeking to spoile him of his estate. Was it not then time to rest after all these toyles? and yet behold he is more ready then before to imbarke himself in new troubles, by the enterprise of a new and dangerous warre, whereof all his posteritie could neuer preuaile. But God more wise then himselfe, did cut off his long discourses (cast in the mold of an infinite rest in heauen, which he could not find on earth. He died at Fontainebleau in Gasconie, in the yeare 1314. hauing reigned 28. yeares, and liued 58. His disposition and his children, are noted in the beginning of his reign, and the estate of the Empire and the Church, throughout the whole discourse thereof.

1314. The estate likewise of the Christians in Asia and Affricke, and of the French in Sicily, Naples and Arragon, must necessarily be described, both that which was past, and that which is to come. The Popes had imbarcked all Christendome in this action, goodly in shew, and very preiudiciall in effect, for those voyages beyond the sea, haue consumed an infinit number of men throughout all Christendome. Our France hath a great share, yea of our kings. Many houses were cast away vpon this shelve, whence grew infinite sutes. And from thence likewise came the corruption of fees, by meanes of the sale of lands made by Gentlemen to peasants. To conclude, they employed 200. yeares to purchase much paine and infinit losse. Wee haue hitherto seene how things haue passed from raigne to raigne, from the yeare 1096. the date of the first departure of the Christian army into the East, vnto the yeare 1315. The ordinarie practise of the Popes of Rome, was to free themselues of Kings and Emperours, the more easily to settle their authoritie ouer them, as the wise and vnpassionate reader may verifie, by all the circumstances and order of the true Historie. I speake onely in termes of State, and as mildly as truth will permit me. In those times, the Tartar (who had vndertaken the protection of the Christians (the better to settle their affaires) obtained of Pope Clement a new Croysado, to the which Philip had vowed two sonnes, Philip and Charles, but it had no successe, although Clement did what he could to further the action. But a dog that is scald feares cold water. And experience is the mistresse both of wise men & fooles. So all these great shewes in the end came to nothing. The countries so valiantly conquered by the Christians, were seized on by the Infidels, so as after infinite toiles, there scarce remained any reliques of this shipwracke, onely some Ilands to the Venetians, and Geneuois, Cyprus, Candie, Corfu, Chio, and to all the Christians ioyntly Rhodes and Malta. The Templers (placed for the guard of Christendome) became so disloyall and corrupt, as they must be rooted out, the which Philip did in France, in whose place were instituted the Knights of Rhodes and Malta, the which continue vnto this day. Behold the end of the voyage of our Argonautes, which made so goodly a shewe vpon this Theater in the first Scene. But the Catastrophe was so miserable, as the Countries where the Gospell had bene preached, remained a shamefull prey to the enemy of Christendome, and the Christian Church at his mercie. As for Sicilie, behold the estate: Charles the Lame (heire to his Fathers misfortunes, taken by Roger Admirall of Arragon, and held prisoner foure yeares) in the end was released, vpon condition he should relinquish all his interest to the two Sicilies. And all which Philip had taken in Arragon, returned presently after his death to James of Arragon, the lawfull heire of that Realme. Naples continued longer in the French mens power, but in the end all was lost, as we shall see hereafter: so as the Arragonois retained to himselfe the possession of these goodly Estates, and left vs in our voluntarie losses, the gages of our accustomed rashnesse, and an apparent testimonie, that the Popes gifts to our kings, haue not greatly enriched the poore realme, as appeares by infinite examples. After that of Naples, Hungarie was in no better estate, being given by the Pope to Charles Martell, Sonne to Charles the Lame, these two quarrels hauing drawne all Europe into a strange confusion. So there was euery where vanitie for truth, brute without fruit, and shewes without effect. The originals are my warrant for this truth, the which I ought to the honour of the Historie without dissembling.

are loose all in the East.

The estate of Sicilie.

LEWIS

Lewis the tenth, called Hutin,
47. King of France.

THIS raigne is short and of finall fame, as the actions of this King are not greatly commendable. He began to raigne in the yeare 1315 and dyed the yeare after, the 16. of Iune, and so he scarce raigned a yeare and a halfe, which time was full of trouble and confusion, according to his turbulent and stirring disposition, wherof he bare the name, for a blemish to his posteritie, for Hutin in old French signifies Mutine. A Chollericke prince, ingrate, indilcreete, outrageous, defacing his royall authoritie, by the insolent abuse of his power, considering his humane passions with the vale of his authoritie. He first married with Marguerite the Daughter of Robert Duke of Bourgoigne, beeing detected of Incontinencie, shee was confined to Chasteau Gaillard vpon Sein, where she died in her ignominie. After her death he married with Clemente the Daughter of Charles, brother to Robert King of Sicilie, pretended King of Hungarie. He made a great preparation against Robert Earle of Flanders, but could not passe with his armie for waters. He discharged his choller vpon Enguerand of Marigny Earle of Longueuille, Superintendent of the treasure, whom Philip had employed long and confidently. Charles Earle of Valois, brother to Philip the Faire, accused Enguerand of extortion and robbing the Tresaurie, making him odious to the people, for that he had long managed the treasure of the Realme to his masters good liking: but Lewis and Charles had hatched this hatred against him, to the losse of his life. He had caused the pallace to be built, and he disposed of the publike treasure, during the long warres of Flanders, the which had wasted much, to the peoples oppression and hinderance. And therefore it was a pleasing spectacle, to see Enguerand of Marigny hanged by a solemne sentence vpon the gallows, which he had caused to be made at Montfalcon, beating downe his image in the pallace, where the place is yet to be seene, with this inscription by it:

This iudgement was very famous, yet afterwards it was reuoked, but the bodie was not taken out of the graue, although he were freed from the ignominie of so shamefull a death. The Earle of Valois was soone after taken with a languishing disease, which consumed him by degrees, and King Lewis Hutin died so sodenly, as he scarce lay sick one day. These were the workes of heauen, which made the foolish people change their opinion, of whome it was rightly spoken: What the people sayes, a foole speaks: for euery one tooke these extraordinary deaths, as witneses of Gods iustice, who punisheth great Princes, which abuse the ordinarie power which he hath giuen them, to serue their owne passions. And it is to be obserued, that this iustice of God continued in the posteritie of Lewis Hutin: for he left his wife Clemence with child, who was deliuered of a sonne, an imaginarie King, haneing liued but eight daies: and though he were royally interred with Kings, yet he is not numbred among them. Morcouer, he left one Daughter by his first Wife called Jane, for whom Eudes of Bourgonie (her Vncle by the mother) caused great Tragedies against the fundamentall Lawe of State, to haue her admitted Queene of France, wrongfully and vniustly, for that women are excluded by the law, whereon the French Monarchie was grounded, as wee haue said: So this miserable raigne was begun and ended by confusion and iniustice. A notable example to obserue the vanitie of the Court, in good seruants vniustly afflicted: of the people, in their false and passionate iudgements, rendring euill for good, and suffering themselves to be transported with the ebbing and flowing of their passions, speaking good and euill of the same action, and the same man, without rule, without measure, and without truth. And of the vanitie of great men, which thinke it to be the chiefe fruite of their greatnesse, to abuse their power insolently, to the ruine of their inferiours: not remembring (being blinded with their passions) that they haue a superiour ouer them, to make them yeeld an account of their vniust proceedings, forcing them to make restitution with interest. All that Lewis Hutin did worthy of commendation, was that he made the Parliament of Paris ordinarie, which had but two sittings in the yeare, although this commoditie of pleading hath bred many futes, to the hinderance of the publike and priuate good. He was called King of France and of Nauarre, and left the two realmes to his successor, who disposed thereof as we shall see. D

HE controuersie touching the Crowne was easily decided, by the euidence of reason, and also for that Jane the Daughter of Lewis Hutin, remained by the Will of Philip her Vncle, Queene of Nauarre, and Countesse Palatine of Brie and Champagne, and yet for the discontentment of some Princes of the blood, Philip went to Rheims with a strong armie, to be annointed there, where hee was installed, the doores of the Church being shut and well guarded. He beganne to raigne in the yeare 1316. and raigned fixe yeares. Hee had foure Daughters by Jane the Daughter of Othelin Earle of Bourgonie and no Sons. By meanes of his Daughters he made his peace with his discontented Princes: for he gaue the eldest to Eudes Duke of Bourgonie, (who had supported the Daughter of Lewis against him) and gaue in dowrie the County of Bourgonie, belonging vnto her by her Mother: and to Lewis Earle of Eureux his other opposite, he gaue Jane with the Kingdome of Nauarre, and the Counties of Brie and Champagne, whereof he afterwards carried the title.

His children.

A Prince of a very tractable disposition, and by consequence easie to be corrupted, rather inclining to ill then good. There is nothing memorable vnder his raigne, but that thorough his facilitie all was tollerable to his bad seruants, who vnder his name laid great exactions vpon the people, the which caused them to mutine in many places, neither did hee (being great of bodie, and therefore called Long, but little of wit) vse his authoritie. Vnder colour of a voyage to the East, two seditious men, a Priest and a Monke of the order of Saint Benedicte, assembled a multitude of mutinous people, which committed a thousand insolencies where they passed, calling themselves Shepheards, but in the end they were defeated in Languedoc.

Rebels calling

An artificiall
plague.

The Iewes expelled before, were now admitted to returne for money: a wretched nation, giuen to all kind of wickednesse, and therefore odious to the people, who exclaimed against the disorders growne vp by the facilitie of Philip. This generall hatred bred such a rage in the licentious mindes of the Iewes, as they brought the plague into diuers partes of the Realme, vsing the helpe of Lepars: Many were grievously punished by Iustice, 1322. and the rest banished out of the dominions of France. Flanders seemed ready to fall into new troubles, but in the end they were pacified, by the marriage of Marguerite the Kings second daughter, with Lewis Earle of Flanders, Neuers and Rethel, and the paiment of certaine summes due by the sayd accord.

These are the most famous acts of that reigne, for to what end serues it to relate that priuate Iustice was done vpon a prouost of Paris, who was hanged, for that he had put to death a poore innocent, for a rich man that was guilty, and condemned to die? Or that Philip would make one weight and one measure throughout his Realme; but hee could not main- teine his authority by the rule of reason. These things either too common, or not effected, are not worthy of a History. Thus Philip the fift died with small fame, the fift yeere of his reigne, in the yeere 1322.

CHARLES the fourth, called the Faire, the 49. King of France.

S Philip the Long had succeeded Lewis Hutin his brother, with some dispute, so Charles brother to Philip, (the last of the sonnes of Philip the Faire,) succeeded without any difficulty, the question beeing formerly decided. Hee was crowned King with great solemnity, the Princes of the bloud and Noblemen assisting, in the yeare 1322. and reigned sixe yeeres. A wife and a temperate Prince, louing Iustice, and yet vnfortunate in his family. Hee was thrice married. His first wife Blanche was accused and conuicted of adultery, during his fathers life, and was confined to Chasteau-gaillerd by Andely vpon

Seine. His second wife was Mary the daughter of Henry of Luxenbourg Emperor, by who he had one son, which died as he was borne, & his Mother soone after at Yssoudon in Berry. His third wife was Marguerite the daughter of Lewis Earle of Eureux, by whom hee had daughters onely, leauing her with child, as shall bee said. But let vs make a collection of his life, which is not long. The facility of Philip the Long, the furie of Lewis Hutin, and the long warres of Philip the Hardie, had peruerterd all, and giuen liberty to euery man to doe

A doe what he pleased, especially the Nobilitie: who beeing armed, committed many insolencies by this libertie and impunitie. Charles beeing annoited, he held a great Sessions in his chiefe Cittie of Paris, to heare all mens complaints, and causeth many Gentlemen to be punished. Among the rest Jourdain of Lisle a Gascon, who vnder colour of being Nephew to Pope John the 22. then resident in Auignon, (hauing had his pardon for eightene crimes, whereof the least deserued death) continued still in his wickednesse. In the end he was taken the iustice of God (which comes in time, euen when the insolent & obstinate sinner dreams not of it) preuented him: for Charles laying all respect aside, caused him to be hanged, as a memorable example, that respect is an enemy to Iustice, which must be executed without sparing of any one that is guilty of any notable crime.

Edward the second King of England, stood vpon termes for his homage of Guienne, and had sent his wife Isabel, the Daughter of Philip the Faire, and Sister to the King, to compound with him. Charles brought him to reason by his authority: And as Hugh the Lord of Montpelar in Agenois, would haue fortified his house without his permission, hee forced him to obey, razing the Castell of Montpelar, whence the quarrell grew, and made him to giue hostages for the assurance of that hee had promised. Amidst these generall quarrels, there chanced a iarre betwixt Edward and his wife Isabel, discontented with her husband, for that both she and her Sonne had lost their credits with him, by the pernicious counsell of Hugh Spencer. Yet was he so supported by King Charles, as he sent her backe into England without any countenance, commanding her to apply her selfe to her husbands humors, the which she indeaoured to doe, being a wife and a couragious princeesse: yet beeing assisted (as it is likely) vnderhand by the meanes of her Nephew Charles the Faire, she preuailed in her desseignes: causing Hugh to be apprehended and punished, as the Leuaine of all their breach: and hauing brought her husband vnto reason, she confirmed her Sonne Edward the third, a prince who shortly shall be the cause of much trouble to this Monarchie. Charles likewise reduced Lewis Earle of Flanders to obedience, although he were husband to his Aunt: and hauing called and condemned him by the Court of Parliament at Paris, he restored him to his estates, the which he had forfeited by felonie, shewing in one subiect, both his seueritie to punish offences, and his clemencie to remit the due punishment. The same Earle beeing fallen in some dislike with his chiefe Townes, and seeking to reclaime them by force, Charles aduised him to win them by mildnesse. A true remedie to reconcile subiects which are accustomed to oppose themselves against rigour, and in resisting to knowe their owne forces, the which belongs to their princes by obedience. Thus hee pacified these contents betwixt the Earle and the citties of Flanders, by a common reconciliation, vpon condition: That the Earle should be acknowledged in his degree, and the King as Soueraigne. This is all that chanced worthe of obseruation, in the raigne of Charles the Faire. A prince worthy of the French Monarchie, and to be numbred among the greatest and most famous men of State. His life was very short, in regard of his great sufficiencie: yet with more order and authoritie then his brother Philip the Long, who left none but Daughters, (whose names are buried in the confusion of times: troubled by the pretences of Males and Females) and his wife with child, as we haue said. A wombe which shall breed many long and perillous controuerfies. Charles dyed in the yeare 1328. leauing the Crowne to the second royall branch of Capets, whereunto the order of the fundamentall lawe did lawfully call them.

From the yeare one thousand three hundred twenty eight, vnto the yeere one thousand five hundred eighty eight.

PHILIP of Valois, the fifthth French King.

He doubtfulnesse of the issue which was expected from the royall wombe of Jane, (widow to Charles the faire) held the beginning of this reigne in great suspence and perplexity; euen for the regencie it selfe: for Edward the third, King of England, (the sonne of Edward the second, and Isabel of France, the daughter of Philip the Faire, and sister to the three Kings last deceased,) pretended it as his right; and in case the child died (whatsoever it were) the realme also, by the title of royall consanguinity, according to the lawes of England.

On the other side, Philip of Valois (the first prince of the blood of France) maintained, that aswell the regency of the male (if any were borne) as the realme, (if it were a daughter, or the sonne died,) belonged directly vnto him, without all controuersie; holding the first place among the princes of the blood after the decease of the three brethren, who had bin Kings one after another. For Philip the Hardy had left two sonnes, Philip the Faire, and Charles Earle of Valois: of whom it is said, That he was the sonne of a King, brother to a King, vnto a King, father to a King, and yet no King.

Lewis, Philip and Charles, had succeeded to the crowne one after another: so as, after their decease, the right came to Charles and his children, according to the fundamentall law of State. To decide this controuersie, the general estates were called at Paris, with great solemn-nity; where they decree, that Philip of Valois should be regent of the realm (if Queene Jane had a son) & King, if it were a daughter. Jane was deliuered of a daughter, the first of April, at Bois de Vincennes, the which was called Blanche. This quarrell thus decided, Philip of Valois was saluted and proclaimed King of France, and within few daies after, was anointed and crowned at Rheims, according to the vsuall custome. And then (being well accompanied with his princes, peeres, officers of the crowne, and an infinite number of his nobility) he made his entry into his chiefe city of Paris, with an incredible ioy and pompe: this was in the yeere. 1328.

Philip leaves his affairs in France.

Being thus in possession of the Realme, hee studied to settle his estate, much disordered by the ill government of the forepassed Kings; and likewise to satisfie the daughter of Lewis Notia, in regard of the countries of Brye and Champagne, lying too neere to his good city of Paris, to be diuided from the crowne. So hee treated with her, and held them by his prerogatiue, giuing vnto her as much in exchange as the said Earledomes were worth, lying farther off in the countries of la March, Rouergne and Languedoc.

But Flanders troubled him much more: the Earle and his subjects were greatly incensed one against an other, by reason of some exactions made by the Earle, for the payment of his old debts due by the accord, so as they made warre against their Earle; and tooke him prisoner. Being the stronger, they controlled their Lord: but soone after they paide for their folly: for the Earle (being deliuered) had recourse vnto Philip, as to their soueraigne. Philip takes the Earles cause in hand, raises a great army against the Flemings, takes, sacks and burnes Cassell, where they had made the body of their army, after the defeat of two and twenty thousand Flemings in a pitched field. Having subdued this mutinous people, he aduised the Earle to vse that aduantage modestly: to winne them by mildnesse, and not to thrust them into errors by despight or dispaire, the which are sooner preuented then repaired in popular tumults.

Being returned from this voyage, Philip found new worke at Paris. The courts of parliament, and all the Soueraigne Iudges, (assembled from all the prouinces) made a generall complaint against the Clergy of France, they accuse them of sundry abuses, and namely, that against the due of their charges, they intermeddled with the politike iurisdiction. The sute was vehement, and famous for the greatnesse of the parties. The King, to reconcile this quarrel calles a general assembly of his whole realme, at Paris. The cause was pleaded before him, with great liberty, by Peter of Cugner (this is hee who by derision they called M. Peter Cugnet whom at this day they finde in the great Temple at Paris noted with a little Monkeis head, placed betwixt two pillars, to put out the candles, being odious by reason of his pleading,) and as cowardly defended by Peter Bertrand, both famous Aduocates in those times. The issue was doubtful, but Philip foreseeing the euent of so important a businesse, after that he had seriously exhorted the prelates to reforme themselves, and in reforming the abuse, to auoide these popular complaints, hee referred the matter to a further hearing. But he had other worke in hand.

Edward King of England doth homage for Guenece.

Edward the third King of England (for that he was not receiued King of France) practised great and new designs against him, studying only vpon reueng. Hee had purposely refused to assist at his coronation, and makes no shew of any intent to doe homage for Guienne, whereunto Philip did cal him. Edward hauing no colour to refuse to doe apparent a duty, came to Amiens, with fo to great and extraordinary a traine, as it seemed plainly, not to be done to honor the King, but rather to strike some feare or admiration into the French, of his great forces. To check this bold brauado, Philip shewed himselfe a King at his first enteruiew with Edward, who euen then chaunt vpon the bit, and smothered his choler. Edward appeares at the place and time prefixt, royallie attired, with a long roabe of crimson veluet, pouldred with Leopardes of gold, a crowne vpon his head, a sword by his side, and golden spurs on his heeles. He presents himselfe standing before Philip sitting in his royall throane, attired with a long robe of purple veluet, pouldred with flowers-de-luces of gold, a crowne on his head, and a scepter in his hand, holding a royall Maiesty, accompanied with his Constable, Chancellor and great Chamberlaine. The Vicount of Melun, great Chamberlaine of France, commands Edward to take off his crowne, sword, and spurs, and to kneele downe: the which he doth.

The oath of Edward King of England to Philip.

Then he tooke both his hands, and hauing ioyned them together, hee spake vnto him in this maner, You become a Leage man vnto the King, my Lord, who is here present, as duke of Guienne, and peere of France: and you promise to be faithfull vnto him and loyal. Say yea. And Edward answered, yea. In like sort hee did him homage for the county of Ponthieu: intreating Philip to restore him all those places in Guienne, which his Predecessors had inioyed. Philip answered him with great grauity, that hee would consider thereof. This was the homage which Edward King of England did vnto Philip the French King, the which I haue particularly noted, as the first act of a notable Tragedy. The euent will shew, that Philip had done farre

A farre better (without preiudice to his authority, lawfully purchased by the law of State) to pacifie Edward by all ciuill meanes obseruable betwixt Kings, and not to braue him vpon an inferior quality, the which is no blemish to the other, for in the end he shewed himself his equall in dignity. A furious baite of hatred among princes which cannot be reconciled.

Edward departed discontented from Philip, resolute to attempt all meanes to crosse him, and to ruine him. He seekes out all instruments fit for this designe, both in Flanders, Britaine and Germany, whereof followed mournfull euent, both for the King and his Realme. I will note euery thing in order, reseruing the Estate of the church and Empire to the end of his reigne, least I should interrupt the order of this discourse. Philip was otherwise affected then Edward, (as commonly desire makes shew of that which is not; pleasing men with vaine imaginations) for supposing that hee had tamed Edward with his imperious homage, he presumed that he had well settled his affaires, to be obeyed by him without any contradiction, and to haue his realme enioy an assured peace, without any disturbance, vnder his command. Vpon this conceipt he intends a voyage to the East, desirous to bee nothing inferior to the glorious and renowned zeale of his predecessors. In this deuotion hee easily yeelds to the perswasions of Pope Benedict the eleuenth, borne at Tholoufa, then resident at Auignon.

The cause of Edward's discontent against Philip.

Philip resolves to go into the East.

His fleet was then preparing at Aiguesmortes, (a sea towne of Languedoc) whilest that he provides for the regency of the Realme, giuing it to John Duke of Normandy his eldest sonne (being foureteene yeeres old) leaving him a graue and learned counsell. And seeking to sound Edward's minde, if hee would accompany him in this holy warre, imitating the example of his predecessors, he learns by certaine intelligence, that he watched his departure, to invade France. This new occasion gaue him a reasonable subiect to change his resolution, and not willingly to expose his new inheritance to his enemy. But this satisfied not Pope Benedict, who grew so bitter vpon this alteration, that (exclaiming generally of Philip as disloyall,) hee sought all meanes to annoy him. There was a capitall hatred betwixt the Emperor Lewis of Bauaria and the sea of Rome, hauing excommunicated him as an heretike. Benedict absolues him, and becomes his friend, seeking to oppose him against Philip: who (disliking of this proceeding) sends Enragues a gentleman of Viarez to Auignon, to let Benedict vnderstand, that if hee did not forbear to speake ill of him, hee would force him to silence, after the example of his predecessor, whose name hee bare, and who had left so famous a remembrance of his rashnesse to posterity.

The Pope's discontent with the King.

Edward being returned into England sleepe not. A prince of an excellent iudgement, great courage, and of a resolute and active spirit, high minded, and a farall instrument to chastise France. His repulse, his homage, and his great meanes, were both the baite and the spur to this generous resolution, which thrust him on to disquiet the possession of that by force, which he could not obtaine by reason. But for so great a proiect hee needed a great counsellor, to direct and fortifie him in the execution of an enterprise of so great import. Robert Earle of Artois, a prince of the blood of France, (descended from an other Robert sonne of Lewis the eight, and brother to Saint Lewis) had a great sure with his Aunt Mahauld countesse of Burgongne, for the Earledome of Arthois. Robert had laboured much for Philip in his great question for the crowne, against Edward King of England before mentioned, assuring himselfe, that Philip would requite him in his vniust pretention: but Philip preferred the countesses right before Robert's wrong: so as leaving the court of iustice free, the county of Arthois was adiudged to Mahauld, by a decree of the court of parliament of Paris. This losse did so discontent Robert, as he presumed to brag openly, that hee would dispossesse Philip of the crowne, by the same meanes that hee had raised him vnto it. But this presumptuous threate, deliuered rashly before many witnesses, cost both the realme and himselfe deere, who in the end smarted for his malicious and vnseasonable discontent. He flies into England, carrying nothing with him, but a minde transported with passion, & armed with policy. Philip proclaimes him guilty of high treason, and seizeth vpon his lands. Edward receiues him with all shewes of loue, and giues him the first place in his counsell.

Edward resolves to make warre against Philip.

Behold, these two great Kings banded one against another, entering into a dangerous warre, which shall much afflict their estates: as commonly the subjects pay for the follies of Princes. The first breach began in the easiest places. Guienne was the first checker of this long

Warre began in Guenene

long and dangerous game. The Earles of Foix and Armagnac were for the King in Guenene, the Earle of Albret for Edward. The King of Scotland is a formal partaker for France, against Edward. Edward begins to spoile Philips country, and Philip takes from Edward the castle of Naintes, by Charles Earle of Alanson his brother. Edward on the other side, makes warre against David King of Scots, and Philip lends him succors. These were the first drops of that cloud which darkened the heauens, attending the storme which shall fall after these thunder-crackes: but what is all this in regard of that which shall presently succeed? By the aduice of Robert of Arthois, Edward makes a proclamation against Philip of Valois, as an vsurper of the realme of France, and labours to stirre vp both the French & Flemings to mainteine his title, as the lawfull heire, beeing the sonne of a daughter of France, against an vnlawfull King, pretending the realme to appertaine vnto him.

Edward sends Ambassadors
into Flanders
and Germany.

Moreouer he sends an honorable and stately Ambassage into Flanders and Germany, to incense those prouinces against Philip. These Ambassadors went with a goodly and an honorable traine, great in expences, shew, bankets and presents. They began in Hainault, to take directions there from Count William father in law to Edward. The Earle doth cause them to be accompanied throughout al the cities of Flanders and Brabant, and doth countenance them with the fauor of his friends in all those cities. They spare nothing in good cheere, nor goodly presents, according to the popular humor of this nation. One of the chiefe Tribunes, or Colonels of this people, was James of Arteuille, a brewer, but in effect he had more credit with the Flemings then the Earle himselfe. They begin to vndermine the flanke of this fort, by the means of this artisan. Hee becomes an Englishman, by vertue of the Angels of England. Hee shall act his part in this tragedy, but in the end hee shall leaue his skin in this peoples hands, whom hee had enchanted; as after many turnes the keeper is deuoured by his lion.

James of Arteuille ringleader
of the seditious Flemings.

Lewis Earle of Flanders stood stiffly for the King his souereigne Lord, but he preuailed nothing in exclayming against this ringleader of the multitude, who were the more incensed by Lewis his choler against their captaine. For Arteuille making it known to all men that he was hated, tooke occasion to demand a gard, the which hee chose among the most seditious, being entertained by him at the charge of England: and so he maintained and augmented his seizure of this confused authority, the which hee had vsurped ouer the Flemings, in Edwards fauor. There was an occasion which made this popular humor to breake forth (being yet somewhat restrained by the respect of souereigne authority, abridge for the most audacious.) A french gentleman being at Gant, was too familiar with this multitude. The Earle suspects him to be a traitor: and without any other proofes, but only the deuotion he had to the Kings seruice, he cuts off his head. The common people were so incensed with this execution, as the Earle could hardly recouer France, to auoide the outrageous crucke of this furious multitud, which pursued him to the death without any respect. Arteuille being then without controule, sets vp his ensigne openly for Edward, who presently sends a fleet into Flanders. He comes himselfe to Antwerp with his wife and children, and giues his sister in marriage to the duke of Gueldres, the better to confirme his loue. And leauing his wife in Flanders, for a gage of his faith, he comes to Cologne, where hee is honorably received by Lewis of Bauaria, Emperour: by whom (hauing made an offensive and defensive league) he is declared Vicar of the holy Empire, both in Germany and France, to haue thereby a title to force the Vassals and subiects of that Empire to succor him, both with men and money, against Philip of Valois, as an vsurper of the realm of France, and sworn enemy to the Empire. In his absence the Queene his wife had so politickly managed his affaires, as at his returne hee did but passe, and with an incredible celerity sent an army (the which hee found ready) vnder the conduct of the Earle of Salisbury.

An vnfeaso-nable execution.

Edwards
practices in Flanders and Germany.

But it chanced, as this Earle (hauing ioyned with the Flemings) went inconsiderately to the siege of Lisle, he was defeated by the Lord of Rombais, who surprised him in this disorder, being drawne into an ambuscadoe. This first check did import Edwards affaires very much, and euen with the Flemings, being subiect to alterations. To repaire this error, he departs presently from England with his fleet: yet he must fight for the passage with Philips Navy, the which attends him with great forces, and with a resolute intent to stay him. The English army was not lesse, neither were their courages any thing danted with this first losse. The

A combate was fierce, but the victory remained to Edward. Who notwithstanding bought it deere, by a great losse of his Nobility, and an honourable hurt which he receiued, for a testimony of his valour. Philip lost thirty thousand men, French and Flemish, and his Admirall Hugh of Quieret, with the aduantage of a good beginning. This battaile fel out in the yeere 1337. in the moneth of May, noted by the name of Sculse, where it was giuen. It was seconded with a greater losse, the which made the way open to Edwards designes, who (being receiued with great ioy by the Flemings) resolved to try his fortune, and to inuade France, by Tournay and Saint Omer, measuring the courage and not the number of his victorious army, ordeined to greater and more famous exploits. Philip was nothing amazed at this first check, but relying in his great forces, hee thought himselfe assured of a victory against Edward, to the end that he might haue no competitor in his hereditary Kindome, nor France any English prince to trouble it againe. He had leuied an army (worthy the possession of this new inheritance) of a hundred thousand fighting men, and many great personages: The Kings of Bohemia, Nauarre and Scotland. The dukes of Normandy, Britaine and Lorraine. The Earles of Alanson, Sauoy, Flanders, Armagnac, Eu and others to the number of 26. with an infinit number of the nobility. He diuides his army into three, to answer the enemy in all places. One part for Tournay, vnder the conduct of the Earle of Eu, Constable of France, and the Marshall of Montmorancy: the other for S. Omer, vnder the duke of Bourgogne, & Earle of Armagnac and he himself remains with the battaile, betwixt them and Arras. The English army had neither so many men, nor so great personages, beeing but threescore thousand men: but the triall made prooffe that it was nothing inferior to the French, neither in courage nor valor. It consisted of English, Flemings and Germanes: this was the fruit of his Embassage and voiage. The Imperiall Eagle appeared in the foremost ranks in great shew & the title of vicar of the sacred Empire, sounded out in all their military proclamations. Edward desires nothing more then to fight. All his men had the same will, beeing nothing amazed with the number nor brauery of the French army, nor with the fame of their commanders. Such is the force of the great God of armies, who disposeth of the hearts of such as shalbe conquerors or conquered, & drawes the motions that are in them to his will & irreuocable decree, the which neuer fails to execute things in their due season. Philip had the like desire to fight, although his counsel were otherwise affected. The like aduertisements were giuen from al parts, and reason it selfe, did with him not to expose his new crowne to the hazard of a generall and doubtfull battaile. So the armies stand some daies at the gaze. In the end Edward (to draw him to fight) besieged Tournay. Some skirmishes were made, in the which, the English were beaten. The place is victualled by Philip: but the English army stands firme in the same quarter, watching a fit oportunity for their designe. Al Europe stood gazing at this great and dangerous spectacle. The friends of both parts were greatly perplexed with so doubtfull an euent, the which brought the estate of two realms into question. But God who reserved the victory & scourge to another season, disperfed this storme, being in shew ready to fall, by this occasion. Jane of Valois, sister to Philip, widow to William Duke of Hainault, and mother to Marguerite the wife of Edward, a Princeesse of excellent vertues (hauing since her widowhood willingly giuen ouer al affaires of State) had professed her selfe a Nun at Fontenelles, to attend her deuotion and fasting. She resolves to imploy all her credit (as a sister and mother in law) with Philip and Edward, to keepe them from so dangerous a battaile. She runnes to the one, and to the other, but finds them both so resolute in their designes, as she is often reiecte: Yet is she nothing danted. In the end she incounters their violent passions with such patience and dexterity, as she obtaines a day and place for a parle: although James of Arteuille (a dangerous sic in a State) tickled Edwards eares, to crosse so commendable a resolution. An example of a woman worthy of eternall praise, euen in this iron age, whereas women haue bene miserable instruments of ciuill dissensions, and hellish fire-brands to consume France with the fire of confusion and misery.

A parle beeing concluded, deputies were chosen on either side to treat: and by them a truce was made. Tournay is deliuered and the armies dismissed, and so the storme preuented for this time, the which threatened both realmes. All good men reioyced, none but James of Arteuille and his faction were greeued. So as (not able to auoide it) yet to feed Edwards humour, he aduiseh him to take vpon him the name of King of France: by the which both A he and his complices should auoide the infamie of rebellion, and the punishment of high Treason: as hauing done nothing, but by the commaundement of their Soueraigne. The date of this title of France was in the yeare 1337. The which England holds to this day, and our Kings the Realme in effect. Edward left his wife at Gand, to keepe the Flemings at his deuotion, being a wife and a vigilant Princeesse: and he himselfe returned into England, extremely grieved; for beeing vnable to satisfie his Germanes for want of money, who expected a great bootie by this warre, from which they scarce returned with their pay. There sprung vp a new combustion from this discontent, the fire beeing onely smothered in the embers, but not quenched. Philip makes his profit of the Germanes discontent, and by the means of Jane, the wife of Lewis of Bauaria, Emperour, beeing his neece, he winnes B to them to haue Edwards part, and to imbrace that of France. Edward in like sort, strives to haue his re. ce. ge on Philip. But to what end serues all this, but to disquiet their estates, the which they ought to maintaine in peace? Thus the passions of Princes are bad counsellors for the good of their subiects. This was the occasion of this new breach betwixt the two Kings. Arthur Duke of Brittain, sonne to that John 2. Duke of Brittain, (who, as we haue said, had bene slaine at Lions, at the coronation of Pope Clement 5.) had two wiues, and by either of them children, of the first named Beatrix, Vicountesse of Limosin, he had two sons, John and Guy, and of his second wife roland, Countesse of Montfort l'Amaulrie, he had John C of Montfort, who contended for the Duchie of Brittain. John the 3. the sonne of Arthur, dying without issue, he made his neece Jane the daughter of his brother Guy, (who died before him) his heire in the succession of the said Duchie.

In regard of this prerogatiue giuen to Jane, Charles of Blois, nephew to King Philip, married her, vpon condition, That those children which should be borne of this marriage, should be lawfull heires to the Duchie of Brittain, whereof Charles was inuested, after the consumation of the marriage: all homages done vnto him, and he was put in reall and full possession of the said Countrie, in the life of John.

After whose decease, behold John of Montfort, halfe brother to Jane (as we haue said) pretending to the said Duchie, surprizeth Nantes, and then Rennes, Vannes, Brest, the Castell of Aulroy with many other places: and hauing receiued the homages of the Brittons, hee D comes to Paris to do his soueraigne homage to the King for the said Duchie, and to be inuested therein. Charles of Blois opposeth in the right of his wife, and hereupon they are both sent by the King to the Court of Parliament of Paris, to do them iustice.

The Court with the Kings authoritie, sitting in his seate of Iustice, and in the presence of many Princes, decrees that Charles of Blois, in the name of Jane his wife (the lawfull heire of the Duchie of Brittain, as succeeding the second son of the first bed,) should be receiued by the King to fealtie and homage, for the countrie of Brittain, and John of Montfort the third sonne of Arthur, of the second bed, should be acknowledged in his degree, to enioy his right when it should fall vnto him. John of Montfort disliking this order, resolues to win that by force, which he could not recouer by reason: and in this humour he goes into E England, craving aide from Edward, who receiues him very graciously: but from thence hee returns into Brittain. Philip aduertised of these practises, pursueth John of Montfort with such successe, as hauing taken him prisoner with the Castell of Nantes, (whether he was retired) he confined him to the Loure. While these difficulties fall out in Brittain, there growes a new trouble, by a strange accident at Naples, in the familie of our Princes of France, of whome we haue spoken. We haue said, that Charles the lame had many sonnes, Charles, Robert, Lewis, and Philip. Robert after this losse of Sicily had for his part the realme of Naples, and the Earledome of Prouence: and left one sonne named Charles, who had two daughters, Jane and Magdalene. Jane by the death of her sister, remained sole heire of these two great Estates, and was married to Andrew the son of Charles King of Hungarie. The subject of our discourse will not suffer me to speake of the other children. Philip the youngest son of Charles the lame, had one son, named Lewis Prince of Tarentum, very faire, but of a violent spirit. Jane began to loath her husband, and preferring the filthie loue of her Cousin before the honour of marriage. she caused her husband Andrew of Hungarie to be slaine, cloaking this horrible & tragike act with an impudent hypocritise: for she takes vpon her the habit of Troubles at Naples.

A of mourning after the death of her husband, whom shee her selfe had slaine: and writes letters to Lewis King of Hongary, brother to Andrew, full of lamentations.

Lewis knowing the detestable dissembling of this maistie, prepares his forces against these fained teares: and without any dissembling, he marcheth towards Italy, with a mighty army, resolute to take an exemplary punishment of these wretched heads: but Jane and Lewis flee into Prouence before the storme. Lewis (faouored by the reuenging iustice of God) takes the realme of Naples easily, with Charles Duke of Durazzo, left for the gard thereof, and Lewis, Robert and Charles, Princes of the blood. The first he beheads, the rest he sends into Hongary to perpetuall banishment: and leauing Stephen Vaynoid gouernour of his new conquest, he returns victorious to his realme.

In the meane time the hatred betwixt the two princes growes violent, both by forme of iustice and by open force. Philip makes diligent search, both in Normandy, Picardy & Guienne, for al the nobility which fauored Edwards faction. He caused Oliuer of Clifton to loose his head, (whose sonne shalbe Constable vnder Charles the sixth) with Bacon, Perfy and Isosfroy of Malestroict, knights of marke, in whom he notes no other crimes, but that they were Englishmen. Isosfroy of Harcourt was summoned, but in steed of appeering at Paris, he retired himselfe to London, to kindle the fire in France. Yet in these preparations of warre, Edward gaue scope to his loues, for in the beginning of this war, he instituted the order of the garter, with this motto, HONY SOIT QVI MAL Y PENSE, in honour of the countesse of Salisbury, C honoring in her the chastity which he could neuer vanquish by all his amorous practises. He armes on both sides, in Guienne and Normandy. The duke of Lancaster, general of the army in Guienne, takes Vilefranch of Agenois, Angoulesme, Rions, Saint Basile, with many other townes and castles, to whom Philip opposeth his eldest son, John duke of Normandy, who recouers Angoulesme and Vilefranch from the English. But the greatest burthen of the war fell vpon Normandy, whether Edward led the flower of al his nobility, landing in the Country of Carantan, with aboue a thousand saile. At his entry he puts al to fire and sword, takes the towne of Carentan by force kils al he finds, armed or disarmed: spoiles, burnes & razeth the towne. In the champion country he puts all to the sword, saying, that he did offer those sacrifices, to Bacon, Perfy and his other seruants, being vniustly massacred by Philip. The D reason was, for that the heads of these men stood vpon the chiefe gate of Carentan. Then he takes and spoiles, Saint Lo, and (after a great fight) he becomes master of Caen, with such a terror, as Falaise, Lisieux & Honfleur, yeelded vnto him without any resistance. These townes being taken, he marcheth into the Isle of France, to draw Philip to battaile, proclaiming generally that he called him to fight in the view of all France, at the great Theater of his chiefe city of Paris. At the same time, by the like practises Flanders rebelled, by means of Janes of Arteuille, who was more then a passionate partaker of Edward. So the disordred passion of this desperate seditious man, was a trap for his own ruine. For as he not only laboured by al means to shake off the French yoke, but also grew so audacious, as to perswade the Flemings to leaue their naturall obedience to their Earle, and to receive a new Lord, such a one E as the King of England should appoint: the Flemmings much displeased with this insolent proposition of Arteuille, (as the blood of a faithfull subiect can neuer deny his Prince, they fall furiously vpon him in open assembly; and without any further proceffe, they kill him, reuenging vpon him the mischiefs they had committed by his pernicious counsels. Thus in the end, this Tribune receiued the guerdon due to such as abuse the fury of an enchanted multitude, making them the instruments of their passions against their superiours. This iust execution crossed Edward, designed in Flanders, and gaue the Earle means to repaire to Philip with his forces, and to consecrate his life to him, the which he lost in this voiage.

Philip slept not during these proceedings of Edward: hee had gathered together one of the goodliest armies that euer was seene in France, consisting of French, Lorraines, Germanes and Geneuois: the which he led towards Meulan, where Edward said hee intended to fight with him. Edward retires vpon this alarm: They imagined that hee fled for feare, but the issue wil shew, that the great God of armies had appointed his victory in another place. He retires, and Philip followes, who in the end ouertakes him at a village called Arenes, a remarkable name, to shew that al the trust of humane forces, & all the designs of mans policy, are like vnto a quicksand. Philips great army hauing the aduantage beeing at home, presumed but not in force, by reason of the troupes of rescue, which Edward kept for the last charge. A Philip seeing his brother engaged among so many enemies, runnes to his rescue. At his arrival the fight is doubled, the English bending their forces against Philip, and the French against young Edward. Philip is overthrowne vnder his horse (the which was slaine with many arrowes) but he was presently rescued, by John Earle of Beaumont: & then al the French cry out, that the King should retire himselfe out of the battaile.

This cry (proceeding from loyall and wel-affected Frenchmen) gaue courage to the English being in fight, seeing the King in this danger. Young Edward was in no lesse peril, being compassed in on all sides, by the French, and assisted by his owne: so as they (fearing the event of this charge) send to his father to succour him: who presently demanded of the messenger, what blow, what wound hath my sonne received? hath hee bene overthrowne? But vnderstanding that there was no such danger, and that they onely feared the worst. Returne (saies he) vnto him, with this charge. Let him either vanquish, or die: and I will be a witness of his valour, so second him when need shall require.

Edward.

Prince Edward and his men encouraged with this message, doubled both their courage and their blowes, and behold they are relieved with a fresh supply. Then the party became vnequall: these men being fresh and lusty, charge the wearied, and tired, who see no hope of succors, but discovered a great groue of horse of rescue: wherein Edward the father beheld the sport, and kept the stakes. Despaire should haue made our French troupes resolute to hazard all (as it hath chanced in other times) but their hearts fainted with their bodies. C For this last battaillion (where Edward remained) comming from the hill, and charging our men without any great resistance, gaue the last blow, as check and mate to our men already much disordered. Then they all giue way, all are disordered, all disperfed. The slaughter is generall without respect of persons, the butchery is so bloody, as in the end Edward (having compassion of so great effusion of blood) cries out to spare the rest: yet he was not able by these first cries to stay the souldiers from so easie an execution; who cut in peeces those poore runawaies here and there, like scattered sheepe. In the end Edward founds a retreat, and riding vp and downe, hee doubles his command to kill no more, although in effect, the night and the wearinesse of the victors made an end of this execution. So all were not slaine, but all overcome. Some troupes saued themselves in this generall overthrow, hadding nere places for a fauorable retreat. King Philip after this vnexpected defeat of so goodly an army, being fallen from his hope, followed with a small troupe, saued himselfe at Bray: whether comming by night, and approaching nere the walles, the gouernor (being in armes vpon so notable an occasion) cries out, who is there? Philip answers, The fortune of France. Being knowne by his voice, the gates were presently opened, but not without terrible cries and lamentations of his poore subiects, flocking about him like his poore children. Shall it in like sort be lawfull for me to weepe in the remembrance hereof, being moued by the bitter apprehension of our present losses? O my country! it is not at this day alone that we mourne for thy miseries. King Philip then comforts them with a resolute countenance, and intreats them to hope for better. He was to be commended in this, that he despaired not in the apparent despaire of his affaires. Having stayed at Bray some houre to take breath, hee retires with all speed to Amiens. The number of the dead was great, they hold for certaine, that there were slaine about thirty thousand men vpon the place: and the floure of all the French Nobility died or was taken there: as Charles Earle of Alanson the Kings brother, Lewis of Luxembourg King of Bohemia, Charles Earle of Blois the Kings Nephew, Raoul Duke of Lorraine, Lewis Earle of Flanders, James Daulphin of Viennois the sonne of Imbert, the Earles of Sancerre and Harcourt, with many Earles, Barons and gentlemen to the number of fifteene hundred. This miserable defeat happened in the yeare 1346. the 26. of August. A moneth famous by the euent of many miseries within this realme.

The causes of

Edward King of England had all the tokens of an absolute victory, as the place of battel, the ensignes, many of the greatest commanders his prisoners, and in a manner all, except the souereigne (whom the bounty of God referued for this realme) the campe, the spoiles, the bodies of the vanquished, which could not be buried but by his mercy.

Some examine the causes and motiues of this great defeat, the which they attribute to the choler, hast and rashnesse of the King and his brother. Truly hasty and rash heat is the

A stepdame of great actions, especially in warre, where the Captaines iudgement is more available then the souldiers force. But why ascend we not from these second causes (true in that which doth concerne vs) vnto the first and soueraigne cause? The aime of the Eternal, purging this Realme, full of vitious and corrupted humours, letting it blood, but not suffering it to die, this blood-letting shalbe the beginning of a stronger medicine prescribed by the same Physitions; & ministred vnto France, in the following reigns, but in the end we shal find the operatio, to the recovery of our estate. Let vs now see the progresse of our miseries.

Edward did all he could to manage this victory wisely, and Philip to preuent him. Edward without any stay passeth on, & without attempting the great cities of Amiens & Abbeuille, although neerer, he makes shew to set vpon Montreuil and Bologne, but he posted to Calais, a fit place for the passage of England. John of Vienne Marshall of France, and with him the Lord of Andreghan, great personages in those daies, commaunded there with a strong French garrison, being assisted with the faithfull resolution of the inhabitants. So, presently after the battel of Cressy, Edward did besiege the towne of Calais. A long siege, painefull, and of remarkable successe. Philip amazed with these bitter crosses fallen out beyond his hopes of ease, slept not, although it were with much paine, and lesse fruit. But his whole care was not for the overthrow at Cressy; he had a further reach, following the trace of this vnforgotten losse. He was entred into a new inheritance: this new losse was to him a new checke. Affliction is a great crime both in great and small, and opens their mouthes which haue their hearts ill affected. The people of France were in extreame pouertie, & yet

the battell
wonne.

Hee besiegeth
Calais.

C the necessitie of the Kings affaires forced them to a new charge. The ill gouernment of the publike treasure: the falshood of Treasurers (who enriched themselves by the pouertie of the miserable people) the fall of money imbased, the decay of trafficke, the increase of taxes, imposts, and subsidies, were the causes of this general want, the which drew the people into despaire in this surcharge of troubles falling vpon the King. This burthen grew the more heauie by a great famine, being followed by a strange generall plague, throughout the whole realme, as if heauen and earth had conspired to the ruine of France.

Philip inuironed with so many, and so great difficulties, continues constant, with a valourous resolution against them all. He provides for the guard of the Cities of Picardie, lying neere vnto danger and (to driue off the time vnfit for armes,) he calls a great assembly of his estates, to take Councel, aid & comfort in the perplexity of so many dangerous occurrents.

Philip calles a Parliament.

E In this assembly it was decreed, to call the Treasurers to an accompt, and to referre the gouernment of the treasure to Clergie men, and to the Nobility, thereby to free the people from all ieaousie of ill employing it. The Abbots of Marmoutier and Corbie, are chosen for this Intendancie, and to assist them, there are ioyned foure Bishops and foure Knights. Peter of Essars Treasurer of France is committed to prison, and condemned in a great fine to the King. Many Treasurers being condemned (iustly or vniustly) yeeld that at once which they had bin long in gathering, the sponge being then pressed by necessitie. The Bankers, Lombards, and other vsurers are then called to a strict accompt, by reason of their vniust exactions. The interests are prooued to exceed the principall, the which is forfeited to the King. The interest is remitted to the debtor, which paid the principall. But the chiefe fruit of this assembly was, that the whole body was well inclined to succour the King in so vrgent a necessitie, without any alteration for the new difficulties of State. Thus the winter was spent without any memorable act on either side. In the spring Philip goes to field with a great armie, and approacheth neere vnto Calais, to draw Edward to fight: but it was in vaine: for Edward contenting himselfe with his victory, and not willing to run the hazard of a second battaile, kept himselfe within his trenches: and to manifest his resolution vnto Philip, he built houses about Calais to lodge his armie drie, and sends for his wife, protecting publicly by a solemne oth, not to rise vntil he did see an end, and make the inhabitants pay for their obstinate resolution. On the other side Philip laboured to crosse Edward's designs, but with small successe. To worke a diuersion of this siege hee makes warre in England, by the King of Scotlands meanes, and in Flanders, by his sonne John, then Duke of Normandie, and afterwards King of France: but all succeeded ill.

Bankers and vsurers are

David King of Scotland (having by Philip's perswasion, entred and spoyled England) was defeated, taken & brought prisoner to London, through the happines of Edward's fortune, and 1348. and the diligence of his officers. John Duke of Normandy, hauing left Guienne by his fathers A command, comes into Flanders, besiegeth the towne of Cassel, held by the English faction: but he is forced to rise, by them within the towne: Then he fells vpon Lille, where he hath a new repulse, so as hardly could he retire himselfe to his father Philip, who sees his subiects in danger of shipwracke, yet could he not releuee them.

Calais taken. Guienne abandoned by John, for the action of Flanders, suffered much: for Henry of Lancaster Lieutenant for Edward in Guienne, (seeing the Countrie left weake by John's departure) issues out of Bourdeaux with an armie, and finding no enimie, he doth easily surprize many townes of Xantonge and Poitou, and laden with spoile he returns home.

In the end Calais yeelds to Edward, for the action of Flanders, suffered much: for Henry of Lancaster Lieutenant for Edward in Guienne, (seeing the Countrie left weake by John's departure) issues out of Bourdeaux with an armie, and finding no enimie, he doth easily surprize many townes of Xantonge and Poitou, and laden with spoile he returns home.

The French garrison was put to ransom, and so set at libertie: the Inhabitants were worse intreated, the baser sort onely were suffered to depart with what they could carrie about them: and in their stead Edward sends a Colonie of English, to whom he distributed all the goods of the vanquished, and fortified the towne, especially towards France: to leaue this place hereditarie to his posteritie, who held it 200. yeares, that is from the yeare 1346. vnto the raigne of Henry the 2. father to King Henry the third.

farewell of the Calisians.

The integritie of these poore inhabitants is remarkable in their extreame affliction. Edward had referred fixe of the chiefe Citizens, to be at his disposition, for the satisfying of his oath: hauing vowed to make the blood to flow in Calais. He demands them to this end, according to the conuentions. This charge being deliuered in the Towne house (where these miserable Burgeses were assembled, by his permission, to giue their Countrie their last farewell) they gaze on one another, terrified with so pittifull a condition. As they all stood mute in this common calamitie, one of the troupe breaking his mournfull silence: C Seeing (saith he) I haue so often employed my life for my countries good, should I now feare to sacrifice it for my last oblation? O my countymen! I doe cherefully offer my head to the King of Englands victorie, and will liue no longer in my countries miserie. This he spake without teares, and with so resolute a countenance, and a brow so manly big, as he moued the whole companie: so as all with one generall voice crie: Let vs go to the death, it is the last antie wee can performe to our poore Countrie. Immediately there was pressing among this great multitude, who should be of the fixe, to carrie their heads to Edwards triumph. They were chosen out, drawne, bound and led to execution. The Queene hauing notice thereof, desired to see the, who were brought bound into the executioners hands. This spectacle moued her to weep, and compassion caused her to beg a pardon of the King, beseeching him to giue life to these men worthie to liue after so constant a loyaltie. She obtains her request, and leaue for them to remaine still in Calais, esteemed to continue faithfull to their deliuerer, who had shewed D themselves so constant in the faithfull loue of their lost countrie. The historie did owe this digression to so commendable an act. The same Sommer brought Edward a wished successe in Brittain, touching the quarrell for the Duchie. Philip had taken John of Montfort, and Joane the wife of Charles of Blois, whom he led into England, and still weakeneth Philip's authoritie in Brittain, and fetles his owne. Thus passe the affaires of this world, euery one hath his turne. The two Duchesses of Brittain, Joane the wife of John of Montfort, and Joane the wife of Charles of Blois, did wonders in keeping those places they had in their possessions, during the imprisonments of their husbands: without entring farther into the discourse of the female warres of these Amazons, worthy yet of eternall memorie, hauing so courageously releued the afflictions of their imprisoned husbands, and neuer yeelded to necessitie. Flanders likewise grew mutinous by Edwards praetiles, being then greatly respected for the successe of his victorious armes. The Flemings receiued their Earle Lewis of Malle without any opposition, being sonne to that Lewis which was slaine at Cressie, but the Kings of France and England contended who should winne him. Lewis was in heart a Frenchman; the cities were generally affected to England: The marriage of this young Prince was great: Edward desired him for his daughter, but especially the oportunitie of this rich Countie for his affaires. He comes himselfe to Gand to compass his desire, but the euent was not answerable: for although the Earle made shew to embrace this alliance, at the great

A great instance of his subiects: yet his heart was otherwise affected, who (vnder colour to goe to the Heron) goes out of Gand with a small traine, and flies to Paris to Philip, who hauing receiued him graciously, perswades him to espouse Marguerite the second Daughter of the Duke of Brabant, thereby to cut off all hope of martyring with England. Thus the hatred of these two Princes continued: which in the end must breake forth into hostile effects: Picardie was the stage of their lamentable tragedies: and from thence the miserie was disperfed ouer the whole Realme. Philip giues the gouernement to Jeffrey Earle of Charne, and the Lieutenancie to Anthony of Montmorency. They fortifie the townes and bridle Calais, being assisted by a great number of voluntarie Nobilitie, louing the command of these two great Captaines, as a schoole of militarie Discipline; to shew, that the French did not faint in their afflictions. These losses were then repaired by the gaine of the country of Dauphine, one of the noblest and goodliest Prouinces of this Realme. And this was the occasion. Imbert or Vmbert Dauphin of Viennois, hauing lost his eldest sonne in the battell of Cressie, (as I haue said) and his youngest being two or three yeares old, by a strange accident, (they say that himselfe let him fall out of his armes, as he played with him at a window, thinking to feare him) and moreouer hauing Amè, the sixth Earle of Sauoy, an irreconcilable and deadly enimie, being too weake to resist him, nor able to make choice of a kinsman to repaire his estate (being wearie of the world, and decaying in iudgement) hee resolues to cast himselfe into the King of France his protection, to oppose him against his C enimie, and to put this goodly inheritance into his hands, thereby to preuent the Earles greedie desire. Forthwith hauing aduertised Philip of his intention, and being graciously intainted by him, he giues all the countrie of Dauphine to him and his successours kings of France: vpon condition, that the first sonne of the house of France should carrie the name of Dauphin of Viennois, and the armes of the countrie of Dauphine, should be quartered with the armes of France, and that the Nobilitie and whole countrie should bee receiued with their priuiledges. Amè Earle of Sauoy (otherwise a deere friend to Philip) sends his Embassadors to make his benefit of this exchange, but it was not for him: all that he could obtaine, was to exchange some land with that which lay intermixt within his territories adioyning, the better to liue in quiet afterwards. Dauphine was thus incorporated to the Crowne D of France. For wee cannot without any reason doubt, but in old time it was a member of this our Monarchie, as likewise Sauoy was: but in these diuersities of portions, vnder the children of Lewis the Gentle, as we haue noted before, the Realme and Empire, swallowing vp both the effect & the name of the Realme of Arles (in the which these Estates were comprehended) haue maintained themselves by a remarkable distinction: and so vnder the authoritie of the Empire, they haue since held their Soueraignie, not acknowledging any Emperour but their Princes. Dauphine is returned to his first originall, and Sauoy maintaines it selfe vnder the obedience of his Soueraigne Prince vnto this day. As for the name of Dauphin, giuen to the first sonne of France, the execution of Prince Suberts will was not put in practise, before Charles the fift sonne to John then Duke of Normandie, in the life of E his father Philip, and not giuen to John in the yeare 1348. The yeare following, the cittie of Montpellier, one of the goodliest of the Prouince of Languedoc, was purchased by Philip, of Lames King of Maiorca, to whom it belonged. The obseruations of this first authoritie of the Kings of Maiorca are yet remarkable in the priuiledges of the commonalty of this goodly cittie, delectable for the fertill situation, and famous, being the goodliest Theater for Physicke in Europe. Thus in the affaires of this world, there is time to loose, and time to win, that men might season their spirits with this temperature, neither to be drowned with aduersitie, nor drunke with prosperitie. In the flowing and ebbing of these gaines and losses one balancing another, Joane Q. of France, wife to Philip died, leauing him two sonnes, for gages of her loue, most worthie to be noted in the marriages of our Kings, John Duke of F Normandie, and Philip Earle of Valois, whereof the first (alreadie of yeares) gouerned the affaires of the Realme in his fathers life, and shall succeed him in the Crowne, and Philip shall be Duke of Orleans. This issue might haue contented Philip, being very old and broken: yet before the yeare was ended, he married Blanche the daughter of Philip of Eureux, King of Nauarre, who had another Daughter, Marguerite, married to Gaston of Foix, from whom shall spring Charles of Nauarre, the scourge of this realme, in the succeeding raignes. But Philip did not long enioy this vnnecessarie marriage: the which was a second burthen A to his yeares and toyles, so as he fell extreamely sicke at Nogent, and hauing recomme- ded concord and the care of his Realme to his 2. sons, leauing the Crowne to John his eldest, he yielded vp his soule to God, the threescore and fift yeare of his age, and of grace, 1350. in the moneth of August, hauing reigned 23. yeares. A Prince whose great vertues were balanced with great vices: for he was deuout, quicke, hardie, valiant, resolute in danger, courageous in affliction, louing order, iustice, and the people. But the presumption of his valour, and his resolution often inclining to rashnesse, choler and impatience, counterpoised these vertues, and were the causes of great miseries, both to him and his subiects.

Truly he could not auoide it, but in taking possession of so great and enuied an inheritance, and hauing so strong an aduersarie in front, he must indure many crosses: but those B inexcusable imperfections caused him to suffer much more then he had done, if he had settled his authoritie with iudgement and patience, and encountred his aduersarie already vanquished, with modestie and wisdom. During the forepassed raignes, since the yeare 1300. Neither the Empire nor the Church of Rome, were in any better estate, by the strange alteration of diuers changes, which happened in these two States: seeking to ruine one another vnto the end of this raigne. We haue left this discourse at the Empire of Albert, the tenth Duke of Austria, to whom Pope Boniface the 8. gaue the title and the armes of France in disdain of Philip the Faire, who caused him to be inuested after another fort, by Felix of Nogaret, then he would doe the Emperour of his Realme. Albert liued not long after the imagination of this new royaltie, for hee was slaine soone after by his Nephew John Duke of C Sueuia, whom he had spoiled of his Duchie, vnder colour that (beeing too prodigally) hee could not gouerne it as was requisite. Henry the 7. Duke of Luxembourg succeeded Albert being chosen with great affection of the German Princes, who feared left Philip the Faire should seaze vpon the Empire, by the Popes fauour beeing then a Frenchman, both by nation and disposition, and resident at Auignon. But hauing vexed himselfe with those inueterate diffentions of Guelphs and Gibelins, in the end he was poisoned by a Monke called Bernard a Iacobin, vnder colour of giuing him the Sacrament in the communion, at Beneuent in the yeare 1313. To increase this confusion, Lewis of Bauaria and Fredrick of Austria the sonne of Albert, contend for the Empire by open force: but they agreed to hold it D by equall authoritie. Yet this diffention was soone reuiued, by the meanes of Pope John the 22. borne at Cahors in Quercy, resident likewise at Auignon: who (seeking to hold a soueraigne authoritie ouer both, and to dispose the Empire to whom he pleased) entertained this hatred betwixt these two Princes, the which burst out into open warre. Fredrick was taken by Lewis in the yeare 1323. who (supposing to be now absolute in the Empire) suddenly fallies into new troubles by the same Pope John, who did excommunicate him, for that he would not resigne the Imperiall dignitie into his hand to dispose soueraignly thereof at his pleasure. This new affront gaue Lewis of Bauaria, occasion to examine the Popes authority, by the learned, and to raise a mightie armie to suppress him. So he came into Italy to oppose the force of the Empire against the Popes excommunications, and to giue a law to the E Sea of Rome, which sought to controule him. John fled at this Alarme. The Colledge of Cardinals assemble, and vpon the Emperours complaint they depose John as a fugitiue, and create Nicholas the 4. in his place. But there followes a strange alteration John returns and doth dispossesse Nicholas, but in the end death surpriseth John, whom Benedict the 12. doth succeed, a Tholoufan, and to Benedict, Clement the 6. a Limosin, who begins more violently against the Emperour then his predecessor John: for he caused Charles Marquis of Moravia, to be chosen in his place, beeing sonne to Lewis King of Bohemia, and Duke of Luxembourg, of whom we haue spoken in this raigne. So all the world was turmoyled with a generall confusion in this age, the which drawes after it a long traine of strange calamities.

JOHN the one and fiftith French King.

He difficulties falling in the reigne of Philip of Valois (the which we have D represented) are but trifles in regarde of the horrible tragick confusions, wherewith the following reignes haue beene afflicted, vnder John, Charles the fifth, Charles the sixth, and Charles the seventh. I will adde also vnder Lewis the eleuenth, vnto the warre of the common-wealth it selfe, the last fit of this intestine disafe, the which shall cease for that time. So we will reckon a hundred and twelue yeeres, of the most wretched time, that ciuill warres could breed in the bowels of this miserable state. The which begins not in our time onely to doe penance, either for the weaknesse of Kings, or the folly of subiects, or by the malice of such as haue abused both the one and the other to serue their execrable passions. By the effects, we shall obserue what a good King is in an estate, and how pernicious the command of many is in a common-weale, who (hauing power in the fouereigne authority) abuse the people with a shew of the common good, an ordinary cloake for such as fish in troubled waters. We shall see, by the vnruely euents of the contempt of royall authority (the King beeing either a prisoner, or sicke in iudgement) what a body is without a head, a realme without a King well obeyed, and a multitude gouerned by it selfe. A subiect susceptible of all impressions (but of bad rather then good, though alwaies couered with a shew of good) an instrument of all mischiefs in an Estate, when as (transported, by violent and disordred passions, couered with a shew of common good) it is not restrained with the reines of a lawfull authority: I meane a multitude, a dangerous beast with many heads, doing commonly more harme then good. Wee shall see heere what counsellours of State, the ambition and couetousnesse of great men bee: especially when women entermedle, armed with the shew of publike authority: and to conclude, wee shall confesse by a found iudgement of this discourse, that all things done in our age were done before. A briefe preface for the greatness of the subiect, yet necessary for that which is represented in these reignes, the which we will note according to their occurrents.

raigned fourteen yeares. He had made a long apprenticeship in managing the affaires of the Realme vnder his father Philip: but he neither ruled better nor more happily. His manners shall be knowne by his actions. He had 4. sonnes by Joane Countesse of Boulogne. Charles, Lewis, John, Philip, and one daughter named Joane. Charles his eldest sonne was Daulphin of Viennois in his fathers life, and Duke of Normandy, and after him King of France. Lewis Duke of Anjou, John Duke of Berry, and Philip called the hardie, first he was Earle of Touraine, and after (through his brothers fauour) Duke of Burgongne, and Earle of Flanders, in the right of his wife. Joane was married to Charles King of Nauarre and Earle of Eureux: Princes which shall play their parts vpon this Theater, in euery scene of the Tragedie that I am to represent, and for this reason they are to be obserued in the beginning.

Charles King of Nauarre the scourge of this Realme, and his humours.

This Charles King of Nauarre was sonne to Lewis Earle of Eureux, and of Joane daughter to King Lewis Hutin, who by the sufferance of Philip the long, her vncler, succeeding to the Crowne, remained Queene of Nauarre, and by this right Charles her sonne caried both the title and effect of the Realme, with many other great inheritances: A Prince of the blood royall both by father and mother, and sonne in law to King John, hauing married Joane his onely daughter. A man of a subtil spirit, eloquent, actiue, vigilant, but ambitious, vnfaithfull, malicious, reuengefull, armed with the prerogatiue of his blood, and the great meanes he enioyed, to be a pernicious instrument to trouble the King & his Realme, beyond all measure, but in the end he shall receiue a due reward for his actions, by a death worthy of his life.

A mournfull beginning of his raigne.

After Johns coronation at Rheims, with his wife Joane, being returned to Paris, he began his raigne by a famous act of an vnfortunate preface: for he caused Raoul Earle of Eu, and of Guines to be beheaded in prison, vpon light accusations, as hauing intelligence with the English, and that hee betrayed his affaires, for that hee had passed and repassed into France vpon his faith giuen during his imprisonment. He was Constable of France.

John aduanced Charles of Spaine to his place, grand child to the King of Castile, and son in law to the Earle of Blois, and so allied to the King, and exceedingly beloued of him amongst all his greatest fauourites. He shalbe the first fruites of many miseries, when as this raigne promised some rest, vnder a King of age and experience, fit to gouerne a Realme. For as John was busie to institute the order of the Knights of the Starre (in the end grown so common, as it remains a badge for the Knight of the Watch and his Archers vnto this day) there chanced a great misfortune to this Constable.

His discontent.

Charles of Nauarre complained that the King detained from him the counties of Champagne and Brie, belonging to his mother by the same title that the kingdom of Nauarre did. This was true, but by reason of their neerenesse vnto Paris, the Kings counsell had vnted these Earledomes vnto the Crowne, and giuen in exchange the Townes of Mante & Meulan, with a pension answerable to the reuenues of the said Earledomes, without any prejudice to the Nauarrois. But he sought an occasion for a cause, smothering some malicious pretence in his heart, the which he discovered by many effects. Not daring to complain directly of the King, he quarrelled with the Constable, as the chiefe of the Council, of whom he was exceeding iealous, for the priuate fauour the King did beare him. Hauing taken counsel with his passion, he caused the Constable to be slaine in his bed, at Aigle in Normandie, but with so great a presumption, as he himselfe came vnto the place accompanied with his brother Philip of Nauarre, John Earle of Harcourt and his brethren, and with many gentlemen his followers. This murder thus audaciously committed, he retires himselfe easily to Eureux (whereof he was Earle) from whence hee writes to the good cities of the Realme, avouching this murder as done by his command, & iustifying it as lawfull and reasonable. King John found himselfe much wronged, but not able then to redresse it, hee promised to remit the fact, so as he would aske pardon with the respect due to his royall maiesty. The which Charles is content to do, but vpon good gages, holding the Kings word insufficient to secure his person. So as John giues him Lewis his second sonne for hostage.

The Nauarrois comes to Paris, hee presents himselfe to the Kings Council, and seeks to giue some reason for this murder: yet the Council condemnes him as guilty of high Treason, & decrees that he should be committed to prison. James of Bourbon Earle of March (newly aduanced to the office of Constable) laies hold on him, and puts him in guard; but all

All this was but for a shew, to maintaine the publike respect, for presently the three queens goe to the King. (Joane daughter to Lewis Hutin his mother in law; Blanche widow to Philip of Valois, and Joane daughter to King John, Queene of Nauarre, his wife). Charles likewise came himselfe, and fals vpon his knees before the King: both he and they seeme to weepe, and to sue for mercie of King John, who had already granted his pardon, vpon good assurance: John grants his request, yet could he not command his heart to leaue this malicious iealousie, the which made him to seeke new occasions daily to crosse his father in Lawes actions.

He then offers his seruice to the King of England, who failes not to embrace this occasion, hauing the heart and hand of a Prince of the blood, whose power was great in the state. Vpon this assurance he sends Edward his eldest sonne Prince of Wales into Guienne, with a goodly armie: a young man of an exceeding hope, and giues him for counsell, John Shandos, Robert Knowles, Francis Hals, and John of Arondel, great men in their times, and which shall be famous in those actions which shall follow.

He attended the end of the truce, the which being expired he enters Guienne, and passeth into Languedoc, to Tholoufa, Narbonne, and ouer all, he spoiles, sackes, kils, and findes no resistance, and returnes without difficultie to Bourdeaux, being laden with spoiles.

New warre by the King of Nauarre practises.

At the same instant another cloud of English-men breakes out of Calais, and spoiles the Countrie of Picardie: but John by these alarmes foresees the tempest of a greater warre, C measuring the forces of England by the will of King Edward his assured and tried enemy.

He therefore seeks a remedie by an ordinarie course: he calles a generall Parlement, to take Councell and comfort from them in these new occurrents. Charles of Nauarre assists, but with an intent to crosse the Kings proceedings by indirect practises, and to withdrawe the subiects affections from assisting the King with their meanes in this necessitie: but it was in vaine, for in regard of Johns promise to better the coyn, they granted him a reasonable aide to raise and intertaine a great armie. This faithfull resolution of the French, did for that time suppress the violence of the English, but not the furious malice of the Nauarrois: for hauing laboured in vaine to dissuade the people from their promised succours, and hauing raised by these practises, seditions in diuers parts of the Realme, he lands at Cherebourg D with two thousand men, robs and spoiles the countrie, and takes the Castell of Conches in Normandie from the King. An intollerable presumption, of a subiect against his Prince, after the murder of a Constable. But John dissembles this affront, and by the mediation of his sonne Charles, Daulphin of Viennois, he remits this second fault, and receiues the King of Nauarre his sonne in law againe into fauour: but in effect he doth it to frustrate his purposes, and to punish such as had assisted him.

John did then giue the Duchie of Normandie to the Daulphin for his portion: so as hee must take possession thereof. An apparent cause to draw him thither: but in effect Johns intention was to draw the Nauarrois into a place of easie surprise, to make him and his adherents to giue an account of their wicked actions, and to preuent them hereafter. The newe Duke of Normandie arriues at Roan, whether all the good townes of the Countrie runne to doe him homage. The King of Nauarre (who held Eureux and many great Lordships in the countrie, with one of the greatest dignities in the Realme) comes to doe him honour, well accompanied, but better receiued by Charles his brother in law.

The King aduertised that the Nauarrois was at Roan with his sonne, goes speedily from Paris, accompanied with his Brother Philip Duke of Orleans Lewis his second sonne Duke of Anjou, the Earle of Tancarville, and Arnoul of Endreghain Marshal of France, and posts to Roan with this great traine.

Arriuing about dinner time, he presently goes to his sonnes lodging, where he finds him at table, accompanied with the King of Nauarre, and the most of them which had assisted him at the Constables murder, where (without any more deliberation or delay) hee cautieth them all to be apprehended. And then (not pausing any longer) hee made choice of foure out of this number, the two Brethren of Harcourt, the Lord of Manbuc, and Colinet Doublet, chiefe actors in the foresaid murder, and without any other forme of proceeding, (as a matter long before determined) hee cautieth their heads to be cut off, setting them vpon stakes, and drawing their carcases to the gibbet. The next day he made choice of prisoners,

Charles of Nauarre taken prisoner by the King. Foure of his complices beheaded.

1356. soners, and sends the Nauarrois with Frignet and Bontabu, his domestike and most trustie A seruants, to Arras, with a good guard, and presently dismisseth all the rest to their houses, enioyning them expressly vnto fidelitie and loyaltie to his seruice, binding the by a new oath.

This v unexpected execution amazed the whole countrie, like to a cracke of thunder, but it roused vp the Nauarrois faction, especially Philip of Nauarre, brother to Charles, and Jes- frey of Harcourt vnto the two brethren beheaded, the which opened the gates to a strange confusion, which shall cast John into miserable captiuitie, and draw the Nauarrois out of prison, with a flaming torch in his hand to fire the whole Realme. Behold Philip and the house of Harcourt presently in England, crying out against murder. They intreate Ed- ward to stretch forth his hand to bee reuenged of so notable an iniustice and disloyaltie. B They offer him their hearts, persons, goods, towns and hauens, to land in Normandie without any difficultie, and there to make warre commodiously against so trecherous and cruell
a Prince.

Edward a wife and vigilant Prince, who had his eyes open to all occasions that might annoy his enemy, imbrace this offer: he assembles his troupes to send them speedily into Normandie. And, to doe nothing by halues, he employes all he can to leaue a great army, the which he sends into Guienne, to make worke for John in diuers places, and not to suffer this first heate of the discontented French to coole, hee then without any delay sends the Duke of Gloucester into Normandie with 4000. choice men, who lands easily, and ioynes with Philip of Nauarre, and so they ouer-runne and spoile the Champion countrie. The terror of these new forces spreads presently ouer all. The townes of Lizieux, Orbes, Becheloin C and Ponteau on the sea, yeeld presently. And (not staying to besiege any great Citties) hee goes to Bretueil and Tuilleries, and from thence to Verneuil in Perche: the which hee takes easily, giuing it out in all places, that it was to reuenge the wrong done to the King of Na-uarre and his seruants: a dutie of humanitie which Kings ought not to refuse one to another in their greatest necessitie.

King John hasteth thither with his armie, and recouers Bretueil and Tuilleries, and had easily repossessed all the rest, if a new occasion had not drawne him elsewhere, and the secret decree of God, to his ruine. Edward Prince of Wales, the eldest sonne of Edward King of England, was then in Guienne to gouerne the countrie vnder his fathers authoritie. Edward D sends him two thousand horse and 8000. English Archers, with commission to assemble all he can in the Countrie of Guienne, vnder his obedience: where he was followed by a great number of the Nobilitie, and houses of marke. The chiefeest were Captal de Buch, and the Lord of Grailly (some thinke that out of these two houses vnted, the race of Camdale is issued) with the Lords of Esparre, of Mucidan, of Montferrand, of Duras, and of Segur. All prepares for a great hurly-burly, John hauing leauied a goodly armie, turnes head to the place, whether the greatest burthen of the warre did call him. Hauing therefore left sufficient forces in Normandie to make head against the duke of Gloucester, he marcheth towards Poitou, whether the Prince of Wales was now come. Pope Clement the 6. a Limosin, resident at Auig-non, sends the Cardinall of Peregrin his legate to these two Princes (beeing readie to fight) E to calme this storme. But the preparation of John's great forces, was the chiefe motiue to make Edward willing to giue ouer: who began to stay and to thinke of his retreat, and of a reasonable composition by the Legates meanes; who goes from one to another to make this accord. John demanded, That Edward should giue him foure hostages, and as one vanquished should remaine at his mercy and discretion. Edward was content to yeeld vp all that hee had taken from him, but without any blemish to his honour, whereof he said, he was accom-plishable to God and his countrie.

The error of King John.

John would not accept of this offer (notwithstanding all the intreaties and perswasions the Legate could vse) finding himselfe farre stronger then his enemy: saying, it was his aduantage to prescribe him lawes. But his Fathers experience, so dearly bought, should haue F taught him wit, and not so willingly to runne into a mischief. Oh miserable France which art neuer wise but too late!

This King shuts his eyes to Presidents, stops his eares to all admonitions of reason, seeking his owne ruine wilfully, as if the time had beene too short for his perdition. He desired at any hand to fight presently, to whip this young warriour, hauing forgotten that he had plaid

A plaid his prize at Cressie; and learned not to be rash in a matter of so great consequence, but what followed? The onely meanes to preserue the vanquished, is to hope for no helpe.

Edward's worthy resolution
in exaunche.

So Edward seeing himselfe reduced to this extremitie, either to loose his honour or his life, he resolues to employ his life couragiously, to saue his honour vertuously, and the euent fauoured his resolution. John had all aduantages ouer Edward, both of number, force, shewe, countrey and conceit (the which is commonly a consideration of no small importance in worldly affaires) and withall the choice of all his horsemen, (esteemed then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wisest Captaines of his whole Realme. Beeing well aduertised of the number and estate of the English armie, (which consisted for the most part of footmen)

The order of the French
armie.

B his meaning was to draw him to battell: presuming easily to defeat this troupe of English bowmen with so great a number of Lances and battleaxes wel armed. So as putting al hope of victorie in his horse, he makes the forme of his battel according to his disscine. But he had forgotten, that neither horse nor horseman saues the man in the day of battell. He resolues therefore to charge onely with his horse, and to giue his Nobilitie the honour of the victo-rie, the which he held confidently in his hands, before the battel. Vpon this proiect, he arrangeth his foot apart in one battalion, and diuides his horse into three squadrons, whereof he giues the first to his Constable (some name the Duke of Athenes, the stemme of the house of Tremouille: and some write, that he was of the house of Brema) accompanied with two Marshals of France, Arnould of Endreghen, and John of Clermont. The second was giuen
C to Charles his eldest son, and the third with his sonne Philip, he referues to himselfe. In this confidence of his horsemen, he bethinkes himselfe of a new stratageme: out of euery Squadron he choseth an hundred horse, and so made one body of three hundred, meaning therewith to breake the first ranks of the enemies army, which for the most part were foote. The Prince of Wales prest by necessitie, had another desseigne. Standing vpon his defence, he resolues to encourage himselfe, and by courage to animate his armie with an obstinate resolution, to fight desperately against so strong an enemy, and so to gouerne his forces as the combate might prooue difficult to the enemy, whom he sees readie to charge. He lodgeth his armie in a place of aduantage for defence against the horse, hauing both behind them, and on their flanks, Vines, Bushes, Hedgerowes and vnderwoods, all of hard approach for D the horse. But he addes industrie and makes the place more inaccessible, causing the souldiers to cast vp great trenches with wonderfull expedition. Hauing provided for his campe, he doth place his archers vpon the approaches so politickly, as they might succour the horse and be releued by them, and likewise resist the enemy when they should be charged. But aboue all he labors to animate his Souldiers, so as the courage of his small troupe did equall the number of the greater, in this firme resolution, either to vanquish or to die together, to maintaine their honors and good fortunes, and in this order the English attend the French army confidently, whom they see preparing to fight. Whilest that Edward provides thus for his defence, there befell a great contention in the French armie, the which swaies much in this daies fight. For comming to make choice of a hundred horse out of euery battalion,

The English
armie.

E there were some discontented, (the places beeing giuen rather by fauour then merite) so as such as were left behind, finding themselves grieved, as with a repulse, were more readie to double their despight, then their courages to fight. Impressions which import much in these great occurrents, when the mind must still be present with that we doe, and not be distracted with any other affections: but they are now ready to fight. Behold this troupe of 300. horse departs, commaunded by Eustache of Ribemont. The trumpets sound to battell, they all runne to the easiest approach of the English trenches, to draw forth their footmen, and to peruoke them to fight. This was another error of John, that beeing stronger then Edward, besieging him in the Vines, and cutting off his victuals, in few daies he might haue vanqui-

but the issue of John's new stratageme was contrary to his expectation: for in this first charge they find resistance.

them at their pleasures, shooting forth a dangerous storme of arrowes, and vpon their flanke A riseth another shower, which passeth through these horsemen, whereas neither launce nor Battleaxe could preuaile. Hauing made this first charge with so great losse, they seeke to retire, and to charge the enemy in some other place; but they fall into a greater perplexitie, for the horses sinke in this mirie ground, and are entangled among the stubbes, stakes and trees: some fall, some rise againe, all are in confusion; they lie plunging in the ditches and trenches, and the English arrowes flie from all sides. This troupe hauing drawne downe the the rest by degrees, like to a current of water which disperfeth it self by a channel, the more men, the more disorder: and our Frenchmen grow amazed at this repulse.

The English seeing them giue backe in confusion, crie victorie, and follow their aduantage, striking on all sides, as they lay wallowing one vpon another. King Iohn runnes to B repaire this disorder. He performs the dutie both of a good captaine, in gathering together his disperfed men, and of a valiant souldier, in fighting courageously: but the blow was alreadie giuen, all was lost. The Duke of Athens Constable, and Iohn of Clermont Marshall, were slaine at the first charge. The Standard Royall appears no more, by the fall of Earle of Charnie, who carried it in this daies fight. The greatest part of the commanders, and of this braue Nobilitie (who sought to be in the front) are vnhorfed.

This rampart ouerthrowne, and the rest shaken and broken in peeces, the Prince of Wales preuailes the more easily. King Iohn is furre engaged in the conflict. The English crie, to the King, to the King. Beeing charged on all sides, he defends himselfe admirably, and his sonne Philip (beeing neere him) surmounted the ordinarie courage of the most resolute C Souldiers, in defending his father from blowes (This generous valour did first purchase him the name of Hardy, and the course of his life did confirme it in diuers worthie actions) but in the end they are prisoners.

Whereupon there grew some controuersie, (not without extreme danger to his person,) for hauing yeelded vnto Denis of Morbec his owne subiect, (borne in the countrie of Arthois, banished for some fact) he was haled by other souldiers, who pretended an interest in this prize. But the Prince of Wales vnderstanding thereof, sent him an honourable guard of some of his most trustie seruants, whilest that he made the victorie absolute. The head beeing taken, all are surprized with feare: all are disperfed, and the slaughter is general without resistance. Edward content to have the head, sounds a retreat, and forbids them to pursue the victorie. Many saue themselves in Poitiers: which stands vpon her guard, lest the enemy should enter with them that fled.

The victorious Prince remaining vpon the place of battell, sends a troupe of Noble men King Iohn taken prisoner. Prince Edward receiues him with great respect. Galscons, to receiue the King prisoner, and to conduct him to his paulion, the which they do with great respect. Edward seeing him approach, meetes him with great reuerence, honours him, comforts him, entertaines him with a louing discourse, and promifeth him all the good vlsage a great King could expect in his aduersitie. A young Prince twice a Conquerour, hauing vanquished his enemy, both by valour and courtelie, leauing an honourable trophæ of his humanitie and wisdom to posteritie. Iohn (seeing his countenance) shewed a courageous mind in his misfortune. A notable example for Princes to shew an inuincible constancie, against the most dangerous losses, amongst which the losse of libertie holds the most mournfull rancke, and is of the bitterest digestion.

The number of the dead.

Our losse was then very great, and the sequele very pernicious. They number seuteene hundred Gentlemen slaine in this battell, amongst the which there were fiftie two Lords.

The chiefeft of marke were Peter of Bourbon, the Duke of Athens, Constable of France, Iohn of Clermont Marshall of France, George of Charny great Chamberlaine, Renauld of Chameil Bishop of Chalons, the Lords of Pont, and Fayette, and of the common sort fure or fixe thousand. A hundred ensignes were brought away in triumph, the spoyle carried away, the place of battell free, the dead bodies at the conquerours mercie. The King was taken F (the chiefeft part of the victorie) and with him he drawes into the same prison Philip his son (afterwards Duke of Burgogne) James of Bourbon Earle of Ponthieu, Iohn of Arthois, Earle of Eu, Charles of Arthois his brother Earle of Longueuille, Charles earle of Tancarville, Iohn of Melun, and his son Archbish. of Sens, the Earles of Vendosme, Salbruch, Nassaw, Dampmartin, la Roche, and many other of accõpt. This ouerthrow hapned in the yere 1356 the

And prisoners

A the 19. day of September, continued with many confusions wherof I tremble to discourse. But let vs continue the order of our Historie. Iohn (falling into his enemies hands) is brought to Bourdeaux, and from thence safely conducted into England to Edward, who shewed himselfe as courteous to his capitall enemy beeing his captiue, as glad of his Sonnes victorie. Some say he commended him more to haue receiued Iohn with humanitie, then to haue conquered him by his valour. A lesson for great Princes to learne, that vertue doth equall valour, and that he is rightly a Conquerour, that can vanquish himselfe. He doth lodge him honourably in the citie of London, in the Duke of Lancasters house, with his sonne Philip vnder a sure guard. The other prisoners are disperfed into diuers places according to their B qualities, to draw a reasonable ransom from them; the which as they payed, he sent free to their houses with much honour, and at that instant he gaue libertie vpon the kings word, being captiue, to all such as he would answer for. In this great calamitie, God looked vpon France with his eye of pittie, willing to chastise it, but not to ruine it. For he referued (during the Kings captiuitie) royall heads, to saue this estate from shipwracke, being almost ruined, both by the great afflictions passed, as also by the imprisonment of their Soueraign head, and the death of so many great personages, necessarie instruments for the preservation and greatnesse of the State. As Charles eldest son to Iohn, Dauphin and Duke of Normandie, Lewis Duke of Aniou, and Iohn Duke of Berrie escaped in this defeat. Charles was off to wife and temperate a spirit, as he seemed capable to gouerne this great barke in the C most horrible stormes of confusion, which happened in this Realme, during his fathers imprisonment. Iohn continued five yeares a prisoner, for he was taken in the yere 1356, in September & was deliuered in the yere 1361. in the moneth of May. But let vs describe in order the disorders which chanced in his captiuitie. As soone as the Dauphin (so called vntil he be Regent) came to Paris, he employes all his wits to procure his fathers libertie, and to maintaine the Kings free authoritie in the Realme; the which was as much restrained as the Kings person. But in this good & commendable resolution he found strange difficulties. He presently calls a generall assembly of the Estates at Paris, in October following, an expedient remedie for the greatest affaires of this Monarchie, profitably practised in the most vtgent causes of our Kings.

D There Charles laith before them, not onely the miserie whereunto the King his father was brought; but also the whole Realme in his person; he intreates them to giue him counsell and assistance in this so great an extremitie. The cause spake of it selfe; his person was an excellent Orator. Moreover, he failed in no point of his dutie: for his mournfull countenance exprest his sorrow naturally, and he did well vrge the necessitie of his demand, with so wise and modest an eloquence, as it would haue moued and dissolued euen the hardest Rocks of the Pyrenean mountaines. But the answer which was then made him, and the long continuance of crosses giuen him in so commendable an action, shew wel what an ill counsellèd people is, & how dangerous it is to let slip the reines of restraint to so furious a beast, which growes then most outrageous, when there is greatest need of mildnesse and modestie.

E Without doubt there had beene many disorders in the former raignes: and in this new controuersie for the Crowne, Philip had made great breaches. But is it now time to com- plaine of the sicke, when he lyes at the point of death, and to represent vnto him his fore- passed errors, in stead of applying fit remedies for his griefe? So doe the people (being wit- tie and eloquent) comaine of the errors of their superiors, and are more readie to increase the disease, (by remedies worse then the disease it selfe) rather then to cure it; as shal appeare by the popular actions, during the raigne of King Iohn, who from complaints haue exceeded to audacious seditions: and in the end to cruell and tragicke massacres: not only to tread under-foote, but to ouerthrow the lawfull authoritie of this Monarchie.

The Parliament consisted of all the best Citties of the Realme: but as Paris is the chiefe, F so hauing among the rest the first degree and greatest meanes, it was also the chiefe in credit. So as when order is well obserued, it brings the greatest benefite to this estate: but when as disorder raignes, the greatest confusion comes from thence. The Church holdes the first rancke in Parliament: and then the Prouost of Merchants in the Citie of Paris, whereas the Vniuersitie had then great credite. All partes shall play vpon this Theater, either for good or euill, by strange accidents. But let vs returne to our Dauphin. After that he had made his proposition; the Estates being assembled in one bodie, resolved: That to auoide confusion, there should be fittie chosen out of all the Prouinces, to determine of things necessarie, according to the instructions and remembrances deliuered to them. These fittie Deputies assemble in the Gray-friars, where by a common consent they resolve what to say vnto the Daulphin: who being intreated to come vnto their assembly, and set to heare some notable offer of assistance, conformable to the necessitie of the time, Robert le Cœq Bishop of Laon, spake thus vnto him in the behalfe of the companie: That the assembly beseeched him to sweare to keepe secret what should be deliuered vnto him by the Estates. This young Prince being nothing amazed in this perplexitie, answers them presently with a resolution: That he should greatly forget the degrees he held in the State, in receiving a lawe from his fathers subjects: And therefore he did commaund them, by the naturall authoritie he had ouer them, to speake freely what their hearts conceiued. Then the Bishop in all their names made knowne vnto him the ill gouernement of the Treasure, demanding reformation thereof, with a commission to call the Receiuers to an accompt; that all such as had managed the Kings money, should be displaced; and that hereafter both the treasure, and the affaires of State should be gouerned by foure Prelates, and twelue Bourgeffes, amongst the which the Cittie of Paris should haue the first degree and credit, and that without this counsell the Daulphin should attempt nothing. And for the conclusion of all their demands, they require him most instantly to set the King of Nauarre at libertie. And vpon this condition they promise the Daulphin aide and succour for his fathers deliuerie.

The Daulphin noting plainly both the intention of this ill-aduised people, and that it was now out of season to take exception at the violence of these popular furies; demands repite to giue them an answer: the next day passeth in this sort, without answer to the Deputies, who intreate him to resolve. He makes his excuse vpon the importancie of these affaires, and demands a new day to consider thereof. And as they pressed him daily to make his answer: so he still prolonged the time by many subtill delaies, grounded vpon sundrie excuses, of purpose to disperse them, and to dissolue their counsels: the which he sees was practised by his enemies. And hauing caused the Deputies to attend many daies, this plot (so hotely pursued) grew cold, and (tired with tediousnesse) they returne home to their houses, without any other fruite; then great shewes: leauing the King languishing in prison, and the Realme in pitifull disorder. But they parted not without leauing the chiefe leuaine of their intended mischiefe at Paris, and too many hands to worke in this masse of confusion, to the great preiudice of France.

An ill-aduised people hath this humor: To complaine still of the present estate, and to seeke the future with hope of better. The Parisiens who had seized vpon authoritie, (more carefull for the deliuerie of the King of Nauarre, then of their lawfull King) summon the Daulphin to set the Nauarrois at libertie, according to the decree of the Estates: and taking his delaies for a deniall; they practise with Iohn of Piqueny, gouernour of the countrie of Artois (to whom K. Iohn going to the vnfortunate battell of Poitiers, had giuen in keeping) to deliuer him out of the Castell of Alleux in Cambressis, where hee had remained nineteene moneths a prisoner. This young Prince enuironed with all these difficulties, had yet one which exceeded the rest. The Bishop of Laon the chiefe of his Counsell betrayed him, being a priuate and passionate partaker of the Nauarrois. Charles of Nauarre is deliuered, meaning to come to Paris, and therefore he demands a safe-conduct from the Daulphin, who grants it, will he or no; that is, he puts a sword into the hands of his most malicious and furious enemy, and lodgeth him in his owne house. These were bitter pilles, but he must digest the, euen the Daulphin and all good men that did assist him. But many of them (loth to allow of these confusions by their free consents) retire themselves to their houses.

The Nauarrois hauing his passport from the Daulphin, not onely as a gage of the publike faith, but as a sentence against king Iohn being prisoner, goes to Paris with a stately traine, where they all prepare for his entertainment. The Bishop of Laon, and the Prouost of Marchants, with a great troupe of his Partisans meete him, who went to lodge in the Abbey of S. Germaine. Hee lets the people vnderstand, that he desires to speake publicly vnto them. A scaffold is built, and the people throng in great troupes, bringing both hearts and cares. The Nauarrois (a subtill and an eloquent man) represents vnto them the wrong of his

A imprisonment, and his interest to the crowne: he desires iustice might bee done him according to his desert and quality; but about all, he spares not to touch that string which should aduance him to the royaltie. The people applaud him, and giue charge to the Prouost of Marchants to make the Daulphin acquainted therewith: the which hee performs with a brauado. The Bishop of Laon (a treacherous seruant to his Maister) answers for him (being silent in this necessity) That the Daulphin should shew grace and fauor to the King of Nauarre, as one good brother ought to another. He makes the Daulphin so humble, as hee prevents the Nauarrois (who kept his lodging but to preach to this seditious multitude) and doth visit him first, whom he doth scarce meet at the doore with a cold welcome. Hee requires audience of his demands. They are read in counsell, which consisted for the most part of men corrupted. Where it was decreed: That all which the King of Nauarre and his complices had done against the King and his realme, should bee forgotten as neuer done: his goods seized and in the Kings hands, should be restored both to him and his, with their honours, which had bene beheaded by the commandement of King Iohn: their bones should be gathered together, and honourably interred: all acts of condemnation disannulled, and an act of their iustification autentically drawne, to free them and theirs hereafter from all ignominy. The demand of the King of Nauarres pretended title, was remitted to another time.

But the Nauarrois brings in the King of England, of whom the Daulphin demanded a truce: the which hee grants vpon condition, that he might succour the King of Nauar and Iohn of Montfort Duke of Brittain in their pretensions. Thus the seeds of war were sowne during the confused calamity of this poore realme, by the meanes of Charles of Nauar. At the same instant Edward makes rigorous demands of his prisoner Iohn, on whom (for all his good countenance) he meant to make a benefit by his captiuitie. He required homage of him for the realme of France, as holding it of the realme of England, and vpon this condition he would set him at liberty. King Iohn being of a couragious spirit, though a prisoner in his person, answers him freely. That hee must not speake to him of that which he neither ought, nor would do, to alienate a right inalienable. That hee was resolved, at what price soeuer, to leaue it to his children, as hee had receiued it from his Ancestors. That affliction might well image his person, but not the inuolable right of the crowne, where hee had the honour to be borne: euer the which neither prison, nor death had any power, and especially in him, who should alwaies hold his life well employed, sacrificizing it for the immortal preservation of France. This generous resolution of King Iohn, gaue as great occasion to pity his calamity, as the strange conditions of the English (being victor) ministred matter of grieve and disdain to all true-hearted Frenchmen: but all this could neither temper the malice of the Nauarrois, nor the furious impudency of this enchanted people. Herevpon the Daulphin intreats the Parisiens to take pity of his poore father: who not able to auoide the ineuitable crosses of fortune, common to all degrees, could well shew his constancy in greatest afflictions. But these brutish mindes will not bee moued by any apparant reasons: so as after this poore prince had vsed all the submissions necessity could inuent, to winne the people, in the end after the losse of his paines, he sought to the other Citties of France. Hauing left Lewis duke of Anion his brother at Paris, to supply his place, and to maintaine some shew of authority, the effect whereof crept hourly into the Nauarrois power, he went from City to City, crauing aide of the French, for the deliury of his father and the restoring of his Estate. The history doth much honor the prouince of Languedoc, to haue made great shewes of duty to their King being prisoner: for it obserues, That the three Estates of the country (assembled in one body at Tholousa) vnder the authority of the Earle of Armagnac their gouernor, did freely grant a great aide to the King, for the performance whereof, they would not onely employ their reuenues, but their most precious mouables, yea their wiues iewels. And to testifie their general heauinesse, they abandoned all sumptuous apparell and bankets, especially all dances, masks, plaies and other pleasures, during the captiuitie of their King.

Champagne followed this commendable example. But examples did no more moue the Parisiens hearts, then reason had done, who answered the Daulphin roughly, when he intreats them most humbly, that hee should call an other parliament, where they would aduise what was to be done. Their intent was to take all authority from the Daulphin, & to vsurpe it themselves: to dispose of the treasor, of honours and dignities, of peace and warre, and of the the life and death of the Kings subiects at their pleasures. To this end they made this yong A Prince contemptible and odious, assembling together both without his priuity and against his will, in Churches and publike places, in priuate houses, in great and smal troupes without any feare or respect of the royall dignity.

The Daulphin more a prisoner then his father, durst not repine against these disorders, which increased hourly, like to a violent streame which falles from a high mountaine through the force of much raine. This furious multitude (puffed vp daily by the practises of the Nauarrois, who imploied both heart and hand to ruine the Daulphin) falles in the end from threats to blowes. The Apostum is ripe, it must needs breake. An exchanger named Peter Maré, pickt a quarrel with the Daulphins treasurer, & kills him in Saint Maries street. B Having slaine him, he flies into Saint James of the Butchery, and no man pursues him. The Daulphin seeing his authority too much blemished, in suffering himselfe to be thus braued, caused the murtherer to bee drawne out of the Church, and to bee executed: his hand to be cut off in the place where the murther was committed, & from thence to be drawn to the gibet and hanged. And to the end the people should not mutine, hee went accompanied with a gard of fouldiars, led by Robert of Clermont Marshal of France.

King John

Parisiens for his deliuey:
but in vaine.

The same day arriued the Ambassadors of King John, being prisoner, to sollicit his deliuey, after many voiaiges made for the space of two yeeres, that is to say two ages for a poore prisoner, to whom delay is a double languishing. But they were too true witnesse, both of the fruitlesse teares of this poore Prince, and of the barbarous cruelties of these Canibals. C They beheld the Bishop of Paris, in the Daulphins sight, and in the view of all the world, to take this murtherers carcase from the gibet, and to carry it to the Church, from whence hee was drawne, and there to bee honourably interred. But this was not all. John of Piqueny comes to the Daulphin from the Nauarrois, to summon him to hold his promise, concerning the demands which were granted him in councell. And as the Chancellor replied, that they had beene performed, hee answered (the Daulphin beeing present, and the two Queenes.) That whosoeuer would maintaine the contrary, had lied. And to heape one mischief vpon another: the Prouost of Marchants, with some of the Vniuersity, come vnto the Daulphin, who by a Iacobin Orator called Simon of Langres (for it is not at this day alone, that Monkes haue beene medlers in State) require him to preforme the promises made to the King of Nauarre, or else the people would rise against him, if hee refused so apparant and reasonable a duty. D

A Parliament was likewise called for the Kings deliuey, wherevnto the bloud of France, (which cannot degenerate) caused the cities to bee inclined, so as things seemed in the end to promise some redresse. Being assembled at the Augustins, the Prouost of Paris gathered together three thousand men of the basest artificans, and comes armed to the house of Saint Pol, where the Daulphin was lodged; having seized vpon the gate, and stopt all the passages, hee ascends to the Princes chamber, beeing followed by his armed men. The Daulphin was therewith much amazed. Feare not (saies the Prouost) for anything you shall see: for what shall be done, hath beene decreed, and it must bee so. The watch-word being giuen, behold John of Conflans, and Robert of Cleremont Marshals of France, (two trusty seruants to the Daulphin, are slaine before his eyes, and so neere vnto him, as the bloud rebounded vpon his face. Ha (cries this poore Prince) what is this? will you attempt against the bloud of France? No my Lord (saies the Prouost vnto him) feare nothing, it is not against your person we pretend, they bee your disloyall seruants we seeke, who haue so ill aduised you. Then he tooke his hood, and put his vpon the Daulphins head, being halfe red, and halfe skie-coloured, the citie livery: and he did weare the Daulphins all that day, beeing of a browne blacke, imbrowdered with gold, in token of his Dictatorship. E

This done, their bodies are drawne to the Marble table, and from thence cast into the palace yard, for a spectacle to this furious people, which flocke thether from all parts, with shouting and clapping of hands. He presently sends to the Daulphin cloth, both red and skie coloured, to make him a hood, and calls the people to the towne-house at the Greue, where he makes them to approue this massacre: and afterwards both the Daulphin and the Estates to doe the like, which were then assembled for very contrary effects. And to confirme and iustifie his vnbridled impudency, he writes letters in the name of the city of Paris, to

A to all the good townes of the realme, exhorting them to ioine with the chiefe cities, and to take their livery as the Daulphin had done, the better to reforme the disorders of the realme. As these confusions encreased daily and hourly, William of Mountigu bishop of Terouenne Chancellor of France, with many other officers of the crowne, fle from Paris, and for the most part retire into Germanie, as a shelter to auoide these stormes, expecting a better season.

The Chancellor had left the great seale with King John, being prisoner, so as then they vfed none but the small seale of the Chastelet, as well in the decrees of parliament, as in all other publike acts. The Parisiens likewise erect a councell of State, composed of Steuens Cocq bishop of Laon (the cocke of this confusion) of Renauld of Corby the first president, Stephen B Marcell Prouost of Marchants (who in the end shall receiue the reward of his wickednesse,) John Rouffac, John Lisle, with many of the Vniuersity, who had not the least voice in this new commonweale. Aflition is good for something: as the Parisiens (whom their furious ring-leaders had fed with an imagination of the souereigne gouernment of the State, to dispose of all things at their pleasures,) had assured themselves of a willing obedience from all the cities of the Realme, to whom (as we haue sayd) they had written, to ioine with them in a common league. So greatly were they amazed, that for answer to their imperious letters, they receiued a generall deniall from all parts of the realme; the cities refusing to harken to any priuate league, and detesting the execrable example of so audacious a rebellion: standing more carefully vpon their gard, for feare of a surprise by the Nauarrois, whom they confidently beleueed to bee the cause of the Parisiens frensie and confusions. C The Daulphin being thus vnworthily intreated by the Parisiens, retires himselfe out of this great forest of Paris, into Champagne, to the towne of Vertuse, where hee assembles the Estates of the country, and according to the honorable offers they had made him, hee obtained all he could desire, answerable to their meanes and faculties. But the greatest benefit he did reape, was the good example they gaue to other Prouinces, who imploied all their meanes not to yeeld to Languedoc or Champagne, in the honour of their loyalty, wherevnto God and nature bound all good subiects to their King, especially being in necessity. Thus the Daulphins courage beganne to reuiue, seeing by effect (in his extremest danger) that all good Frenchmen were not dead. A lesson for great men neuer to despaire in most desperate extremities. D

leaves Paris.

The Nauarrois had no other care but to ruine the Daulphin. Not satisfied with his practises in Paris, he sollicit the King of England instantly, and represents vnto him by sundy messages, that a fit opportunity is now offred to make himselfe master of this goodly Estate. There was great likelihood (the King beeing a prisoner, and the affaires brought to that extremity) that the English should soone haue preuailed ouer this realme. But God had otherwise decreed, who shewed the rod, but staied his arme, holding in his hands both the hearts of men and the euents of things. Edward obserued well the meanes to effect his designs in this confusion, but knowing the ambitious and disloyall humour of the Nauarrois, he could not trust him. Yet not to contemne so plausible an occasion, he assists him with some helpes, by degrees, onely to balance what force should bee offered, expecting some better and more safe opportunity, the which he promised himselfe rather by treaty with his prisoner, then by al the intelligences and practises of this prince, importunately disloyall against his own bloud and the State: the which he should haue maintained with the hazard of his life. This turbulent spirit, not able to containe it selfe within the limits of duty, assembles all his forces, to beginne the game by open hostility against the Daulphin, and to this end he labours to corrupt the Captaines of places; but hee could no more moue their loyalty, then the Parisiens had done the Citties.

The Daulphin seeing the Nauarrois in armes, vnder the command of his brother Philip, doth likewise arme, and very lawfully against so vniust a violence. But herein he did wisely draw profit from his enemy, and maintaine his authority, not duely respected without force of armes, nor pleasing, if armes had not beene taken by necessity: And from hence there grew a great occasion to confirme his authority, in the reasonable and necessary employment of his forces. The disorder and confusion of times had wonderfully incensed the nobility against the people, by reason that the Nauarrois (having imploied them two yeeres to make make himselfe redoubtable and fearefull, and keeping certaine troupes in field, which were A abandoned to all licentiousnesse, for want of pay :) they had no other enemy, but the Oxe and the Ass of Iames the Good man: (for so did these soldiars of confusion call the countryman in derision,) whom they had long tormented with all impunity. But patience too much moued turnes into fury.

The poore country man thus tortured, in the end resolues to shewe his teeth to this deuourer of the people, and to fall on them with open force, who had so often oppressed them without any resistance. Vpon this occasion they make a popular league in the country of Beauuois: the people being armed in great troupes skirmish in diuers places, and fall vpon the gentlemen, by whom they had beene wronged: they kill them, their wiues and children without respect: spoile, sack, burne and pull downe their houses. This armed multitude in B the beginning did much harme, like to a fire sodenly kindled. A dangerous course and of great consequence, but it was happily suppressed by the Daulphin, repaying the fault, for the which the Nauarrois was blamed.

This popular frenzie quencht in the breeding, was called the Iaquery of Iaques or Iames the good man, too common in the souldiers mouthes, as wee haue said, more ready to deuoure the countriman, then to looke vpon an armed enemy. Thus it was suppressed by the Daulphins diligence, who opposing his men of warre to this seditious multitude, vanquished them easily: as the peoples rage moued against reason cannot long continue: dangerous fits of ciuill warre, when as such as haue the gouernment in hand, neither can nor will C doe iustice to the subiect vniustly oppressed, who haue reason alwaies to demand it, and can complaine when it is denied them. But they seeke a remedy worse then the disease, when as being culpable of the infolencies they reprehend in such as oppress them, they will take vpon themselves to seeke reuenge, the which they may not expect but from the hands of such as may lawfully take it, that is from such as haue the publike authority vnder the law.

The Daulphin (hauing repaired this confusion) assembles the Estates at Compiègne, to the great dislike of the Parisiens, being partisans to the Nauarrois. They sought (as it were by especiall priuiledge) to hold the possession of the Estates still at Paris, and were much discontented they should bee held in any place else. But the parliament proceeds without regard of their complaints, and decrees, That Charles the Kings sonne, Daulphin of Viennois, (who had D then had beene called but lieutenant to his father being prisoner) should be acknowledged and called Regent of the Realme of France, and that all good Frenchmen should obey him as the King himselfe. This new title purchased great authority to this yong prince throughout al France, and (making him to appeare in these obscure times of afflictions, as a lanthorne during the tempest of a cloudy night) it reuiued his courage: seeing himselfe at liberty without the walles of Paris, whereas Marcell should not braue him, nor murder his seruants in his chamber, yea in his bosome. Thus did he settle his authority by degrees, wonderfully shaken by the audacious credit of the Nauarrois, who hauing another intent, did runne a contrary course. For as the Nauarrois designe was to vsurpe the State against all order, so hee troude it vnder his feet, hauing recourse to vniust violence. So as in the field he had armed troupes, in the city of Paris a fedicious multitude, and generally passion and fury. The two pillars E of his designs were iniustice and violence, supported by the peoples fauour, who may doe much being wel aduised: but what mischief can wee imagine in an Estate, which a multitude will not attempt, being bewitched by such as abuse them, like a brute beast which goes where he is driuen? The proiect of this prince (otherwise great both by bloud and meanes) had an vnfortunate issue, as wicked attempts must haue a ruinous end. The mischief fell first on him by the people, in whom he had relied, and after by him vpon the people, whom hee had deceiued, to make them an instrument of many disorders, yet was the people lesse punished then himselfe, as lesse culpable.

The Daulphin declared Regent.

But hee who had disloyally abused this brutish multitude, felt in the end the reuenging hand of God, not onely in seeing al his practises proue vaine, but also feeling in his body the fire of Gods wrath iustly kindled against such as confound the society of mankind, and the lawes of State vnder which they are borne. Without doubt bad counsel is alwaies dangerous to the giuer. This prince preached peace, and made warre: reformation of state, and nourished confusion: liberty, and yet brought those cities which obeyed him into cruell slavery.

A slavery. He abused the people with a shadow of liberty, and fought to winne them by deuities, but the contrary effect made him so odious, as hauing plaid the bankerout of his credit, he fell into the hatred, and detestation of all the world, as the following discourse will testify. To teach all men. That the greatest policy is to be an honest man.

1358. The Nauarrois begins to grow odious to the Parisiens.

The Regent countenanced with this new title, and the faithfull loue of the French, testified by the former effects not sought for by practises, but bred in their hearts; and encreasing daily in experience of affaires, beganne to amaze the Nauarrois, and to terrifie the heads of this Parisien multitude, hee seized vpon Bois de Vincennes, and Pont Charenton. And not to loose any opportunity, hee approacheth the city of Paris, and burnes and sackes the Parisiens houses, in reuenge of that which the Nauarrois had done to the Kings seruants. B Thus both armies were in field, and doing much harme generally, they multiplied the losses on either side vnder colour of reuenge. The Parisiens thus tired, chose the King of Nauarre for their Captaine, suffering him to bring souldiers, yea Englishmen, into the city, of whom the most of his troupes consisted. The armies approach: the Regents forces incampe at Conflans, and those of the Nauarrois at Saint Denis. The Parisiens heat began to coole amidst so many miseries, and without their commanders it had beene quite frozen.

Two French armies, one against another.

Jone the widow of King Charles the Faire, and by that meane ante to the Nauarrois, desired infinitely to see these two Princes at peace. Her degree and age gaue her free access to both. Since visits them and perswades them to concord, with all the best reasons shee C could. In the end, after many iourneys, shee obtaines an enteruiew, to parle themselves of their affaires without any mediators. The Regent (a yong prince, wife and temperate) would not at the first be intreated, but in his heart hee desired nothing more; foreseeing it to bee the onely meane to bring the Nauarrois in ielousie with the Parisiens, who relented daily, growing weary of his actions. The successe was answerable to his designe, for behold the people are presently incensed against the King of Nauarre, and the Prouost, who had accompanied him to this parle. They sodenly make publike and priuate assemblies to preuent the practises of these two traitors (as they terme them) which would make their peace without them. Iohn Roussac and others (iealous for that they were not imployed) run from shop to shop, to set fire to this flax, shewing that priuate treaties are very preiudiciall to the D generall good of the City.

Jone desired to make peace.

The Parisiens grow ielous of the Nauarrois.

The Nauarrois amazed at these newes; he leaues his army, and runnes to Paris with the Prouost of Marchants, to pacifie these new tumults, the which hee found to bee practised against him. Being arriued, he imployes all his partisans to preuent it; and by their meanes he renews the league with the Parisiens, protesting to liue and die together. Hee sweares the Regents death with them, and perswades them to admit a new supply of Englishmen for the safety of the city. And to shew that he had his heart free from al intelligence with the Regent (as they had suspected) hee makes a braue sallie vpon his troupes by Saint Anthones gate; but hee soone found a stop, for as he did charge boldly, so was hee repulled valiantly, being charged and beaten by the Regent, so as with difficulty he recovered the gate. Within E few daies after, he tries by the other gates, if he might speed any better, in diuerse resolute attempts, but all is in vaine; hee is chased, shotted at and beaten with losse and shame. This charge did so alter the minde of this inconstant beast with many heads, I meane, of this Parisien multitude, who of late had so much loued, honoured and supported him in all his wrongs, as now there is nothing but cries against him, as against a disturber, an ambitious and disloyall man, a prater, a deceiver and teller of lies. That it is no longer time to depend on him, but the Citie must prouide seriously for their owne affaires, and ioyne with their lawfull Lord. During these popular humors, the Nauarrois appeares not, nor any man for him, beeing so odious vnto the Parisiens, as it was very dangerous euen to talke of him. It was in vaine to hide himselfe at Saint Denis, during the heate of this popular rage. But F to bring words to effects, the Parisiens by a common consent in their Towne-house, resolve to treat with the Regent: and to this end they send a messenger vnto him, beseeching him to grant a safe conduct for their deputies to come vnto him. The Regent imbraceth this occasion, and giues them an ample passport; vpon which grant and assurance, the Parisiens send a troupe of their grauest Citizens to the Regent with this petition.

That

suborn themselves vnto
the Dauphin.

That it would please the Regent to pardon the Parisiens ( beeing ill aduised ) what was passed, and to grant them free trafficke, untill a peace might be made to his content. The Regent hauing receiued them graciously, grants their requests, & makes his troupes retire from about Paris, to the Contesses Vallee, expecting this peoples course, beeing newly reclaimed to their dutie, the which might as suddenly returne to their furie; suffering them to taste of peace, and to see the rod ready, beeing like vnto a furious beast, not to bee trusted but vpon good warrant.

The Nauarrois and the Prouost of Marchants labour to repaire their credit at Paris, supposing (if this fury were once euaporated) they should returne into credit, hauing both the Bastill and the Louvre at their deuotion. But they are deceiued. The chance was cast, and the houre of their ruine was at hand, the people beeing resolute to giue an apparent testimony of their intent; and a fit occasion was offered. The English nation was the chiefe support whereon the Nauarrois relied, hauing lodged them in great troupes both within and without the City, for his owne strength; the which did much harme in all places. The Parisiens crie out, that there was no more need of any fouldiers, seeing that a peace was concluded, and then they began with them within the city, which were in their power. The occasion was small.

The Parisiens
mutiny againt
the English
that had ter-
red them.

Behold a troupe of English come from dinner at the King of Nauars lodging: the multitude (without any other cause, but that they were English) falls furiously vpon them, they kill 25. at the first, and take forty seuen, whom they drag into prison. Then euery man seized on his guest at one instant; so as there were foure hundred cast into the prisons of the Louvre, without Magistrate and without order. Onely a tumultuous cry was heard in the streetes; That they must punish these wicked Englishmen, which had committed so many disorders, and that the prisoners should answer the spoiles their companions did abroad. The Nauarrois, the bishop of Laon, and the prouost of Marchants, accompanied with their followers, runne to this alarm: they intreate the people to assemble and to doe things by order and reason. The multitude comes to the Greue. The Nauarrois (hauing whetted his naturall eloquence, with a long and artificiall discourse) makes knowne his loue and the good succours the English had giuen him in his necessity. The multitude at this name of English, cries out. That they must kill them without any further speech, and then goe speedily to Saint Denis, to dispatch the rest.

So without any more speech they command the prouost to lead them thither. The assembly being thus confusedly dissolued (the Nauarrois, nor prouost not daring to reply) euery man runnes to armes, especially such as were best furnished, so as in few houres there were fixeene hundred horse and ten thousand foote resolu'd to charge the English, which spoiled the country with all impunity. The Nauarrois and the prouost make a good shew at this fodaine mutiny of the people, and seeme more busie then the rest, to remaine still commanders of this multitude: but they dispatch sundry messagers vnder hand, to wish the English men to stand vpon their gard, and to attend resolutely this multitude of Parisiens, which came against them without all order. The troupe is in field, the drums found, & the ensignes are displaid; but the King of Nauarre made a stand betwixt Montmartre and the windmills, to giue the English breath, who did lay a strong ambuscado at Bois de Bolongne, and sent forth some of their best horsemen to draw this vnwarlike and ill gouerned multitude into danger. These scouts appearing, they are hotly pursued by the Parisiens, but with such disorder, as is incident to people couragious in the streetes, but cowards in fight of an enemy that vnderstands his profession. They runne into this ambuscadoe, who charge of all hands vpon this disordered multitude, and followes them flying euen to the gates of Paris, in sight of the Nauarrois and the prouost, who are beholders of this defeat and relieue them not. The Nauarrois retires himselfe to Saint Denis, where the body of this army was lodged, and the prouost of Marchants to the city, the which is filled with cries, lamentations and iniurious speeches against them both. The prouost fearing the peoples fury goes guarded with a troupe of two hundred men: and least all should bee lost, he seekes to assure himselfe of the Louvre and Bastile. The maske is now vncovered, and the people runnes to armes. Iohn Maillard (captaine of a quarter at Saint Anthones gate) takes a banner with the armes of France, and running through the City cries Mountjoy Saint Denis. At this crie,

A crie, and the sight of the standard, all flocke together on heapes. The Prouost seekes to saue himselfe in the Bastile, to auoide the fury of this multitude, whom he had so often imploied to shed innocent blood: and with him Simon Palmier and Philip Gupphart, two torches of popular sedition. They enter but (oh the iudgement of God! which the wicked cannot flie, at such times, and by such means as hee hath prescribed for their ruine) the place they had chosen for their safety, was the pitfall of their misery: for being entred, they wilbe Masters, vnder colour of certaine letters from the King of Nauarre, who gaue the chiefe command of that place to the Prouost.

They fall to great words with them which commanded the place: and from words to blowes: where without any great difficulty they are all massacred, to the peoples great content, who flock to the Bastile to see the end of their Prouost. They require the carcases, the which are presently deliuered vnto them and drawne from thence with all sorts of ignominy before Saint Catherins Church: whither the prouost had dragd the bodies of the Marshals of France, by him so vnworthily murdered: to the end wee should honour God, who appoints the punishment according to the offence, with an equal ballance: and punisheth faults with answerable paines. Thus the cite of Paris was freed from the seditious leuaine of confusion, and restored to the lawfull obedience of their King, in the yeere 1358. the second day of August, remarkable for so notable an act.

This iust execution thus made, the city (as it were recouered of a deadly disease) sends deputies to the Regent: beseeching him to come and take possession of the authority due vnto him. The Regent comes, and is receiued with as much affectionate ioy, as before hee had beene odious and contemptible. Such are the people, such they haue beene, and such they shalbe, that great men may learne by these examples, how to gouerne a multitude. This happy successe troubled the Nauarrois; who imagining the crowne of France vpon his owne head, did (to his great grieffe) see him settled in the State, who had beene almost ruined. Vntill then he had the Kings seruice alwaies in his mouth, as his good Kinsman and subiect, but now passions driue him into such fury and despaire, as hee resolues to cast off the maske of humility and obedience, and all other ciuill respects: and to make warre against the Regent with all violence, not onely by secret practises, but by open force. The Nauarrois, seeing the Parisiens to grow affectionate to the Regent, sought by all means to torment them, making strange spoiles of their houses, especially of such as were his most deuoted seruants, but in general all that belonged to Paris, was abandoned to the spoile. The Regent assembles his army, the which hee had retired to ease the people. But the remedy proues often very hurtful to the champion country, vpon the first application. Behold two French armies are in field in the heart of France, committing that which we haue seene with our owne eyes in the bosome of our miserable country: for what better commentary can there bee then our owne experience? Thus harme growes both from the enemy which affailes, and the friend that defends: so as wee may truly say, that in ciuill warres, the cure is often times more hurtful then the disease. The Nauarrois finding himselfe too weake alone, calls in the English to the sack of France, without a head, and almost without a soule. Edward aduertised from the Nauarrois, by sundry messengers, of the Estate of France and the Regents happy successe; condemned himselfe, as hauing failed his owne good fortune, taking the King of Nauarres complaint in no better part: who saied, that he had not beene assisted as the cause required, applying al his wit to the ruine of his country, holding it a gaine to take from his owne blood: so blind are passionate counsels.

Hereupon Edward sends new forces to the Nauarrois: who fortified with these succors, and with his goodly promises, begins the war more fiercely then before. He takes the castle of Melun with halfe the city, by the means of Queene Blanch, whilst that the Kings soldiers fight for the rest: hee burnes the Abbey of Lis, and all other places alongst the torrent of Brie and Gastenois. Then crossing the Isle of France, to annoy the Parisiens, & to strike a terror by his forces, he takes S. Germaine in Laie, Creil vpon Oise, Poissy and many other places, with great booties & many prisoners: running daily to the gates of Paris. Hauing staied some daies at Mans, he goes to meet with the succors from England (taking Chastre vnder Montlheri as they passe, the which hee spoils, sacks and burnes) led by Captal de Buch in Medoc, a country in Bourdelois, a great and a mighty Lord: who resignes them to his brother

The desolate
state of the cite.The Parisiens mourning againe.

Philip of Nauarre. With these forces he takes Clermont in Beauuoisin. On the other side A
Robert Knowles, a valiant English Captaine, with a troupe of theues, rather then souldiers, runs vp the riuer of Loire into the countrey of Auxerre, spoyling, sacking, burning, & carrying away both men and beasts into his forts, bringing the countrey to a misarable defolation. This was rather a robbing then a warre, as commonly ciuill warres be: the which with more reason we may call vnciuill. The cattell taken, houses burnt, men beeing dead or beggared, the land remained desolate, vntilled and vnsowne. So as there fell so great a famine, as halfe the people died for hunger, lamentable troups of poore families wandred vp & down, creeping into towns, like desperate folkes, to beg bread of them which had it not.

The Parisiens seeing that this alteration did nothing reparaire their estates, grew mad: and as the common sort values no friendship but for their profit, they abated much of the loue B and respect which in the beginning of their reduction they did beare vnto the Regent: who was not only troubled to encounter armed men in field, but also with mens humors grown bitter by affliction, especially in Paris. A sea, subiect to the ebbing and flowing of mens sundry humors and affections.

The Nauarrois (who was still watchfull to embrace all occasions to annoy the Regent) seekes meanes to nourish the seedes of his ancient credit with the Parisiens, by some of his faction, giuing them to vnderstand by diuers writings spread abroad, that hee lamented to see France vndermined with this desolation, whereof the Regent was the original cause. He founded forth the vaine name of libertie and reformation of State, vexing the Regent more C by his practises, then by open force; although he were supported by the succours of England. The Regent was thus perplexed with many difficulties, finding himselfe as it were besieged not only within the walles, but also within the humors of this great city, being ignorant how to counterbalance force with mildnesse, in the perplexitie of so many miseries, and the diuersitie of such contrary humors, wherein he sees himselfe engaged.

Amidst all these difficulties, the wisdom and courage of this Prince is very considerable, for he seemed to the people of a resolute countenance, and in the managing of affaires he had alwaies a care to their reliefe, so as they could not but loue him for his amiable & sweet behaviour, yet for the maintenance of his authoritie (beeing come within the cite) he caused some notable executions to be done, of certaine desperate and seditious men, and committed others to prison. This was done with the peoples liking, incensed against the Nauarrois: but seeing themselves to fall out of one mischief into another, the Parisiens began to returne to their old waywardnesse. The Regent hauing worke for both hands, encounters his enemy in field by force, and in the city by eloquence, causing the people to assemble at the Greue, sitting vpon that crosse which we see at this day. His tongue preuiled more then his souldiers armes, whereof we obserue no great successe: but his eloquence was so happy, as the people regarded it as an Oracle, giuing him the title of wise, hauing ioyned a wife carriage to his admirable eloquence: as appears in those goodly discourses.

Three yeares passed thus, during the imprisonment of our King Iohn, whom it is now time to visit in England. Edward had caused Iohn to be conducted from London to the Castle of Windfore, with his sonne Philip. There he propounded vnto him new conditions of peace, not so rigorous as the former, but yet so hard, as (beeing deliuered to the Regent, and by him to the Estates then assembled at Paris) all the Kings good subiects (though very desirous to redeeme him) did not allow thereof, for that they did import the honour of the King and realme too much, making too preiudiciall a breach in the Soueraignty.

The extremities were notable in the Kings languishing beeing a prisoner, and the present warre: but lest they should suffer all to run to ruine, in so great a suspence of affaires, the Estates resolute to comfort the King by aduice, to attend another time for his liberty, and to labour by all meanes to maintaine the warres.

The Prouinces did their best indeauours to furnish money for this necessity: & euen Paris promised to maintaine 600. Lances, 400. Archers, and a thousand Corselets, that is, F 1000. foote armed with Brigandines, a kind of armour then much vsed. The Nobilitie, notwithstanding their priuiledges, offered to contribute toward the charges, and restored the orders for martiall affaires, in a maner forgotten through the indulgency of our kings.
The Clergy shewed a notable zeale, and all those officers which had managed the publike treasor

A treasor made a great and extraordinary summe of money, by meanes whereof they were discharged from further accounts, & the realm much eased. This prouision came happily for the preservation of France, against the which Edward made then great preparation at the instance of the Nauarrois. The truce expired, he did forbid the French to traffick into England: in the meane time his army lands at Calais, & himself follows in person with a goodly traine. Being landed & resolute to take possession of the realm of France, or by force to ruine it, he marcheth directly to Arras, the which he takes in 3. daies, hauing assured it with a strong garison he goes towards Champagne, wheare passing onely, hee besieged Sens, E which yeelds without resistance, & by their example Nevers. All Bourgongne was strooke into such a terror, as they redeemed their country from spoile with a sum of money. Hauing thus found means to intertaine his army at his enemies charge, & enriched his soldiers with an inestimable booty, hee marcheth towards Paris, as the head city of the whole realm, and the chiefe end of his designe, the certain triumph of his conquest, & the goodly Theater of his victories. Our Regent was nothing amazed at these threats of Edward, for (hauing leui-ed a goodly army with great expedition) he attends him at Paris, where the whole burthen of this war did lie. He lodgeth his army in the suburbs, & fortifieth against his approaches, being taught by the examples of his grandfather & father, not to hazard any thing, resolving only to defend himselfe within his trenches. This resolution succeeded happily, for Edward seeing the impossibility to draw the Regent to fight (notwithstanding al his alarms) raiseth his siege; and marcheth into Britany, to refresh his army, to the great content of the Pa-risiens, who could not sufficiently commend the wisdom of their Regent, hauing so politickly auoided this storme. The Regent imbraceth this occasion, he furniseth Paris with aboun-dance of victuals, and commands the souldiers to liue orderly without oppression of the inhabitants: he fortifies the weakest places with al speed, and doth so encourage the people, as they are ready to sacrifice themselves for the preservation of the State. Edward (supposing the great wast caused by the men of warre resident in this great city, would haue taken from them al means to continue, and haue bred an impatiency in the mindes of this vnconstant people, giuing him the better means to enter it) hee returnes with his army being strong and lusty, by this good refreshing of Britan. Being returned, hee finds things better ordered then before: so as preuailing nothing, but walking about the city, & beholding a far off the great towers, and the admirable masse of so many buildings, as a brieft of the whole world, hee resolves to leaue the siege and returne no more. Thus experience teaching him, what the strength of our chiefe city was, hee packs all vp, and goes towards Chartres, meaning to besiege it. But whilest he lodged there, his army making a horrible spoile of the whole country, there chanced an occasion (as the worke of heauen) which sodenly quailed his ambitious designe to ruine France, for behold a horrible and extraordinary tempest of haile, thunder and lightning falls with such violence as many horses and men in the army perished, as if that God had stretched forth his hand from heauen to stay his course. This amazement causeth Edward to vow to make a peace with King Iohn, and the Regent his sonne vpon reasonable conditions. Hee which had thus thundred, did likewise open the Duke of Lancasters mouth, shewing how reasonable it was to limit humane attempts within restrained bounds:
& not to attend an infinite and perpetuall prosperity in worldly affaires, beeing more safe to content himself with a meane successe, then to be transported with the violent course of humane hopes, cast in the mould of indiscreet desires. He likewise laied before him the impossibility of so extraordinary a designe, as to make himself maister of all France, a notable example for princes to behold their owne infirmities and the greatnesse of God to whom they owe the homage of their enterprises: being then most happy, when they are most sober & temperate, without imagining an infinite power in the short weaknesse of this mortall life, whereunto they are subiect like other men. This lesson mollified Edwards heart inclining to the deliuey of King Iohn his prisoner, & to a generall peace: the which was concluded at Bretigny, in the yeere 1360. the eighth day of May, vpon these conditions. That the county of Poitou, the Fiefs of Thouars and Belleuile, the countries of Gascony, Agenois, Peregort, Limosin, Cahors, Tarbe, Bigor, Rouergue and Angoulmois, with the homages of

For assurance of which agreement, there should be deliuered into the King of Englands hands, these hostages: Lewis duke of Anjou, John Duke of Berry, sonnes to the French King: Philip Duke of Orleans, the Kings brother: Philip Duke of Bourgogne, the Earles of Blois, Alanson, Saint Pol, Harcourt, Porcian, Valentinois, Grandpre, Brenne and Forest: the Lords of Vaudemont, Coussy, Pyennes, Saint Venant, Preaux, Montmorency, Garencieres, Rocheguion, Estouteville, the Dauphin of Auvergne, Andregel and Craon. A choise of well selected personages, to be a sufficient caution for the money and conditions that were to be performed. The deputies for King John, were John of Dormans bishop of Beauvais, and Chancellor of France, John of Melun Earle of Tancarville, the Lord of Bouciquat Marshal of France: the Lords of Montmorency and Vigny: John Groslee, Simon of Bossy, John Marets Lawiers, and John Maillard and Stephen of Paris, Bourges of Paris. For the King of England were, John Duke of Lancaster, the Earles of Northampton, Warwicke and Suffolke, Renault of Celestan, Gualter of Mauny, Knights, with certain learned men for their counsell. This treaty of a generall peace, signed by the two Kings, was ratified by their two eldest sonnes, Charles and Edward, and proclaimed by Heraulds: first at the windowes of the kings and princes lodgings, and then at the corners of the streetes in great solemnity. The hostages were deliuered to Edward the father, who embarked at Honfleur, and lead them into England, leauing the Earle of Warwicke in France, to see the execution of the peace.

The hostages given for the performance of the conditions.

The Deputies that treated.

King John brought to Calis.

The two Kings sweare a mutuall league of friendship.

King John received by his sonne with great ioy.

King John (hauing long expected the time of his deliuey) parts from England with a strong garde, and is conducted to Calis, attending the money promised, the first pawne of his liberty. The Regent his sonne labours earnestly: the city of Paris did contribute willingly a hundred thousand royals, and after their example all other cities paid their portions. Of such power is our head city both to doe good and euill: so by this end they made amends for all former errors. The money is brought to Saint Omer, whether the Regent comes to see the deliuey: Edward returns to Calis, hee is wonderfull kinde to John, and they sweare a league of friendship, and comprehended Charles King of Nauarre (being absent) in this peace; his brother Philip vndertaking for him, to the end that all quarrels might be troden vnder foote, and all men liue in peace, vnity and concord. So John being set at liberty; after a languishing imprisonment of foure yeeres, hee takes his leaue of Edward with all the shewes of loue that might be betwixt brethren and confident friends.

Being parted from Calis, hee findes his sonne Charles comming to meete him, with a great and stately traine. I cannot well expresse the ioy of this first encounter: this good King embracing his sonne (as his redeemer) with ioy mixt with teares, and full of fatherly affection, with the content of his sweete recovered liberty, seeing himselfe in his sonnes armes, who had giuen him so many testimonies of his faithfull loue in his necessity, and set in the midst of his subiects with his first authority, depending no more vpon anothers will. And contrariwise, what ioy was it for this wife sonne to enioy his father, so precious a gage of the authority, order and obedience of a State, and a great discharge for him of this painfull burthen.

Thus discoursing of what had beene done during his imprisonment, and of what was to be done, they arriue at Hedin: whether not onely the whole country repaires, but also the Deputies of Paris, and of all the prouinces of the Realme, to congratulate their good Kings deliuey, where he disposeth of the government of his house.

The King of Nauarre meetes him at Compiegne, hauing first sent backe his hostages, to shew that hee relied onely on his word, and put himselfe into his power. Thus passeth the world; and after a storme comes a calme. King John made his entry into Paris with this goodly traine, being receiued with an incredible ioy of all his subiects. The Parisiens going

A to kisse his hands, offer him their hearts, with a goodly cubberd of plate, worth a thousand markes, for homage of their fidelity and obedience. 1364.

The parliament had surceased about a whole yeere: John, for the first fruits of his recovered authority, would honour the opening of the court with his presence: being set in the seat of Iustice, in the midst of all his officers, to the incredible content of all men, who beheld the cheerefull countenance of this prince, like the sunne beames after a troubled skie. Such was the returne of King John into his realm after his imprisonment, as the catastrophe of a Comedy, in the which after mourning they reioyce. This happened in the beginning of the yeere 1361.

Some moneths were spent in these publike ioyes, but they must seeke to recouer his hostages: in the effecting whereof they found many difficulties: for neither the priuate Lords (whose homage hee had bound to the King of England,) nor the countries (whose souerainities he had yeelded by this accord) would obey. They argue with the King in counsell, and demand an acte, shewing, that the King cannot dispose of the souereignty of his realme, nor alienate the reuenues of the crowne. John on the other side (fearing least Edward should reproach this vnto him, as a practise betwixt him and his subiects,) made them sundry commandements to obey. Hee went to Auignon, to visit Pope Innocent, who died at this time, and Urban the sixth succeeded in his place, both Limosins. To hanfell Johns recovered liberty, and to ease his minde, afflicted with long imprisonment, Urban exhorts him to vndertake the voiage of the holy land, as generall of the action. John (not remembering the examples of Kings his predecessors, Lewis the seventh, and ninth, nor apprehending the present burthen of his great affaires; nor the danger of so mighty and watchfull an enemy, who had so long, and with so great paine kept him prisoner) accepts the charge, and makes a solemne promise: and to hasten the execution thereof, hee returns into England. Some say, the loue of the Countesse of Salisbury (whose husband had the garde of the king being a prisoner) was the principall motiue of his returne. The which I cannot beleue, vpon the report of the English: being vnlikely that his age, his afflictions, his great affaires, and the voiage whereunto he prepared, should suffer this prince to follow so vnseasonable a vanity. But whatsoeuer moued him therevnto, hee died there, leauing his life in England, where he had so long languished, as a preface of his death.

Difficulties in the performance of the conditions of peace.

John dies in England. His daughter, Elizabeth.

Thus John died in England, in the yeere 1364. the eight day of Aprill, leauing Charles his eldest sonne heire to the crowne of France. A good man hee was, but an vnfortunate prince; wise in ordinary things, but ill aduised in great affaires: iust to all men, but not wary how or whom he trusted in matters of consequence: temperate in priuate, but too violent in publicke. To conclude, a good prince, but not considerate: more fit to obey then to command. Truly these heroicke vertues are the proper Iewels of crownes, and wisdom is a companion to the most excellent vertues, especially in princes, who are aduanced vpon the Theater of mans life, to gouerne the rest.

We haue noted that Bourgogne had beene giuen to Robert the grand-child of Hugh Capet for his portion. A little before the decease of King John, it was vnted to the crowne of France, by the death of Duke Philip, a yong man of the age of fifteene yeere, sonne to that John which died in the battaile of Poitiers. Hee was betroathed to the heire of Flanders, but both the Dutchie, and the daughter were for another Philip, the sonne of John: to whom the father gaue this new succession, in recompence of the faithfull seruice hee had done him the day of his taking, and had continued it in prison.

Bourgogne annexed vnto the crowne.

CHARLES the 5. called the Wise, the 52. French King.

HIS Charles, during the life of his father John, had giuen so many testimonies of his sufficiencie to gouerne well, that he was held for King before he tooke the Crowne, the which he receiued at Rheims the 19. of May 1364. hauing before his coronation provided hono- rably for his fathers funerals.

He reigned sixteene yeares, being called and knowne by the name of Wise. In his youth he did taste the bitter rootes, and in his age the sweete fruites of vertue; beloued, honoured, feared, and respec- ted, both of his owne subiects, and of strangers. A deuout Prince; wise, temperate, chaste, vigilant, louing Iustice, order, and the people, hauing as great authoritie as any Prince that euer reigned ouer this Monarchie, accompanied with other vertues fit for those times, to preserve a State, the which had more need of counsell then of force, too ventrouly hazar- ded by his Grand-father and father. He was well assisted by the Princes of his blood, and the officers of the Crowne: very wished and worthy aduantages for a King, who beeing the head of an estate, ought to be well serued by the principall members, to guide and gouerne the whole bodie.

We haue said, that he had three brethren: Lewis Duke of Aniou, John Duke of Berrie, and Philip Earle of Touraine: to whome according to his fathers testament, he resigned the Duchie of Bourgogne, with a marriage of great aduancement. He gaue to Lewis the Duchie of Orleans, and to John he gaue Auvergne, Poitou and Xaintonge, (besides Berry) for his portion, and Languedoc for his gouernment. He was likewise well serued for Militarie actions, by Bertrand of Guesclin a Britton, an excellent Capitaine, whome he honoured with the dignitie of Constable, in the place of Maurel de Fiennes (hauing deposed him for sundrie crimes) and for affaires of the State, he had John Dormans Bishop of Beauuais, and Chancellor of France, and in the end Cardinall, whom his brother succeeded in the same charge. With these helpes of counsell and force, he soone restored the realme, beeing dis-

A membered by the strange confusions of the forepassed reignes. In his youth (during these former broiles) he was poisoned by the practises of the Nauarrois, of whom we haue so often spoken. This was prevented by counterpoisons, yet left it a great infirmity in his body, the which forced him to a quiet life, more profitable both for himself and his whole realme, then if he had beene a man of action: for he dispatched affaires in his cloister without danger, and incountred his enemies with a happy successe.

In the beginning of his reigne, hee married with Joane the daughter of Charles duke of Bourbon: a Princess of excellent beauty: the which hee preferred before the great wealth of the heire of Flanders, and the benefit of his owne realme: hee had three sonnes and one daughter. In the former reigne there was nothing but warre, desolation, teares, cries, lamentations, despaire, and generally the mournfull image of death. After these long and insupportable calamities, the wildome of Charles (reducing things to their first beginning, by his happy dexterities) gaue France a new forme: like vnto a man who hauing a long and dangerous sicknesse, recouers himselfe by carefull keeping. But there remained an infinit number of men accustomed to liue dissolutely, through the licentiousnesse of the warre; the which if he had sought to reforme by any good order, it had bred some tumult in the State; according to the violent and head-strong or restless humour of the French, who must bee doing at home, if they be not imploied abroad.

The English provided worke for these warriors in Britan, in Flanders, in the heart of France, and in Castille: but the wisdom of Charles prevented all. I will note what happened, rather according to the subiect, then the order of times; for that matters are so confused, as I cannot represent the dates distinctly, without repetition and tediousnesse. Britan was the first list to trie our men of warre: there might they make warre without breach of truce; and the quarrell betwixt Charles of Blois, and John of Montfort, continued more violent then before: for that John of Montfort had married the daughter of the King of England, and Lewis Duke of Aniou, the daughter of Charles of Blois, who imbraced their priuate quarrells, by these new occasions.

Bertrand of Guesclin a gentleman of Brittan (of whom wee haue before made mention) had done the King good seruice, during the warre with the Nauarrois. Charles relying vpon his fidelity and valour, giues him the charge of the warre, to assist Charles of Blois, being old and broken; who was pressed by his enemy, being supported with forces from England. Guesclin being arriued, the Nobility of Brittain (which were of Charles his faction) repaire vnto him, to the number of 1500. lances. The History names the houses Rohan, Laual, Leon, Dinan, Ricux, Chasteau-Briand, Tourne-mire, Raiz, Malestroit, Quintin, Auangour, Loheac, Ancenis, Pont and many others.

This notable occasion was ministred to imploy these forces (seeing that Joane the heire, the Dutchesse of Brittain, would not end this controuersie by composition, as her husband Charles of Blois desired.) John of Montfort besieged the Castle of Aulroy, well defended by the contrary faction. John Chandos an Englishman, a wise and well experienced capitaine, commanded the English troupes. Hee had an aduersary in front, no lesse valiant then himselfe, Guesclin, who fought for his country, and the despaire of Charles of Blois (much grieued with the tediousnesse of so painefull a proceesse), was a new spur to animate him to fight. They ioine with their troupes, the encounter is furious, well charged, well defended. The two commanders made great prooffe of their valours. Guesclin and Clisson are noted to haue omitted nothing of their duties: but God, who holds victories in his hand, gaue it to John of Montfort, and the English army. The ouerthrow was great, for Charles of Blois, (the head of the army) with John his bastard brother, the Lords of Dinan, Auangour, Loheac, Malestroit, Pont, Quergourlay, and many others were slaine: the Lords of Rohan, Leon, Raiz, Mauny, Tonerre, Rouille, Frainuille, Reneuall and Rochfort, were taken prisoners, and so were John and Guy the sonnes of Charles of Blois, with Bertrand of Guesclin, the which did greatly preiudice our Kings reputation. The place of battaile, the ensignes and the dead bodies, remained in the power of John of Montfort, who sent the body of Charles of Blois with an honorable conuoy to his widow. The castle of Aulroy (the cause of this battaile) yeelded to the conqueror. This happened the 29. day of September. 1364.

This great defeat troubled Charles, as a thing beyond his expectation. John of Montfort sends 1365. sends his ambassadors, beseeching him (as his Soueraigne) to receiue homage of him and his for the Duchie of Brittain, wonne by rightfull armes, by the defeate of his enemye, as God adiudging vnto him this right and possession.

King Charles reconciles the pretendants for Brittain, 20. 0. pound sterling.

Charles imbraceth this occasion: he assignes him a day for the performance thereof, and to do right and iustice to both parties beeing heard, the widow of Charles of Blois being called, and the matter debated, he reconciles them vpon these conditions: That, for the interest which Ioane preterded for her and hers, to the Duchie of Brittain, he should haue the Earldome of Ponthieure, the Seigneuries of Auauzour, Guillo, Gincamp, Rochedorie, Lauuion, Chateaulin in Cornuaille, Dualt, Phelgoft and Rospreden, to the value of twentie thousand liures or frankes of rent: and if Iohn of Montfort died without lawfull heires, the Duchie of Brittain should returne to Ioane and her issue male or female.

This accord drew Iohn of Montfort to Paris, where hauing done his fealtie and homage, as well for the Duchie of Brittain, as the Earldome of Montfort, and other lands he had in France, the widow of Charles of Blois ratified it by the vertue of the decree. Oliver of Clifton at the same Treatie was restored to the possession of his lands, forfeited when his father was beheaded, (as we haue said.) He shall be Constable, & giue vs good cause to speak of his life.

This accord was made in the towne of Guerande, in the yeare 1365. but it continued not long: for Lewis of Aniou the Kings brother, (sonne in law to the Duchesse of Brittain) was not pleased with this agreement: whereby he said he was greatly wronged, and Iohn of Montfort distrusting King Charles, had his recourse to the King of England, to whom he went in person, to require ayde against the forces which he pretended would come against him: leaving Robert Knowles an Englishman in Brittain, who not attending Iohns returne, began to make warre vpon the French, with all violence. Charles being pressed (both by the Duchesse Ioane, and by Lewis of Aniou his brother) declares Iohn guiltie of high treason: for that hee had broken the accord, and would not appeare vpon sundrie summons daily made vnto him. So the warre beganne againe: the successe whereof we will note hereafter. Thus there passed fixe or seauen yeares, with varietie of accidents in Brittain.

In Flanders.

Whilest that Brittain was thus shaken with sundrie stormes, Flanders was not without trouble, by the accustomed praetises of the English. Lewis Earle of Flanders, sonne to that Lewis which was slaine at the battaile of Cressie, had one onely daughter named Marguerit, who remaining heire of this great and rich estate, was the Leuaine of the ancient ialousie betwixt the two Kings, Charles and Edward, struiuing who should haue her.

The Citties of Flanders, of greatest power in this pursute, held stoutly for the English, Count Lewis father to the maid, was in suspence: fearing both the English and the French, for diuers respects: and yet he loued the first and feared the last: but in the end, by the means of Marguerite of Arthois, mother to the Earle, a marriage was concluded in fauour of Philip the Hardy, brother to Charles the French King, to Edwards great grieve, both father and sonne, who in disdain of this refusall, fought all meanes to breed new troubles in France.

The Treatie of Bretignie ministred a new subiect, and apparent cause of discontent to the King of England, who complained that he had beene deceiued by Charles, vnder a shew of faithfulness, hauing restored vnto him all his hostages, receiuing onely the summes promised for the ranfome, leauing vpon his simple word, the reuenues of those Seigneuries granted him by the treatie.

The cause of new warre betwixt France and England.

Charles had retired all his hostages, in good time paying readie money: and making knowne vnto Edward, the sundrie charges he had giuen to the Countries and places comprehended in the treatie, to yeeld themselues wholly into his power: he likewise signified vnto him his subiects answers; who in the beginning excused themselues ciuilly, by honest delays, but in the end the generall Estates giue Charles to vnderstand, That the question being for the generall interest of the States, they were not to be forced to yeeld to an unlawfull action, directly contrarie to the fundamentall law of the Realme, which suffers not the King to preiudice the Crowne, nor to alienate the reuenues thereof, which were not to be alienated. That this accord made in prison, for the Kings redemption, was forced, and so by consequence, vnciuill, and not to be allowed by the Law of nations.

The effects followed this resolution, with such an obstinacie of the Countries, Citties and Noblemen, which were charged by this treatie to yeeld, as they protest freely to Charles, that 1366. A that they will willingly spend, goods and liues, rather then fall into the king of Englands hands: and contrariwise, would employ all their meanes to liue vnder the subiection of the king of France. This faithfull constancie of the interested subiects, must needs be pleasing vnto Charles: but for that he himself had made this treatie: his honour was greatly ingaged, the which he must iustifie by good and auailable reasons: and make it knowne vnto all Europe, who had their eyes fixed vpon these two Princes, playing their parts vpon so famous a Theater. Edward complains by a sollemne Ambassage to the Emperour Charles the 4. who took the paines to come into France, with an intent to employ his authoritie and counsell to reconcile these two Princes: but it was in vaine. The cause of this fruitlesse paine proceeded from Edward, beeing resolute to haue his part tryed by armes, being emboldned by his victorious successe in the former raigens.

Charles had alwaies protested to obserue the treatie of Bretigny inuiolable. But hauing vnderstood the generall resolution of the States, and of the countries and Noblemen, interested by the said Treatie, he resolues to protect them: and hauing excused himselfe both to the Emperour and forraigne Princes, by a publike declaration, he sends a Gentleman of Beausse called Chapponeau, to the Prince of Wales being at Bourdeaux, summoning him to appeare before him at Paris, at the instance of the Nobilitie and commons of Guienne; complaining of him. He also sent a Herald to the King of England, to proclaim war against him. The Earle of Armagnac, the Lord of Albret (who had newly married Isabel of Bour-

C bon, and by this alliance was become French) the Earls of Perigort, Cominges, & Carmain: the Lords of Barde, Condon, Pincornet, Pardaillan and Agenois, began this protestation against the King of England, followed by all those Prouinces, protesting for the crowne of France. At this exaple all the Towns of the Countie of Ponthieure, yeelded to Guy Earle of S. Pol, and to Guy of Chastillon Master of the Crosse-bowes. Then the Kings armies marche into diuers parts, vnder the commands of the Dukes of Aniou and Berry, and the Constable Guesclin; to whose wisdom, (and especially to the Chancellor Tourmans) they attribute the obedience of the people of Guienne, discreetly praetised by them. Limoges and Cahors yeeld at the sight of the Kings armie. Carlat, Bergerac, S. Seuer, and in the end Rochel by siege, and by the successe of these Citties (reduced to the Kings obedience by force), S. Tan d'Angely, Angoulesme, Xaintes, Fontenay, Parthenay, and many other townes obey voluntarily. The fortresses of Mortaigne, Lusignan and Sanzay, are added to this conquest, and in the end Tours stretcheth forth her hands to the King, and shakes off the English yoke. Whilest that the Kings armie performed these happy exploits in Guienne: the Prince of Wales (a hardie and generous warriour) to turne aside this deluge, the which he fees falling vpon the countie of Bourdeaux) resolues to enter by another quarter, which (fearing no enemye) should be found without defence. Hauing made a flying campe of English and Galcons well armed, he slippes into Auuergne, from thence into Bourbonnois and Berry, where hauing refreshed his troupes some daies, he passeth into Forest, and gathering together the boates vpon the riuer of Loire, he passeth ouer at Marigny of Nunnes, and so crossing Masconnois, he comes into Bourgogne, where finding all desert, without victuals, all being carried into walled Townes, by the care of Philip the Kings brother, he marcheth into Auxerrois, and from thence into Gastinois: in the end he staves before Espernon, with an armie of twentie thousand men, which terrifies the whole countie, and takes the towne easily, beeing not releued.

Charles recalls his armie out of Guienne, giuing the Constable Guesclin commission to stop this streame: the which he executes so happily, as all this cloud was presently dispersed: so as the Prince of Wales could hardly retire himselfe to Bourdeaux, not laden with spoiles, as in former times, but with shame and losse.

This was the successe of the first passage the English made through France. But what is become of our Nauarrois? we haue obserued how he made his peace with King Iohn, when as he returned from prison. He thence retired himselfe quietly into his realme of Nauarre, dissembling his ialousie, and watching all opportunities to crosse the affaires of Charles, who spared him with so great respect. The neerenesse of Bourdeaux was a fit meanes for him to continue his praetises with the English vnder-hand: although by meanes of the Queenes, he entertained a shew of friendship with Charles his brother in law.

The successe of the French armie in Guienne.

The exploits of the Prince of Wales.

1366. Castille ministred matter of employment for our warriours, with a very notable successe. A Peter King of Castille, sonne to Alphonfus, (making great profession of loue to the French) married Blanche the daughter of Peter Duke of Bourbon, and sister to Joane the wife of our Charles the VVise, and to brother in law to the King. Whilest the Castilian loued his wife, the alliance and friendship of our King, was his greatest honour: but abandoning himselfe to a strumpet named Paërle, he forsooke all dutie to his wife, left France, and linckt himselfe with the English, against his sworne faith to his allies. To this trecherie he addes the mur-ther of his wife, and a cruell tyrannie against his subiects.

Peter king of Castille murther
 his owne wife.

These execrable proceedings procured the wrath of God against him, with the hatred both of great and small, which drew him headlong to his ruine: Alphonfus his father making him his heire and successor of his realme of Castille, had bequeathed a legacie by testament B to Henry his bastard sonne, a vertuous man, that is to say, as lawfull by his vertue, as Peter was growne degenerate by his vices; and as greatly beloued of the people, as Peter was hated in generall, by reason of his abominable life. He spoiled Henry his brother of this legacie, the which his father had left him: but thinking to take from another, he lost his owne:
 for Henry thus ill intreated, flies to Pope Vrbane the fift, resident at Auignon, beseeching him to vse his authoritie by admonitions to his brother; aduising him to restore that which his father had giuen him. Vrbane inclining to his iust request, cites them both to appeare before the Consistorie, to draw them to their duties; Peter not onely refuseth to obey the Pope, but doth outrage to his Nuntio: Henry thus repulsed, repaires to Charles, by the means C of Peter of Bourbon, brother to the Queene of Castille, whom her husband Peter had murdered. The indignitie of this fact procured Henry great succours from King Charles, even at such a time as he wanted worke for his men of warre. The command of this armie was gi-uen to Peter of Bourbon, a Prince of the blood, with the counsell and direction of the Constable Guesclin, who also bare the name, as he tooke the greatest paines. The armie is leuied in Languedoc by the Kings command, and the exceeding care of the Duke of Berry, gou-ernour of that countrie, to the incredible ioy of many voluntaries, who went cheerefully to so iust a warre: the successe was both happie and speedie; soderly as the French armie appeared for the succour of Henry, all the Castilians reuolt against Peter, who (with great difficultie) saues himselfe with his concubine, and three daughters he had by her, and one onely ser- D uant, carrying nothing with him but a little ready money, and the miserie of a dispossessed Prince.

Charles sends an armie into Castille.

The Castilians
 reuolt against Peter and ex-pell him.

The King of England inuades Peter and restores him.

This his calamitie did first moue the Prince of Wales to compassion, and then his father
Edward commanding his sonne to succour him with all his forces; the which hee performed speedily with a goodly armie, meaning to crosse the desseines of our Charles: but (oh the patience of God, which giues a sinner so long a time of repentance, that in the end (without any excuse) he might pay both the principall and interest!) the successe of this English armie was such, in fauour of Peter of Castille, as hauing vanquished the French armie, by a notable defeat of foure and twenty thousand men; taken Guesclin the Constable, Arnoul of Andreghen Marshall of France, and many other great men prisoners; Peter was restored to the possession of his Realme, and Henry dispossessed; who escaped hardly in this great danger, and retires himselfe into Languedoc, to John Duke of Berry the Kings brother, and gou-ernour of that countrie. But after this gracious assistance of Gods mercie, his iustice must take place, as it did against Peter by this meanes. Henry beeing courteously receiued by the Pope and the Duke of Berry, and the Constable Guesclin set at libertie with all his companions, hauing paid their ranfomes to the Prince of Wales, he recouers a second aide by the bountie of our wife Charles, and the diligence of the Duke of Berrie, to attempt a new recouerie of the Realme of Castille. The Constable Guesclin was appointed to this charge, to withstand the first checke, if it were possible. The euent answered the proiect, and by an admirable meanes, the which ruined Peter through his owne folly.

This tyrant (growne proud by the wishfull successe of the English forces) makes no regard to satisfie the Prince of Wales for the charges of this warre (although the successe were for his good,) but busying himselfe to take reuenge on such as had riuen against him, he contemned such as had succoured him: yea treading all pietie vnder foote, hee allyed himselfe with the King of Belle-marine a Sarasin, and (marrying his daughter) hee abjured
 the

A the Christian Religion; holding the neighbourhood of so mighty a King, to be more certaine and profitable, then all the forces of England. But it fell out contrarie to his conceipt, for Henry assisted by the Constable Guesclin and the French forces, hauing won fise battels against Peter, in the end he was quite defeated and taken prisoner.

Hauing him in his power, at the Castilians sute (wonderfully incensed against this Tyrant) he caused his head to be cut off, reaping the fruites of his impietie, the which made him to forsake the true religion: of his vanitie, trusting to a rotten planke, with the losse of his conscience, and of his exceeding crueltie, hauing murdered his wife, tyrannized ouer his subiects, and spoiled his brother of his estate against all right. He that writes the historie of Spaine, reports that he was slaine by his brother D. Henry in Guesclins tent, being come out of Montiel vpon his assurance. An excellent lesson for all men, especially for great Princes, not to dally with God, who punisheth haynous crimes with haynous punishments euen in this life, attending the euerlasting paine in the life to come.

Charles King of Nauarre was much perplexed, seeing himselfe betwixt two armies, for desiring to be a neuter and to please both, he knew not how to gouerne himselfe. He seekes to intertaine both Charles and Edward, although he were more ingaged to the English, and could not well trust his brother in law, hauing greatly offended him. So he lets the English armie to passe through his dominions when it marched into Castile, to succour Peter, and suffered himselfe to be taken prisoner by Oliver of Mauny, a Gentleman of Brittain, who led him into Castile, to make the English thinke he had bene forced, and the French, that hee did willingly employ himselfe for them beeing in their troups.

A miserable hypocrisie, which of a master makes himselfe a slaue, who might haue bene one of the chiefe of the armie, without this wretched dissembling. The good and wise King, taught by the example of his father John, that an Eele is lost by ouergripping it, desired onely to pacifie his brother in law, although he were well acquainted with his bad disposition, and the practises he continued with England. So he gaue him a safe conduct to come vnto him and restored vnto him Mantes and Meulan, and the free possession of his lands in Normandie: but this prince fraught with malice, could not be reclaimed, neither by the Kings pro-peritie, nor by his clemencie, for (not trusting him) hee retires to his realme of Nauarre, where he continues his old practises with the English: he helps the Britton with men out of Normandie, and attempted against the Kings person, seeking to poison him by Isquet
Rue and Peter of Tetre, his domestically seruants: who were executed, and the Nauarrois places seized on, as guiltie of high treason. Thus Charles was forced to fight against his own blood, and to haue the malice of his kinsmen and allies. No small combat for a great Prince.

We haue discoursed at large of the valour and happie successe both of Edward the third, King of England, and of Edward his sonne Prince of Wales. But as humane things are not durable, so there chanced a great accident vpon his returne from the warre of Castile, which brought them both to the graue. The Prince of Wales finding himselfe threatned with a dropsie, passed from Bourdeaux into England, to take the aire of his natiue countrie, but he died soone after his arriall, the 46. yeare of his age. A Prince of great hope, not onely lamented of his friends, but commended of his enemies. Edward the father, seeing his right arme (as it were) cut off, died for griefe leaving Richard the son of his son Edward in his place, who was receiued (without any question made by his vncles) as the first by right of succession. Richard (not to degenerate from the example of his grandfather and father, being crowned King) vndertakes a warre in France: whither hee sends a goodly armie vnder the command of the Duke of Clarence his vnkle, who (hauing landed at Calais) passeth the Riuer of Somme at Clery neere vnto Peronne, and bending towards Soisson, hee crosseth the Riuer of Oise and Ain. Then marching towards Chaalons he passeth Marne, and shewing himself before Troyes in Champagne, he spoiles the countrey, and so goeth ouer Seine betwixt Ville-neufue and Soufey, and bending towards Beausse and Gastinois he crosseth into Brit-taine, there to reuiue the warre in fauour of John of Montfort, spoiling the countrie with a strange desolation. On the other side there lands another armie at Bourdeaux, the which hauing entred the countrie, fortified such places as held for the English, to nourish the seedes of this new warre. In the countrie of Guenaudan (a diocesse in that large Prouince of Languedoc) there was a castle neere to Mande named Randon, whereas the English maintained a strong

a strong garrison, a retreat for theues, which did infinite harme in the countrie. The countie hauing sued vnto the king, to free them of this encombrance, he graunted them Guesclin the Constable, a man of great reputation, but the armie should be defrayed at their charges.

He comes into Languedoc, besiegeth Randon, and brings them to the last extremitie, but as the besieged (not able to hold out) were entred into composition, behold the Constable (sicke to the death) yeelds vp the ghost. At the same instant the place was yeelded vnto the King: so as in signe that the honour of this prize was due to Guesclin, the Captaines carried the keyes of the castle vpon his herie. Thus died Guesclin, leauing an honourable testimonie of his valour and loyalty: and to Charles an extreame sorrow for his death, who honoured him with a notable obsequie, causing his bodie to be interred with the Kings at S. Denis: and at the foot of his owne tombe was that of Guesclin, with a burning lampe maintained by B foundation, called The lampe of Guesclin vnto this day. King Charles had giuen all Bourgogn to his brother Philip for his portion, according to the will of his father John, as we haue said, and had married him with Marguerite the rich heire of Flanders. Being in possession of Bur- gogne, there happened another occasion in Flanders, which wonne him great credit with those people, whom he should command after the death of Lewis his father in law, who was yet liuing. The inhabitants of Gand, a mutinous people by nature, who neuer want matter to mutine, had then a great discontent, both against their Earle in generall, (by reason of some new impositions) and against them of Bruges in particular (iealous to see them in so great fauour with their Prince, by reason of a channell which they had drawne from the Ri- uer of Lis, for the commoditie of the countrie: which riuer crossing the riuier of Gand, the Gantois supposed it was all theirs in proper: so as none might vie it without their liking. This iealousie grew so great, that this great cittie (as big with their waiward and contentious humors, as it was populous and rich) beeing thus mooued, resolues to make shew thereof, and in this furie they make a league, and choose a head, bearing a marke or token of their faction, and from words they go to blowes. One called Leon (a bold practiser of popular seditions) was found fit to be the King-leader of this tumult: their marke was a white cap, for all the troupe. These Gantois gather together, they hinder the worke of this channell, and the gathering of the custome, beeing the cause of this quarrell: they kill Collecters and Recei- uers, and in the end the Gouvernour of the cittie called Roger, who beeing there for the Earle laboured to teach them their duties. Their furie exceeded to farre, as they spoile the Earles Pallace, fire it, and in their rage pull it downe to the ground. They run in great troupes to o- ther townes, to draw them to their league. They besiege Ypre, held by the Earles men, cry- ing in all places, Libertie, as hauing a meaning to change their Lord, and then to seaze vpon Flanders. This cruell disorder amazed the Earle, when as beheld Philip Duke of Bourgogne, his sonne in law, flies vnto him to quench this fire: and as men admire rather the Sunneri- sing then setting, and that the name of the house of France, and the greatnesse of his goodly portion gaue him great authoritie: so it chanced that he pacified this rebellion, to the con- tent both of the Earle and cities, taking a happie possession of this great inheritance, by a fa- mous and profitable occasion. But Flanders alone was not subiect to these mad mutinies: for those of Montpellier, newly reduced to the obedience of our King, grew into so great a furie, as they slue James Pontel a Knight of the Order, and Chancellor to John Duke of Berry, Gouvernour of the countrie, Guy of Scery Seneschall of Rouergue, Arnould of Montelaur, Gouvernour of the said cittie, and other officers of the Kings and Dukes, to the number of foure score, and cast their bodies into a well. As the outrage was odious, so the punishment was memorable. The Duke of Berry comes with forces, assisted by the whole Prouince, de- resting so foule an insolencie, so as the Inhabitants (calling to mind their audacious phren- sie) resolue to submit themselves to punishment, and not to stand desperately against force.

The Consuls of the Cittie hauing halters about their neckes and torne clothes, the keyes of the cittie in one hand, and a red cap (the marke of their office) in the other, met with the Duke their gouernour, beeing followed by the Clergie (carrying a crosse) all crying for mercie, and weeping with a lamentable noise.

In this mournfull sort the Duke enters the cittie gates, being without any guard, he finds the streets full of poore and desolate people, vpon their knees, men and women, olde and yong, crying for mercie, and redoubling their pitifull cries, as witnesses of their repentance. Then

A Then the Duke commands they should presently bring all their armes into one place neere vnto his lodging, placing a guard at the gates and vpon the walles. The next day, he caused a scaffold to be made in the market place, where hauing sharply rebuked the people for their rebellion, he pronounced a sentence in the Kings name, whereby he declares: That all their priuiledges were taken from them, their Consulship, Town house, common Arches, Vni- uersities, their Bels, Salt-pannes, and al Iurisdictions of the Citie, either of soueraign courts, or of the commonaltie: sixe hundred inhabitants to bee chosen at aduenture, condemned to death, that is, two hundred to loose their heads, two hundred to be hanged, & two hundred burnt, their children declared infamous and slaues for euer, and their goods confiscate. The commonaltie should pay fixe score thousand frankes of gold, and the charges of the Dukes voyage, and his armies. The Consuls with certaine Councillers that were named, should drawe the bodies of such as had bin massacred out of the well, and bury them. A Chappell should be built for their obsequies, with the same Bell which did sound the alarum. The gates and city walles should be beaten downe, and their armes burnt publicly.

The sentence
pronounced against them

This was their doome: but it was moderated at the intercession of Pope Clement, then re- sident in Auignon, by the meanes of Cardinall de la Lune. The same was qualified, the pri- uiledges restored, the gates and walles preferred: but the Authors of this sedition were put to death, that the rest of the Inhabitants might liue in safetie.

Is moderated.

A notable president for subiects to suppress their furie, euen when they thinke to haue a iust cause of complaint, feeling themselves surcharged or otherwise grieved: considering that errors are sooner committed, then repaired. And for commanders, that it is a dan- gerous resolution to let loose the raines to a mad multitude, which augments the mischiefe, supposing to cure it.

Queen Isabel wife to our wise Charles, daughter to Peter of Bourbon, dies about this time, to the great griefe of her husband, to whom she left two sonnes, Charles and Lewis, both ve- ry yong: for Charles was borne the 3. of December 1371. and was carried to the Font by Charles of Montmorency, and baptised by Dourmans Bishop of Beauuois, and Chancellour of France. Lewis was Duke of Orleans. Shee left him also one daughter, Isabel, married after- wards to Richard King of England. Necessary obseruations for the course of our History.

D This good Prince after his wiues death, was nothing healthfull, so as broken with poyson, the which had much weakened him, and with the tedious toyles of his youth, more then with age, he decayed dayly, and he himselfe perceiued it, so as feeling the ende of his life to approach, remembring what troubles he had past, during the mournfull imprisonment of his Father, by the contempt of his yong age, lest the like should happen to his son Charles, vnder colour of his minoritie, gouerned by Tutors, hee decreed in a generall assembly of the States, by a law, and an irreuoicable Edict, That after the decess of the King of France, his el- dest sonne should succeed him presently, and at the age of fourteen years, should be declared ca- pable to gouerne the estate alone, and be freed from Tutors. But (oh the weakenes of mans wis- dom!) he did not foresee that his son should be ill gouerned by his Tutors in his minority, E that the age of fourteene should not free him from Tutors: and that euen his sonne com- ming to mans estate, should giue more scope to the ambition of his own vncles (more wor- thily to be called murderers, then Tutors) then his weakest youth had done.

He had a Fistula in one arme, by the which those ill humors were drawne away, which grew by poyson, and gaue him great ease when it did run. It chanced this Fistula stopt, and then his maladie encreased much.

Charles (resolving by this sharpe alarum, to goe the common way of all flesh) calles for his three brethren, Lewis, John, and Philip; and hauing recommended his children and sub- iects vnto them, he giues them particular aduise, for the gouernment of the Realme: lea- ving the custody of his sonne, and the Regency of the Realme vnto them. He died the 16. of F September, 1380. in the Castle of Beauty, seated vpon the riuier of Marne. He commanded that Oliuer of Clifton should be Constable, hauing commended his fidelitie and sufficien- cie, and that they should carefully preferue the amity of Germanie.

Thus died Charles the wife, wonderfully beloved and lamented of his subiects, leauing his Realme in good estate, after so horrible a desolation. And although the confusions pat- ted had wonderfully impouered the subiects, and wasted the Kings Treasor, (neither

was 1380. was his raigne free from warre yet did he leaue the Prouinces of his Realme very wealthy A and an infinit treasure in his coffers: although he had built the Louure, S. Germaine in Lay, Montargis, Creil, the Celestines and some other Churches. Of such power is good husbandry in this realme, as in riches it yeelds not to the treasures of Peru, nor in fertilitie to any country vnder heauen, to subsist amidst so many stormes, and to be presently restored by good husbandrie. An example for Princes to imitate, and not to despaire in like confusions, but to hope for all that may be wished for in the restoring of an estate, by patience and dexteritie, vertues proper to our wife Charles. A Prince so much the more praise-worthie, hauing His Disposition preferred this Estate, when it seemed lost, religious, wise, modest, patient, stirring and stayed, when need required, able to entertaine euery man according to his humor: hauing by these vertues wonne a great reputation, both within and without the Realme, and honourable B to his posteritie; as to haue saued France from shipwracke.

He loued learning and learned men: Nicholas Oresme was his schoolemaister, whome he honoured with great preferments. He caused the Bible to be translated into French, imitating S. Lewis. I haue seene the Originall in the Kings lodging at the Louure, signed by king Charles and his Brother the Duke of Berrie. A goodly obseruation of the auncient simplicitie of those royall characters. I haue likewise seene a Manuscript of the translation made by the commandement of S. Lewis. He delighted in the reading of the holy Scripture and Philosophie: hauing likewise caused the Ethicks and Politicks of Aristotle, with many bookes of Tully, to be translated into French. The fauour he shewed to learned men, stirred vp many C good wits, who began to draw the Muses from their graues, both in France and Italy.

The Historie doth particularly note, that he did often visite his Court of Parliament and his chamber of accompts: gaue audience vnto sutors, read their petitions, and heard their complaints and reasons, imploying some dayes of the weeke, euen in his greatest affaires, to do those fatherly and royall workes of Iustice. He tooke great delight to aduance his houshold seruants, giuing them meanes secretly (and without the priuie of any) to instruct their sonnes, and to marrie their daughters. A testimonie of a good conscience, and of a wife man. This bond of loyaltie could haue no better foundation, then in transporting it from the Father to the sonne, nor almes be better employed then from the master to the seruant.

Royall vertues and worthie of eternall memorie. But alas! what shall be the successe of D this bountie and wisedome? The raigne of his sonne Charles shall be most miserable. Hee hath done the part of a good Brother, of a good master, a good Father, and a good King:
but God the Soueraigne of Kings, had limited the euents of his cares. To teach vs, (by a notable example) That while the Lord buildeth the house the workmen labour but in vaine: if the Lord keepe not the citie, the watchman watcheth but in vaine: for an eternall Maxime of go-uernment & state: Whosoever glories, let him glorie in the Lord. But vertues are not heredita-
rie. Iohn not very wife, begat Charles a wife and happie Prince, and he begets a frantick man, vnhappy both in youth and age. We may on the other side oppose other considerations very disputable. Profit aduised him to marrie the heire of Flanders, not onely to pacifie that country, but also to enlarge his owne dominions, adding thereunto that great and rich E estate of Flanders, from whence so many mischiefs haue sprung to France, but his delight made him preferre the faire before the rich. Moreouer, the rules of State did not permit him so to aduance his brother, making him in a manner equall to himselfe in power, the which must needs be the cause of many inconueniences, as it after happened. The cause of his brother Philip Duke of Bourgogne, is ordered by the same rule, for who can with reason mislike, that Charles giues a portion to his brother by his fathers will; and that in the rich marriage of a Prince his vassall, and of a neere estate (whereby his Realme was daily annoyed) he preferres his brother before his capitall enemy? But God had referred the honour to himselfe. Bourgogne since Robert, the grand-child of Hugh Capet, had bene successiuely in the power of Princes, who had alwaies done faithfull seruice to the Crown, and now it shal F be a scourge vnto it: yet in the end it shal be vnited vnto the Crowne again, and taken from such as had abused it. Experience doth teach, that in matters of State, the end is not alwaies answerable to the beginning, nor the successe to the dessein, to the end that Princes may depend of him who is greater then themselves, who hath made them, and can mar them: and without whom they cannot doe any thing.

Behold

A Behold the life, death, race, raigne and manners of Charles the fifth, called the Wise. But 1380.
before we enter into the trouble some raigne of Charles the sixth, let vs obserue the estate of The estate of the Empire and of the Church. We haue said that Charles the sonne of Iohn King of Bohemia had bene chosen Emperour, and called Charles the fourth. Hee held the Empire two and 30. yeares, beginning in the yeare 1350. So the raigns of Iohn and Charles his son, is contained in this Empire: for he died in the yeare 1378. Before his death he provided that Win- cesthis son should succeed him in the Imperial dignitie. At the first he married Blanche Countess of Valois, daughter to Charles Earle of Valois, and sister to Philip of Valois the French King, being very young, (for she was but seauen yeares old when she was betrothed vnto him) he had bene bred vp in the Court of France, and learned the French humors: he loued B our Crowne better then our Lawes. A Prince wholly inclined to his owne particular, making shew to loue our kings, but vnderhand he supported their enemies against them.

This was the principall reason why his comming into France prooued fruitlesse, after so long a voyage and so great expences, ministring a sufficient cause of ialousie to our Charles, who gaue him the best entertainment he could, to make him know, that the Soueraignie which he pretended to haue ouer France, was but a dreame. Yet he suffered the Country of Dauphine (which they called the Empire) as a member of the auncient Realme of Arles) to be wholly infranchised from that subiection, to cut off all pretensions from his successours, embracing the commoditie to settle his affaires euen by their meanes who he knew were not his friends.

C This Emperour Charles the fourth, did all he could both in Italy and Germany, to apply vnto himselfe the rights of the Empire, being wholly incline d to his owne profit, for the which he vsed the name of Iustice and good order, being more learned in law, then in doing right, and hauing more knowledge then conscience. It is hee which made the Golden Bull, both to rule the Election of the Emperour, and the rights and dignitie of the Empire. The former confusions of the Empire had so dispenced all priuate gouernours of countries and cities, as euery one played the Emperour in his gouernement.

These tyrannicall disorders were the cause of the Cantons in Swisserland, who since haue established a goodly commonweale, consisting of thirteene Cantons, who maintain them- Original of selves with great order and force, hauing the amitie and alliance of the neighbor Monarchs, the Cantons and an honourable place among the Estates of Christendome vnto this day. Their particular historie, belongs not to our subiect, it sufficeth to haue noted their beginning, and the occasion of their commonweale, newly erected in the disorders of that age. The Church of Rome was in a very poore estate, first by the continuall factions of the Guelphs and Gibelins, and of itselfe by a distraction bredde by an open schisme, hauing two Popes, two chaires, two seas, and a deadly hatred, the which troubled all the Kings and Princes of Chri-stendome, some defending the Pope, others the Antipope as his opposite.

We haue said, that in the raigne of Philip of Valois the Pontifical Sea was translated from Rome to Auignon, where it continued about 70. yeares, Clement the sixth hauing bought this citie for his successors; being a pleasant and fruitfull seate. These quarrels (continued with such violent passions) had tyred mens minds like as a long processe doth wearie the most obstinate pleaders. The Popes being absent from Rome, gouerned the estate of Italy by three Cardinals their Legats, but all went to ruine. Gregorie the sixth a Limosin, being chosen Pope at Auignon, went to Rome to redresse these confusions, wherein there was small helpe. Being receiued with an incredible ioy of the Romanes, and of all Italy, he returnes no more to Auignon, but passeth the rest of his daies at Rome. After his death the people with all vehemencie require a Romaine borne, or an Italian for Pope: but there was some difficultie in the election, for the Colledge consisted for the most part of French Cardinals, who desired to haue one of their owne nation. They were much diuided: but the Cardinals (fearing the peoples furie, armed with an intent to murder them if they did not chooe one of their nation) yeilded to the election of a Neapolitane, named Bartholomew, who was receiued and proclaimed by the name of Vrbain the sixth.

But within few daies after, the Male-contents rettyred from Rome (vnder colour to flee the plague) to Fundy, a towne in the Realme of Naples (of the French faction) by means of Queene Isaue, when they did chooe Clement the 7. a Limosin, who retired to Auignon, An Antipope chosen,
and

1380. and was opposite to Urban the sixth, with open defiance one of another: which schisme continued vntil the counsell of Constance, each Pope with his faction. Clement had for him the Kings of France, Castile and Scotland. Urban had the Emperour, the Kings of England and Hungary: Clement held his seat at Auignon and Urban at Rome. In those daies liued Bartholl, Baldus, Petrarch, Boccace, Planudes a Greeke by nation, Bonsauenture and John Wickliffe. These hurliburles touched the hearts, and opened the mouthes of many good men, wonderfully grieved to see such diuision in the Church, apparently growne by the ambition of such as had greatest authority in the same. The writings lie open to their reasonable complaints, which euery one may read, without any further discourse.

CHARLES the sixth, the 53: French King.

Necessary observations for the vnderstanding of this reigne.

It is necessary to haue some direction to passe through a Labyrinth; so this crooked reigne hath need of some order to guide vs, in the disorder of so many obscure confusions, which we are to represent. I will first obserue the most famous acts and worthiest personages of this reigne, and then will I distinguish the subiect according to the occurrents. This miserable reigne continued 42. yeeres, beginning in the yeere 1380. and ending in the yeere 1422. Charles the sixth succeeded his father Charles the fifth at the age of 12. yeeres (being borne in the yeere 1368.) hee was crowned in the yeere 80. married in 84. dismissed his Tutors to reigne alone in 87. falles into a phrensie in 93. and dies in the yeere 1422. So beeing vnder age with his Tutors, and of age in perfect sense, hee reigned thirteene yeeres, and liued in his phrensie twenty nine yeeres. Who sees not then the iust calculation of forty two yeeres in this reigne?

Charles the fifth his father, had three brethren: Lewis Duke of Anjou, John Duke of Berry, and Philip Duke of Bourgoigne. Queene Joane, daughter to Peter Duke of Bourbon, wife to Charles the fifth, and mother to Charles the sixth, had one brother, James Duke of Bourbon. These foure vnckles shall play their parts vpon this stage in diuers occurrents; but let vs adde the rest, euery one shall haue his turne.

We

A We haue said, that Charles the Wife left two sonnes; this Charles the 6. whose raigne we now describe, and Lewis Duke of Orleans. And our Charles had three sonnes, Lewis, John, and Charles: and one daughter named Katherine, all by Elizabeth of Bauaria, one of the chiefe fire-brands of this Tragedie: an outrageous woman, an vnnatural mother, and altogether vnworthie of this crowne. These three sonnes were Daulphins one after another in their fathers life: but Charles succeeded him, notwithstanding all crosses and difficulties: and Katherine his sister was married to Henry the 5. King of England; a mournfull gage of a horrible confusion for this Realme. But alas, how many cruell acts of ambition, vanitie, and treacherie of such as held the helme of this estate, being either royall persons, or serled in the highest dignities? How many changes and reuolutions of these froward humors, daring any thing vnder the libertie of this raigne: the King being either a child, or sick, and alwaies weake and vnable to gouerne so great a charge? In the first Scene of this Tragedie, we shall see the Vnckles of this young King in diuision one against another. Lewis Duke of Anjou (declared Regent, as first Prince of the blood) is crossed by his breethren, the Dukes of Berrie and Bourgoigne, and he abuseth his authoritie imperiously. Lewis Duke of Anjou beeing dead, Lewis Duke of Orleans, brother to King Charles the sixth shall take his place, as the first Prince, and shall fall to quarrell with Philip the Hardie Duke of Bourgoigne, his Vnckle, who dying, shall leaue John his sonne successor of his iealousie, against Lewis Duke of Orleans his cousin. John shall exceed all humanitie, and kill him; but the hatred shall not die, beeing transplanted into Charles Duke of Orleans, sonne to Lewis massacred, the which shall breed infinit troubles. The Daulphins shall play their parts, sometimes friends, and sometimes enemies one to another. John who had murdered Lewis of Orleans, shall be slain by Charles the Daulphin, who shall be King: but from John shall spring another Philip of Bourgoigne, who shall kindle a new fire, to be reuenged of his fathers death. The stranger is engaged in these ciuill warres: women augment it by their furies. On the one side Valentine Duchesse of Orleans: on the other Isabel Queene of France. The Constables of Clifton and Armagnac are likewise drawne in: and the subiect growes licentious in these disorders. Passion preuailes with such a furie, as the mother forgets the birth of her owne wombe, and so abuteth her authoritie, as she dares attempt (against the fundamentall lawe of State) to giue the realme to a stranger, who was crowned, and proclaimed King in the heart of France, by her boldnesse.

These be the contents of this wretched raigne, with these two parcels distinctly to be obserued; the Kings Minoritie, and his Maioritie, and thereby we shall diuide our whole discourse.

THE MINORITIE OF KING Charles the sixth.

FROM THE YEARE, 1380.

When as CHARLES receiued the Crowne by the decease of his Father, vnto the yeare 87. that he dismissed his Vnckles, to rule alone with absolute authoritie.

F HE generall estates assemble at Paris, presently after the death of Charles, called the Wife, to prouide for the gouernement of the King and Realm, and to auoide all apparant iealousie betwixt the Kings Vnckles, they decreed, That according to the declaration made by their good King deceased, Charles his sonne should be annointed and crowned King, and that vntill he were of competent age to gouerne so great an estate, Lewis Duke of Anjou, (as eldest of the house of France, and so the first Prince of the blood) should be Regent; and haue the authoritie of Councell and royall commaund. And likewise by vertue of King Charles his will, A Oliuer of Clifton (a braue and valiant Knight borne in Brittain) was made Constable of France. Oliuer of Clifton tooke possession of his charge, preparing for the Kings Coronation: and the Duke of Aniou receiuing the Kings treasure, which they say was eightene hundred thousand Crownes. A very great summe for those times, and after so wretched a season. He forced Sauvigny the head Treasurer, to deliuer those summes into his hands, and by this excesse laide the ground of a great presumption which followed.

A controuersie for precedence between the Kings Vnclles at his coronation.

Charles is annointed at Rheims, and crowned after the custome of France, the 25. of October, in the yeare 1380. in a sollemne assembly of his Princes of the blood, Princes allyed, and Officers of this Crowne. The Dukes of Aniou, Berry, and Bourgogne the Kings Vnclles, Wencelin Duke of Brabant, the Dukes of Lorraine and Barre, the Earles of Sauoy, of Marche and Eu (friends and confederates to our Kings) did assit. At this tolemnitie there was some question for place, whether should take it: the Duke of Aniou as Regent of the Realme, or the Duke of Bourgogne as first Peere of France and Deane of the Peeres: distinguishing the degrees according to their qualities, to whom the order was giuen.

The King to crowne his infant by some notable act, tooke vpon him to decide this controuersie, and decreed: That for as much as at the Kings annoyning, the Peeres of Fraunce ought to hold the first rank, in all ceremonies: the Duke of Bourgogne as the first Peere. should take place of the Duke of Aniou: and so Philip was preferred before his elder brother, continuing the possession of the name of Hardie, the which hee purchaseth in defending his father John so stoutly at the battaile of Poitiers. But he increased this name of Hardie too much in his carriage, leauing it hereditarie to his children, conuerting this stoutnesse into an imperious presumption, which bred a huge deluge of miseries to the great prejudice of the whole realme. The day after the Coronation, the States beseech the Regent to prouide for the reliefe of the poore people, whose burthen was too heauie for the great arrearages they were to pay of debts growne in former raignes, and the rather for that there was no warre which imposed the necessitie of so great a charge.

The Regent did not yeeld thereunto, but continued these leauies of money more and more, which was the occasion of tumults in diuers Prouinces of France, as if this popular humor had bene like vnto a pestilent feauer, or an infectious disease. Flanders likewise kindled great fires vpon sandrie occasions, which were quenched with much trouble, after memorable combustions. Flanders shall imbarke first in this storme, and shall come last to land not without danger by strange accidents; to teach Princes, how farre they should presse their subiects; and for subiects, with what respect they should reuerence their Superiours, in seeking out remedies for their afflictions; for in the end (amiddest all these tumults) the victors weepe and lament in the ruine and notable losse and ouerthrow of the vanquished.

We haue said, that Philip Duke of Bourgogne, made a composition for the Gantois, with the Earle of Flanders his father in lawe. But this accord lasted not long: for the Earle disdain- ing the indignities he had digested, during the sedition, could not forget them: but vnder- fained quarrels (to the end they should haue no cause of complaint, as breaking the accord) E hee pincheth some, and ruines others: and for that the Gantois stood vpon their guard, not suffering the Earles men to attempt any thing within the limits of their Cittie, he made a search in the Cittie of Bruges, (where hee commaunded absolutely) for such as had bene of the faction of White Cappes, where hee executed aboute siue hundred. This execution kindled a new fire: Gand falls to armes, and Ypre followes; to whose succour the Gantois send three thousand men. The Earle beeing the stronger, cuttes them in peeces betwixt Cortray and Pourprigny, as they march: Ypre yeelds vnto him; beeing entred the Towne, he cuttes off leauen hundred of the chiefest mens heades: and then without any stay, he marcheth to Gand, and beseegeth it. But his forces were too small in regard of that great and patious cittie, so as hauing employed all his meanes, they had still the liber- F tie of foure gates.

The Gantois loth to be shut vp, and to endure the discommodities of a siege, hauing a wonderfull aduantage by the numbers of their people, resolute to prouide well for the gaide of the cittie, and then to draw forth a good troupe to spoile the countrie, and to force some of the Earles places, thereby to make a diuersion of the siege. They go to the field with fixe thou-

A thousand choise men, vnder the command of John de Launoy one of their Tribunes. They take and burne Tenremonde and Gramont, townes belonging to the Earle, committing infinite spoiles in the country. The Earle leaues the siege, and marcheth away with an intent to fight with them. He findes them nere to Niuelle, chargeth them, defeats them, and puts them to flight. They recouer the gates of Niuelle, and the Earle enters with them pell-mell, some of them (led by Launoy) recouer the fort of the towne: the Earle besiegeth them, and cauieth many fagots and bauins to be brought about this Tower, and to bee set on fire. All these poore wretches are burnt, making most horrible cries.

This Tribune intreateth, that they might be receiued to ranfome, and shewing his purse, B but receiuing no answer from them, but scornes and mockes, he casts himselfe from the top of the Tower vpon their halberds and pikes, and so hee dies very valiantly. This fight was horrible, and truly vnworthy of a Lord displeased with his subiects, and yet hee continued it with a new slaughter of this poore people, who beeing amazed with this great defeat, had neither feete to runne, nor hands to defend themselves. All are put to the sword, so as of fixe thousand, there hardly escape three hundred. But the Gantois shall soone haue their reuenge. At the brute hereof, they were as much amazed, as the Earle was puffed vp with pride to pursue his victorie, beeing in so ready a way for the execution and pursuit thereof.

In this disorder, the Gantois choose another head, Philip of Arteuille, sonne to James of C Arteuille, (who (as wee sayd) was slaine by the people) who aduiseeth them to humble themselves vnto their Earle, and to craue pardon. They are resolute, hauing necessity for their chiefe Councellour, praying and beseeching their Earle, To haue pittie of the blood of his subiects, who submitted their liues and goods to his mercy, to dispose at his pleasure, either in pardoning them, or suffering them to depart, in abandoning their native Countrie, as a perpetuall banishment, that it would please him chely to graunt them their liues. The Earle was greatly incensed against them, and in such a choler, as they could receiue no other answer: But that all sorts within the Cittie, men and women above the age of fifteene yeeres, should barefeete and bareheaded submit themselves to his mercy, and being in this estate he would aduise what to doe. They sue for mercy.

The Earle makes the Gantois desperate.

D The people of Gant seeing him transported with wrath, and no meanes to pacifie it; They resolute (by the aduice of Philip of Arteuille, their leader, in this extreame necessity) to hazard all, and not to hope for any safety but in dispaire, beeing the least of two mitchieues, to die courageously, for the liberty of their country, and defending themselves against the vniuolt violence of so inexorable a man: then hauing scene their wiues and daughters deflowred, they should either suruiue their infamy, or bee slaine and massacred without any defence, like dogges, at the mercy of so cruell an enemy. The euent, or rather God the protector of the afflicted, fauoured this courageous resolution. For the effecting hereof, they make choise of siue thousand of their most resolute and best armed men, to trie their fortunes against the Earle, and provide the best they can for the gard of the city: E with a generall resolution and consent; That if these siue thousand men should bee defeated: to the end they should not attend the doubtfull euent of a siege, nor fall into the hands of so irreconcilable an enemy, they would set fire of the city, and euery one saue himselfe as hee could.

This beeing concluded, Philip of Arteuille parts from Gant, with his desperate troupe, and marcheth directly to Bruges, takes a seat of aduantage, and intrencheth himselfe, attending the oportunitie, either to defend themselves with aduantage, or to fall vpon the enemy. The Earle puffed vp with his first successe, imagining them too few for the Laquais belonging to the Gentlemen of his traine, came to charge them within their trenches, and to force them to fight. Arteuille not like a Brewer of beere, as hee was, but as a great captain, ordred his troopes with such dexterity, as the Earles army had the sunne in their eyes: F vpon this sodaine change, hauing a full view of the Earles men, he goes resolutely to the charge, leading forth this desperate troupe, which fell vpon them like a great streame of water, breaking forth suddenly, hauing found a passage. The first ranks (troubled with the sunne beames which dazeled their eyes, and not able to withstand so violent a charge) giue way, and turning their backs, they disorder all the rest.

The Earle of Flanders defeated by the Gantois.

The

1385.

The Gantois vpon this aduantage, teare all in peeces, they encounter, as famished Wolues doe in a flocke of sheepe. This braue Nobility flies, as astonied, and is put to the sword. The Earle cries, intreates, and runnes, but all in vaine: hee that had the swiftest horse, and the best legges to fle was the most valiant. The retreat from thence to Bruges was neere: the multitude flies thither, like a current of water. The Earle enters with the rest, not able to gather his men againe together, and shuts himselfe into his castle.

The Gantois following, and killing them that fled, enter pel mel, and seized vpon the gates. Arteuile hauing speedily provided for the guard thereof, the Gantois (being victors) disperse themselues through out the city, crying against the vanquished. The Citie is wonne: and liberty proclaimed for the good Citizens, killing al such as they found to fauor the Earle, searching all houses for his seruants, and commanding to spare the good citizens. The Earle (foreseeing by this brute) that the enemy would presently pursue him, he fodenly leaues his rich attire, and takes the simplest of one of his gromes, and so forsakes the castle, to seeke some corner to hide his head in. Hee was scarce gone out, but his castle was beset, and easily taken and spoiled, whilest that he saues himselfe in a poore womans house: where in her silly cottage she had onely one roome beneath, and aboue a garret, to the which they mounted by a ladder. The Earle creeps into this cabin, and the woman hides him in the bed-straw, where her children did lie, and comming downe, tooke away the ladder. The Gantois hauing made search in euery corner for the Earle, they came to the house where the Earle was, and searching it, they went vp to the place where he lay hidden. He that could haue read the secrets of this poore princes heart, in this amazement, should haue seene a remorse of conscience, for that he had not intreated his subiects with more mildnesse. Being thus freed, hee creeps out of this cottage, and gets forth of the towne, being alone and on foote: running from bush to bush, and from ditch to ditch, fearing euery one that passed: when as behold (lying hidden in a ditch) hee discouers a household seruant of his owne, named Robert Marsball, who takes him vp on horse-backe behind him, and in this order hee recouers Lisle.

This vnexpected successe bred new designes, in the frantick braine of this Tribune: and of this furious multitude, who should haue bene fatished to haue auoied this shipwrack, and (returning to their houses) should haue fallen to their vsuall trades, and haue vsed this profitable successe to good purpose, and made their peace with their lawfull Lord, being sufficiently chastised. But vanity thrusts them on, and the certainty of Gods threats shewed it selfe in the following punishment: to teach vs, That man hath but the misery which he seeks by his owne folly. A generall lesson for great and small, both for men, families, and States. Arteuile with his Gantois (hauing glutted themselues with the sacke and bloud of such as were any way affected to the Earle, hauing spoiled his castle, and left it desolate, beaten downe the gates of Bruges, and filled vp the ditches) from thence they goe to conquer the other cities of Flanders, where hee conceived a new Empire. Presently all obey him. Ypre, Dam, Bergues, Bourbourg, Furnes, Scluse, Pourprigne, Courtray and the lesser townes, Audenard resists. It is presently besieged. At the brute of this successe, all Flanders flies thither: so as in few daies there were aboute a hundred thousand men assembled before the towne. The Earle amazed with so violent a reuolt of all his subiects, hath recourse to his sonne in law Philip Duke of Bourgongne, that by his meanes hee might bee relieved from the King: although he were more affected to the English then French, hauing bin too much respected by our Kings. A proud prince in prosperity, and too much deiected in aduersity.

The Regent and the counsell refused to venture the King with this man in so dangerous a cause: but two reasons moued the King thereunto, and made him ouerrule both the Duke of Aniu his vncl, and his whole counsell by the perswasions of the Duke of Bourgongne. The one was Arteuile himselfe, who during the siege of Audenard (not content to haue ruined the Noblemens houses of the country) had made some roades vpon the frontiers of France.

The other was, King Charles dreamed that hee was mounted vpon a flying Hart, which carried him gently through the ayre, and a Heron vnder him, which did beat downe all other birds, came then flying to his fist, and the Hart brought him to the place from whence he

He carried him to his great content. As the King conceived a delight to report this dreame, as presage of some good successe, so the Duke of Bourgogne laboured to drawe him into Flanders. The king vpon these motiues doth presently leaue an armie, and goes to field. Arteuile to auoide this storme, fortifies the passages of Flanders, especially Port du Lis, neere vnto Comines. The French surprise this passage politickely, hauing attended all night in the dirtie marsh vp to the ancles, expecting the commoditie of the passage. Their patience was the more commendable, for that it was in the depth of a sharp winter, in December. Comines and Verrain being taken, sackt and burnt, the towne of Ypre kills their gouernour, who would not suffer them to obey the King, and yeeld themselues, paying fortie thousand franks for a composition. By their example, Cassell, Bergues, Bourbourg, Grauelin, Furnes, Dunkerke, Pourprigne, Tourmont, Vaillant, Messine, and other neighbour townes resolute to seaze vpon their Gouernours, being Gantois: and to send them bound hands and fetters vnto the king, as testimonie that they had yeelded vpon force.

Charles receiues the townes to mercie, and cuts off the heads of these vnlawfull Gouernours. Arteuile fearing the reuolt of other Citties, and that his forces (which were great) would fall from him, resolues to preuent Charles, and to force him to fight, promising himselfe the like successe as he had against the Earle before Bruges. With this resolution hee chargeth the French army betwixt Cortray and Rosebecque, vpon the Mount of gold, which at the first shooke did somewhat amaze them, they recoyling a little, but without any disorder: yet supported by the Battaile and rereward, they breath, and all together charge this multitude with so great a furie, as all are put to flight, and cut in peeces, or taken with a strange disorder. They number aboute threescore thousand men slaine, and an infinite number of prisoners taken: after the Nobilitie had glutted their choller vpon this seditious rabble, who had made rebellion a vertue, Philip of Arteuile their leader was slaine: hee was found breathing among the dead carcases, whom the King commaunded to be hanged, and so hee had the reward of his imagined Empire.

This double euent may serue as a lesson, both for great and small, for great men, in the Earles person; for small, in that of this Tribune. For the first, to commaund well, for the others to obey well: and for all, not to passe the bounds of their duties. God punishing the great for their tyranny and crueltye, and the lesser for their disobedience: dangerous plagues of mankind, the which cannot stand but by order and authoritie, well gouerned, and well applied.

They call this ouerthrow the battaile of Rosebecque, which chanced in the yeare 1382. in December: it was the more remarkable, for that the vanquished had soone their reuenge. Charles thus victorious, could not manage his victorie; for in stead of surprising the Gantois in this amazement, he lingers too long at Cortray, to seeke out the remainder of those miserable mutines, which remained in this defeate: whereas, in pardoning the vanquished, the victor gets a double victorie.

This place also (being infamous by a great ouerthrow which chanced in the yeare 1312) moued him to choler, for that this ill aduised people, to note the memorie of that day, did celebrate a sollemne feast yearely, and had reserued fise hundred paire of gilt spurs, which they had taken from the French in that battell. Charles was so transported with the memory of this audacious indignitie, as he caused this poore Towne to be burnt. An vnworthie reuenge off so great a Monarke, who should hold it the greatest reuenge vpon his enemies, to pardon when he may reuenge. The Duke of Bourgogne in all this confusion, did not forget to seeke for goodly moueables, wherof there was abundance. He carried away that goodly clocke, and that exquisite tapistrie, which is now at Dijon in the Kings house.

The Gantois seeing their ruine; fle to Richard King of England: they choose Francis Arteuile, one of their Citizens for their head, and renew the league of white caps, more obstinately then before, being resolute to die, rather then to trust their Earle, to whom they imputed the cause of all their miseries, the which had continued fise yeares, and deuoured two hundred thousand men. So fatall are ciuil dissensions betwixt the Lord and his subiects. Lewis their Earle hauing laboured to settle his affaires both by the French and English, against the Gantois, feeling daily the inconueniences of this rebellious people, as thornes in his sides, fell into such a melancholie, as he died, leaving his whole estate much troubled, to his sonne in law, Philip Duke of Bourgogne, who being farre engaged in his father in lawes quarrell, was nothing pleasing to this his people.

The warre was renewed, both by practises of the English, and by the meanes of Arreman, the head of that faction, who hauing tasted the sweet of popular command, desired nothing more then to maintaine this diuision: but there fell out a sodaine accident, which pacified all this great trouble, as a little raine doth a great winde. Two citizens of Gant (whose names deserued well to be registred in this history) discoursing one day of their common miseries, and noting the true causes of these calamities within their city, as feeling the wound, they sought the meanes to cure it, the which had continued so long, and cost their miserable country so deere. The Kings pleasure, and the Duke of Bourgognes, must be knowne: they were not ignorant of the peoples humour, being very wearie of so many miseries.

pacifie Gant.

Their enterprise was not without exceeding danger, by the absolute authority of three or foure, who had most credit with the people, being susceptible of any mischief, when they are thrust forward with a shew of good. It was requisite in the managing of so important a businesse to vse wisdom and secrecy, vntill the foundation were well laied: and for the execution thereof, there needed one which had both credit and authority with both parties. The God of peace presented one vnto them, which governed this action discretely, John Delle, a gentleman of Gant, but bred vp in the court of France. Hee that seekes peace, findes it. This Delle goes to the King, and Duke of Bourgogne, he laies open his peace, and is well entertained. He returns with a good answere, both by letters of credit, and priuate instructions, to the Gantois. At his returne the matter is so well furthered by those two citizens (who were in great reputation with the people) as without the priuity of Arreman, or the English Negotiators, the banner of Flanders (the signall of their popular power) is follemlly planted in the great market place. All the people flocke thither, where hauing signified vnto the chiefe Magistrats, that they would haue peace, and obey the duke of Bourgogne their Prince; Deputies are appointed with power to negotiate and conclude a peace with him. This was effected after a long confusion, to the content, both of the Earle and Flemings. Of a light beginning, God performs a great worke, when it pleaseth him. Thus the duke of Bourgogne pacified Flanders in the yeere 1384. when as hee feared greatest tumults by meanes of some seditious persons: to whose great grieve a peace was proclaimed throughout all the Estates of Flanders, which gaue an incredible content to all the people after so many miseries.

Peace in Flanders.

Now King Charles grew great, and although hee were but sixteene yeeres of age, yet was he desirous to marry. The duke of Aniou his vnckle, according to the aduice which King Charles the wife had giuen on his death bed, thought good to seeke him out a marriage in Germany, in the house of Bauaria, to counterballance the credit of the Emperour Maximilian, no friend to the house of France, what shew soeuer he made. Hee therefore marrieth with Isabel the daughter of Stephen duke of Bauaria, a princeesse from whom they expected much good: but she brought infinit troubles to France, as we shal see hereafter. Thus mans wisdom is deceiued, when as he hopes for best: that God might be knowne for the author of all good, both in the family and State. This imperious Proserpina, verified the prouerbe, That a woman raiseth, or ruines a house. She had almost ouerthrowne the State. But shortly there shal an Italian woman be ioyned to this Germaine, to augment the confusions of this reigne, reasonable good in the beginning, but very miserable in the end. This yeere likewise concluded a peace in Brittain, after many troubles, John of Montfort hauing renewed his homage to the King, and sworne fealty, which shall not long continue, to the great prejudice of the King and his realme.

Charles marrieth with Isabel of Bauaria.

Peace in Brittain.

Charles sends men and munition into Scotland.

The truce was continued in shew betwixt France and England, but with no more loue of the two Kings, then betwixt capitall enemies, who sought to annoy one another by new attempts. Charles hauing pacified Flanders and Brittain, resolues to be reuenged of Richard, who had sought all meanes to annoy him in either province, besides the ordinary brauadoes hee gaue him within the heart of his realme. Hee therefore sends a thousand men at armes to David King of Scots, and threescore ships well appointed with furniture to arme twelue thousand men of his country, vnder the command of John of Vienne, Admirall of France.

A France. Their entry into Scotland was pleasing, but the Scottishmen grew soone discontented with our men, either through their fault or ours, they accusing vs of insolency and insolence, and we them of barbarousnesse and cruelty to their friend a stranger, who came to succour them.

This diuision caused David to make a peace with Richard, and our Admirall of Vienne to returne speedily home with his Frenchmen: but not without obseruing the manners, strength and commodities of this Island, diuided into two kingdomes. And least hee should seeme to haue made a fruitlesse voiage, yeelding an account vnto the King of what hee had done, scene and learned in Scotland, hee lets him vnderstand, that the strength of Scotland consisted but in five thousand horse and thirty thousand foote halfe armed. And that of England in eight thousand horsemen, and 60000. foote men. This relation (were it true or false) gaue aduice to assaile the King of England in his owne country, where he might be vanquished with more facility then abroad, the which so moued the minde of this yong prince (transported with the great harmes suffered with such indignity by the English) as it was easie for the duke of Bourgogne whom it much concerned to haue the English molested, being often disquieted by them in his country of Flanders, to perswade the King to undertake this warre. Opportunity did likewise seeme to inuite him, for that the duke of Lancaster (pretending right to the realme of Castile by his wife) had exhausted England, both of men and money, and the Gantois being pacified, all Flanders would be held in subiection by this check.

Charles resolues to make warre in England.

The Regent acquainted with the duke of Bourgognes humour being his brother (who for his priuate interest would hazard the whole) and noting the eminent dangers in the Kings person (who would imbarke himself in this action) the great want of money, the peoples exclamations, the great danger of tumults by the great exactions which must be made, and in the action it selfe, the inconueniency so apparent to any one that would open his eyes, the impossibility of so great an enterprise, to assaile a great King (so oft a Conquerour) within his owne Realme, not holding any land there; hee was vtterly against it, yet he spake soberly, least he should offend the King, who greatly affected it.

Lewis Earle of Touraine the Kings brother (who soone shalbe duke of Orleans) the Count Cliffon, the Earle of Saint Pol, the Lord of Coussy, and others in whom Charles had most trust, had beene so perswaded by the Duke of Bourgogne, as they had nothing else in their mouths, norhing founded in this yong Princes eares, but the necessity, profit, honour and facility of this voiage. What my Liege (say they) are you lesse then the King of England? shal the French yeeld to the English in valour, courage or force? what an indignity is it to haue this people alwaies at our gates, to nourish them in our bosomes, and to furnish them with armes to beat vs? what a benefit will it be to take their nest from them and leaue them no place of retreat? The Countries of Guienne, Normandy, Picardy and Flanders, are wholly yours. How much doth that import for the honour of your Maiesty, and the good of your Realme, to returne them their owne, who haue so often defeated your armies, taken your ancestors, spoiled your Estate, braued it in your towns, and besieged your chiefe city of Paris? As for the facility of the execution, who sees not but you may effect it if you please? The Saxons conquered England with a handfull of men, farre from their owne home and with small meanes, and William the Conquerour with his sword alone. And you my Liege hauing a realme full of men, victuals and money, euen at your enemies gate, shall not you preuaile? England opens her armes vnto you: your Realme inuites you, which without doubt will employ both heart and purse for so great and generous a designe, the which imports both the honour and quiet of your Maiesty.

Such and like speeches they did continually buzze into Charles his eares, but from his Chamber they were published in the Court, and so throughout the whole realme, as that which pleaseth the King doth commonly please all. The designe was to be wished against a capitall enemy of the State, and the proceeding had a faire shew. At the generall instance of all the French, the King decrees in counsell, to leauy a great army, for the voiage of England: letters are sent out to all parts, subsidies, taxes, loans imposed, greater then during the imprisonment of King John, but all was shadowed with this reason. That they must endeavour once for all, to roote out the English, who vndermined this Estate and sought sought to ruine it. This decree was put in execution with great applause of all men, as if France had laied new foundations of her greatnesse, both to warrant it selfe from danger at hand, to haue a reuenge of former losses, and to build a new Estate at the cost of the common enemy of the French nation. The Navy is prepared at Scuse and Blanbergue to the great content of the Flemings. They armed foure hundred eighty seuen ships for war, with an infinite quantity of victuals the which came from all parts like to a flowing streame. The nobility strues who shalbe best appointed. Strange Princes are inuited. The King of Spaine (then a friend to our King) the Earle of Sauoy, the dukes of Saxony and Bauaria send men. Our princes will not yeeld one to another in costly shewes: they adde superfluous curiosity to necessity. They paint and gild their shippes, all glisters with goodly ensignes, pennons, banners, standards and streamers. The masts painted with rich grounds shining with leaues of gold, gaue notice to all men, that they went not onely to a certaine victory, but to some ioyfull nuptials. But all this feast was made without any reckoning with God, who laughs from heauen at these ants, that strue to climbe without a ladder, and at princes, who made these brauadoes at the poore peoples cost, who remembred not that God hath a souereigne court, and a register to controll their actions, and to oppose against their vanities. The army was prepared in two places, in Flanders, and in Britan. It consisted of twenty thousand Knights and Squires, as many Genouois archers on foote, and fise hundred men at armes Britains, vnder the command of the Constable Cliffon, who was with the fleet in Britan. They had a care safely to lodge this great army after their descent in England, expecting with safety the variable euent of warre, against a King and people, whom they came to fight with, on their owne dunghill. To preuent all inconueniences, they build a great frame or engine (some attribute this inuention to the Constable Cliffon, others to John of Viennne, Admirall of France, who had laide the first plot of this enterprise) like to a towne of warre, with towers, bastions, bulwarkes, flankes and other defences, according to the manner of that age. There was a lodging for the King and his court, according to the degrees of princes, officers and noblemen of marke: lodgings for the chiefe of the army, according to their quarters, and space to set vp their tents and pauillions, halls and common places for the munition and victuals which followed the army, and to conclude, conuenient roome to imbattell a great number of men of warre.

This inclosure or frame was round, and made of many peeces with admirable art, and so great abundance of stufte, as if they had cut downe a whole forest: it was finished with wonderfull speed, by the great number of workemen which came from all parts. To the men, ships, victuals, and this engine, the Kings court gaue an extraordinary beauty, beeing accompanied with the Dukes of Lorraine and Bar, the Earles of Sauoy, Armagnac, Geneue, Saint Pol, Longueuille, Eu, Daulphin of Auvergne, the Lord of Couffy, Maister William of Namur, with all the great Barons of France, and an infinite number of braue nobility who imbarkeed themselves more willingly then in the voiage to the holy land. Thus was the preparation made in France for England, where they remained in great perplexity, to see so great a storme ready to fall vpon them. They prouide the best they can, first by deuotion, (hauing recourse vnto God) then they fortifie their portes and all passages with great diligence, both with men of warre and all sorts of incombers, to helpe those places which nature had made of hard acceffe in this Island. They say that Richard leauied a hundred thousand foote, and ten thousand horse, which was not answerable to the Admirals relation, the first Architect of this ridiculous attempt. But thus are princes oft times abused, imbarkeing themselves in dangerous actions without reason, whose ends are not answerable to their beginnings.

All was ready in the end of September: the King had prouided for the gouernment of the realme in his absence, leauing his brother Lewis Earle of Touraine, assisted with the Duke of Berry his vnckle, and the bishop of Beauvois his chancellour. Thus he parts from Paris, and comes to Scuse with great speed, to recouer the time lost. The Regent should not abandon his person in so long and important a voiage, but hee staies behind the King promising to follow presently, but his meaning was to bring this enterprise to nothing. The King beeing arriued, the houres of stay are tedious, hee tels the minutes, and complains of the time lost: hee sollicites his vnckle to come by sundry letters, and sends post after post,

A hee stamps, he chafes by reason of his stay. The whole Court is of the same humour. The Duke of Aniou answers the King, that hee will part to morrow, but hee staies at Paris to make good chere at leisure, of purpose to draw on winter, to make the voyage impossible, and so to ouer-throw the action, the which was neuer pleasing vnto him, either for that it was pleasing to the Duke of Bourgongne his brother, and so to crosse him, or for that hee held it preiudiciall to the King and his realme.

B But seeing himselfe prest by importunity, and impatient letters from the King, hee parts from Paris, and the same day the Constable Cliffon wayes anchor at Lantriguer in Brittainne, with this great Towne of wood, and seuentie two ships of warre, meaning to ioyne with the whole body of the army at Scuse: but it fell out contrary to his desseigne, and other-wise B then the facility of his supposed victory had represented vnto him.

For hauing run his course towards Flanders, to take port at Scuse, behold a contrary wind casts him vpon the coast of England, where (notwithstanding all the diligence of his Mariners) his fleet was dispersed into diuerse parts, three ships (wherein this great Engine was) are driuen into England, and runne on ground at the mouth of the Riuer of Thames. Behold our Argonautes as much amazed to see them selues taken in a weire, as the English were glad, who with ioy and admiration see them selues possessed (beyond all hope, and without any paine) of that which had cost their enemies so much to ruine them. These newes sie speedily to King Richard, who commands this great booty to be brought vp the riuer vnto him, whether all the Country flockes to so strange a spectacle, and euery one holds it for a presage of good successe, to haue taken their City, which should haue taken C them. An other part of the Fleet is driuen into Zealand, and the Constable of Cliffon with the rest arriues at Scuse, much amazed at this first disaster.

All their ioy of an assured victory is conuerted into a generall feare, least some new losse should follow this vnfortunate beginning. But whilest this amazement troubled most of the French, the Duke of Bourgongne and those of his faction (who desired the performance of this voyage at any rate) made these difficulties light, as common accidents which should not hinder great enterprises, the which cannot be executed without some crosses, for the which they must seeke a remedy and not dispaire: Hee had perswaded the King againe, D easie to be drawne to what he desired. Herevpon the Regent arriues, who (seeing the King, resolved to imbarke) vales his maske, speakes plainly, and tels the King in his Counsell, That he will neuer consent hee should expose his person and estate to the hazard of the sea, of weather, and of war, and vpon an aduice which seemed apparently false: being most certaine that the King of England had assembled about a hundred thousand fighting men. That these first losses were aduertisements from heauen to bridle those vaine hopes, which are sooner conceiued then brought forth. He had alwayes sufficiently declared, that it was not his aduice, yet for that he would not seeme to contradict the Kings will, and crosse such as gaue him this counsell, as honorable to himselfe, and profitable to his Realme, he would not rashly oppose him selfe. But seeing now that God spake, hee did open his mouth the more boldly, bearing in his heart a faithfull zeale vnto the Kings seruice, and the good of E the State. That shortest errors being best, it were better to retire in time, then to make an absolute shipwrack of the Kings person, and the honour and good of the Realme, too much dismembred by former afflictions. This check from heauen which God had sent, Winter, and the feare of worse, made the Regents aduice to bee allowed, both by the King and his counsell, who changed opinion for their voyage to England. So this great enterprise was disappointed, being very preiudiciall to the poore people, who endured the warre than their enemy should haue felt, by an vnseasonable and excessiue charge.

I haue quoted this action in the yeare one thousand three hundred foure score and one, vnder the Regency of the Duke of Aniou. I know some attribute it to the Duke of Berry, but I haue followed the first opinion, vpon the relation of true Authors, and as it shall appeare by the progresse of this report most likely. This action was the cause of seditions at Paris and Rouen, bred without doubt by the discontent of this bad gouernment: for this great thew so incensed the people (being weary and griued to haue borne so great a burthen for so vaine an enterprise) as they rise at Paris, Rouen, Amiens, Poitiers, Lions, and many other Citties, by this new occasion which presently succeeded the first folly.

Naples offered to the Regent.

The Regent was blamed by the people, to haue beene too slack in his opposition against this preparation for England, and the chiefe in Court hated him for being so hasty, for that hee was the onely staie thereof. Thus ill thought of by both, he was maligned of all hands. It chanced the realme of Naples was offered vnto him by Queene Joane and Pope Clement the seuenth. This was his whole desire, but he must conquer it by dint of sword. The title onely was offered him, both by her that might giue it as being heire, and by him that might confirme the donation as being Pope. All the Kings counsell (being weary of the Regents command) wished to see him gone, but they must flie to the people for money; the which was hard to get, as experience did witnesse.

Presently as they heere talke at Paris of a new imposition (although they sweetned these bitter pilles with the goodly name of subsidies) all the world begins to crie out, and from Paris this bruite flies through the whole Realme. The people runne tumultuously to the Greue, they desire the prouost of Marchants to bring them to the Regent, the which he de-laies from day to day by excuses, but in the end hee cannot retaine them. A great multitude runnes to the Regents lodging, they giue him to vaderstand, by their prouost, into what extremity they were brought, and vrge the late superfluous expences. To what end then (say they) serues a new warre to conquer a new kingdome in the ayre with the ruine of the widow and the Orpheline? This was not decreed, nor practised by the good and wise King Charles, wherevnto he had bound his sonne, who should not suffer the memory of his fathers ashes to bee taxed with this dishonour. The Chancellour Dormans speaks at the Regents request, hee laies before their eyes the necessity of this voiage whereby both the King and realme might reape profit and honour, promising the King should prouide for the reliefe of the people. This was gently put off, to make them loose this humour in diuiding them, but the people continue more obstinate, they require a plaine & resolute answer to their demand, so as the next day, they come in troupes before the Kings lodging, where the whole counsell was assembled with the Regent.

The King giues audience to the prouost of Merchants in the peoples name, who deliuer the same complaints. Then John de Marais an aduocate in parliament, an eloquent and popular man, prepared carefully for the purpose, makes a goodly and artificiall oration to diuert the people from this bitterness, laying before them their duties, the necessity of the Kings affaires, and the good which should redound by the enterprise of this forraigne warre. He omitted nothing of the office of a good Orator, but he preuailed not, for the people going from thence, without respect of the King or his counsell, runne presently to the Lewes, Lombards, and such other Marchants houses as had been accustomed to gather all publike exactions, they breake vp their shops and counting houses; they take away what was good, and ill intreate all such as they meet of that profession, yet they kill no man in this first tumult. The Regent winking at this insolency, and fearing least it should encrease by mouing the people already in choller, thinks it best to referre the matter to an other time, vntill the fume of this bitter discontent were blowne ouer, aduertisements coming from all parts of the realme, that the cities grew into the like humour.

But all this dissuades him not from his enterprise; he employs all such as he thinks fit to winne the people. John de Marais, Peter de la Riviere, James Andelle and such like Tribunes, who seemed to bee in credit with the people, in shewing themselves affected to the common good. And to loose no time, he prepares his army, being resolute to leauy this imposition by force, whatsoeuer it cost. The farmers of this leauy, haue charge to begin it. A Collector at the Halles requiring a denier from a poore woman, for a basket of herbs, shee crying out, a great troupe flocke about this collector and teare him in peeces.

But this is not all, in this tumult all runne together on heapes: Porters, Pedlers, Carters, Butchers, Tauerners and such like, the scumme of the baser sort, they goe in troupes to the towne-house, they breake open the doores, and take such armes as they finde. By the constables command they had made beetles or axes to arme their men withall, they take them, and so vse them, as this sedition was afterwards called, by the name of Mait-totins. Being thus armed, they goe to the Farmers lodgings, beate downe the doores, breake open cofers, cubberds and counting houses, they drawe forth their bookes and papers, they teare and burne them, they take away money and mouables, and in the end they

A. they kill and massacre all the farmers they can finde, searching all corners of their houles. They crie that one had saued himselfe in Saint James church at the Butchery, they runne thither, and murder him holding the Image of the blessed virgin in his armes. Some saue themselves in Saint Germain Abbay, where they are presently besieged. But whilest that some labour after this siege, the rest runne to the prisons of the Chasteler and Fourl' Euef- que where they release the prisoners and arme them. They bethinke themselves of a head, there was a very sufficient man in prison named Hugh Aubriot, who in former times had beene Prouost of the Marchants, and had with honour executed great charges, both in the Treasury and State, but for certaine dislikes of the vniuersity, (which was then in great cre-

B. on promise to be their leader, but being at liberty hee slips away and retires wisely to Didoe flie as plagues in a common-weale. This rable finding themselves countenanced by the departure of Aubriot, and recalling themselves from this phrensie, their hearts faint and euerie one bethinkes himselfe how to yeeld an account of that which had changed, all this zeale of publike good vanishing away with the consideration of priuate danger. Such as had most to loose (finding themselves actors in these insolencies) seeke for counsell of John de Marais a popular Aduocate, intreating him to bee intercessor for them vnto the King. The Vniuersity is also requested to employ their credit with the prouost of

C. Marchants and other notable citizens, which were not guilty of these phrensies.

There is a number chosen to goe to the King, and to sue for pardon. These deputies, in their habits, countenances and words shew the greatest sorrow that may bee, for an offence committed. John de Marais is their aduocate, the King hauing heard them, sends them away, vntill his counsell had aduised what answer to make: who decrees, That for punishment of this popular insolency, the City of Paris should pay a hundred thousand francs, and the heads of this sedition (with such as had broke the prisons, should be at the Kings discretion.

This decree is deliuered to John de Marais to make knowne vnto the Parisiens, in whose name hee had spoken to the Kings counsell. Hee acquaints them with the Article for the fine, and conceales the punishing of the Authors of this sedition: whether it were by commandment, or otherwise, the history makes no mention: yet hee kept their heads and his owne for the scaffold, as wee shall presently see, to reape the deferred punishment for dealing in these dangerous affaires, and to pay a deere interest of their popular brokerage. The Parisiens tamed by this reprehension, pay the hundred thousand francs, as a fine for their folly, and the whole taxation imposed for the warre of Naples, without any question.

These summes are giuen to the Regent for his voiage into Italy, where his bretheren, the Constable of Clifton and the greatest part of the council wished him, rather then in France (the Chancellour Dormans onely excepted, who soone shall reape the frute of his departure) notwithstanding any shew they made him, to see him in so good a way to settle his greatness. Hee parts from Paris taking an honourable leaue of the King, of his bretheren and of the whole Court, leauing the Regencie to the Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne vntill his returne. But taking the way of Italy, hee takes the way of much paine, and the Rendez-uous of death, which soone swallows vp both his life and all his desires. His army was goodly, some say thirty thousand horse and an infinit number of foote: others thirty thousand men without specifying horse or foot, but all agree that hee went to the conquest of this realme, not onely well accompanied but also well furnished with siluer, the necessary sinewes of a long warre. They gaue out, that it was the Treasor of Charles the fifth, the which he caused Sauoy to deliuer in the beginning of his Regency.

The order of the History commands mee now to set downe the titles of the Realme of Naples, for the which our Lewis of Aniou marcheth into Italy with his army, and the success of this voiage. VVee haue said, that Charles (brother to the King Saint Lewis) Duke of Aniou and Earle of prouence by his wife Beatrix, was called to the Realme of Naples by Pope Vrbain the fourth, and conquered the possession by his sword, hauing defeated Man-froy and Conradin of Sueuia.

That hee was dispossessed of Sicilia at the Sicilian Euen-song, by Peter of Arragon, sonne in law to Manfroy, fauoured by Nicholas the fourth taking from Charles what his predecef. A for Vrbain had giuen him, fo as after hee had contended long with Peter of Arragon, the realme of Naples remained vnto him, leauing it to his children with more trouble then content. This Charles of Aniou brother to Saint Lewis, had many children, Charles, Robert, Lewis and Philip. Lewis furnamed the Lame, married Mary daughter of Stephen King of Hongary. Charles Martell had two fonnes, Lewis and Andrew, Lewis was prince of Durazzo or Dirrachium, and Philip prince of Tarentum. All appeered on this Theater in some fort, but Robert second sonne to Charles, was King of Naples, and Earle of Prouence: he had one sonne named Charles, who succeeded him in these two Estates, and hee had but two daughters, Ioane and Marguerite.

Ioane as the eldest, was Queene of Naples and Contesse of Prouence, and was married to B Andrew brother of Lewis King of Hongary; a loose and an audacious princeesse, who slew her husband (as wee haue said) and married with Lewis sonne to Philip Prince of Tarentum, her cousin, against all order. Lewis King of Hongary, sonne to Charles Martell, comes to Naples, to reuenge the murder and adultery of this mastiue bitch: who flies with her incestuous husband into Prouence, yeelding him the free possession of the city of Naples, and that of the greatest part of the realme, some places remayning in Apulia, in the gard of certaine captaines, oonfident seruants vnto Ioane, who were the meanes to put her againe speedily in possession of that Estate, soone wonne and soone lost. It is manifest that the inuestiture of the realme of Naples belongs to the Sea of Rome. Lewis King of Hongary C being victor, hauing performed the duty of a good brother, and done all hee could against this vilanous murtheresse, returnes home, leauing all his new conquest to the disposition of Pope Clement the sixth a Limosin, then resident in Auignon.

Ioane means to recouer Naples.

Ioane who was neere vnto him, and to whom Auignon (where the Popes had now long held their Sea) belonged, had no great labour, for yeelding Auignon vnto him shee reco- uered Naples, both by the Popes fauour (who had the chiefe authority, as also by money, wherewith shee did both winne the Gouernors of places most easie to corrupt, and also leuied an army to force them that were most affected to the King of Hongary. Now shee is settled againe in the realme of Naples, with her adulterer Lewis of Tarentum, who suruiued not long after this exploite of Naples and the sale of Auignon. After his death shee marries presently with James of Arragon Duke of Calabria of whom shee was soone wearie, falling in loue with Otho of Brunswike, a young Germaine Prince, of a good house, but not of ability to support Ioane, so as shee held him not as a husband, but vsed him as a Stallion. Amidst these alterations of Naples, the Sea of Rome, was not quiet, for after the death of Pope Gregory the eleuenth, who retired from Auignon to Rome, the Colledge of Cardinals fel to a horrible contention for the Popes election: the Romans beeing resolute to haue one of their owne nation, and the French one of theirs, from whence sprong that strange Sichisme whereof we shall speake.

Vrbain the sixth, was chosen at Rome, after the decease of Gregory the eleuenth, and the French Cardinals yeelded to this election, but for that they said they had beene forced by the Romans, who had them in their power and threatned to kill them, vnder colour to change the aire, hauing obtained leaue to goe to Anagnia, they retire to Fundi, a City of the realme of Naples, fauoured by Queene Ioane, French by stocke and humour, and there they choofe Clement the seuenth for Pope, to oppose him against Vrbain. Clement retired to Auignon, and Vrbain keepes at Rome.

A Schisme in
the Church.

Two Popes, two Seas, two Factions, which trouble all Christendome with horrible confusions. Clement seekes to fortifie himselfe, and as France held for him, so did hee labour to haue Naples wholie at his deuotion, by reason of the neerenesse, much importing for the city of Rome, where the chiefe quarrell was debated. Contrariwise Vrbain the sixth to be reuenged of Ioane (a partisan to Clement the seuenth his enemy) hath recourse to Lewis King of Hongarie the first interested, being brother to him whom this strumpet had slaine, that hee might oppose the same scourge which had already corrected her. But Lewis excusing himselfe by his age, and the infirmity of his body, sent him Charles issued from that Lewis Prince of Durazzo, who wee sayd, was sonne to Charles of Aniou, seeking e- uen in the race it selfe, a man to punish this wicked woman, giuing him a goodly army to that

A that end. Lewis seeing this great storme ready to fall on her, flies to Pope Clement the se- uenth, and by his aduice adopts our Lewis Duke of Aniou, of whom we now treat.

Lewis hauing prepared his army, and beeing crowned King of Naples and Sicile by Pope Clement the seauenth in Auignon, hee lands at Naples, to take possession of the realme, wherevnto the lawfull heire and the Popes authority did call him. But hee came too late, for Charles of Durazzo (being parted from Hongarie with his army, and happily landed,) entred the Country, ouer-came Otho, the pretended husband of Ioane, and holding him prisoner, hee forced this miserable woman to yeeld vnto his mercy, the which was to cruell a death as her life had beene execrable. Notwithstanding all these difficulties, Lewis B of Aniou (thrust forward by his owne ambition,) proceeded: hauing giuen such order to his affaires (after the adoption, made by Ioane in his fauour, and the Popes coronation) as hee procured all the Captaines of places to hold for him, hauing ingaged them by money and golden promises, so as many places held good for him: and the people desired him, being glad to be freed from Ioane, and to haue so mighty a Lord, to maintaine them in peace.

taken and smothered.

Lewis enters the realme of Naples: at the first he winnes Tarentum and Beri, but whi- left he determines to proceed in his desseignes, death surpriseth him, making an end of his infinit ambition and of all his toyles; but not of his childrens, Lewis and Charles, nor of C their posterities. Thus Charles Prince of Durazzo, of the race of Aniou (called the Hon- garien, for that hee had beene borne and bred in Hongarie, and brought vp by King Lewis) remained peaceable King of Naples, leauing two Children, Ladislaus and Ioane, who shall prepare a new stage, whereon our Princes shall soone play their parts, as you shall vnder- stand. Let vs now returne to France: The Duke of Anious departure put all authority in- to the hands of the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne, who began to manage the affaires of State at their pleasures. There was no great loue betwixt them, although they were bretheren, but onely to maintaine them-selues against such as might hinder their ambitious proiects. And for that they had knowne the Chancellor Dormans, to bee wholly affected to the Regent, they perswaded the young King to dismishe him, for some reasons, the which are D not specified in the Hiltory. But Princes want no colours when they will disgrace their ser- uants. Peter Orgemont was appointed in his place, after the seale had remained some time in the hands of Robert of Corby first president of the Court of parliament of Paris, and of Philip Moulins a Chanoine of the sayd city. But Flanders (which alwaies bred some mon- in that age) stirred vp by the English, and puffed vp by the ridiculous conclusion of this great and vaine preparation, began new troubles, and had practises with them of Paris, to draw the rest of the cities of the realme into some popular league. These newes put the King into great perplexity, the rather for that he had surprisid certaine letters from the Maillotins of Paris, to the white caps of Gant, to make a correspondency betwixt them, the accustomed Leuaine of rebellion with ill aduised people.

The Chancel-
disgraced.

E As these things amaze both the King and his vnclcs, behold Richard lands at Calais, with an army vnder the command of the duke of Lancaster, who at the first spoiles Picardy, and then plants himselfe before Ypre, and besiegeth it. The Gantois had made a good shew, both to the King, and Duke of Bourgogne, vntill that time, seeming resolute to ob- serue their former accord: but the English army beeing entred into Flanders, they goe to field, and ioynce with them before Ypre. The Kings vnclcs muste men in all places with great diligence, and intreat their neere friends to come speedily to their succour. The Dukes of Lorraine and Bar make hast, the Duke of Britan comes with a goodly troupe. They haue sodenly assembled twenty thousand Frenchmen at armes, besides the succors of Lorraine and Britan, the number of foote is not specified.

The English

F Charles (thus accompanied) comes to Saint Denis in France and hauing taken leaue of the Martyrs (according to the ancient custome of Kings) and giuen the foreward of his ar- my to the leading of the Constable Ciiffon, and the Duke of Britan (the Constable march- ing before the Duke, by reason of his place) the ground of a dislike fell out betwixt them, which being nourished by diuers occasions, shalbe the subiect of a great defaister both for the King and realme.

Charles makes a truce with
the English.

The King followed (accompanied with the Dukes of Berry, Bourgogne and Bourbon) his vnclcs, and the Dukes of Lorraine and Bar: hee lodgeth at Blandelle, two leagues from Cassel, with an intent to charge the English, who presently leaue the siege of Ypre, Cassel and Grauelins, and retire to Bergues, where Charles presently besiegeth them. The English demand a parle with the Duke of Britan, they put him in minde of the benefites hee had receiued from their nation, and demand requitall in this occurrent. The duke of Lancaster remaines at Calais, by reason of his weaknesse: the English captaines require respite to vnderstand his pleasure.

In the end the King receiues them vpon honest conditions, to depart with bagge and baggage and to leaue Flanders, the which they performe. Being returned into England, they are accused to haue sold the Earldome of Flanders to the French, so as by Richards command they are beheaded. The Gantois made a dutifull answere, and promised obedience and loyaltie to the King. A truce was concluded for one yeere with the English, by meanes of the Duke of Lancaster for King Richard, and the Duke of Berry for our King Charles. Such was the issue of this sodaine voiage of Flanders, beeing a meane to settle a businesse of a deeper consultation and more dangerous consequence; seeing it concerned not onely the heart, but the whole body of State. They sought how to suppress the sedition, which was apparently bred in Paris, and by their example; in many great cities of the Realme. To this end, Charles vpon his returne from this voiage, staied at Saint Denis with his vnclcs, the constable, chancellour, and his whole counsell: they were all troubled to resolve in so important a cause, for what should they doe? To punish the poore people tired with the warres, threatened with losses, halfe dead by the feeling of so great calamities, that were to beat one lying sicke in his bed for his waywardnesse, and not to cure him of the paine which is the cause thereof. It were a meane to driue him to dispaire, to apply a remedy worse then the disease. And not to punish them, would argue feare, and make them grow more proud and insolent, a meane to animate them to all impunity, and to lay the way open to a disordered rebellion.

But the last aduice preuailed, being wel verified, that since the paiment of the fine, the Parisiens were growne worse, and more bitter: hauing had conference with the Gantois audacious mutines, and the right artisans of rebellion, holding it a vertue to play the madde men against their naturall Lords: and also had so farre abused the Kings bounty, as they had presumed to sollicit the best cities of the Realme to the like disorder. It did greatly import for the good of the Kings seruice and of the State, that such phrensies should bee suppressed by an exemplary punishment done vpon the chiefe authors. John de Marais was very deepe engaged in these tumults, and the more dangerously, for that he cast the stone, and withdrew his arme, and making a shew of seruice to the King, he fed the people in these mad humours, very torches of sedition, vnder a collour of the common-weale: for who can beleeue they would put so famous a person to death without some iust cause. I know they write diuersly, and euery man hath his iudgement free; yet is it not true nor likely, that in pardoning a whole multitude offending, they would punish him in whom there were no shew of offence. If hee were not culpable at the least, hee was accused of that which was the subiect of a publike condemnation.

Charles beeing aduised to punish the Parisiens for the insolencies they had committed in his presence, caused his army to lodge about the city, and on a certaine day he sends for the Prouost of Marchants and the Sheriffes, who come vnto him to Saint Denis, with a countenance full of humility, and shew of amendment. The King gaue them to vnderstand, by Peter Orgemont his Chancellor, that he ment to goe to his city of Paris, to punish the rebels and seditious, who had not respected his presence. The prouost makes answere. That the whole body of the city was wonderfully greeued for that which had beene committed by men in despaire, worthy to be seuerely punished, but the good citizens had no community with these rascalls, and that the whole city was ready to doe him faithfull seruice.

There were many about the King which made all odious that concerned the Parisiens: but Charles made them no other answere, but that hee would bee soone at Paris, and doe what reason and the ducitie of a good King required. Hee causeth his foreward to march, led by the Constable Cliffon and the Marshall of Sancerre, who seize vpon the gates,

A the which they found open without any guards. The King accompanied with the Dukes of Berry, Bourgogne, and Bourbon, with other Lords of his Councell, and an infinit number of Noblemen and Gentlemen in great shew, terrible to the people, marcheth into the Cittie. Being come to Saint Denis gate, he causeth the barres to be beaten downe. The Prouost of Merchants, the Sheriffes, with the chiefe Inhabitants of the Cittie, carrying the keyes, beseech the King to giue them audience: he denyeth them, and passeth on to the house of S. Pol, but the army is disperfed throughout all the quarters of the Cittie. Presently they take away all the chaines, and send them to Bois de Vincennes. They search all houses for armes; the which are instantly carried to the Louure, and the Bastile. The Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne, with the Prouost and his Archers, go throughout the city, causing 300. of the most seditious to be apprehended.

The next day many heads were stricke off at the Halles, and amongst the rest, that of John de Marais, whom all men had heard of late discourse so eloquently with admiration, beeing held for the Oracle of France. These executions were done by fitts, with such a shewe of grauitie, as the seate of Iustice did more terrifie, then the executioners arme vpon the scaffold. A whole day was spent in these slow proceedings, the cittie gates beeing kept so straitly, as no man might issue forth: houses and shops were shut vp, with so great a silence, as if all had beene dead, euery man beeing hidden in his house, or else so amazed as he durst not looke into the streetes. The Vniuersitie (which then was in great credit with the King) becommeth sutor for the people, and beseecheth him not to include the innocent with the culpable. The King answereth coldly, that he would aduise what to do, willing them to retire. In the meane time a great Scaffold is made on the highest staire of the Pallace, before the great image of Philip the Faire, with great shew and pompe: in the midst was a royall throne, and seates on either side.

The Herald giue commandement throughout the cittie in the Kings name, that euery man should repaire to the Pallace at a certaine houre. The King sitting in his seat of Iustice hauing on either side of him, the Dukes of Berry, Bourgogne and Bourbon, his vnclcs, with all the rest of his Councell in order, he commanded Pe. er Orgemont his Chancellor, to deliuer his mind to the people of Paris. The multitude beeing disarmed, compassed in round about with armed men, beeing bare-headed, they fall vpon their knees, seeing Orgemont rise from his chaire: who hauing made a great obeysance to the King, he turnes to the multitude. If thou hadst (quoth he) O Cittie, as much care of thy durie, as thy Kings haue alwaies mildly and fatherly intreated thee, thou wouldest remember the soueraigne bountie and clemencie of our late King of happie memorie, Charles truly wise, who (desirous to tame thy folly and rashnesse by a wife mildnesse) pardoned the strange and cruell errors which thou haddest committed against his father being a prisoner, without any respect, afflicting the afflicted, and supporting his capitall enemy against him, with all trecherie and insolencie. Thou canst not denie, ingratefull people, how much thou wert indebted to that good Prince: duty did bind thee to sacrifice thy selfe cheerefully for him in his afflictions. But all these things being troden vnder foot, he vied towards thee all the humanitie, which the most affectionate and faithfull subiect may hope for of his Prince. His sonne our King seated at this day in the royall throne, and heire to his vertues, hath followed his fathers steppes in this mildnesse and clemencie, hauing supported thee more then a father could doe his child. But thou hast followed (beeing mad and ingratefull) thy wretched disposition, suffering thy selfe to be furiously transported by thy wicked Councillors (the firebrands of sedition and disobedience) and by the vnruely passions of thy blind furie. The goodly worke thou hast made of late, the disloyall intelligences thou hadst with those mutines, enemies of all command & policie: the audacious practises thou hast presumed to make in the Cities of this realm: and the blood which thou hast spilt in the bowels of this thy countrie, whereof she hath horror, feeling her bosome polluted with the blood vniuently shed by thy violent hands. All these horrible and tragick effects are knowne to the world: for the which thou canst yeeld no excuse, which doth not double the offence. O wretched people! be not these authentick testimonies to the whole Realme, yea to all nations, of thy ingratitude, disloyaltie, crueltie, villanie, and fury. Miserable, what hast thou deferred? The Kings bounty? But thou hast treacherously abused it. Thou hast made shew to contemne publike authoritie, drunke with thine owne phrensie speech, to the Parisians.

1387. " phrensie and of thy wicked Councillors. The King, the King I say, shall make thee seele, that A
 " he hath one arme to support and maintaine the good, and another, to punish and roote out
 " the wicked. Thou hast seene examples vpon these wicked heads, which made thee to forget
 " thy duties; but the punishment is light in regard of the offence: neither doest thou seele any " sinart, whereof thou thy selfe art not the cause. Orgemont hauing thus ended, turnes vnto the King. My Liege (with le) is this it which your Maiestie commanded me to say vnto the people. It is (answered the King) but this sufficeth not, in regard of what they haue deserued.
 This short and rough answer from the King, the Chancellors speech, vttered with great vehementie, and especially the bloud freshly spilt, which they did see as it were rebound vpon the place of execution: the fearefull armes wherewith the people were compassed in, had B brought them into extreame perplexitie, like men already in the graue: so as euery one bethought himselfe, according to his offences he had committed: and such as had wealth, according to the enemies which did maligne them, beeing terrified with the tragicke spectacle of Iohn de Marais.

They stand all mute, their eyes fixed on the ground, prostrate before his throne, men and women, young and old, infinite in number. In this great silence the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne rise from their seates with a very mournfull countenance, and fall at the Kings feete, beseeching him to haue pittie of his poore Cittie of Paris, and not to comprehend the innocent with the culpable, good men with rascals vnworthy of his grace. Presently after their speech, without expecting any answer from the King, the sorrow of this miserable peo- C ple, suppressed during these complaints and threats, burst forth into so lamentable a crie, as if the whole cittie had bene lost. All cryed for mercie: there was nothing but cries, lamentations and howlings of women and men, old and young. The Ladies and Gentlewomen of the Cittie, with their heire hanging downe, full of teares, cry out: Lege Lord, will you
ruine your cittie of Paris for some rascals: let it begin by vs and ours, we desire not to suruine this miserie: take pittie (Lege Lord) of your people, who sue for pittie. The people crie out againe with a fearefull voyce; Mercy, Mercy.

The Parisiens
cry for mercy.

This spectacle was pittifull to behold: there was no heart so hard but relented. The King in the end answered, (the noise beeing quieted,) That he would not punish the good for the bad, and that he did pardon the people, vpon condition, they should be better aduised hereafter, and not suffer themselves to be seduced by these wicked ring-leaders of sedition. That for Gods sake, and at his Vncles sute, he gaue life vnto the prisoners, paying such fines as his Councell should decree.
 Those to whom the prisoners belonged, cryed out, God saue the King: and the people freed from their feare, redouble their cries with great ioy, and so they all depart. The Councell decrees, That forasmuch as the Cittie of Paris had bene engaged in this sedition, they should be deprived of their Magistrates, chaines and armes, and should loose all priuiledges vntill the King had otherwise determined. That for recompence of this capital crime, as well the prisoners, as all others guilty of the sedition, according to information duly made, should pay the moitie of their goods. The which was speedily put in execution, to send home the men of warre, by means of the great summes of money which they leuied by this exaction. Thus the sediti- E on at Paris was suppressed, and afterwards at Rouen or Orleans, but with farre more rigor then at Paris. An example for all subiects, how to oppose themselves against their Lords:
 who soone or late make them to reape the fruites of their rashnesse and insolencie. Their Magistrates, chaines, armes, and all priuiledges, were soone restored to the Parisiens, by means of the Duke of Bourgogne, who from that time sought all means to creepe into the peoples fauour, which he and his sonne shall vse no lesse then the Nauarrois had done:
 this happened in the year of our Lord God 1387. in the moneth of December. This iust execution did greatly countenance the young age of Charles, for that in so sollemne an act, he had carried a countenance worthy of a royall Maiestie: His age and the name of a King, made him know that he was a King; together with the daily instructions which did found in F his eares, by his most inward and trustie seruants: yet his Vncles kept him stil in his minori-tie, disposing of matters in counsell by their authoritie. Charles was much discontented with this proceeding of the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne, who should rather haue preuented him, then he them, experience hauing taught all Frenchmen what he was. Hee therefore seekes a remedie for their errour,

He

A He caused a Councell to be held at Rheimes, where it was decreed, That Charles should be free from the government of his vncles: for that both his age and the prooue of his iudgment discreetly plainly that he was worthy to gouerne his realme. This resolution greatly displeased the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne, who would gladly haue held a longer possession of this royall authoritie which they enioyed, beeing discontented with such as had put this spirit into the young King. The Cardinall of Laon (one of the first authors of this Councell) enioyed it not long, for he died (not without suspition of poyson) Iohn of Montague shall pay both principall and interest in his time. Iohn Mercier and the Lord of Noiant shal haue their parts, these shall now enter into quarter, and haue all the credit. It is this Noiant which caused the golden Hart in the Pallace to be made for a modell of that which he would make B of gold, of the Ingots he had gathered together in the Tresurie, hauing reduced the coyned money into this forme, least Charles, a young Prince and very bountifull, should giue it away prodigally. The Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne retire themselves quietly to their houses, making a shew to be very well satisfied, although they hatched a great discontent, and especially Philip, beeing a man of an imperious and insupportable spirit.
 We haue drawne Charles out of his Minoritie, the first parcell of our discourse. Let vs now see his Maioritie, into the which I tremble to enter, foreseeing so happie a beginning to haue so lamentable an end. But alas! what shall we see therein, which we haue not seene in our miserable age. Our experience shall be vnto vs a mournfull commentarie, most true C in the raigne which we are to represent.

The Maiority of King Charles the sixt.

Remarkable in two respects: Of Health, and Sicknesse.

D  E rained thirteene years, either with his Vncles or alone in his good sense, and 29. in phrensie, not ruling but ruled, or rather rauished by the sundrie pasions of others. So we will distinguish his Maioritie, according to the calculation of these two seasons, and in either of them the most famous acts of these home-bred confusions.

The first time of the kings health.

FROM THE YEARE 1388. VNTO 1393.

E  RANCE enioyed a long rest, the tempest of these popular tumults being pacified, Flanders subdued, and the English forced to hold a truce (by reason of their home-bred quarrels, the which brought forth strange effects, as we shall hereafter shew.) Charles then under-tooke the charge of his realme, to gouerne alone, without any Tutors. The flower of his youth, framed to great affaires, and commendable for his milde disposition, promised the fruites of a raigne both wise, moderate, peacefull, and most happie. But oh the vanitie of mans hopes! a dreame of him that wakes, a fruitlesse paine which hunts and gets nothing.
 Being freed from the government of others, hauing absolute authoritie he was desirous F to marrie Lewis his onely brother, and to giue him authoritie: neither would hee abandon his cousins of Aniou, Lewis and Charles in their pretensions to the Realme of Naples. The Estate of Milan did wonderfully import to aduance this action, for the commodities it hath in Italy. To this end he married his brother Lewis with Valentine the daughter of Iohn Galeas Duke of Milan, a marriage which succeeded not according to his desseine, no more then his owne. An Italian woman ioyned with a Germaine, shall make strange worke; to shew, that ill

1389. all is not gold that glisters: for both these marriages were built vpon grounds of apparent good, as farre as humane reason could comprehend, to the end they might haue great intelligences both in Germanie & Italy, alliances which import much for the good of France. Philip of Valois, the Kings brother, and John Duke of Orleans, were dead without children, and the Duchie returned to the Crowne. Charles giues this Duchie to his brother Lewis, who was but Earle of Touraine, and now shall be Duke of Orleans, and by this name shall be much spoken of.

In this profound peace, it was necessary for Charles to make himselfe knowne to his subiects, after so many confusions. He makes a progresse into Languedoc, one of the remotest Prouinces from his chiefe citie, lying vpon the Mediterranean sea, and yet one of the most fertill and best affected to the Crowne. Hee had especial reasons to visit this goodly Prouince, for the great complaints they made against the Duke of Berry their gouernour, who committed great extortions by his officers, vnder colour of authoritie. Charles passeth by Dijon to see his Vncle the Duke of Bourgogne, who accompanies him to Auignon. The Earle of Sauoy comes vnto him, the people of Daulphine and Viuarz shewe a wonderfull ioy to see their King after so troublesome a time. So he comes to Auignon, being kindly receiued and much made of by Pope Clement the 7. who could not stand without him, hauing Vrbain the sixt, for his competitor. The widow of Lewis Duke of Aniou repaired thither, who by the fauour of Charles caused Lewis the 2, her eldest sonne to be crowned King of Naples. This course we must hold for the continuance of our historie.

From Auignon he went into Languedoc to settle his authoritie, the which was much respected by the people of that countrie, but had beene greatly blemished by the gouernment of the Dukes of Aniou and Berry his Vncles, Gouernours of that goodly Prouince one after another. Hee stayes at Montpellier, a Cittie of a goodly and pleasant situation; where he heard many complaints against the Duke of Berry, his Vncle, for his great oppression of the contrie. But the absence of this Prince, and the authoritie of his name stayed the remedie to another season. The Estates of the countrie made sute to haue the Earle of Foix for their gouernour, hauing heretofore liued quietly vnder him; but he would not accept of this gouernement, without the good liking of the Duke of Berry, so as all the punishment fell vpon Betizac his chiefe Treasurer, who was burnt at Beziers, purging in the fire the extortions he had committed vnder his maisters authoritie.

At that time Charles King of Nauarre died, so often blemished in the truth of this historie: we haue noted how he had retired himselfe from Court, into his Realme of Nauarre. As this retreat was vnto him a reprochfull banishment, so this shamefull solitarinesse was a ciuill death. But the Catastrophe of his tragicall life was a famous prooffe, that God doth often reuenge notable sinnes by notable punishments euen in this life. He was much broken by the excesse of venerie, and all sorts of dissolutions, the which he had exceedingly vsed with his wonderfull tyrannie and crueltie. As they did annoint him with medicines fitte to warme and comfort his benumbed members (some say they had chafed him with Aqua-vitæ, and wrapt him in a sheete) behold, fire takes hold of this sheete with such violence, as (being vnable to quench it) he was consumed by degrees, liuing some daies, as suruiuing his paine; and that which increased the horror of Gods iudgement, his death made both great and small to reioyce, and was receiued in France with as great content, as the winning of a great and famous battaile. There was a generall truce betwixt the French and English, so as the garriisons lying still, the souldiers bred vp and nourished in armes, fighting no more by order vnder their ensignes, sought now their prey by disorder vpon the labourer and merchant. The countries of Rouergue, Perigott, Limosin, Auuergne, and La Marche, had English garriisons, who spoiled these countries, and did runne vp into the neereft parts of Languedoc, Velai, Genaudan, Viuarz and Suenes, where the villages are for the most part walled in, to preuent these sodaine incursions. There were many theues amongst them: Teste noire or Black-pate in the Castle of Ventador; Ameriqor Marcel at Roch-Vandais, who breaking the truce, fought to be supported by the King of England, but in the end they all fell into the hang-mans hands, or perished miserably by some strange death, an Image of our late confusions. Libertie had bred vp these warriors with so great abundance, as the English passed the sea to make Turneys, and to fight at barriers, as they vse at great Triumphs.

Notice the Dukes treachery banish.

The tragical death of the Nauarrais.

1389. Aumphs. There was a Tilt set vp betwixt Calais and S. Iaquelvuert, where the Nobilitie made small of their valour, as in a schoole of Fence. To take away this troublesome abundance, they took occasions to make long voyages into Castile and Italy, but in the end there was a very famous one offered against the milcreants of Barbarie, at the Geneuiois request, who suffered many discommodities in their trafficke, by these barbarous Africans. Charles granted them succours willingly, and gaue the charge of this warre to Peter Duke of Bourbon, assisted with the Earles of Auuergne and Foix, the Lords of Coucy, Guy of Tremouille, John of Vienne Admirall of France, Philip of Arthois Earle of Eu, Philip of Bar, Harcourt, Antioing, Linge, Pyquiny, and many other great men from all parts of the Realme, which ranne to so famous an action, vnder so worthy a commander, and at so great leysure, more painfull then the toyle of warre to men that desired nothing but employment. Richard King of England, to imitate Charles, granted succour to the Geneuiois, vnder the command of the Earle of Salisburie, accompanied with many Noble men and English Gentlemen, moued with desire like vnto the French, in the enterprife of this pleasing paine. The Deputies of the Kings of France and England assembled to treat of a generall peace, but not able to effect it, they continue a truce for foure yeares, with goodly prouisions against robberies, for the safetie and quiet of their Estates. Charles gaue free passage to the English, by the Countries of Languedoc and Daulphine, to passe the Alpes safely.

All come to Genoa, to the great ioy of the Geneuiois. Being shipt, they land within fewe daies in Barbarie. Presently they beseege the Cittie of Affricke. So our historie teares it, as bearing the name of all the vast and barbarous countrie. They call the African commanders Agadinquor of Olfierne, and Brahadist of Thunes. But our Argonauts found them which stayed their furie. The Barbarians defended themselves with an obstinate resolution. But their force did them lesse harme then the ayre, and diet, being very contrarie to their complexions, so as our armie decreased daily, especially of men of accompt. This siege continued fixe weekes with much losse and no hope to preuaile. The Geneuiois hauing conceiued a hope of a sodaine victorie, began to grow cold and slacke in furnishing of the armie. The Duke of Bourbon foreseeing the difficulties which might grow in continuing obstinate at this siege, fearing the winter, and not trusting the Geneuiois (who are famous for that they haue no faith) remembering the example of the King S. Lewis, resolved to returne, without any greater losse. He trusteth vp his baggage, and brings backe his troupes into France, continuing the example to all such as are capable of reason, how difficult it is for Christians to performe these strange attempts, after the experience of many ages. The French and English hauing liued louingly together in this voyage, returned to their houses, without doing of any memorabile act, but to haue indeuoured to doe something worthie of memorie, to auoid idleness during so peacefull a time.

Brittaine did then conceiue, and afterwards bring foorth more preiudiciall effects then Barbarie it selfe: and the way was made by light occasions to horrible and monstrous effects, to the great preiudice both of the King and Realme: for a notable testimonie to posteritie, what Councillors enuie and ambition be in a State: we like wretches seeke for peace, and when God giues it, we flie from it, we maligne another mans good, and deprive our selues of our owne. But alas! it were a small matter for a great personage to hurt himselfe by his owne passions, if this poison did not spread abroad to the preiudice of the commonweale. We haue said that John of Montfort remained peaceably Duke of Brittain, by the death of Charles of Blois, and the agreement he made with his widow, whose eldest sonne John of Brittain, Earle of Ponthieure was redeemed from prison out of England by the Constable Cliffon, who gaue him his daughter in marriage and payed his ranfome. The Constable was a Britton, and so a subiect to John of Montfort Duke of Brittain, his antient and capitall enemy, and yet by this new succession was become his Lord.

Doubtlesse in this qualitie Cliffon could not but yeeld vnto him as his vassall, but as Constable of France and deerey beloued of his master, the greatest Monarch in Europe, and Soueraigne to the Duke of Brittain, herein the Duke must needs respect him, his place giuing him authoritie in many notable actions, ouer the greatest personages within the Realme. This was the ground of their hate, which not onely embarked King Charles, Lord vnto them both, but carried him so farre into the maine, as hee could not auoide a notable shipwracke shipwrack by their means. By the former accord, John of Montfort was to yeeld vnto Cliff. A on all his patrimony, whereon hee had seized vnder colour of a confiscation, reuoked by Charles, the which he had not yet performed. And although he had promised the King and giuen him a new assurance, yet did hee not trust the King, but continued his intelligences with the English, fortified his places, and coyned both gold and siluer against the Lawes of State. Hee refused likewise to acknowledge Clement the seventh for lawfull Pope, whom France approoued: not to suffer the Earle of Ponthieure aforesaid to beare the name and armes of Brittain. These were the chiefe causes of their complaints and differences. The King and his most secret Councell, Mercier, Montagu, and la Reuiere held for the Constable.

 The Dukes of Berry, and Bourgongne, and the Chancellour Orgemont, for the Duke of Brittain, a cunning dissembling Prince and high minded. Hee spake proudly, by reason of his intelligence with England, which could not faile him and mildly when as hee found meanes to do his businesse vnder-hand, and not to breake with the King. Hee comes to Tours vnto Charles, where after many discourfes, their quarrels are ended by marriages: the Kings daughter (beeing yet young) is promised to the Dukes sonne, and the sonne of John Earle of Ponthieure (borne of the Constables daughter) to the Dukes daughter, who promiseth likewise to restore Cliffson his lands, in shew friends, but in their hearts irreconcilable enemies. Here vpon Cliffson goes into Brittain to receiue his lands. The Duke held a Parliament at Vannes, whether he called his Nobility. The Constable comes, fearing no enemy: the Duke had built a Castle called the Hermine, where hee feasts the States. The Constable is called, and welcomed with the first: this countenance did not shew what was prepared for the end of the banquet against the Constable. After dinner the Duke taking him by the hand, vnder colour to shew him his building, and to haue his aduise, as of a great Capitaine and well scene in Architecture, hee leads him from place to place, through halls, chambers, and closets, vntill hee had brought him to a great Towre, hauing an Iron doore, wherein were armed men. The Duke enters first, the Constable followes him, as viewing the proportion of this worke, and the thicknesse of the walles by the windowes.
 But behold the Duke slips out of the Towre, where hee leaues the Constable, and shuts the doore after him.

This signe giuen, the armed men seaze vpon the Constables sword, and keepe him prisoner, putting Irons on his legges. The Constable was not so much amazed at this strange vsage, as the Duke reioyced at this sweete content of reuenge, thinking to attaine the full of his desires, to be reuenged of a capitall and cruell enemy, and in the heate of his fury he commands a faithfull seruant of his, called John Baualan, to dispatch the Constable presently. Baualan accepts this charge, but he doth not execute it. Hee goes to the Towre and assures him selfe of the Constables person, retaining the souldiours, whom the Duke commanded to obey him, and so he passeth the night with the Constable. But the night gaue him Councell. The Duke transported with ioy in the heat of his choler, goes to his rest, but care awaked him, and reason (of more force then his passion) lets him know the fault he had committed, and repentance followed this first act. A wise seruant in not obeying his maisters passion. The Duke lying restlesse a great part of the night, riseth early in the morning, calleth Baualan, and demands what is become of the Constable; his passion betrayes his minde before he spake, witnessing the shame he had of his choler, and his griefe for this furious charge. Baualan comforts him, and assures him that the Constable is well.
 The Duke wonderfully glad of this newes, which freed him from so cruell a torment, commands he should be well intreated and with respect, attending newes from the King: from whom there comes post vpon post with complaints and commandements to the Duke.

The Duke without any great delay excuseth himselfe of his imprisonment, and sends the Constable to the King. It had bene more auailable for him to haue suppressed his chol-er, in committing this errour. But hee did verifie; That hee which offends doth neuer forgive. F
 The Constable goes to the King to Blois, hee thanks him for his care in his deliuey: the Duke doth likewise send vnto him, to craue a safe conduct to come him selfe to make his iust excuses, and to shew what reason had moued him to put the Constable in prison.
 The Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne holding openly for the Britton, obtaine leaue for him to come vpon the Kings word. Hee comes well accompanied, and not onely iustifies

A the taking of Cliffson, being his subiect, and in his owne countrey, but also he would haue
 the King beholding vnto him for the respect he bare vnto his officer, whom otherwise hee might iustly haue put to death. It is an easie matter for great men to manage their affaires at their seruants cost. This Constable digested quietly this new affront, being glad to haue recovered his libertie; but the Duke of Brittaines malice shall be the cause of great miserie both to the King and Realme, seeking new deuises to satisfie his choler, a furious beast which can neuer be tamed by flattery. It burst forth vpon a light and ridiculous subiect, which bred a horrible Chaos of sundry confusions.

B Peter Craon a noble man of the Countrey of Aniou, had great credit with the King, and with Lewis Duke of Orleans his brother, who loued him so deere, that he trusted him with his greatest secrets, euen with his amorous passions, whereunto his loose disposition, his age, ease, and Court made him too proane, to the great discontent of Valentine his wife, who exceeding ielalous of her husband, and an Italian, seeking by all meanes to learne how hee was affected, feeling him so cold to her, shee findes no better expedient then to gaine Craon, whom shee handled so cunningly, as shee drewe the worme from his nose.

Hauing speciall aduertisement of her husbands loues, shee threatens the Lady that was beloued, and complains to her husband, naming the reporter. The Duke of Orleans finding himselfe wronged by this disloyall affront done him by Craon, in a very light subiect, C but a prooffe of his rash treacherie, vnworthy of so strict a friendship wherewith he had honoured him, he complained to the King his brother, who loued him exceedingly. Both of them detesting this disloyall rashnesse of Craon, as a trea-herous and an insufficient man, holding him vnworthy of their seruice, dismisst him with great disgrace, refusing to see him or to heare his pretended excuses.

This Craon retires to his house wonderfully perplexed with this disgrace, and finding himselfe not greatly safe, hee retires to the Duke of Brittain his kinsman and deere friend, to whom hee reports his misfortune. The Duke embraceth this occasion, and with a deeper reach, perswades him that the Constable is the cause of this disgrace, making his profit of the passions of these young Princes, and proceeding in his discourse, D (thrust on by the inueterate hatred he bare him) he perswades Craon to kill him, to ridde the world of so pernicious a man: and thereupon offers him his meanes, vpon all occasions.

This was that miserable counsell which hatred and malice gaue him, two bad counsellors:
 for if choller be a short furie, who sees not by the effect, that hatred is a continuing rage, the mother of reuenges, the seede of all miserie to mankind.

As it was simply concluded betwixt them, so was it vainly executed by Peter of Craon.
 He had a house at Paris, whither he findes meanes to send men fit for this murder, and followes himselfe secretly: (an easie matter in this great Forrest of Paris) who knowing the howers of Court, and hauing set spies to obserue when the Constable should goe from the E King at night to his lodging, he attends him with his murderers in a little house where he should passe, and sets vpon him with twentie armed men.

The Constable thinking at the first, that the Duke of Orleans had done it in ieast, made no great regard thereof, but vnderstanding it was Craon, hee defends himselfe, with a great skene (such as they did vsually weare in those daies,) who beeing charged of all sides by these twentie murderers, and crying for ayde, hee saues himselfe (all wounded) in a bakers shop.

The people that were neare, came running at this noise: Craon saues himselfe on horsebacke by Saint Anthones gate, with the greatest part of these murderers: three onely were taken in this disorder.

F The Constable was carried to his lodging called the house of Mercie (it is now the house of Guise, as the Historie obserues) all wounded. The King and Court (disquieted by so audacious an attempt,) are all the night in tumult. These murderers beeing examined confesse, that Peter of Craon had not onely caused them to commit this acte, but was also present at the execution, and so they are beheaded.

The King comes to visit the Constable lying in bed: he doth comfort him, and assures him,

him, that he will not leaue fo execrable an act vnpunished. But in effect this affront so impudently done to his Constable in the bosome of the head Cittie, in the view of all his Court, and in his presence, together with the scorne of his audacious imprisonment, and the patience of Cliffon, who keeping silence, the indignities he had so oft receiued of the Duke of Brittain, pleaded for him, beeing sealed by these outragious wounds. All these things put Charles into such a choller, and made so great an impression in his heart of settled hatred against the Duke, as he was farre more sicke then the Constable himselfe.

Crown condemne ne for attempt ing against
the Constable

King Charles assisted by his Councell, declares Peter of Craon guiltie of high Treason, and enemy to the Crowne of France, hauing attempted against his chiefe Officer, and doth cite him to come and iustifie himselfe speedily. He is called, and (not appearing) is condemned for his contempt: he is declared a banished man, and his bodie and goods confiscate. And in the execution of this sentence, his house at Paris was razed. The Tragedie began by this act, in the yeare, 1393. in the moneth of May, but it shall continue with many other mournfull acts, and shall cause new Scenes vpon this Stage. This sentence thus executed at Paris, it went into Aniou and Brittain. All Craons places and houses were seized on: and put into the Kings hands: and the Duke of Brittain was commanded by the same Commissioners to deliuer him. The Duke of Brittain excuseth himselfe, sweares that hee hath him not in his power: discouers the place where he is: makes offer of all his meanes, for the execution of Iustice: he sends to the King to reiterate his excuses, assuring him, that he was not priuie to this murder. Craon was fled to the towne of Sable in Maine, which appertained vnto him.

Charles (transported with choller) lost both meate and rest, incensed by the Duke of Orleans his brother, and his most trustie seruants, Noyant, Mersier, and Montague, dreaming of nothing more then to be reuenged of the Duke of Brittain, whom he held to be the very cause of this attempt. Such as were of iudgment and without passion, thought no otherwise. But alas! how weake is mans vnderstanding, euen in the best things, wherein there often wants a good proceeding. Charles had great cause to be grieved with the Duke of Brittain, but he should moderate the heate of his choller, by the temper of wisdom, expecting wisely a fit oportunitie to punish, not troubling the quiet of his mind with such violence, in seeking reuenge of his enemy.

We may well say, That Charles had a good cause, but it was ill managed, and the Duke of Brittain a bad, the which he gouerned with policie. Wherein our Charles should haue vsed cunning to crosse his enemies cunning, following the example of his wife father Charles the fit, who vanquished the Nauarrois with patience, and flying the vntempered rashnesse of Iohn his grandfather, who seeking hastily a reuenge of the same Nauarrois his enemy, did thrust himselfe into a mortall prison.

The children are neither heires of their fathers vertues, nor of their happinesse, whose bodies they haue by the will of God, beeing the instruments of their essence, but hee referres to himselfe the soueraignie of vertue and happinesse, to gouerne them in the difficult Labyrinths of this world. The Dukes of Berry and Bourgoigne aduise the King their Nephew to leaue the deciding of this quarrell to the Constable and Craon, and not to attempt any thing against the Duke of Brittain, who disauowed the fact, who feeling himselfe oppressed, would seeke for extraordinarie remedies to defend himselfe, whereby strange inconueniences might ensue.

But the King was resolute at any hand to make warre against the Duke of Brittain. All are sent for, euery man doth march, the Rendez-vous is at Mans. Peter of Craon retires from Sable, whilest this storme riseth: but the King marcheth on, assuring himselfe that hee was in Brittain, although some say that he was in Arragon, and that the Queene of Arragon had giuen him intelligence, that she held a French Knight prisoner at Perpignan, who would not discouer his name. This distempered choller had much impaired the Kings health, who carried in his face the disease of his mind.

His Physitians dissuaded him from this voyage, as most preiudiciall for his health, and the Duke of Brittain by a new excuse, beseeched him to belecue, that he had no dealings with Peter of Craon.

The King could not bee diuerted by all these difficulties, from passing on in this jour-

A journey so wilfully vnderaken by him, although his Vncles found new deuises to stay him, both at Chartres and at Mans, employing his phisicians, to tell him, how dangerous it was to march in Sommer, beeing extreemly hote, considering the debilitie of his health, much impaired since his burning choller, the which had altered all his blood, whereof hee had part by daily feauers. But this passion of choller had so possessed his poore afflicted spirits, that such as were about him, besides himselfe, perceived his grieffe to be the greater, in that he was sensible of what he suffered: and his seruants espyed that which they could not but see in him, by the extreame apprehension they had of the harme which was at hand. Moreover, the Duke of Brittain (to calme this great storme which was readie to fall vpon him, although in truth he had hidden Peter of Craon at Sufmet, and was sorrie that hee had not

Beardel, a very famous man for the integritie of his life: to beseech him to belecue that hee was nothing guiltie of this attempt, neither did he know what was become of Peter of Craon, whom he would send vnto him with his hands and feete bound, if he were in his power. That he should not make warre against his owne Countrie, and against a poore people, which must suffer for another mans folly. In the end, this man pronounceth the threats of Gods iudgement against Charles, if he should proceede vnto warre, so lightly vnderaken against his vassals and subiects, and against the articles of marriage concluded betwixt his daughter and the Dukes sonne, as a seale of their loues. This Bishop was heard in Councel, and the Duke of Berry speaking more boldly then the rest (for the authoritie which his degree and white haire gaue him) laid open all that might hinder this voyage. But Charles stopp his eares to all good counsell, hauing his braine disposed to the distemperature which shall presently seaze vpon him, running headlong into the mischiefe which should afflict him and all France. He parts from Mans in Iuly, (in an exceeding hote day, as the Historie sayes as if all things had conspired to afflict this poore Prince) at nine of the clocke in the morning, to receiue the coolenesse of the greatest heate at Noone-tide, weake in head and mind, distempered with choller, grieffe, despiight and languishing: his bodie wearied with watching and distaste, not able to eate nor sleepe, hauing his head muffled with a great hood of Scarlet, and his bodie couered with a thicke Ierkin of Veluet: (too waightie for a sharpe winter) marching on a sandie plaine, so sealt with the Sunne beames, as the strongest did melt in sweate, and were out of breath. Beeing entred the forest of Mans, behold a man bare-headed and bare-legged, attired in a coate of white rugge, steps sodenly forth betwixt two trees, taking hold of the reynes of his horse: he stayes him, and sayes vnto him, King, ride no farther, but returne backe, for thou art betrayed.

A strange accident befalls
the King.

Charles (whose spirits were otherwise dilled) was amazed at this voyce, and his blood greatly distempered. His seruants runne to this man, and with blowes make him leaue the reines of his horse, and so without any farther search the man vanished. After this accident there presently followes another. Charles and his Noblemen did ride in troupes deuided, by reason of the dust, and he himselfe all alone pensiuie with the pages of his chamber, who were so neere vnto him, as they trod on his horse heeles. He that was neereest carried his helmet vpon his head, and the next his lance, beeing garnished with crimfon silke. As the heate of the Noone day makes men drouisie on horsebacke, it chanced the Page which carried his Lance, (beeing very sleepe) let it fall vpon him which carried the helmet, making a great noise, like the rushing of armes: the King starts with amazement at this noise, and seeing the crimfon banderolle of the Lance, hauing his spirits weakened with the former distemperatures, transported with the imagination of this voyce, sleepe with labour and heat he imagined himselfe to be compassed in with many armed men which pursued him to the death.

The second season, from the time of the Kings sicknesse.

From the yeare 1393. to the yeare, 1422. This time of his infirmities is distinguished into many acts, whereof this is the first Scene, of a long and mournfull Tragedie.

Charles falls
into a phrensie

HVS Charles transported with this phrensie, layes hold on his sword, drawes it, runnes violently after his pages, and cries amaine, At these Traitors. The Pages conceiuing at the first, that he had bene displeased for the disorder of the Lance, flie from him. The King fol- lowes after, doubling his crie. At this noyse the Duke of Orleance runnes towards him, to vnderstand the cause. The King layes at him, not knowing him: the Duke flies, and the King followes. The Duke of Bourgogne rides to him: all gather together with great outcry: Squires and Knights compasse in the king, till that beeing wearied, and his horse out of breath, his most trustie Chamberlain takes hold of him gently behind, and stayes him, chea- ring him with flattering words, and speaking vnto him with that familiaritie that befits a faithfull seruant to a good master. Then all draw neere vnto him, they take his sword from him, they lay him on the ground, and disrobe him of his thicke velvet ierken and his scarlet cap, to giue him breath.

The pitifull
estate of the Court.

A generall consequence of this accident.

His Brother and Vncles salute him: but he knowes them not, neither makes he any shew to moue, being perswade, his eyes troubled, turning vp and downe, mute, sighing, panting, mouing both bodie and head with great amazement. All signes of phrensie appeared in this poore Prince. The Physitians are sent for in hast: they come, but he knowes them not. Bro- ther, Vncles, Lords, Physitians all sigh: all lift vp their eyes to heauen. Teares fall from the Duke of Orleance eyes: he beates his brest and crosseth his armes, he approacheth neere to his poore brother, and he recules from him. All are amazed, all confounded.

O my Country! what trouble shall this poore head giue vnto thy body? but may I law- fully sigh with my Countymen who sighed then, foretelling the miseries that should befall them by this phrensie, as if my selfe had bene (in this disorder) a witness of so great an af- fliction, both to this poore Prince and to his Estate. The Historie doth very fitly set downe the diuers Censures that were giuen of this accident, both at Rome and Auignon (famous places beeing then the seates of Popes) and also in England and in France.

The poore subiects (as men whom it concerned) spake soberly, and with great griefe: some blaming the Duke of Brittain, and Peter of Craon: others the Constable of Clif- son, and Mignons of his chamber, who had drawne the king into this action: but all in ge- nerall lamented bitterly this great disaster. England was amazed at this report, and sorry for it: especially the Duke of Lancaster, who had conferred with our Charles very priuately in the treatie of peace which they had at Amiens. He wept, commending this good and wise Prince, beeing desirous of the good of all Christendome. Rome and Auignon (beeing then banded one against the other, by reason of the Schisme of Antipopes) reioyced at this cala- mity befallen vnto our poore King. Urbain (as his professed enemy) triumphed in his mis- erie, whereinto he said he was fallen by a iust iudgement of God, hauing supported Clement his competitor against him. Clement reioyced, for that he was not fully confirmed in his au- thoritie by him: the King hauing busied himselfe with his subiects quarrells, whereas his greatest charge was to restore the dignitie of the holy See to her auncient beautie. This the Historie obserueth of the Censures of these Antipopes.

But the diuine Oracle saies, O how happy is he that iudgeth wisely of the afflicted, represen- ting an admirable example in the person of Iob, to gouerne themselves discreetly in this

Cen-

A Centures. Iob hath the testimonie of a very good man, and yet he had great afflictions, ha- uing lost goods, children, house and health, tormented by his wife, and not onely abando- ned, but also persecuted by all his friends, in that which was more deare vnto him then his goods and life, his credit, whereof they seeke to depriue him, accusing him that he had liued wickedly like an hypocrite, hauing but the shew of a good man, and not the integritie of a good life whereof he made profession. Such is the vaine iudgement of this world, which holds aduersitie for a vice, and prosperitie for a vertue; measuring things according to their passions, and not with reason, but the truth doth teach vs another lesson. O Lord how great are thy workes, thy thoughts are very deepe, the ignorant man doth not know them, nor the fool doth not vnderstand them. That we might know the chastisements of God to be alwaies iust, although the causes be vnknowne vnto vs.

We cannot denie but there were errors in Charles; but yet we must confesse, in acknow- ledging things as they be, that he was one of the least vicious Kings of France, and if wee shall examine the zeale he had to the government of his Estate, he must hold an honorable ranke among the most vertuous Princes that haue at any time deserued wel of this Monar- chie. Many nearer causes of his infirmities, may be truly and soberly obserued: the disposition of his bodie, his manner of life, the surcharge of affaires, the weaknesse of his braine, the a- bounding of choller, griefe, and waiwardnesse, the want of rest and foode, the importunity of his voyage, the terror of this voye, and the noise of armes, to weigh downe the ballance C ouercharged with so a heauie a burthen. But why from man doe we not ascend to God?

Truly God doth hold and gouerne this rod: and as Charles was the head of this great E- state by his wife decree, so he not onely punished the person of Charles, but the whole body of this Realme: that both great and small might learne by this pittifull spectacle, to humble themselves vnder the mightie hand of God, who hath created the spirit of man, to worke according to his good and wise will; and disposeth absolutely of men and their affaires, as he pleaseth: and that this saying may be the scale of a true and sober humilitie, I haue held my peace O Lord, for thou hast done it, drawne from this Maxime, G d doth all well, whatsoever he doth. O Kings! this famous example belongs to you, in so famous a King. O subiects! you must learne by the head of Charles, of what price his head is, whom God hath giuen you for D King: that you may pray vnto him with all your hearts, to make him fit for the government of the whole bodie, without the which it cannot subsist. But I will returne to our Charles. Pardon courteous Reader this digression, for the search of the vse of so famous an Acci- dent.

This new and strange accident made them presently to dismishe the troupes, hauing other worke in hand then to make warre in Brittain. All the Court is wholly affected to the kings health. He is presently carried backe to Mans: his sicknesse increaseth, he must be transpor- ted to a better aire. The Physitians aduise it should be to Creil vpon Oise, one of the royall houses, in the country of Beauuoisin, betwixt Beauuais and Senlis, a pleasant and wholsome seate vpon the riuer. He is conducted thither with great care; but his franticke feuer con- tinues still. They seeke to conceale it, lest the fame thereof should be dishonourable: but truth speakes generally. James Harfeldy, an excellent Physitian of Laon is sent for, and per- forms his dutie happily, as shall appeare by the euent. Nothing wanted that mans witte could deuise to helpe and cure the infirmities of so great a King. Let vs leaue Charles in the Physitians hands, and returne to the Crowne as sicke as the head, hauing as great neede of a good and speedie remedie.

A Parliament is presently called: they assemble at Paris, with all speed: all France mournes for the affliction of their King, whom they loued deere, for his mildnesse, and the singular hope they conceiued of his reigne: whereby Charles purchased the name of wellbeloued. The Estates assemble to resolue what was necessarie for the gouernement of the Realme in this F accident. They determine first, what might bee fittest for the forme of gouernement, hoping verily of the Kings speedie recouerie, beeing loath to seeke a remedie that might any way preiudice his authoritie. It was therefore set downe for a lawe, That they should abstaine from the name of Regent, vnist in this sodaine accident, the king beeing aliue and of years. And they concluded, That during the kings infirmities, and without any pre- iudice to his authoritie, the Soueraigne gouernement of the Crowne of France should bee giuen

the Princes of his blood. But this point being decided, there was another of no lesse difficultie. To what Prince? The order of the fundamentall Lawe, called Lewis of Orleans the Kings brother, as first Prince of the blood: but neither his age, nor the present necessitie cold allow thereof. The States yeelding vnto reason, decreed: That being apparantly necessarie to provide for the State, by reason of the Kings weaknesse, being very sicke, it were not conuenient to lay so heauie a burthen vpon so weake shoulders, as the Kings brother, a young Prince: but that the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne, his Vncles, next to his brother, should haue the gouernement of the Realme, untill the Kings recoverie. John Duke of Berry was elder then Philip, but hauing purchased an ill fame in Languedoc, to be couetous and violent, he was nothing pleasing, so as the French were better affected to Philip the Hardie, Duke of Bourgogne, a cunning, cold, temperate, mild, patient and popular Prince, but ambitious, factious, reuengefull and malicious. Being therefore pleasing to the States, the chiefe charge was imposed on him: the title was common to both brethren, but the effect of the authoritie was proper to him alone. The Estates adde to their decree (especially in his fauour) that the Duchesse of Bourgogne should haue the first place next to Queene Isabel our sicke kings wife, and by consequence, they giue her access to her chamber, and the gouernement of the Children at all euents. This was Marguerite the heire of Flanders; a woman of a manly courage, raised for her great possessions, and wholly bred to ambition. This new precedence displeased Valentine the Duches of Orleans, who yeelded nothing vnto her in greatnesse of courage. We stand now vpon good rearmes, that must be gouerned by three women, a Germane, an Italian, and a Fleming, all which had absolute authority ouer their husbands: whose distaffes did cut like swords, whercof they will giue vs presently a sufficient prooffe.

Philip Duke of Bourgogne aduanced

to the gouernement of the Realme by a Decree of the States.

Two factions
in Court.

Behold the Kings Vncles now at the helme, to the great discontent of the Duke of Orleans, and of James of Bourbon his Vncle by the mother side. The wind changeth, and the sailes turne, the Court is transformed. There are two factions: but that of Berry and Bourgogne is the stronger. The Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon make the other, but there is no equality. The authoritie of the whole gouernement, and of the treasure, is in their hands to whome the States had decreed it. Such force hath this sollemne consent of the French in matters of State.

Such as had bene of Charles his most secret Councell, were out of fauour: the Constable, Begue de Villaines, Montague, la Riviere, and Mercier, they are all in bad estate, for their ouerthrow is plotted, by what meanes soeuer. The Dukes authoritie must begin with them, yet there was no loue betwixt the two brethren (for who can beleue that ambition and couetousnesse are fit to vnite friendships) but onely to ruine their common enemies, and to suppress their authoritie. Such as were in their rowle, had their turnes, but diuersly. The Duke of Bourgogne standing vpon his guard, restrained his imperious wife, who at his first aduancement to this great command, would haue turned all toply turuy: but hee seekes all meanes to preuent his enemies, being resolved to begin with the Constable, as with the strongest, and this he concluded with his brother of Berry. Montague cunningly smels out this practise, and withall the best he could carry away, saues himselfe at Auignon, attending some better opportunitie: but he shall returne too soone to loose his head on a scaffold. The Constable Cliffon, at his first speech with the Duke of Bourgogne, is so checkt and threatned by him, as swallowing this pill quietly, he steales out of Paris, and retires to his house at Monthery, from whence with extreame danger he saues himselfe in Brittain, hauing the Duke for his capitall enemy. But he had his sonne in Law there, the Duke of Aniou, the Earle of Ponthieure, and so many friends within the Countie, as in the end the equitie of his his cause shall draw the Duke of Britan to reason, being his most dangerous enemy. After notice, that the constable was fled, Begue de Villaines a gentleman of Beausse, (who had married the Contesse of Rebelde in Castille) la Riviere and Mercier were coopt vp, but all elcaped by sundry meanes, only Montagu in the end shall loose the mould of his doublet, although hee seemed to haue better provided for his safety then all the rest. That wee may hold for an vndoubted Maxime in all the resolutions which mans reason can set downe in greatest dangers, That what God keeps, is well kept. Yet not rashly to omit the lawfull meanes of our preferuation, neither to rely ouer much vpon our owne wisdomes, no more then to a rotten planke in passing of a great riuer.

The Duke of Bourgogne had nothing lesse in his heart, nor more in his mouth then the sacred name of Iustice. Hauing the Court parliament of Paris at his deuotion, he begins to plant his artillery against the constable, by this authority. The Kings aduocate hauing framed a complaint against him, commissions are sent into Britan to summon him, who not finding him, they proceede against him by exceptions: all formalities being obserued, they condemne him by a decree of the Court of parliament (in the presence of the dukes of Berry and Bourgogne) as guilty of high treason, hauing attempted against the Kings person by poison, and against the state by theft and treason. That as guilty of these crimes, hee was degraded of the office of Constable, condemned in a hundred markes of siluer to the King, and banished the Realme.

condemned
and being absent.

A strange alteration, the which the history represents in these verses.

*Inconstant Fortune neuer stales,
her motions turning are alwaies:
The highest mounted on the wheel,
is strangely cast behinde the beere.*

But truth corrects the vanity of this popular opinion. Go as Iudge, hee raiseth one, and casts downe another. Aduancement comes not from the east, nor from the west; but God doth raise up and pull downe by his wise providence: for God that hath made the world, should not he gouerne the world? the eye sees not the Sunne through a thicke cloude, and yet it is in heauen, notwithstanding the weakenesse of our sight. That which the ignorant call fortune in diuers euents of worldly things, is a secret operation of the wisdom of God, alwaies iust, euen when it is most vnknowne vnto vs: the which is no more polluted with humane passions, then the Sunne beames with the most infected carion, whereon it workes by his heate. Oh man! distinguish the rod from the hand that rules it: doe thou thy duty, and leaue the euents to God: feare God and thou shalt haue no neede to feare Fortune. An assured pasport not onely to auoide the strange alterations of Court, but all other accidents of mans life, which hath nothing constant in it, but inconstancy it selfe. But euery man treads on him that falls, saith the same history. Euery man speaks infamously of the disgraced constable, they crie out against him, as hauing bewitched the King. Thus the afflicted is alwaies held culpable, according to the censure of this wise world, which iudgeth onely by outward circumstances. But who would beleue, that Cliffon and his companions (who had so great an interest in the Kings health) would make him sicke? The issue will shew the contrarie, verifying; that as sclander is the touchstone of vertue, so there is nothing more courageous then a good cause, nor more victorious then the truth. Cliffon stirres not at all this brute, hee stands vpon his gard, purchaseth friends, and attends the time, which in the end brought him to a safe port, as wee shall see hereafter. After his condemnation, the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne halted nothing so much, as to aduance one to this goodly charge, whereby they might tie some great person vnto them. They offer it to the Lord of Couffy, who refuseth it, wherevpon Philip of Eu Earle of Arthois is aduanced, and for a confirmation of this new league, he giues his sonne to the Duke of Berryes daughter.

Philip of Eu
made Constable.

Thus passed the beginning of this new authoritie, when as Charles, by rest, a good ayre, the coolnesse of the winter, and good vsage, beganne daily to recouer his health, coming first to the knowledge of such as were ordinarily about him, and of his wife, children and brother, who parted not from his bed whilest his vncles made this goodly worke at Paris. Hauing recouered his health, and James Harfely dismissed with an honorable reward,

Charles recouuers his health.

all France was reuiued with incredible ioy, to see their King as it were raised out of the graue and giuen deuotly to his prayers, but hee hath a greater relapse into this miserable disease by a new accident, and this was the occasion. Charles returned to Paris to his subjects great comfort, who sought to delight him with all kindes of sportes. Euery man imployed his wits thereto; So as there was a new inuention of a maske, of wilde men, attired in fine linnen cloth, all couered with very fine flaxe, from the foote to the head, being glued to the cloth so artificially, as if it had growne to the skin, and that they which did weare it had beene naked. They were fixe, and the King would make the seuenth, to lead the dance. For the auoiding of all danger of fire, which might easely take the flaxe, commandement was giuen to put out all torches; but it chanced that the Duke of Orleans, vnacquainted with this maske, came into the Hall, followed by his pages, who carried torches (according to the vsuall manner) euen as these Sauage men (tied one to another like prisoners) present themselves vnto the Companie, the King (who marched first) goes presently to the Duchesse of Berry, shee holds him, and refuseth to let him goe without knowledge what he was.

The King falls into a relapse
by a strange accident.

And euen then the Duke of Orleans, with an actiue resolutenesse answerable to his age and naturall wantonnesse, takes a Torch and comes neere to these Sauage men, to know them by the lifting vp of their maskes, when as fire takes hold of this flaxe, so sodainely as all were on a flame, not able to free themselves beeing all tied to one line. The violence of the fire kindled with the rozen, caused a most horrible crie, but generally all men crie out, Sauie the King, whom they knew to bee one of the Sauage men. The Duchesse of Berry wraps him in her gowne, being long and large after the manner of those times, and so drawing him out of the Hall, they led him into the next chamber, without any hurt to his person. But the amazement was such, by the horrible cries of these poore men which burnt in the flames, (not able to be helped well in so sodaine an outcry) as the King could not be staid in this amazement. They lay him on his bed, but his spirits could take no rest. Thus the night passeth away, this poore prince being much disordered in minde, and all his seruants distressed with griefe. There fell out another unhappy accident. In the morning it was bruted through the city, that the King was dead, so as the people did runne in flockes to his vnles lodgings, exclaiming against them for the ill gard they had kept of his person, whom they desire to see either dead or aliue, so as the Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne yeelding to this violence, were forced (euen when as the King beganne to take some rest) to raise him out of his bed, and to leade him through the city to our Ladies Church, to pacifie the peoples fury. At his returne his spirits faile him, hee falls into his former phrensie, and neuer after were they settled, notwithstanding all the helpes men could apply.

He languished two and twenty yeeres in this pittifull Estate, and in the tediousnesse of so long an infirmity the Realme was not without languishing. Sometimes hee was in good temper, (as phrensies haue their respits, and doe not alwaies disemper the faculties of the minde) but still he fell, and euen when as he thought to doe best, he erred most, when as hee sought to retaine the authority to himselfe, and that nothing should be done but by his command. Hence sprong the horrible confusions in this reigne, for that diuers passionate men ruled his weake braine diuersely, one vndoing what another had done, couering their passions with the Kings name and authority. And all the liberty to doe ill, grew from this spring. But let vs returne to the end of our painefull webbe. The duke of Orleans wonderfully perplexed to haue beene the cause of this scandale, excuseth himselfe presently in the hall, and to the King his brother, but all this did not satisfie. The duke of Bourgongne reprocheth him, and exceeds the censure of an vnkle, for hee laies hold on this occasion, to make him odious to the people, as if it had beene done of purpose to kill the King.

Ielousie betwixt the Dukes of Orleans and Bourgongne.

This maske of burning men (which chanced in the beginning of the yeere 1394.) shall burne farther, and kindle a greater fire betwixt the vnkle and the Nephew, for the space of tenne yeeres, vntill the death of Philip Duke of Bourgongne, leauing this hatred hereditary to his posterity. There is no meanes which the Bourguignon doth not attempt to wrong his Nephew of Orleans. Certaine Augustine Fryars undertake to cure the King, by incisions in his head, whereby hee was in great danger of his life. These counterfitts were brought

A brought forth publicly in their habits, and beheaded, but the scarres of these wounds will remaine in Lewis his face, who recommended them vnto the King.

The women are dealers in these actions. The Duchesse of Bourgongne perswades Queene Isabel, that Lewis his meaning was to kill the King her husband, and his children. These impressions are confirmed by the graue and sweete discourses of the duke her husband, who by degrees sealed a hatred in the Queenes minde against her brother-in-law. Thus this faction is much fortified by the authority of Queene Isabel, and by her, with her husbands name, whom she makes to speake what she pleaseth, sometimes as her will directed him, but not alwaies. Yet this weake braine is the checker of all these courtly policies, by the meanes of women, who are continually about his bedde or his chaire, to distemper his braine with variety of newes springing from their wretched passions: and this poore prince is sometimes wonne, sometimes lost, and alwaies tormented with these importune discourses.

Valentine wife to the Duke of Orleans, an Italian and daughter to John Galeaz (one of the cunningest and most subtil wittes of her time, which subtilty some held shee increased by coniuring) would not yeld to the brauadoes of these two princesses: against whom shee opposed her selfe, not onely by her husbands degree, but also by so politike courage bred in her selfe, visiting the sicke King with such ciuill entertainment, as her greatest enemies could not finde any honest collour to deny her the dore. So as the King did not onely willingly see her, but did call for her, and in his greatest fits did know her onely, among all the rest, refusing to take anything but from the hands of his good Sister of Orleans. The more the Kings loue kindled a ielousie in these two princesses her enemies, the more it rayed vp the minde of Valentine, and by her meanes, of her husband: who remembring (too hatefully) the degree whereunto he was borne, and the wrong done him in reiecting him, yet hauing neither dexterity, nor meanes to winne many seruants, hee gaue the Duke of Bourgongne all aduantages, beeing graue, cold, pleasing and modest: so as by his wife temper hee disclued the heate of the Duke of Orleans immoderate vehemency, who tryng himselfe with the shew of his greatnesse, makes it knowne by effects, that all the authority was in the Duke of Bourgongne, for whosoeuer had neede of any publike helpe hee must passe through his hands, and what businesse soeuer chanced, either within or without the realme, the true rendez-uos was at his lodging. Thus the vnkle made his Nephew to walke horses (as they say) although hee chafed and stamped beyond all measure. These diuisions troubled the whole court, making them to neglect the affaires of state, and what can wee obserue more famous in so disordered an estate? All busineses are done in the Kings name, yet without the King, vnlesse the parties would haue him to countenance some great passion. I doe purposely omit all that which passed in this reigne touching the Schisme of the Church, and the house of Aniou in the realmes of Naples and Arragon, nor to breake off the course of my intent, meaning to represent in due place all that concernes this foraine history. Richard King of England sends his Ambassadors to Charles, to congratulate his recovery, offering him a generall peace, and demanding his daughter in marriage. The Kings relapse delayed the conclusion for a time, but soone after, by the care of the Duke of Bourgongne, who had a great interest in this alliance, by reason of his country of Flanders, it was concluded, in the yeere 1395.

Charles had some intermissions, by meanes whereof hee could ride: Richard repaires to Calais, and Charles to Ardres, whether Richard came to ratifie the peace concluded betwixt their Ambassadors, and to receiue his new spouse. The Kings encountred one another with loue and kindnesse, making shewes of great good will: but it was a short ioy for either of them. For as it seemed that the quiet of these two realmes had beene settled by this generall peace, sealed by this marriage, and seasoned with so many reciprocall shewes of cordial affection betwixt these two great Kings, behold a great combustion in England, which intangles both these Kings in this common calamity. Richard being of himselfe effeminate, carelesse, voluptuous and idle, grew more delicate by this profound rest built vpon the alliance of his enemy, who alone might haue quickened him. He is alwaies with his yong wife, embracing her, dallying with her, and attiring her, with such contempt of his authority, abasing himselfe too much to his subjects, so as hee grew contemptible vnto his enemies, 1394. enemies, who presumed to attempt against his person. The ordinary warres of England against France, had caused many necessary impositions without any grudging of the subjects: but when as necessity ceased by this generall peace, the people require to be relieved: William More makes an oration vnto the King in the name of all the English in generall. Richard hauing no meanes in these infinite exactions to supply the charges of his idle and voluptuous life, contemned his subiects request, and in the end pressed vpon the same matter by the Duke of Gloucester and the Earle of Arondel, in the name of them all, hee puts them violently to death. The English madde with rage for the death of their deputies, flie to such remedies as despaire giues to necessity. From this generall discontent sprong a strange Tragedie against Richard, for the English seeing themselves thus despised by their King, they cast their eyes vpon Henry of Lancaster his cousin: and hauing called a parliament, they put Richard (being forced in open assembly) to resigne the crowne, and to condemne himself to perpetuall prison, as hauing abused his royall authoritie and his subiects. But this tragick change concerns the history of England. This may briefly suffice for ours, in the conference of our estate with theirs.

Charles did greatly grieve at this deiection of Richard his sonne in law, from whom hee expected great loue and quiet for his subiects. But who seeth not the vanity of this world, both in great and small, to feare a shower euen when the Sunne is hottest? Hee sends for Isabell his daughter of twelue yeeres old, whom Richard had not yet toucht, beeing content to behold her (like a puppet) vntill shee came to age, satisfying his humour by some other waies: howsoeuer it were, it prouoed to the dislike of his subiects, and scorn of neighbour nations. Isabell beeing returned to her father, shalbe married to Charles Duke of Orleans, sonne to this Lewis who is now in quarter, and from her shall spring a goodly plant, which in the end shall giue vs many Kings in their order to preferue this Monarchy. But, as if France had bene the store-houise, or rather the common Sanctuary of all Christendome, to whom the afflicted Christians might repaire in their greatest extremities, it happened in those daies, that Sigismond King of Hungary intreated Charles to succour him against the Turke, the common enemy to the Christian name, who got footing in the Empire of the East. For, the Schisme in the Church, the confusion of the Empire, and the daily wars betwixt France and England, had so mortified all Christians zeale, from all care to support the affaires of the East, against the Turkes our fivorne enemies, as the way was made easie for the planting of themselves there to our ruine. But all the fault was not in the Westerne Princes: the Christians of the East were in horrible confusions, and euen at Constantinople, whereas the Paleologues had in some sort maintained the name of the Empire of the East, since the bad government of our French.

All the Lords of Greece, vassalles to the Empire, ioyning with the Despote of Bulgaria, against the Emperour, did strue to ruine one another. This ciuill warre drew the Turke out of Asia (where hee was yet confined) into Europe, overthrew all the rest of the Empire, and in the end shall bury the whole body of this great Estate, with the Christian name, in the ignominy of our disordered passions, as in a common sepulchre. It sufficeth to note the motive of this warre, which was to expell Batizet (of the race of the Ottomans, who yet holds the Empire of the East) being called in by John Paleolog Emperour: but seeing so mighty an enemy entred within his dominions, vnder a colour to succour him, hee fought to be freed from him by the meanes of Christian Princes his friends. The next was Sigismond King of Hungary, who had reason himself to feare this overflowing deluge, the which in the end hath ouer-runne Hungary, beeing at this day for the most part vnder the Turkes tyrannie. But the euent was not answerable to his designe. Charles beeing solicited for succours, granted them, as freely as his infirmity would suffer. But the Duke of Bourgongne made the prouision: the charge of the army was giuen to his sonne John Earle of Nevers, beeing two and twenty yeeres old, and married to the daughter of Albert of Bauaria, Earle of Hainault, Holland and Zeland, by whom he had then one sonne, who shall succeed him. The armie was goodly, beautified with the presence of many great personages, as Philip of Eu Constable of France, the Earles of La Marke, Saint Pol, and Bar, the Lords of Couilly, Tremouille, Vienne, Bouciquault, Roye, Monterel, Saint Py, and Brezay, to the number of a thousand Knights and Squiers.

Being

A Being ioynd to Sigismonds army, which consisted of many Hongariens, Bohemiens and Germans, they desired at any hand to haue the vangard, and to march in the face of an unknowne enemy, of whose discipline they were ignorant; and to make prooue of their valour, against the aduite of Sigismond, they cast themselves desperately into the midst of the Turkes auantcours, all the Christian army being too farre behind to second them, but it chanced, that Batizet (followed by a farre greater troupe then theirs) compassed them in easily as with a net, so as after they had fought valiantly, and made a great slaughter of Turkes, not able to withstand so great a force, they were all cut in peeces, or taken prisoners. John of Bourgongne, and all the aboue-named Lords, were either slaine or taken, not one escaped the sword or slavery.

Hungary.

B Batizet mouued with the great losse of his men, would haue slaine all the prisoners, but the greedy desire of ranfome was helpfull to some few of the Noblemen. The historie of Germany notes but fiue, all the rest were murdered after their taking, by the commandement, and in the presence of this Barbarian, who hauing resolved to kill John of Bourgongne as the head of the army, was dissuaded by an old Turke a Necromancien, who saye vnto him; Preserue this young man, who shall kill more Christians then thine armie. A Prince borne to the spoile and ruine of his countrie, whereof hee shall bee shortly a more cruell scourge then the Turkes. They spared him, but he spared not the blood of his cousin germane, to defile his incestuous hands, and to prophane the bosome of France, which had so greatly honoured him. Enguerrand of Couilly, a great man in his time, died in prison, and Philip of Eu Constable of France, (by whose death the Earle of Sancerre was aduanced to this great dignitie,) but after him there shall bee other Constables in this confused reigne. This defeate chanced in the yeere 1396. before Nicopolis a citie in Misia, neere to the which Traian vanquished the Daciens. This victory of the Turkes had proceeded farther, by the terror it gaue to those countries, but God gaue those Christians some time of breathing before the last stroake, the which came but too soone for the scornors of God: yet after this ouerthrow, as Batizet prepared to pursue his victorie against the Christians, Tamberlan, another scourge of mankind, overflowing Asia like a great dgeuge, overthrew him, and tooke him prisoner, and so God staid the Ottomans power for that time, but the Christians malice (abusing the patience of God) prouoked his wrath, which beeing iustly kindled against them, he suffered the Turkes to take Constantinople, the capitall city of the Easterne Empire, as we shall see else-where, but let vs returne to France.

Charles had some truce with his infirmity, who notwithstanding this indisposition of his braine, was in reasonable good health of his body, so as hee had children during this time. Before his sicknesse hee had Isabell (of whom wee haue made mention) and Lewis the Dauphin Duke of Guienne. But John Duke of Touraine, and Charles Earle of Ponthieu, Michele, Mary and Marguerite, two sonnes, and three daughters (a goodly issue to keepe the Crowne from beeing an Orpheline) were borne to him by Isabell of Bauaria, during the weakenesse of his spirit. And much happinesse befell him.

E After the taking of Batizet, the Turkish Emperour and the returne of John of Bourgongne into France, hauing paid his ranfome, the Lord of Bouciquault, (beeing sent to Genoa, to receiue it to the Kings obedience, to whom they had willingly giuen themselves) hee made a voiage to Constantinople with a new army, more happy then the first, freeing the city, and returning victorious into Italy. Milan belonging to Valentine, by the decease of John Galeaz her father, had bene surprised by Francis Sforce, but at the return of the Marshall Bouciquault, it yeilded to the French obedience, and so did Placentia and Pavia, cities in Lombardy. But these conquests continued not long with them, no more then the rest of Italy, by the fatall influence which hath alwaies made it a Sepulcher for the French, so as this suddaine yeelding of those Italian cities to the French obedience, was like vnto a fire of straw.

F Verdun being ill intreated by the Duke of Lorraine (although it were an Imperiall town) cast it selfe into Charles his protection. Charles, the sonne of Charles of Nauarre, rightly marked with the name of bad, made great instance for his Seigneuries of Eureux, Cherebourg, and other lands in Normandie, the which Charles the fifth had taken from his father, who resigned his interest by an agreement made with him, for two hundred thousand franks that 1398. that were given him, and the Seignury of Neimours, then made a Duchie vpon that occasion. But in these happy euents the ieaousie betwixt the Dukes of Orleans and Bourgongne continued and encreased hourly, through the violent practises of their Proserpinaes, of whom we haue made mention, who failed not to bring fuell to this fire, not onely making coales to scorch one an other, but also a burning flame to fire both their houses and the whole Realme. The occasion and meanes was very strange. Valentine Duchesse of Orleans (whom King Charles did know and loue during the sharpest fits of his infirmity, euen when as he knew not his owne wife Isabel) being in the Kings chamber, (whether she had brought her little sonne to play with the Kings children) shew cast a faire apple, after the which the children did runne, but Valentines sonne caught it, and hauing eaten it, fell presently sicke, and within few daies after died. Therevpon they concluded directly, that this child died of poyson, prepared for the Kings sonne, which confirmed the old opinion, that the King had bene bewitched by her, so as all respect laide aside, they cried out against her, as against a rauening Wolfe. There was no other talke in Court, Paris, and through all the Prouinces of France.

The hatred
betwixt the houses of Orleans & Bour-gongne increaseth.

Valentine, Duchesse of Orleans, for-bidden the Court.

The Duke of Bourgongne seemed very busie, and sent all complaints to the Kings counsell, who decreed, That, to auoide a great scandale, Valentine should retire from Court, the which shee did to the Castle of Asiniere, vpon the waie from Paris, to Beauvais: the Duke of Orleans disdayning it much, who must needs be toucht with this ignominy, and the peoples hatred encreasing mightily against him by this new accident. Whilest this homebred hatred continued in Court, betwixt the vncle and the Nephew, the Constable Cliffon fortified himselfe in Britan, both with friends and meanes, hauing by his dexterity gained the greatest Noblemen of the country, by whose meanes hee made a profitable peace for himselfe with John of Montfort Duke of Britan, to whom hee had bene a capitall enemy. The manner of this vnlooked for reconciliation is worthy of memory, to giue after-ages the subiect of a notable iudgement in so famous an example. The Duke prickt in conscience, and moued by necessity, hauing banded all his subiects against him, seeing apparently the notable wrong he had done to the Constable Cliffon, hee resolved to be reconciled vnto him, and to winne his loue. But foreseeing, that hauing so often deceiued him, he would no more trust him but vpon good assurance, hee resolues to secure him by an extraordinary meanes, sending him his eldest sonne as a pledge of his faith. The Constable seeing himselfe possessed of this yong Prince, without any other security then his fathers letters, stand amazed at so vnexpected a prooffe of the Dukes loue, and resolues to haue his reuenge by a curtesie not onely strange, but lesse expected, for although hee had all the reason in the world to distrust the Duke, who had detained him prisoner vnder colour of a banquet, and had sought all meanes to ruine him, yet taking a new aduise vpon this new occasion, hee parts from his house, and bringing backe this yong man to his father, puts himself into his power. The Duke more amazed at this strange confidence of the Constable, so changeth his minde, as after that time hee became his most affectionate friend, hauing built a firme friendship vpon this foundation, the which continued betwixt them the rest of their daies, to the mutuall content of either, and the profitable quiet of their subiects, verifying, That curtesie is a wife and happy counsellor of State, teaching great men, that patience triumphes in a good cause; and that wee must hate as if wee should loue, euen in the greatest heat of passionate quarrels, being well said by the Ancients, That hatred must bee mortal, and loue immortall.

The Duke of Britan and the Constable reconciled.

Deadly hatred betwixt
the vncle and
the Nephew.

The hatred betwixt the vncle and the Nephew ended not so quietly. The Duke of Orleans hauing receiued this disgrace in the person of his wife Valentine, growing very impatient, redoubles his complaints with great vehemency, saying, that it was no longer time now to obiekt his age, against the degree wherevnto both nature & the fundamental law of State had openly called him, seeing it was now ten yeeres since this borrowed authority of the Duke of Bourgongne, had giuen him respite to be of age to enioy his right, the which they could not take from him without preiudice to the crowne, that it is a visible vsurpation, being no longer able to disguise his grosse practises. The Duke of Bourgongne did frustrate these complaints by his coldnesse and authority, but the Duke of Orleans grew more vehement, falling from words to deeds, and hauing had conference with the Duke of

Guelldres,

A Guelldres, hee raiseth a good number of men at armes by his meanes, and lodgeth them about Paris, where he enters with the said duke, hauing aduertised no man thereof, but onely the King, who fauoured his brother exceedingly, when hee came to his right sence. The duke of Berry made shew to be a neuter, but seeing the duke of Bourgongne to vlturpe all to himselfe, tyred with his ambitious dissimulation, he inclined more to the duke of Orleans his Nephew, although in shew hee laboured to reconcile them. The dukes of Bourbon and Aniou princes of the blood were of the like humor. The Kings council labours by al means to end this quarell betwixt these princes, disallowing the government of any one in particular, and confirming a command of all the princes together, supporting it by alliances: for, Charles the eldest sonne of Lewis Duke of Orleans, married Isabel of France, the eldest daughter to our King Charles the sixth. Lewis the Kings eldest sonne, Duke of Guienne and Daulphin of Viennois, was betrothed to Katherine of Bourgongne, daughter to John Earle of Neuers, sonne to Philip. To John the Kings second sonne, Duke of Touraine, Iaqueline is promised, the onely daughter of William of Bauaria, Earle of Hainault and to his heire. To Philip of Bourgongne, sonne to the aboue named John, Michelle the Kings second daughter is promised, for these marriages were all but future promises, by reason of the yong age of the parties.

The counsell
seekes to reconcile the princes by alliances.

This was to ingage the faith to come, & now present to satisfie the discontented. Queene Isabel was twise pleased, both in her children and her race, which by this meanes was transplanted into the royall blood of France, by her cousin, who also carried the name of Bauaria: but what? as ambition cannot be tamed, so in all these marriages, there was more alliance then friendship, and more dissembling then truth. God must needs reconcile them at the last by a stronger conclusion.

PHILIP Duke of Bourgongne dies, leauing his sonne
JOHN the heire of his passions, against LEWIS
Duke of Orleans, in the yeere 1404.

The beginning of the ciuill warres.

Hus Philip duke of Bourgongne, raised vp with a new hope to maintaine himselfe against his enemy Lewis duke of Orleans, as well by the ciment of this alliance, as by the increafe of power which his sonne John brought him, (becing his right arme, the true Image of his great and haughty courage, and a new fire-brand of his ambition) dies at this time, when as hee dreamt least thereof, for hee died at Hal, going to visit his townes in Flanders, and to crosse the practises of the duke of Guelldres, who was a principall support to the Duke of Orleans. Marguerit his wife (a companion in his ambition) did not suruiue him a whole yeere, who fearing to finde her husband too farre indebted, renounced his moueable goods, laying downe her purse and girdle vpon the place appointed, according to the vsuall custome, and so required an act from a publike notary. Griefe for her husband did not hasten her death, seeing that she feared not her liuing should faile after him. John of Montfort duke of Britan (who had kept such a stirre vpon this Theater) died foure yeeres before him, yet more wise and happy in one thing, hauing mortified the hatred hee bare to the Constable Cliffon before his death. So death doth sodainly stay mens designs, which else flie most violent. How wretched are we to be thus blinde, in these goodly examples. But let vs returne to our discourse.

Philip of

Duke of Bri-

Philip left three sonnes, John Anthonie and Philip; but John Earle of Neuers, his eldest sonne succeeded him in his great Seigneuries of Bourgongne and Flanders; and the chiefe heire of his hatred and other vices. Hee was equall to him in ambition, malice, dissembling, and policy, but herein hee did surmount him, that his father Philip hauing for the 1404. space of tenne or eleuen yeeres, crossed the designs of Lewis his Nephew, yet hee carried A himselfe with such a cunning temper, as holding the helme and making him to carry the bal- ble, he made his vnlawfull gouernment supportable by his modesty, and reasonable by the order which had confirmed him in this authority. But John continues his practises with such violent fury, as within three yeeres (hauing giuen the duke of Orleans a thousand crof- des, and plunged France in a ciuill warre) he murders his cousin germaine most cruelly, de- files his country and his blood, and continues his furious designe with so great presumpti- on, as countenancing this murder with a free confession, and seeking to maintaine it by reason, he omitted no kind of mischiefe, but brought in al disordered confusions, as if France had bene the Rendezuous of villany and impiety. A text, the commentary whereof may be read at large in the following discourse. Behold the beginning of a ciuill warre among B the French, both long and furious, bred by the ill counsell of the princes of the blood, abut- ting their authority. A history the more worthy the noting, for that it serues vs to marke the fits, and accidents of diseases, wherewith we haue bene afflicted, to applie the vse thereof to our owne experience.

The Duke of Orleans ad- uanced to the gouernment.

After the death of Philipp, all the gouernment of publike affaires was without all contro- uersie deliuered into the hands of the duke of Orleans. The King loued his onely brother deere, and desired to grace him what hee could. The Queene (to please her husband) made shew to reioyce thereat, hauing no more a Duchesse of Bourgongne to incense her, reason gaue him this preheminance, and the French obeyed him willingly, as the lawfull C gardian of the French Monarchie. All things fauoured this yong prince, if hee had not fai- led himselfe: but this choleric hatched in his brest, hauing for so long a time swallowed vp so many indignities, the immoderate heate of command, so much desired, and the ambition and couetousnesse of his wife Valentine; all these pluckt from him the fruit of these fauour- able occasions to settle his greatnesse, and gaue his enemy meanes to ruine him. These D errors were accompanied with indiscretion, which commonly shakes the miserable. The dukes of Berry and Bourbon, his vnclcs, had fauoured him much, during the Bourguignons reigne, and their age had greatly countenanced his authority, if hee could haue vsed them rightly. But this young Prince was so pleased with the sweete of command, as hee was loath to impart it to any: the which must needs discontent them, although (being D wife) they dissembled it, yet this dislike incouraged the Bourguignon his enemy to attempt against him.

The couetousnesse of Valentine prepared the way to these disorders. Lewis was desi- rous to purchase the Duchie of Luxembourg, his wife vrged him thereunto hourly, wish- ing him to deuise some meanes to make the King to pay for it. Vpon this aduice Lewis propounds in counsell, that for the Kings important affaires there must bee a taxation made. There neuer wants some pretext to colour these exactions, but in effect it was for this purchase. John duke of Bourgongne opposeth for the good of the commorweale. On the one side it was a goodly meanes to shew both his loue to the people, and his zeale E to the Kings seruice, and on the other, a reasonable subiect to make the duke of Orleans odious. Yet this proposition passed in counsell through the absolute authority of the duke of Orleans. The Bourguignon imbraceth this occasion, and flatters the Parisiens, to ioyne their loues, and to oppose them against his enemy, who could not bee more odious then in this cause; and euen then they grew into such dislike of him, as they could neuer loue him. This was spred throughout the realme, and the duke of Bourgongne ha- uing protested that this charge was imposed vpon the subiects against his consent, lay- ing a good foundation of firme correspondencie with the Parisiens, hee retires into Flan- ders, to take possession of his mother Marguerits inheritance, and credit, with that rich peo- ple, but in effect it was to build vpon the hereditary hatred hee had against his cousin and capital enemy.

To omit nothing that might anile him against the duke of Orleans, being at Brussels he sends his Ambassadors to King Charles, beseeching him, with all affection to consum- mate the marriage betwixt Lewis his eldest sonne, duke of Guienne and Dauphin of Vien- ne, and Katherine of Bourgongne his daughter. Charles thought it fit to content his cousin John vpon this demand, but his brother Lewis crossed this marriage, as prejudiciall to the house

The duke of Orleans grows odi- ous to the sub- iect, by reason of an imposi- tion.

A house of France, being already weakened by the vniing of Bourgongne to Flanders, the which would be much more fortified by this alliance with the Kings sonne. Johns Amba- sadors (after long delays) retorne home without any effect, making their master acquainted with the cold proceedings of the Court, the which required his presence. In the end, hee resolves to goe in person, to sollicite a matter of so great importance. But being ready to march, behold the King of England sends an armie into Flanders, to besiege Sluse, which makes him yeeld to necessity, and to demand succours of the King, as his soueraigne, against the common enemy of the State, staying himselfe in Flanders, to prevent these practises of the English. Lewis of Orleans (pretending a truce betwixt France and Eng- land) causeth succours to bee denied him, as if they should draw a warre vpon France being B already tired with so great and long troubles. John held himselfe much wronged by this deniall, and to haue the better meanes to retorne to Paris, he compounds with the English, being desirous to make it knowne, that hee would oppose himselfe against the duke of Or- leans designs, taking hold of the occasion which hee himselfe offered him to his great prejudice.

The imposition was leuied by the duke of Orleans his command, and commissions were brought into Flanders. At Paris it was exacted with all rigour, but John commands his subiects of Flanders not to pay it, and goes well accompanied to Paris to assist the people, who greatly discontented with this burthen, durst not yet vtter their grieve, expecting the C countenance of a great commander. The Parisiens incensed against Lewis of Orleans, sol- licite John of Bourgongne to come to Paris, being resolved to employ all their meanes in the defence of this cause, which they held to bee very important for their reliefe. John de- sired nothing more; so as redoubling his courage at these calles, hee goes in haste to Paris, and staies at Louvre in Paris, giuing the Parisiens notice to come vnto him. The King remained at Paris, as hee was accustomed, the Queene and Lewis of Orleans hauing dis- covered the duke of Bourgongnes intent, and fearing least (being the stronger, and hauing the Parisiens at his deuotion) he should force the King to marry the Dauphin Lewis, made D sure to his daughter: they thought it best to conueigh this young prince into Germany, to some place of safety. And going together from Paris they left the Dauphin with Lewis of Bauaria (his vnclc by the mothers side) who should conduct him secretly in a litter to Corbeil, where a goodly troupe attended him. The Bourguignons followers giue him present intelligence of their departure. John followes so speedily as he ouertakes the Daul- phin Lewis at Ville-Ivisue, conducted in a litter by Lewis of Bauaria his vnclc, & brings him backe gently to Paris, where they receiue the duke of Bourgongne with great ioy, and are glad of the Daulphins retorne, going to meet them in great pompe, as at a ioyfull triumph. John being come to Paris, hath conference with them of this faction, and findes them at his deuotion. The prouost of Marchants, and the Vniuersity, assure him of their faithfull ser- uice, they intreat him to undertake the reformation of the State, a charge which hee doth willingly imbrace, as a fit maske for his ambitious humor.

The Parisiens sollicite John of Bourgongne to come.

John of Bour- gongne lea- ueth on the Daulphin sper- son.

E Hee then presents a petition to the King, beseeching him to reforme the State, strange- ly corrupted by the ill gouernment of the treasure, whereby the subiects were oppres- sed with insupportable charges, and sacred iustice ill administred, the ordinary subiect of the peoples complaints: but in effect it was to araigne the duke of Orleans. The King forbore to make any answer vntill his brothers retorne, being president of the coun- sell, and greatly interessed in this complaint: but these were words without effect, if force had not followed this admonition.

Hee sues to the King for re- formation of the State.

The Bourguignon, had brought great troupes, vnder the conduct of John without Pitty, bishop of Liege, and the duke of Cleues. The duke of Orleans had also assembled an armie from diuers parts, by the Lord of Harpendanne, fortified with the forces of the duke F of Lorraine and the King of Sicily, being made ready for the voiage of Naples. Thus the Isle of France is full of souldiers of one Iuiery, but of contrary humors, as the manner is in ciuill warres, French against French, and kinsman against kinsman, all making profession to main- taine the good of their country in ruining it.

Ciuill warre begins.

John of Bourgongne in shew had the aduantage, being in the capital city, and posses- sed of the peoples hearts: hee had the King in his power, and (for a gage of this newe authority, authority, which men honour like the sunne rising) the Daulphin of the house of France, A whom hee pretended to bee his sonne in law. All these considerations made his heart swell, and his tongue to speake proudly. But Lewis duke of Orleans founds forth the name of publike authority, which then remained in his hands, as in a sacred gard. The most passionate make a stay at the name thereof, to attend the euent of so great a quarrell. Such force hath the name of lawfull authority and order in a State, whereon it depends as on a firme foundation.

These armies thus lodged about Paris, the Generalls mindes appeared in the deuises of their standards. In that of the duke of Orleans was written Je l'enueie, with a staffe full of knots painted in it, signifying that hee would knocke him on the fingers that should presume to touch his authority. In the duke of Bourgongnes was written in Flemish, Ick Hond, B that is to say, I hold it, with a ioyners plane to make smooth the knotty staffe, and so to intcounter the force that threatened him, yet these passions were suppressed by the only respect of authority, without the which all had tended to a violent spoile. The Princes of the bloud (who were not engaged in these quarrels) labour to reconcile their cousins, seeing the Kings infirmity will not suffer him to vse his absolute authority.

Lewis of Aniou, King of Naples and Sicilia, and Lewis of Orleans, were with the Queene at Melun, the dukes of Berry and Bourbon, and the King of Nauarre, are at Paris with the King, and al the faction of Bourgongne. The King of Sicilia comes to Paris, he lets the dukes of Berry and Bourbon vnderstand, how necessary it was to quench this fire in time. All these C Princes are willing to mediate an accord, but the indiscretion of the duke of Orleans had almost spoiled all.

At the first he grew amazed, but seeing no man to stirre, and hauing some feeling of his authority, he beganne to speake bigge, writing to Paris, and to the best cities of the realme, against such as had made this petition. And (contrarie to the aduise which the Princes his cousins gaue him, not to part from Melun) hee resolues to come to Paris, and to oppose himselfe against the duke of Bourgongne. The city and Vniuersity of Paris send an honorable deputation vnto him, excusing themselves, beseeching him to hearken to a good reformation, but hee lo checke the deputies, as they returned ill satisfied, to a people bigge with a seditious humour. He shewed himselfe indiscreet in two sorts, excusing himselfe when no D man accused him, which was properly to accuse himselfe, and in w. king of a sleeping dog, incensing this mutinous people, who were then kept in awe by his onely authority, not daring to mutter against him but in secret. The Bourguignon desired nothing more then to haue some apparent cause to draw this people into mutinie, giuing it out openly that the duke of Orleans came in armes to spoile the city of Paris. Behold the Parisiens are in armes, prepared both within and without, to withstand the duke of Orleans comming, they beate downe pentises within the city, to make the streetes more free for to cast stones. The people troupe with the duke Bourgongnes men, and issue forth armed about Montfaucon, in view of the Orleanois, lying in great numbers vpon the plaine.

The Chancellor of France, accompanied with the Presidents and Councillors of the Court of parliament, goe to the Princes, aduertising the Duke of Orleans of the danger of a great confusion, if hee did not foresee it. Herevpon Lewis commaunds his troupes to retire, and staies at the Castle of Beautie vpon Marne, to haue the better meanes to heare from his Vncles, who (by the authoritie of reason and alliance, after many voiajes) reconciled Lewis of Orleans, and John of Bourgongne, hauing seene and embraced one another like kinde Kinsmen, with all outward signes of perfect and cordiall loue. This was but a coloured peace, the which in the end was so heauie a burthen to them both, as it weighed them downe, and by their owne wilfull follies, as if they willingly sought their owne ruines, verifying this assured maxime: That man hath no harme, but what hee seekes himselfe; confirmed by the truth of these Oracles. Ther F haue no harme; but by their owne iniquitie: and; My people haue not obeyed my voice: and, I sell would none of mee, ratified likewise by the experience of all men, all Estates, and all ages. The duke of Orleans sought his owne death, in prouoking his enemy without reason, and the duke of Bourgongne in murdering him, erected a scaffold to shed his owne bloud.

This

A This agreement made; John of Bourgongne informs the King and his counsell, how much it did import to take the towne of Calais from the English, where the commoditie of landing, and the necernesse of the Kings estates, gaue the common enemy great means to molest the prouinces of Flanders and Picardie, requiring aide and succours from the King to besiege it; the which he grants. Wherevpon he with all his cities, make great preparations to fortifie the French army, the which enters into Picardy, attending a commandment to beleager Calais. The artillerie and munition was ready to goe to field, through the great diligence of the Duke of Bourgongne, stirred vp with hope to pull this thorne out of his foote, and to free the trafficke betwixt his subiects and France; when as suddenly the Kings letters pattents come to the heads of the army, commanding all men of B war, of what condition so euer, not to passe any farther, vpon paine of their liues. This vnexpected countermand, accused the Duke of Orleans as the author thereof; and gaue occasion to all men that desired the good of France to detest him, as seruing his owne passions, to the preiudice of the commonweale, but aboue all it gaue too important a cause of discontent to the Duke of Bourgongne, who infinitely grieued with so inexcusable an affront, and such inhumane circumstances of a cruell indignity (for whereto serues it to discover in particular, the grieues of so apparant an iniury) hee resolues to haue his reuenge once for all. Thus farre the Duke of Bourgongne had reason to complaine of the Duke of Orleans, but he exceeds, from reason hee flies to passion, the which is a dangerous counsellour; which presented vnto him a pernicious remedy, being then pleasing to his troubled minde, leauing C him nothing but a late repentance, and his body taken in the trappe which hee himselfe had made.

Thus John resolues to free himselfe of his cousin the Duke of Orleans, who hee supposed would bee a perpetuall and irreconcilable enemy. The motives of this cruell resolution, are visible by the forepassed actions. But they added ielousie herevnto, an intestine fire, which consumes him that lodgeth it in his bosome. The original of the historie speaks nothing hereof, for this shamefull iniurie (which the wise conceale) was not spoken of by those that were chiefly interested. But the learned obserue, that the Duke of Orleans had vied his cousin of Bourgongnes wife too familiarly, when as her husband was in the voiage of Hongarie. A young Flemish Princeesse and browne, of whom they had made a D song, the which the Duke of Orleans caused to be put into musick, and to bee sung before the ielous husband, at a banquet which he had made him, hauing the Princeesse picture in his Cabinet, and vinting that it was the triumph of his loue. These are stabbes which pierce the hearts of generous men with an incurable wound. This they set downe for one of the motives of the Bourguignons hatred against his cousin of Orleans. This vanity cost Lewis of Orleans deere, being giuen exceedingly vnto women, and as it was one of the causes of his death by the iust iudgement of God, so is it considerable, for being slaine by his enemy, amongst his other vices, he shall reproach him of luxury, to iustifie the murder. But let vs obserue the sequele of this Tragedy.

A new cause of discontent betwixt the Duke of Orleans and Bourgongne.

The Duke of Bourgongne resolues to kill his cousin of Orleans.

Lewis Duke of Orleans is slaine by John Duke of Bourgongne, and in the end John makes a counterfeit peace with the children of Lewis, but it is the renuing of greater troubles.

John of Bourgongne hauing resolued to kill Lewis of Orleans his cousin german, went to Paris, with so good a thew, as if hee had no intent to breake the accord so solemnly made betwixt them. That which most troubled him, was to see his enemies authority confirmed by this reconciliation, hauing the absolute gouernment of the State, respected as the Kings brother, and the first prince of the bloud. And (to giue him greater authority and power) the good King Charles had giuen him for a new yeeres giift in the 1407. yeere 1407. the Duchie of Guienne for his portion, whereof the Daulphin then carried the A title. This new fauour and great aduancement, kindled the coale of iealousie in the Bourguignons braine, beeing already much transported, and holding it for certaine, that hee should neuer by any ordinary course preuaile against so passionate and powerfull an enemy, who as his meanes did increase, so would his desire augment to ruine him. Hee therefore thinks it convenient to preuent him, and drawes vnto him men fit for so audacious a murder, Raoulet of Autouille a Norman, an ancient seruant of his house, and discontented with the Kings brother, for that hee had taken from him the office of Generall of Normandy, and a fouldiar of Guines called William Corteheuze, with others of the same humor, to the number of eighreene. This William had a brother called Seas of Corteheuze, a groome of the Kings chamber, who should be the instrument to draw this poore Prince in- B to the pitfall. The Queene lay then in child-bed, the Duke of Orleans goes to visit her after supper, when as this Seas of Corteheuze goes to the Queenes chamber to tell him, that the King desired him to repaire presently vnto him for very important affaires. The Murderers were lodged secretly in a house by the which the Duke should passe. Being mounted vpon his moile, accompanied onely with two Squires vpon one horse, and one that followed on foote, his pages carrying torches both before and behind him, as the horse (which carried the two Squires) came before the house where this ambuscadoe lay, hee beganne to snort and to runne. The murderers issue forth instantly and charge the Duke, at the first they cut off his hand which held the reignes of his horse. Hee cries out, I am the Duke of Orleans, and they answer, It is you we seeke for. They double their blowes with such violence, as they beate him downe and cleaue his head, so as the braines lay scattered vpon the pavement.

The duke of Orleans murdered by the Bourguignon.

The yong Squire that remained with him, runnes desperately among their weapons, and is presently slaine vpon his poore maister. The pages had already giuen the alarm at his lodging, and many came running to succour their Lord, whom the finde thus massacred. There was nothing to bee heard but cries and lamentations, whilest they murderers (having fired a house and cast Calthrops in the streetes) gette themselves into the Duke of Bourgongnes house. Thus the night passeth in miserable lamentations. Valentine doubles the terrour of this horrible accident with fearful out-cries. The Princes his cou- D sines runne thither to participate in this sorrow. All weepe and lament, all crie out in this mournfull house. When the day appeeres, they finde his hand on the one side, and his braines scattered on the other. The reliques of his head are gathered together with teares, and all is kept for an honorable funerall.

O head! how many mischiefs attend thee? Oh murderer! thou shalt be murdered, disloyall, thou shalt be disloyally slaine. I haue horror, yea I tremble to shed this blood again by my report. The very enemies of Lewis were amazed at this audacious murder, foretelling the miseries that should follow. The Queene wonderfully passionate, causeth herselfe to bee remooued to the Kings lodging, and doubles the gards. In the end the King hath notice thereof, and apprehends it according to the weakenesse of his braine, but the Princes provided presently for his safety and their owne, euery man fearing for himselfe in so strang E an accident.

Such was the violent death of Lewis Duke of Orleans, traiterously slaine at Paris by John Duke of Bourgongne, the twenty daie of Nouember in the yeere of our Lord 1407. who thinking to kill his enemies, slew himselfe, and left this blood prodigiously shed, as a mournfull Legacy to his posterity, and hoping in his ouerweening spirit, to vsurpe France from the lawfull heires, hee lost Bourgongne for his posterity, neither could hee hinder his issue whom hee had so treacherously murdered, from the happy enioying of the whole realm, for Lewis Duke of Orleans left three Sonnes by Valentine the heire of Milan, Charles, Philip and John: from Charles the eldest (beeing duke of Orleans,) is issued directly King F Lewis the twelfth, the father of the people, and of John Earle of Angoulesme, father to King Francis the first the father of the mules, who hath giuen fower Kings successiue to our monarchie. But of John of Bourgongne we can reckon but two successors, Philip and Charles. Philip was his sonne, who by the patience of God left Charles in his place, but Charles suffered for his grand-fathers errors and his owne, for hee died in blood: his pride

The issue of Lewis of Orleans.

A pride was interred in an vknowne tombe, and Bourgogne was pluckt from the felonious hands of this murdering race, and vnted to the Crowne. Now John of Bourgogne shall commit strange disorders during twelue yeares, from the date of this massacre, and it seemes that blind Fortune hath adorned his temples with bayes and triumph, to guerdon these execrable crimes: but he is not freed that drawes his haltar after him. Hee shall soone pay both principall and interest to Gods iust iudgement, which slackes not, although it seeme slacke, but comes in due season, marching slowly, to take all excuse from the obstinate and impudent sinner, recompensing in the end this apparent slacknesse of punishment, by the greatnesse of eternall paine.

But let vs returne to this desolate house: Valentine widdow to Lewis, with her three sons, B and Isabell of France the Kings eldest daughter, wife to Charles, the eldest sonne of Lewis, now Duke of Orleans, by the decease of his father, come all to our poore King Charles, (beeing sicke) to demanda iustice. All cast themselves at the Kings feete, as much discom- forted as themselves, for the cruell death of his onely brother, whome he had alwaies loued dearly both found and sicke. Lewis of Aniou King of Sicily and Naples, the Dukes of Berry and Bourbon; with all the Princes of the blood, accompany them in this lamentable state, wherein Charles promisseth to giue them satisfaction.

Valentine demands iustice for the death of her husband.

The Kings Councell being assembled, they require an account of the Prouost, what hee had done in search of these murderers. He answers, that hauing done his duty he could not find any thing. That there were no places vnsearcht, but Princes and great mens houses,

C where if he might be suffered to enter, he would do his best, to discover the murderers. The Princes were all in Councell, and the Bourguignon amongst them, all promise it freely: John of Bourgongne (guiltie of the crime) holds his peace: and as they beheld one another; he riseth, and drawing the King of Sicile and the Duke of Berry apart, he confesseth, that through the devils motion he had committed this murder. These Princes (beeing amazed) concele it for that day. The next day comming to Councell, the Duke of Berry willed him to retyre himselfe. Thus amazed he returnes to his lodging, and presently without any staie he flies with fure more into Flanders, where the murderers likewise finde a sure re- treat. That conscience which at the first had terrified him, is now hardened: and that which had mooued him to confesse himselfe the author of this murder, doth now animate D him with new motions, to become obstinate, and to maintaine by vniust force, that which hee had committed by furious violence. Hauing sought the loue of all the Cities of Flanders, he finds them willing to support him, in right or wrong in his necessitie: vpon this assurance he calles an assembly at Gand, to leuie those succours whereof he stood in need.

John of Bourgogne confesseth the murder.

Flies from Paris.

At the newes hereof, the zeale of iustice growes cold in Court: they seeke an accord with him whom they should pursue: the King of Sicile, and the Duke of Berry goe to him to Amiens, beeing prouder then if he had done a meritorious acte, where making open profession of his pride, he had placed ouer the doore of his lodging, a table wherein were painted two Lances a crosse, whereof the one had a well steeled head for the warre; and the other a burr head for the Tilt, as giuing the choice of warre and peace: publishing generally that he not onely had done the murder, but that he would and ought to doe it. And to the end he might be mad with reason, he findes Diuines in those daies that confirme him in this passion, and protest to maintaine it by the Scripture, as the sequele will presently shew. The Princes that were sent vnto him, (not able to mooue him to confesse his fault, and to humble himselfe:) they command him in the Kings name not to come to Paris. He answers them boldly, that he would presently go, to informe the King what reason had mooued him to punish the common enemy of France.

Fortifies himselfe.

And hauing reuiued his practises at Paris, by meanes of his intelligences, he gathers together a great armie, and accompanied with his two breethren, and the dukes of Lorraine and Cleues, he comes to S. Denis, and lodgeth his troupes about this great Citty, who willingly stretch forth their hands vnto him, as to their redeemer, who should purchase them perpetuall rest. The Princes go vnto him, and intreate him in the Kings name, not to enter into Paris, but with his ordinarie traine of 200. men. John makes them answer: That for the suretie of his person, hee could doe no lesse then to go well accompanied, and the next day he

he arriues at Paris with all his troupes, beeing receiued by the Parisiens with cries of ioy, as a new Monarch. He fortifies himselfe in Bourgogne house, where he is visited by the whole bodie of the cittie and the Vniuersitie, who seeke to support this execrable murther. The next day the game is played with a strange præludium. John Petit, a Doctor of Diuinitie, maintained (with wonderfull impudencie) that the Duke of Bourgogne had caused the duke of Orleans his cousin to be worthily slaine, by reason of many notable crimes, whercof he doth accuse him. The Originall of the historie doth set downe these detestable phrenesies, to shew how much disorder preuailes in an estate without a head. The Councell of Constans shall condemne this Impostor, beeing accused by the Colledge of Sorbonne, who shall disauow this mercenarie man, after the death of the Duke of Bourgogne.

And is absolved for the murther.

The issue was answerable to his speech. The King beeing sicke in mind, and the Princes fainting, John of Bourgogne is absolved of the murther committed on the person of his Cousin germaine. The King (to couer this bad act) declares by his letters pattents. That in case he died, he would that Lewis his eldest sonne, Daulphin of Viennois, should haue the gouernment of the Realme, and after him John and Charles his younger sonnes, one after another, without any Regent. But the Bourguignon was ignorant, that this decree gaue him authoritie that should punish him: beeing also aduised (for some speciall considerations) not to deale any more with the affaires of France, but with his owne. So he retires into Flanders, not daring to attempt any thing, beeing thus iustified and absolved.

This insolencie, accompanied with some indignities against the Kings maiestic, displeased the whole Court: and not iustificable by the Bourguignon faction, it caused Valentine and her children to renew their complaints to the Kings Councell, who stoutly made a decree against John Duke of Bourgogne, for satisfaction of the murther committed by him on the person of the Duke of Orleans. But what auails it to report that which tooke no effect, but onely to proue, That when lawfull authoritie is suppressed, iustice is of no force, and the stronger treades under foote the right of the weaker. As it proued in this ridiculous and imaginative sentence, giuen in fauour of the children of Orleans against the murtherer of their father: for it was scarce recorded for the benefit of the interested, when as newes came of the victorie which John of Bourgogne had gotten against them of Liege, in fauour of John of Bauaria surnamed Without-pittie, their bishop. This did quite change all their thoughts, countenances and words in Court; all Commissions for the leauying of souldiars, for the execution of this decree, by force are reuoked. There is no talke, but how to warrant the King and Daulphin from the Bourguignon, who without doubt would (according to his humor) bring his victorious armie to Paris, disannull the decree vpon their heads that should maintaine it. So as the Daulphin with the Dukes of Berry, & Bourbon conduct the King to Tours for his better safetie, beeing vnwilling to leaue him in the Parisiens power, who were passionate partisans of the Bourguignon.

The King forsakes Paris.

The Parisiens are wonderfully discontented at this departure: they arme, drawe their chaines, as in a time of warre: and call in the Bourguignon, assuring him of their hearts and meanes. He comes speedily with a great armie, and staies at S. Denis, contrarie to the Parisiens expectation, who thought he would haue kept more firme, hauing so great forces. But he wisely weighing the vanitie of popular tumults, resolues to husband this occasion; and to make his peace with the King and the house of Orleans, hauing so great an aduantage ouer them, to ratifie the abolition which he had obtained against all euent, Hee then sends his Ambassadors to King Charles to Tours, William Duke of Bauaria, the Lords of S. George, Croy, Vieufille and Dolehaing, to treat a peace with him and the children of Orleans, making great shewes of humilitie and loue.

Valentine Duchesse of Orleans dies for griefe.

This new course moued the King and Princes, the which they expected not from the Duke of Bourgogne, beeing so late a Conqueror: so as they easily yeeld to an agreement, vpon conditions; but still to the preiudice of the poore widow, and afflicted Orphans. In this confusion, Valentine Duchesse of Orleans (seeing her paines lost in the pursuite of so iust a cause) dies for thought within few daies after: leauing great trouble and few friends to her children, and great ioy to the Bourguignon, seeing his cause wonne by the death of this couragious woman, who onely might oppose her selfe. The King comes to Chartres, to solemnize this peace, he sends for Charles Duke of Orleans and his breethren, and for

John

John Duke of Burgogne; and all appeare at a prefixed day. A scaffold is made, where the King sits in his seat of Iustice, enuironed with the Princes of his blood, in great state. John Duke of Burgogne (approaching neere the King) kneeles downe with Dolehaing his aduocate, who speaketh thus. Liege Lord, behold the Duke of Burgogne, your seruant and Cousin is come vnto you, for that he vnderstands you are much offended with him, for the deed done and committed on the person of my Lord the Duke of Orleans your brother, for the good of the realme and of your person, as he is ready to let you vnderstand whensoever it shall please you, and therefore my Lord, he doth humbly beseech you, that it would please you to forget the wrath and indignation you haue conceiued against him, and to receiue him into fauour.

After these words, the King commaunded the Duke to retire himselfe: which done, the Queene, the Daulphin, the Kings of Sicile and Nauarre, and the Duke of Berry fall on their knees before the King, and the Queene said; Dread Lord wee beseech you to grant the request of your Cousin the Duke of Burgogne. The King answered, wee will and doe grant it for your sakes. The Duke of Bourgogne beeing called againe, kneeles before the King, who saies vnto him, Faire Cousin we grant your request, and pardon you all. The Duke, hauing thanked the King, riseth. Behind the Kings chaire stood Charles of Orleans with his breethren weeping bitterly. The Duke of Bourgogne goes vnto them accompanied with his Aduocate, and hauing saluted them with a very humble countenance, the Aduocate spake thus vnto them, My Lord, the Duke of Bourgogne here present, intreates you to put out of your remembrance that hatred which you may haue against him, for the outrage committed on the person of my Lord of Orleans your father, and that hereafter you will remaine good kinsmen and louing friends. The Duke added, And hereof I pray you. But they answered nothing. Then the king said vnto them: My faire Cousins, I will haue it so. And they answered: Lege-Lord, seeing it pleaseth you to commaund vs, wee yeeld thereto: for we will not disobey your commandements in any thing. The Duke accepted it, thanking the King and his Cousins of Orleans. Then the Cardinall of Barre brought the holy Testament, whereon both parties did sweare a peace, neuer to remember what was past, and to hold a perpetuall league of friendship. And the King said, we will that hereafter you liue like good Kinsmen and friends together, and we strictly charge you not to wrong one another, nor any other person that hath fauoured you: neither shew any malice or hatred vnto them, as you tender our displeasure, except such as committed the said murther, whom we banish our Realme for euer. These are the very words faithfully collected out of the Originall of that age. This happened the ninth of March, 1409. Then followed nothing but mariages: the Duke of Bourgogne married his two breethren, Philip earle of Neuers with the heire of Couffy, and Anthony duke of Brabant, with the heire of Luxemburg. He is greatly in credit both with the King and Queene, his traine seemed greater then his masters, the bountie of his Kitchin drawes men from all parts: but hee had not made his peace with God, neither (in his heart) with those poore Orphelins, destitute both of friends and meanes, at whose cost this peace was made, the which was but counterfeite and continued not long.

To governes the Court.

AFTER this accord the Court takes a new forme. Queene Izabell thinks no more of her poore Nephewes of Orleance, she is wholly the Duke of Bourgongne. The Duke of Berry follows the same traine. For prooffe of a cordiall friendship, the Queene doth openly fauour the marriage so long promised, of Lewis the Daulphin her eldest sonne, with Katherine daughter to the Duke of Bourgongne, which marriage was solemnized. Now John of Bourgongne is father-in-law to the Daulphin: it is he which gouernes both his heart and house. Moreover, Charles King of Nauarre, Lewis Duke of Bauaria, the Dukes of Lorraine, Brittain, Barre, Alençon, Cleues, Vaudemont, and (after their example) the greatest Noblemen in Court, are all on his side. There is nothing but feasting in his house, all ioy, whilest the Orphans of Orleans weepe. Paris honours him as their protector, and trusts none but him, and John doth affect nothing more carefully with the King and Daulphin, then the loue of the people. He doth all he can to please them. The chiefe subiect of his discourse, is to reforme the State, to seeme thereby more affectionate to the common weale. In a sollemne feast, (where all the Court was present) he gaue to his friends, in stead of a banquet, plomets of gold and siluer, shewing by this figure, that his desire was to rule the State well: and to shew the effect of his words he procured this notable occasion. All men cryed out of the Treasurers, as horse-leeches of the common treasure, and the chiefe causes of bad husbandrie, whereby the King and people were so much impouerished. We haue made mention before of one of the Kings chiefe minions called Montagu, who had too soon fled the storme: beeing returned he growes in greater credit with the King then before, who giues him the office of Lord Steward, and marries his eldest sonne to the sister of the Lord of Albret, his Constable, although Montagu were but of a meane calling. The shew of his traine exceeded Princes houses, and made him odious to all in generall, so as they accused him to haue robbed his Prince and the publike Treasure. The Bourguignon beginnes with him, in the reformation of the State. The Princes of the blood were easily drawne to allow of his proceedings: so as Montagu was taken, condemned, and speedily beheaded. Whether this were done by commissioners, or iudicially (as it was said to be iustified after his death) it is not certaine. This is a good lesson for meane men, that grow rich by the publike treasure, not to abuse their wealth by excessiue pompe: to keepe their credit in Court, and to flie the furie of great men, vnder his protection that hath power of life and death, arming themselves with a good conscience and vnreprouable in their charges. But the Bourguignon had a farther reach then Montagu: for vnder colour of the publike good, he reuenged himselfe of him, who else might haue crost his desires. His meaning was not to reforme the State, but to gouerne it absolutely. Thus he seeks to vsurpe all, and in the ruine of Montagu, he will haue all men know that he hath power to hurt and helpe. This first insolencie furthered his enemies, beeing in a manner forsaken of all men, euen of their owne blood: for John Duke of Berry (carried away with the vent of this new fauour) had subiected himselfe to the Bourguignon: but finding himselfe contemned by him, who tooke all to himselfe, and reiected such as had serued him to rise, John resolues to ioyne with the house of Orleans, and to oppose themselves against the Duke of Bourgongnes greatnesse.

Montagu put to death.

This

A This is the beginning of the two factions of Orleance and Bourgogne, which troubled all France during this raigne. This league (whereof the house of Orleance bare the name (as the first and most interested) was concluded at Gyen in the yeare 1410. the 10. of March, beeing defensiu and offensiu against the house of Bourgogne. The chiefe were Charles Duke of Orleance and his breethren, John Duke of Berry, Lewis Duke of Bourbon, John Earle of Alençon, Francis Earle of Clermont, Bernard Lord of Armagnac, and Charles Lord of Albret, Constable of France, with their friends and followers in great numbers. Of the Bourguignon faction, were John Duke of Bourgongne with his breethren, Charles king of Nauarre, (sonne to that wretch, of whom we haue made mention) the Dukes of Lorraine, Brabant and Brittain, the Marquis of Pont, the Earles of Neuers, Vaudemont, S. Pol, Ponthieu and many others. This murtherfull diuision continued vnto the yeare 1419. in the which John was slaine, but it ends not so. During these eight yeares we shall see diuers changes, one in, and another out, as they could enable themselves with the Kings authoritie, which is the strongest barriere of ciuill warres. Now the Duke of Bourgongne is in quarter, and plants his Ordinance against the Orleanois, as guiltie of high treason: but shortly hee shall be dispossessed, and they of Orleance shall take their turne.

The house of Orleance complains, that they are not respected according to their degree: they sue to be admitted to the priuiledges due to Princes of the blood, and that the Duke of Bourgongne should not command absolutely, holding (as they sayd) both the bodies and wils of the King, Queen, and Daulphine in captiuitie. They assemble in great troupes, first at Chartres, and after (to manage their affaires with greater shew neere vnto the capital Cittie of Paris) they lodged at the Castell of Winchester, then called Bicestre, but now ruined. The Duke of Bourgongne accused the Duke of Orleance for practising to take the Crowne from the King and Daulphin, perswading the King to what he pleased against them as against rebels and disturbers of the publike quiet. This fire continued but seauen or eight moneths, wherein there chanced no memorable accident, but onely the death of Lewis the good Duke of Bourbon, who died for griefe in the beginning of this warre, beeing accused as the motiue of these troubles.

D Queene Izabell laboured to reconcile these Princes, but she preuailed not, beeing suspected by the Orlean faction, whom she had left without cause, to ioyne with the Bourguignon. After some Edicts of confiscation, not executed (like Canon shot spent in the aire) a peace was made by meanes of the Duke of Berry, vpon condition that he and the Duke of Bourgongne should ioyntly haue the Daulphin in guard, and the house of Orleance should be respected in their degree, and that Peter of Eflards (a sworne enemy to their partie and a most passionate seruant to the Duke of Bourgongne) should be no more Prouost of merchants. This was concluded at Winchester, whereof it beares the name, the twentieth day of November in the same yeare, hauing contended this sommer about Paris onely, to the hurt of the poore people, discontented chiefly with the Gascons that came out of Armagnac, who gaue their name to the troupes of the Orlean faction, called for this occasion Armagnacs, wearing for their colours a white scarf, the which they haue vsed in our last troubles. This first peace continued not long, neither were all promises performed. The Bourguignon did eate the cake alone, and yet he complained first, as hauing to do with children. He sends the Lords of Croy and Douries, to the Duke of Berry, to disioyne him from the Duke of Orleance his Nephew; who hauing intelligence of their negotiation and passage, caused them to be surprized in Sologne, and brought prisoners to Blois: but he sent backe Douries, and detained Croy, as suspected to be guiltie of his fathers death, and by consequence punishable by the treatie of peace. The King commands him to set him at libertie: and he demands iustice of his fathers murtherer. Hereupon they go all to armes. They cause the King to summon him by his Edicts, whereunto Charles duke of Orleance answers, by a challenge to the Duke of Bourgongne, as the murtherer of his father, and the author of all the miseries which then raigned in France.

F Thus beganne this second warre, the twentieth of July the yeare following, 1411. the Princes passions giuing the poore people scarce seuen moneths respite to breath in so many calamities, which they suffered through their voluntarie diuisions. The Orlean faction assembles at Gergeau vpon the riuier of Loire, to resolue of the meanes to make warre against John

Beginning of the second warre.

John Duke of Bourgongne, whom they challenge by a publike cartell, as the murderer of a Prince of the blood, the Kings onely brother: and as vſurper of the royall authoritie, holding the perſons and wils of the King and Daulphin captiue. John Duke of Bourgongne had great aduantage; the Kings authoritie, and the Daulphins, (who was heire apparent to the Crowne of France) the capitall cittie of the Realme, the approbation of the beſt Citties, moſt of the Prouinces, and without compariſon greater meanes of himſelfe, both for men and money.

This ſecond warre continued a yeare, it began in July, 1411. and ended the yeare after, 1412. in the ſame moneth, farre more variable and violent then the firſt, and memorable in this, that the vanquiſhed was victor, and the victor vanquiſhed. The ſame authoritie which had ſupported the ſtronger, was in the end fauourable to the weaker: ſuch as moſt pleaſed their maiſters humor, receiued death of him for their reward. Very neceſſarie obſeruations to iudge of theſe ciuill warres. The Orlean faction went firſt to field. They were about ſeuene or eight thouſand horſe. The number of their foote is not ſpecified. Charles Duke of Orleans makes the bodie of his armie in Gallinois: the Duke of Bourbon in Bourbons, and the Earle of Alanson in Vermandois. Peronne, Chauny, Neele and Han, yeeld vnto them. Clermont (which belonged to the Duke of Bourbon) is fortified: they ſeek to ſurprize Reſteuil and Bapaumes, but in vaine. This was the firſt ſally begun by them of Orleans: but the Bourguignon takes another courſe, he prepares the Kings Edicts againſt them, he employes the peoples force within the Citties, and armes in field, and all auails him at the firſt. He had a great armie both of horſe and foote, the which doth preſently march into Picardie, where the Orleanois had begun, and eaſily recouers what they had gotten. Han ſtands reſolute: they beſeege, take, ſpoile and ſack it.

The Flemings which were vaſſals to the Duke of Bourgongne, being laden with ſpoile, craue leaue to returne home, neither could the Dukes promiſes, nor threatnes retaine them, but they leaue his armie and depart. This had almoſt ouerthrowne his affaires, he abandons Mondidier, the which was preſently ſurprized by Peter of Queſnes, Lord of Gannes, of the Orlean faction, and putting his armie into Garrifons, doubting the euent of this warre, he ſends with all ſpeed to Henry the fourth, King of England, crauing ſuccors in this neceſſitie. Henry makes his profit of theſe ciuill diſſentions in France: he preſently ſends twelue hundred men to the Bourguignon, to ſupply the Flemings want, vnder the command of Thomas Earle of Arondel. The Orleanois looſe no time; and for their nearer approach to Paris, they ſurprize S. Denis, and S. Cloud, places of importance, and fortiſie Corbeil for the paſſage of the riuer, of purpoſe to ſaniſh this great Cittie, which liues by daily prouiſions brought from diuers parts. But he finds one to countermine his practiſes, vſing the ſame inſtrument he had employed to hurt him. The Orleanois keeping the field about Paris, muſt needes be the cauſe of great calamities. And all this was acted in the view of the King and Daulphin.

John informes the King of his enemies inſolencie, who (without appealing to his Maieſty) preſumed to ſpoile the heart of France, as if they were ſtrangers or enemies. Charles apprehends this error but too eaſily, deſiring nothing but reſt: but Lewis the Daulphin eſpecially is incited by theſe informations, and his choller increaſeth daily againſt his Couſins of Orleans. The Bourguignon ſaid, that they played the Kings, and could not conſeale their intention, which was to ſeize on the Crowne, ſeeing they preſumed to take armes againſt the King. There are rigorous Edicts made againſt the Orlean faction, as againſt rebels and guiltie of high treaſon. All their goods, honours and perſons are conſiſcate which remaine in this armie, if within fifteene dayes after publication of the Kings letters patentes, they retire not them ſelues to their houſes. And to begin with the greateſt, Charles of Albret Conſtable of France, and Arnold of Corby the Chancellor, are diſpoſſeſſed of their dignities, and the Earle of Saint Pol preferred to the firſt place, and Dolehaing the Duke of Bourgongnes aduocate to the laſt.

This ſtorme makes worke at Paris, they ſeek out all of the Orlean partie, and preſently caſt them into priſon: Peter of Eſſars being reſtored to his place, remembers the article made againſt him at Wincheſtre, and armes the people againſt them. Whoſoeuer is found out by the Parifienſis, being of the Orlean faction, he is brought with hazard of his life

A to priſon. All is lawfull in this popular rage, ſo it be againſt the Armagnacs. All theſe engines forced from diuers parts, doe ſtrangely ſhake the Orlean partie. Such as were reſtrained within any townes, durſt not breathe: and many in the armie ſlippe away daily, ſcaring the rigour of theſe Edicts, which were executed with all ſeueritie. Charles Duke of Orleans (hauing taken counſell of the Princes and Noblemen, his aſſociates, what courſe to follow in this alteration, before a greater inconueniency) reſolues to draw the Bourguignon to battell, although he were fortified with theſe new forces from England. So as hauing paſſed the riuer of Oyle, vpon a bridge of boates (all the paſſages being ſeized on by the Bourguignon in the Kings name) he preſents himſelfe before the gates of Clermont in Beauuoſis, where John his capitall enemy remained. The Orlean armie is faire, beautified with the preſence of great perſonages: the Duke of Bourbon, the Earles of Alenſon, Clermont, Albret, Vertus, Vienne, Bouciquaur, the Archbiſhop of Sens, (brother to that Montagu, which was beheaded) Craon, Montbaſon, Hangeſt, with many Barons, Knights, and Squires, all reſolute to end this quarrell by battell: and to that end (hauing deſied the Duke of Bourgongne) they attend him, betwixt Clermont and Catherenay. But the Bourguignon leauing them there to ſpoile that goodly and fertill cuntry of the Iſle of France, whereby they increaſed the hatred and curſe of the people, more incenſed then euer againſt theſe Armagnacs, exclaiming of him as of a coward that durſt not fight, he arriues at Paris, to the peoples great content, who attend him with all deuotion. He preſently takes Saint Cloud and Saint Denis from the Orlean partie, to their great loſſe, notwithstanding any diligence of Charles their head, who proclaimed a victorie before the combate. Thus Paris is freed without any reſtraint, and all the Orlean partie brought very lowe. Neither Charles nor his Aſſociates, talke any more of fighting with the Bourguignon: they had worke enough to retire themſelues, and to defend their Townes, expecting a preſent ſeige. John of Bourgongne ſaies not to huſband this good ſucceſſe, and (to countenance his forces) hee doth engage the King and Daulphin in the purſuite of his enemies traſe vanquiſhed. So his victorior armie enters into Beauſe, turning head towards the Duchie of Orleans, the inheritance of his chiefe enemy. Eſtampes yeelds to the King. The Duke of Bourbon is there taken priſoner, and ſent preſently into Flanders.

D Whileſt that all things ſucceeded thus happily for the Duke of Bourgongne, Henry the fourth King of England calles home the troupes he had ſent to his ſuccour, vnder the Earle of Arondels command, intreating the Duke to hold him excuſed, if he did vſe his owne at his neede. He had no meaning to fauour the ſtronger partie, but to ſuccour the weaker, as experience did ſoone teach. This ſodaine alteration did ſomewhat ſtay the Bourguignons deſſeine to attempt Orleans: but making warre aduiſedly, he attends his enemies proceeding and taking an honeſt leaue to retire, by reaſon of the winter, he comes to Paris, where (not to looſe any time) he continues the Kings thundring Edicts, and executes many of his priſoners, to ſheſh the people. To blood hee addes Eccleſiaſtical Excommunications againſt the Armagnacs, whileſt the Orleanois take cold by making warre in Charolois, and ſending for ſuccors into England, ſeeking for releefe in the ſame place where their enemy had found E a ſcourge to whip them.

Certaine letters (carried by a Monke from the Duke of Orleans to the King of England) were intercepted, and brought to Paris, being examined in full aſſembly of the Vniuerſitie, and from thence imparted to the people, with the Bourguignons Commentaries. They made the Orlean faction ſo much the more odious, as if the Dukes of Orleans, Burgie, and Bourbon (combined together) had fought to take the Crowne from the King and Daulphin, and to diſmember the Realme in giuing part of it to the Engliſh, and to deuide the reſt among themſelues. Strange newes without any ſubieſt, which vaniſh at their breeding: but yet they ſerue to purpoſe, according to the deſſeine of their Architects.

F The King and Daulphin (being poſſeſſed by John of Bourgongne) haue no thought but to ruine the Orlean partie, and put vp with this firſt ſucceſſe, hoping to finiſh the reſt, they imploy all their meanes to leaue a great army, the which (through the Bourguignons care) was held to be an hundred thouſand men. A notable number, after ſo many miſeries, and in ſo great a conſuſion.

1412. The cittie of Bourges was of great importance, for the vnting of the Prouinces on that side Loire, where the associate Princes had their greatest supplies of men. The Bourguignons greatest malice was against the Duke of Berry, who not onely had forsaken him, but (for his degree and age) vnderstood much in his enemies affaires. They resolue therefore to beseege it, to make the way more easie for the conquest of the rest. In the beginning of the Spring, the King and Daulphin go from Paris to their armie, which assembled in Gastinois: being entred into Berry the lesser Towns yeeld without question. Dun le Roy, Fontenay, & Sancerre. Bourges beeing summoned, makes answer: That neither the King nor Daulphin did make this warre, but the Duke of Bourgongne, who holding their persons and willes captiue, would depriue the Princes of France of their right, hauing imbrued his murdering hands in the blood of the first Prince of the Crown, seeking to vsurpe the State. There were very many good souldiers within the Cittie, which were supplied with all that might be wished for in a long sege. They intreated the enemy (in scorn) that hee would approach neere the Cittie; and they leaue their gates open in a brauerie. Many fortunate sallies are made by them, crying in field, God save the King. They take many prisoners. The waters abroad are poisoned, and many die before they discouer the cause.

All rings out with militarie railings of Armagnacs and Bourguignons: but the greatest defeat is in spoiling of the Countrie. All the prouision beeing carried into the cittie, what a spoile should an armie of an hundred thousand men with their followers make; and (to increase the miserie) all the houses of the champion countrie were either sackt or burnt. The English (beeing victors in France) neuer committed greater spoiles then these French armies.

As the Duke of Berry (the Lord of that countrie) was much grieved to see these spoils, so the Daulphin (the heire apparent of the Crowne) was discontented with his father in lawes ambition, growing odious vnto him. His blood (which could not degenerate) mooued him to compassion, and the blood vnjustly shed, troubled his conscience. For, to what end should they ruine a whole Realme to execrable a murder? If zeale to reforme the State (saith he) be the Bourguignons intent, is this the way? His father (beeing sicke) could not apprehend these things, by reason of his infirmities: what reproch then were it for him (beeing his eldest son) to suffer himselfe to be bafled by his father-in-law, like vnto an infant? These apprehensions mooued this young Prince, who nothing dissembling his conceptions, told his father openly, that he was not pleased with these confusions, and that they must find out some meanes to pacifie them. It chanced one day, as they aduertised the King, that in a sally made by them of the towne, they had slaine some one of his seruants, the Daulphin cried out in the presence of the Bourguignon: Shall we neuer haue an end of these miseries? I am resolved to make them cease. The Bourguignon hauing before discouered some coldnesse in this young Prince, found his mind now to be wholly changed. Hee therefore replied mildly: That it should be well done, so as they of Orleance would acknowledge their error. How (saith the Daulphin) shall they acknowledge their fault. If we do not know them for our bloud? And then they resolved to make a peace. The Duke of Berry had layed the foundation by Lignac, great master of Rhodes, who failed not to embrace this occasion, seeing the Daulphin so well affected. The Earle of Sauoy had sent his Ambassadors, to exhort both parties. After a moneths sege they begin to treat of the meanes to pacifie these troubles. The Bourguignon makes halt to be the first in all things, and parles with the Duke of Berry betwixt two barres. One accuseth, the other excuseth, but in the end a peace is concluded by Deputies.

The Princes, at an interview imbrace one another, with all shewes of cordiall loue, such as their blood makes shew of, after long bitternesse. The Bourguignon onely is troubled, doubting this peace to them would be a warre to him, for that he had no peace in his owne Conscience.

The King enters into Bourges, where the place is signed, and for that reason it was called the peace of Bourges, the 25. of Iuly, in the yeare 1412. A Parliament is called at Auxerre, to confirme it by sollemne oth. The Princes are receiued into fauour with the King and Daulphin, all Edicts made against them, were disannulled and of no force. They and theirs restored to their degrees and dignities: all things to be forgotten. The names of Armagnac & Bourguignon

A (as infamous markes of ciuill dissensions) forbidden vpon paine of death: and the English (come to the succour of the associate Princes) to be satisfied out of the Kings Treasure. Without the cittie of Auxerre, neere to the Abbey of S. Marian, a stately scaffold was made, where the king sitting in his seate of Iustice, enuironed with his Princes, the officers of his Crowne, and the chiefe Deputies of the Parliament, the peace was proclaimed with as great ioy, as the warre had bene tedious and mournfull. To confirme this peace with Iohn of Bourgongne, Philip Earle of Vertus married his daughter: but all this could not reconcile him to the house of Orleans. The Daulphin teiocyed much at this peace, and made all shewes of loue to his Cousins lately reconciled, beeing grieved that there had bene so long dissention betwene them: desirous to repaire what was past, and aboue al to maintaine an inuolable peace within the Realme. The good sicke King present at all, yeelded his consent and authoritie, sometimes inclined to good, sometimes to ill. Queene Izabel held with the strongest: but all these good motions were crossed by the Bourguignon, so as all the confusions of this reign are not yet ended.

IOHN Duke of Bourgongne seeing himselfe crost by

LEWIS the Daulphin, and the house of Orleance restored to grace, stirs vp new troubles, from the yeare 1412. vnto 17. when as the Daulphin died, but the troubles ceased not.

D FRANCE began to hope for better, by the meanes of Lewis the eldest sonne of King Charles: hauing a desire to make a peace against the Bourguignons will. But this was not all they expected of the Daulphins first resolution: yet the weaknesse of the sicke King, and the inconstancie of this young Lieutenant gaue the subtil braine of Iohn of Bourgongne too great an aduantage to suffer the French to enioy the fruites of peace so much desired, who neuer yeelded to bare threats, but grew more resolute. And notwithstanding this alteration of the Daulphin his sonne in law, yet hee left not the Court, beeing alwaies neere the King, keeping the Councell in breath, who were for the most part all of his faction: and although they worshipped the Sunne rising, yet seeing the spirit of this young Prince to be weak and inconstant, and the Bourguignons firme resolution, they stood vpon their guard, doing nothing that might openly offend either the one or the other, but vnder-hand they fought to please the most politicke and reboubted master; who else might prooue a most cruell and dangerous enemy.

Thus were affaires handled in the Kings Councell. And as not onely the Court, but the whole world, is an ebbing and flowing of diuers humors, the which doe change according to occasions: and the scaffold whereon dissembling, trecherie, and treason play their partes diuersly. So at that time the Bourguignon (a principall artizan of these goodly shewes) found an ample subiect wherein to employ his filthy trade. But although he seemed to haue gained all, whatsoeuer he desired that should come to passe, and to haue attained the full of his desires, yet all his enterprises came to nothing, and in the end he payed (with the price of his blood) the great debt of his horrible wickednesse. But this Act shall haue many Scenes. In the first, our Historie shall set downe the new gouernement of Lewis the Daulphin. This young Prince was not capable of so great a charge, hauing an idle braine, beeing carelesse and voluptuous, giuen to his owne will, obstinate, taking no aduice from any but of himselfe, or from young men of his owne humour: loth to yeeld to any that vnderstood more then himselfe, and especially to his vncles, whose graue haire he disdaind: neither could he loue his father-in-law, beeing resolved to gouerne the Realme alone. The Queene seeing her Sonnes humor inclined to loue the house of Orleance, made shew to fauour them: but in effect she was indifferent, beeing wholly giuen to flatter with her husband, and to gouerne him according to the time.

The Bourguignon dissembling his sonne in lawes wayward humours, was alwaies neere A the King, giuing him such goodly reasons as the good Prince could not gaine-say him. The subiect of his sutes was pleasing to the Parisiens, whose good liking he entertained chearefully, but alwaies with an intent to be reuenged of his enemies, vnder this goodly name of the common-wealth, as the soueraigne end of all his desseins: but in effect he held still one of the chiefe places, not yielding in any thing, to gouerne them which seemed to rule, and to keepe backe such, as might crosse his authoritie. By the peace of Bourges the Constable of Albret should be restored to his dignitie, and Arnold of Corbie to his Chancelorship. They delay him from day to day, but in the end they are restored with much difficulty. The meanest haue many delays, more troublesome then a flat repulse, beeing more willing to leaue all, then to make these fruitlesse poursuites. Arnold of Corbie beeing honorably restored to his place, resigned it into the kings hands, to auoide the daunger of so confused a time: more wisely then Henry of Marle that succeeded him, beeing slaine at the massacre at Paris, with the Constable of Armagnac. But the Bourguignon flew a higher pitch, then to preiudice the house of Orleance in their goods and honours, or to crosse their affaires and their followers. He found no better expedient, then to do as he had done with Lewis their father: For a dead Lyon doth no harme. To this end he assembles some of his most trustie followers at Paris, to find meanes to murder the Dukes of Orleance, Berry and Bourbon: but Peter of Essars (one of his most violent partisans) discovered this practise, for the which he soone after smarted.

By the treatie of Bourges, the English (which came to the Duke of Orleance succour) must be satisfied. They presse for payment, one part beeing discharged (to the Duke of Orleance great hinderance) he was forced to leaue his brother John Earle of Angoulesme in hostage for the rest: beeing carried into England he was in the end redeemed, after much trouble and many delays.

In this article the Bourguignon made shew of his good husbandrie, solliciting the English vnder hand, on the one side for to presse Charles his principall debtor, and on the other side he cried out against the disorder of the Kings treasure, so ill gouerned as there was not sufficient to furnish the ordinarie expences of his house: pretending all these great sums to be wasted, either by the Treasurers, in gifts, or in superfluous expences. This complaint was very plausible, but it was a pit-fall to catch his enemies, and to mutine this discontented people, by reason of their great oppression, beeing easie to be moued at the name of the commonweale. He soone obtained from the King a generall conuocation of the chiefe cities, to reforme the abuses of the Realme, and especially of the treasure, for the releefe of the poore people. To make this partie good, the Cittie of Paris must make the first point: but the Vniuersitie which stood as a neuter (dealing with nothing but their bookes) should make the proposition and first instance.

The cause was vehemently set downe by a Doctor (chosen for the purpose) and auowed by the Cittie and Deputies of the Prouinces: such as were subiect to accompts, were much terrified, and the greatest number fled: such as were taken, lost their heads at the Halles or Greue, to the peoples great content, who highly commend the Duke of Bourgongne, as the onely Prince which loued the good of the Realme. The Dauphin growes ielous at the sound of these praises (as prejudiciall to his honour) vowing neuer to suffer the Bourguignon to attempt any thing against his authoritie. Such as were interestted, fedde the young Princes humor: who (by the meanes of Lewis of Bauaria his Vncle by the mother side) perswade him to take the name of Regent for a marke of his greatnesse.

He takes this title, and giues notice to the Duke of Bourgongne, that it is now high time hee were knowne in his degree. The Bourguignon (protesting that he hath no other obiect but the good of the Realme) makes no shew to deale in these affaires, leauing the gouernment thereof to whome it appertained: yet vnder-hand hee caused the Parisiens to arme, and (least the better sort should bee called into question) hee employes the basest, beeing led by one Cabech a butcher, followed by a multitude of rascalles, who (being armed) come in troups to the Regents lodging, and require of him by rowle the chiefe enemies of the Bourguignons house, who (they sayd) had gouerned the treasure, or had beene enriched by excessive gifts. Amongst the which was Peter of Essars, who (without any

A any long processe) lost his head, receiuing a iust reward for his great wickednesse, by his hands, who had then caused him to commit them. But this was not one daies furie: the next day the people assemble in great multitudes, and taking white cappes for their badge, they come to Saint Pol, where the King lodged, and demand audience, hauing seized on all the passages to his lodging, after a terrible manner. A Carmelite Friar was speaker for the people, accompanied with the Deputies of this multitude as his ruffians. Beeing entred into the Kings chamber, after many tedious speeches, he demands reformation of the State, protesting they would not be fed with words: they vrged the King to punish such, whose names they had contained in a list, being guiltie of capitall crimes. The Duke of Bourgogne makes a good shew, and answers: That the King would consider thereof. This Friar replies impudently, that they would not depart before they had such as they demanded. Their rage was such, as the King and Princes tooke white cappes, the marke of the seditious. They demand the chiefe seruants of the King, Queene, and Dauphin, not onely men, but also women which had beene in any credit: and about all, Lewis of Bauaria the Queenes brother. There was not any one but stood amazed at these audacious impudencies.

The Queene comes weeping, she intreats the King, the Monke and the deputies of the people. They answer, it is their charge, and they cannot alter it. The people crie from the base Court with a violent noise, that if they deliuer not these prisoners, they will force the lodging. So as after all these intreaties, Lewis the queenes brother with the rest (specified in the rowle) both men and women, yeeld vnto the mercie of these madde and furious men, and are by them led into diuers prisons.

This night passed not without many murders; many were strangled, and many cast into the riuer, without any other formes of iustice, but the Bourguignons secret commandement: who (with his cold and graue countenance) made shew to haue no interest in the action. The cittie was neuer in so lamentable an estate, by this shamefull contempt of Law, order, and of the King, Princes and Magistrates. There is no talke but of blood, killing, hanging and drowning of poore prisoners.

The horror of this confusion toucht the hearts of the most passionate. The Vniuersitie (which had beene the mouth of these captious complaints) repaires to Henry of Marle the first president, and to John Luuenall of Vrins the Kings Aduocate, protesting that they were not guiltie of these infamous disorders. And hauing taken aduice, they resolue to go to the King, as well to purge themselves of the suspicion of these abominable confusions, as to intreate him to giue eare to a good peace. They giue him meanes to winne the heads of this popular faction, and set vp an Ensigne with the Kings armes, and crie in all parts of the cittie, Peace, peace, good people: an inuention which preuailed much in this action.

Euill counsell is most hurtfull to him that giues it: the Bourguignons practises light on his owne heade. The people seeing themselves disauowed by the Vniuersitie (who then had great credite for their esteeme of wisdom and knowledge) hauing the King and his Parliament opposite, beeing abandoned by their Tribunes, they hide themselves in Bourgongne, and hee himselfe feeling the storme to approach, retires to Compiene, attending the event.

The Orlean faction repaires to Paris with speede, and were receiued ioyfully by the people, as the anchor of their hope. All the world exclames of the Bourguignon as the onely moriue of the troubles of France, and vnworthie to hold so honorable a rancke among the Princes of the blood. The queene feeds this dislike, for the interest of her brother imprisoned, and the King thunders forth his Edicts against the Bourguignon, the which are seuerely executed vpon such as are apprehended. Scaffolds, riuers and streetes wirnesse the reuenge of the murders committed by the Bourguignons vpon the Orleanois. All Officers preferred by the Bourguignon are displaced, and all such as had supported him are ill intreated. Valeran Earle of S. Pol, is put from the dignitie of Constable, Guthard Dauphin of Auergne, from that of great Master, and Charles of Rambures from being master of the Crossebowes, the which is at this day as the Colonell of the infanterie. Three hundred men and women of the Bourguignon faction are banished by a decree of the Court of Parliament. John Duke of Brittain leaues the Bourguignon and comes to court against him.

To conclude, all bandie against the Bourguignon, yet he is nothing amazed, but continues rinues constant against all stormes. He craues ayde of his citties in Flanders in this necessity: A being thus perplexed, there fell out a fauourable occasion to raise him vp againe. The queene beeing much discontented with him, incenseth the Daulphin. This yong Prince had some of his household seruants from the Bourguignon: she vsing the authoritie of a mother, takes them from him, and puts them in prison: the reason was, for that she feared these men were of the Bourguignons faction. The Daulphin takes this as an affront, and writes to his father-in-law to assitt him. The Bourguignon imbracing this vnexpected occasion, calles a new assembly of his subiects, and shewes them these letters. And making his profit thereof, he giues them to vnderstand how needfull it was to leaue an armie, to free the King and Daulphin, whom the Orlean faction held in captiuitie: and vpon this cause he writes to all the Citties of the Realme, intreating them to assitt him in so good a worke, and worthe of good subiects to their Prince. Herupon he leaues an armie, and goes to field, making a public declaration, That he takes armes to set the King and Daulphin at libertie, and is followed by many French, so as his armie increaseth daily. Hauing passed the riuer of Some he enters into Compiene, and doth summon Senlis, to send him the keyes of their gates, as marching for the Kings seruice: but a countermaund comes from the Daulphin, which doth frustrate his desseine.

The Daulphin drawes the Bourguignon.

The Daulphin (wonne by the Orleanois) protesteth that he had neuer written these letters, and disauowes the Bourguignon: he writes letters vnto him of a contrarie tenour, requesting him to forbear to torment the people vpon so vniust a cause: protesting that hee was not onely in full libertie, but doth also enioy his authoritie, by vertue whereof he commands him to dismisse his troupes, and to leaue France in quiet. The Bourguignon goes on his course, meaning to enter Paris, and to stirre the people to a new sedition, and so he marcheth with his troupes neere to the cittie, and stayes at Saint Denis, but his proiect had no successe.

The Daulphin assures the Cittie walles and the peoples hearts against him, who seeks by all meanes to speake to the king or people, approching himselfe neere the cittie, sending his Heralds with letters, planting his colours neere the gate, and in the end conueys a staffe with letters in it, but all this would not preuaile. The King doubles the batterrie of his Edicts against him, as guiltie of high treason, and a disturber of the publicke peace: commanding all men that were in his armie to leaue him, vpon paine of confiscation. Hereat the greatest part of his troupes fle away, yea his Flemings abandon him, who had alwaies protected vnto him in all his assemblies, neuer to carry armes against the King nor Daulphin. In the end the King and Daulphin, accompanied with the Princes of his blood, march with a goodly armie, they besiege Compiene (where the Bourguignon had left a garrison) and take it by composition: from thence they march to Soissons a Towne of greater strength: hauing taken it by force, and Enguerrand of Bournouille his right hand in it, he leaues the towne in peace, and cuts off Bournouilles head at Paris, with many of his companions, to the peoples great content, glad of this new bloud: and in the end he passeth to Arras, the which he beseegeth with his victorious armie.

The Bourguignon amazed at these vnexpected euent, demands peace of Charles, and obtaines it with much intreatie, by the meanes of the Countesse of Hainault his sister, and the Duke of Brabant her brother. It is called the peace of Arras, beeing made at that siege. This was grieuous to the Dukes of Orlean and Berry, who said, that both the King and Daulphin had promised them, not to lay downe armes, before they had viterly ruined the house of Bourgongne. But God wiser then they, would vnite all the French, to oppose them with a common consent, against the English their common enemy: and will soone shew, that it is a meere vanitie for mortall men, to nourish immortall hatred against their enemies, to satisfie their insatiable reuenge. We haue said, that Henry the fifth King of England watcht all opportunities to feede the confusions of this miserable raigne: and to that end he did sometimes succour the Bourguignon, sometimes the Orleanois, still supporting the weaker. And knowing well the Duke of Bourgongnes humor, seeing the Daulphin incensed against him, he leaues a goodly armie, to make a benefite of these diuisions. The euent fauoured his desire, but not his proiect: for meaning to assitt the Bourguignon, he findes that he had made his peace with our Charles.

Hauing

A Hauing landed at Harfieu, a sea towne seated vpon the Riuer of Seine, hee sends his Herald to demand his daughter Katherine. This was a matter farre fetcht, and a strange course, but this daughter must be the ground of many miseries for this Realme, and likewise an occasion to free this Realme absolutely from the English by a strange meanes, and (as we may say) admirable, as the course of our History will shew.

Henry takes Harfieu by composition. Before hee takes possession of this conquest, hee goes bare-footed to the Church, to giue God thanks. Hee had not his whole army with him, one part attended him at Calais, hauing an intent to ioine with them, and so to fortifie his troupes. With this resolution hee lodgeth at Fauille, and passing through Caux to the county of Eu, hee comes to Vimou, to passe the riuer at Banquetacque (an infamous place by out losse) where the passage being surprised, he takes his way towards Arennes and from thence to Baillu in Vimou, seeking to passe the bridge at Remie: but not able to force it, hee recouers himself vpon Some, and so passeth the riuer at Voyenne and Bethencourt, places ill garded by them of Saint Quintin: and then hee lodgeth at Mouchy la Gache towards the riuer of Misamont.

He had in his army fixe thousand horse and twenty thousand foote. That of King Charles was farre greater of itselfe, besides the Burguignons troupes (which were drawne together for another intent then to fight with the English). They were in all aboue twenty thousand horse and threescore thousand foote, and therefore Henry did shunne the battaile and sought how to saue himselfe through the fennes. Our accustomed rashnesse, and wilfull forgetfulnesse of two experiences past against the same nation, and in the like occurrents, made vs to note with blacke and mournfull letters that ouerthrow and calamitie. Henry demanded passage to returne into England, yeelding vp Harfieu and other places conquered in this voiage, but wee fought our owne decay, The Constable Albret commanded the forward that day, and with him were the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Earles of Eu and Richemont, the Lord of Bouciquault Marshall of France and the Lord of Dampierre, Admiral. The battaile was led by the duke of Bar and the Earles of Alenson, Vaudemont, Neuers, Blamon, Salines, Grandpre and Rouffy. The reereward by the Earles of Marle, Dampmartin and Fouquembergue.

D Dampy (being denied passage by the Constable) resolues to fight, putting his trust in God and in his owne valour, determining to vanquish or to die, he made choise of a place of hard acceffe, and the better to fortifie his archers, every one had a sharpe stake planted before him. The French ordered as before, attended their enemies, either looking who should beginne the game. Impatieney forseth the weaker, like desperate men, the English Archers beginne the fight with such a furie, as the French forward cannot endure the violent fall of this furious storme; the Constable Albret was slaine fighting in the foremost ranke. The duke Anthony of Brabant, brother to John Duke of Bourgongne, (seeing this disorder) leaues his troupe to redresse it, but hee was also slaine by the English bow-men, with his brother Philip Earle of Neuers. The battaile was likewise forced after a great fight. The reereward

E fled, and saued themselues in the nereest places of retreat. So as the losse was not so great as the shame and ouerthrow. They number tenne thousand men slaine, but their rashnesse was inexcusable. The head snarted for it, and the Bourguignons brethren had there an honorable tombe. Charles duke of Orleans and Lewis of Bourbon, the Earles of Eu, Richemont and Vendosme (the strongest pillars of the Orlean faction) with many Noblemen and Gentlemen, were taken and led into England. This defeat chanced the twentieth day of October in the yeere 1415. called the euill battaile of Agincourt. And as one mischief comes neuer alone; the bodies slaine at this defeat were scarce buried; before Lewis the Daulphin dies. This Lewis (eldest sonne to our Charles, sonne in law, and a terror to the Bourguignon) was little lamented of the people, and lesse of his father in law, who hated him to the death. A prince of little valour and much toile, more busied with himselfe then with the affaires hee managed, the which he made troublesome by his insufficiency and presumption to know much, vnwilling to learne from others what hee vnderstood not, for the good of the State and his owne duty.

John duke of Touraine his brother, succeeded him in degree, as the first Prince of the bloud, and the Earle of Armagnac was made Constable, in the place of Charles of Albret, who

A wise Prince and loving learning, commendable in all things, but for his couetousnesse, the which made his vertues of lesse fame. A blemish very ill befeeming a generous and heroicke spirit. These great losses should haue made the Bourguignon humble, but he became more insolent, making new practises to raise himselfe, hauing no competitor. Imbracing this occasion, he gathers together what troupes he can, with an intent to goe to Paris. The Queene and Constable of Armagnac (vnwilling hee should come armed) command him in the Kings name, not to approach. The Parisiens were not then so well conceited of the Bourguignon, beeing restrained by the court and vniuersitie, but especially by the Kings authority beeing present, who spake whatsoeuer his wife and the Constable would haue him, being then alone in authority in the Kings Councell.

The Bourguignon in resolves the warre.

The Bourguignons troupes kept the field, committing all kinde of insolencies & spoiles: against whom the King made Edicts as against common theues, giuing the people liberty to kill them. But this did nothing mollifie the heart of this reuengefull Prince, borne for his countries misery, hauing no other intent but to afflict it with new calamities. To this end (as in the Kings sicknesse the Daulphin had the name and authority of the State) hee fought to winne the fauour of John, succeeding in the right of his brother deceased. This occasion was offered, but the issue was contrary to his designe.

The Emperor
Sigismund comes into France.

The misery of our France was such, as the common duty of humanity, mooued forraine nations to pittie, foreseeing our ruine, if the warre betwixt France and England continued. In this common desire, the Emperour Sigismund (by the consent of the Germans) came into France. His traine and the good worke he vnderooke, deserued an Imperiall Maiesty, but the end will shew his intent to be other then he protested. Beeing arriued in France (to the great content of all the French) he findes our Charles at his deuotion, who receiued him with all the pompe hee could giue to so great a Monarch, making shew of the great desire hee had to make a peace betwixt the French and the English, for the generall good of both Estates. But this accord was but halfe made.

The Emperour (hauing remained some time with Charles) goes into England, where he findes Henry of an other humour, puffed vp with the happy successe of his affaires and the weakenesse of ours, and in truth the measure of our miseries was not yet full. So Sigismund (hauing perswaded Henry in vaine) returnes into France. Charles (to honor him) sends his sonne John Duke of Touraine and Daulphin of Viennois into Picardy, to meet him, hauing married the daughter of the Earle of Hainault, as great a friend to the Bourguignon, as ill affected to the French. The Emperour seeing his labour lost, in seeking this reconciliation, takes his shortest course into Germany, leauing a reasonable subiect to the deere-sighted, to iudge that he had an other intent then to settle a peace in France, by countenancing of the Bourguignon, the instrument of her miseries, for after this yong Prince had spoken with the Emperour, hee is wholly changed in fauour of the duke of Bourgongne, and resolues to bandy with him against the duke of Orleans. This foundation being laid by the Emperours policy, it was fortified by the Earle of Hainault, father-in law to John the Daulphin. Now he imbraceh the greatest and most dangerous enemy of all true Frenchmen with a wonderfull affection.

The Daulphin
John dies.

But the subtil is taken in his owne snare, and the end doth bewray the intent. As all things tended to a manifest change by meanes of this young prince, enchanted by his charmes, hauing a spirit like vnto waxe apt to receiue any impression, from so subtil an artisan as the Bourguignon, behold death cuts off all these hopes, cast in the mould of this new authority, buried in Johns tombe, who died during these practises, at Compiigne, when as the fire beganne to kindle in fauour of the Bourguignon, and to the apparent reuiuing of troubles in France.

To John succeeded Charles Earle of Ponthieu, the yongest sonne to our Charles the sixth. He remained also the first Prince of the blood, with the prerogatiues of the fundamentall lawe. A prince that shall minister much matter to talke of his life in the course of our history, guided by the singular prouidence of God, to raise vpon this monarchy, almost ruined. The least, but the happiest of all his brethren, for this is that Charles the seuenth, who (ha-

But this shall not be without many painefull difficulties, the which the order of our History commands vs to represent in their due places.

New kind of misery now supplies the stage, to despight Nature by the frantike drunkenesse of our confused passions. An vnnatural mother forgets her onely sonne, she bandies with his capitall enemy, against her owne blood, seeking to transport the hereditary crowne to strangers, a crowne inalienable by the law of State, to the end this Medea might fight both against nature and the lawes of the Realme. A horrible phrensie, a fit of ciuill warre, that is to say, of the assured ruine of the State. They call it ciuill (being the ruine of citizens) but very vnciuill indeed, for if we shall iudge thereof by the barbarous and brutish cruelties, what is there in the whole world more vnciuill? But alas! behold the Image of vnkinde confusions, whereof the fury of our warres hath made vs eye-witnesses, for haue we beheld lesse? Hauing seene the crown set to sale, and our Kings blood shed vpon our Scaffold. But the History requires audience, to report things in their order, as they haue chanced according to the causes and motiues.

confusion, the mother against the son.

Charles Earle of Ponthieu had married the daughter of Lewis of Anjou, King of Sicilia; a capitall enemy to the Bourguignon. So this young Prince bred vp from his youth in hatred against the house of Bourgongne, must bee the instrument to ruine him and his whole race. He loued his pleasure much, and sometimes hee gaue himselfe vnto it with too great a scope, yet he could employ himselfe well to serious affaires, and force his spirit in necessity, firme in his resolutions, and immouable in his designs, wherein hee happily ended his daies, restoring the Realme strangely shaken by the errors and losses of his predecessors. In this beginning of his new authority, he was faithfully (though not profitably) assisted by the Constable of Armagnac, one of the chiefe pillars of the Orlean party, and almost alone, since the imprisonment of the duke of Orleans and the death of the duke of Berry, the King continuing in his infirmity, sometimes better, sometimes worse, but alwaies weake both of body and minde.

Charles an enemy to the house of Bour-gongne.

The Bourguignon had his troupes together, to the great spoile of the country, who complained still without any redresse. This Prince beeing resolute in his course seekes all occasions of new garboiles, his hatred encreaseth daily against the contrary faction, seeing them aduanced in credit, being out of hope to haue any interest in this new Daulphin, who was wholly possessed by Armagnac, an old fox and an irreconcilable enemy.

He hath practises in Amiens, Abbeuille, Peronne and all other good townes of Picardie: who by reason of neighbourhood are easily drawne to his party, making goodly protestations 1417. protestations to maintaine them in peace and liberty vnder the Kings obedience. Hee writes likewise to all the good townes of the Realme, complayng of the death of John duke of Touraine, a Prince whom hee assured to be wholly giuen to the good of the State, and for this cause had bene poisoned by the enemies of the publike quiet. But his true intent was, to make such odious as were in credit about the Kings person, although hee named them not in his letters, but in noting them, hee made a still and dangerous warre against them, encouraged by his forces and perswasions, who entring the cities freely, and causing his letters to bee publicly read, hee moued their hearts by the feeling of former confusions, the blame whereof the Bourguignon laied vpon his enemies.

The Bour-
guignon
armes, and drawes in the English.

The King, (that is to say) his Councell, being incountried both by writings and force, should likewise oppose armes and writings against the Bourguignon, but he sends the Lord of Cagny to treat with the Bourguignons, which negotiation was fruitlesse, both for that the person sent vnto him was odious, as also by reason of his charge which was not pleasing vnto him. Hee had an intent to put Cagny to death, but the respect of his maister withheld him, making answer to all his instructions, specified at large in the originall of this History. But what auails it to repeat many vaine words without any effect? In brieft, these are but accusations and excuses, plaints, and counterplaints. All protest to bee the Kings seruants, and all ruine the King, in troubling his Realme. What plainer Commentary can we desire of these factions, then what we haue heard and seene in our times? The Bourguignon made a more dangerous warre then with papers; he had secret practises within the cities, to winne the inhabitants. He also drew the English into armes, and armed himselfe, ioyning their forces together, but with diuers intentions, yet their generall designe was to afflict France, fishing in a troubled water, making their profit of our confusions, & building their affaires vpon the ruine of the realme.

A mutiny at Rouen.

The Dauphin Charles plaies an other part, he had scarce knowne the Court, when as hee was forced to goe into Aniou, to the funeralls of Lewis duke of Aniou King of Sicilia his father in law, and to assure the Duchie, being in some danger, by reason of the neighbourhood of the duke of Britan, a doubtfull friend in the incertitude of those confused times. Being arriued, behold a charge of difficultie for the first fruites of his new authority. The people were mutined at Rouen, they had slaine Gaucourt gouernour of the city, the Aduocate and the Kings proctor, and besieged the Castle; and to multiply these calamities, the Bourguignon is in field, and besiegeth Saint Florentin. The Kings armie is not dismissed, but dispersed into diuers parts, according to the necessitie of his affaires. The Dauphin hauing need of the greatest part for Rouen, sends the lesser to the besieged, but the succours being weake and slacke, Saint Florentine yeelds to the duke of Bourgongne. This hard beginning might haue bene preiudiciall to his affaires at Rouen, but they succeed better; for the chiefe of the city met with the Dauphin, and excuse themselves of this tumult, imputing it to the people ouer-charged, they beseech him to pardon this fault, and to receiue their voluntary obedience. Thus he is honourably receiued into the city, already pacified, and settles all things with mildnesse.

The Daul-

great enemies.

The Bour-
guignon.
The English.

His mother.

But there are other newes of harder digestion; for the Bourguignon marcheth to Paris with a great power, and the English takes port in Normandy with a thousand faile. There were reasons on either side to ballance these great difficulties, and to trouble the Dauphin, for whether shall hee goe first? If hee march to Paris, the English will conquer without resistance. If hee make head against the English, then Paris is lost, being wholly inclined to the Bourguignons practises: who sees not but the losse of the capitall citie of the realme would be his ruine, and the ouerthrow of all his designes? but Charles did not foresee a greater difficultie at hand by his mother, more wayghty and dangerous then all the rest, yet must hee auoide all these three stormes, not without great danger. That the providence of God, (the preseruer of this Monarchie) might shew it selfe more admirable, restoring this estate, being in shew vterly lost. For Charles (who in so sharpe an encounter reaped so worthy a victory) owes the homage vnto God, who gaue him meanes both to fight well, and to vanquish happily. The Dauphin standing doubtfull betwixt these two great extreames, resolves to goe to Paris, to defend the citie against the Bourguignons practises, and to assure the Kings person, who hee knew would speake whatsoeuer hee pleased, being in his power.

Henry

A Henry of Marle Chancellor of France, remained at Paris with the King, being wholly at the Dauphins deuotion. The people stir not, being kept in awe by the Parlement and Vniuersity, who were then well vnited. But experience will soone discouer the inconstancy of humane attempts, when they seeme most assured, and the vanity of a multitude, being the actors of great mens proiects.

The Bourguignon at one instant, doth publish his protestation, and displaies his colours, causing his troupes to march. He makes a declaration, conteining the causes for the which he takes armes, that is; To reforme the State, extremely desolate, by the ill gouernment of such as (abusing the Kings infirmity) managed the affaires of the realme at their pleasure, and without pity of the poore people, oppressed them with extraordinary charges, against all right and reason. He protested to haue no other intent, but to restore the realme to her former liberty. But he shall change his copy, imposing new exactions, to the preiudice of the people, and shall grow offended with such as shall oppose themselves: so as it seemes, all this was but a maske to abuse the people, vnder the goodly shew of ease and liberty. But as at the first all seemes goodly, so these glorious beginnings wonne him great credit with the French nation. Thus his armie beginnes to march through Picardy towards Paris. All cities open their gates, where hee doth presently proclaime an exemption of all Subsidies and other charges, except of salt, as the gentlest imposition, seeing that all men without distinction paid their part. But about all, hee was very carefull, that his armie should liue orderly and modestly, without any oppression to the poore people, being his ordinarie discourse, as one greatly grieved for their afflictions, and being very desirous of their quiet and content.

These examples proclaimed his vertues, and wonne him the peoples hearts. Other cities in Picardy follow this example: Beauvais yeelds willingly vnto him, and shout out for joy at his entry, he goes presently to Senlis, kept by Robert Deu for the Armagnacs. The ciizens (desirous to imitate the rest) seize vpon their gouernor, open their gates willingly, call in the Bourguignon, and receiue him with all ioy. From thence hee marcheth speedily to Beaumont, the which hauing indured some Canon shot (being subiect to the house of Bourbon) yeelds vpon an easie composition. Ponthoise and Melun obey without any dispute. So by degrees hee comes before Paris, and to shew his army to the Parisiens, hee lodgeth at Mont-rouge, but to approach neerer, hee incamps lower, in a place called, The withered Tree, vnto this day; by reason there stood a great dried Tree. A preface what should after befall his greene and flourishing designes. Being there, he writes his letters to the King and city of Paris, full of cunning admonitions, beseeching the one, and exhorting the other, to hearken seriously to a good reformation of the State, the true and souereigne end of his armes.

The Bour-
guignon with an army before Paris.

In the meane time hee loofeth not an houre. John of Luxembourg (during this his necessary aboad at Paris) goes with a part of the army, to trie the voluntary cities, and euery day made new conquests. Chartres, Eitampes, Gaillardon, Montchery, Auneau and Rochefort obey, and after some daies of rest (to annoy Paris) he besiegeth Corbeil, a place of importance for the victualing thereof. But whilst hee pressed Corbeil with exceeding hast, behold he suddenly abandons it against the opinion of all men.

The Dauphin and the Constable of Armagnac supposed, that seeing that hee had lost his labour at Paris, he would seeke to possesse himselfe of places of easier conquest, according to his course begunne. But the effect will shew, that his rising was to an other intent, which bred a horrible combustion throughout the whole realme, for Isabel Queene of France, (discontented with her sonne Charles) intreates the Duke of Bourgongne to free her from captiuitie. Shee was then at Tours, with some gard, by the Kings commandement, for the which shee blamed her sonne, and the Constable, who then had the government of the Court. They kept not so strict a garde of the Queene, but shee had liberty to walke both within and without the City, euen to the Abbay of Marmoustier, where shee had her chiefe deuotion. This was a meanes to giue intelligence vnto the Bourguignon, and to slip into his hands, as wee shall shew. Reason requires, the History should let downe the motiue of so vnnatural a discontent: but shee is silent, and reports onely a very light occasion, That the King comming from visiting of the Queene, who held her State at Bois-de-

Vincennes,

1417. The King dislikes of the Queene Vincennes, and returning to Paris, hee met Lewis Bourdon a Knight, going to Bois-de-Vin-A cennes, who comming nere to the King, bowed himselfe on horle-backe, and so passed on lightly, without any other reuerence. The King sends presently his prouost of Paris after him, commanding him to apprehend him, & to keepe him safely. The prouost executing his charge, tooke the said Knight and brought him to Chastelet where by the Kings command, he was cruelly tortured, and drowned in the riuer of Seine: and some few daies after, by the commandment of the King, the Daulphin, and such as then gouerned at Paris, the Queene (accompanied with her siter in law the Duchesse of Bauaria) was sent to Blois, and so to Tours, to remaine there in meane estate. William Toret, John Picard and Laurence Dupuis, were appointed for her gard, without whose consent shee durst not attempt any thing, no not to write a letter. These be the words of the Originall.

The Queene
 sent with a gard to Tours.

This her imprisonment, was aggrauated by a new rigour. All the treasure which she had in Churches, or priuate houses within Paris, was seized on by the Constable of Armagnac, a free executioner of these proceedings. This shewed a notable dislike betwixt the husband and the wife, and the mother and sonne: but the cause is not specified. If it be lawful to serch into this secret, shall wee say, that Queene Isabel mother to our Daulphin, louing the one better then the other (as the variety of the mothers affection to her children is too common) had strained all her credit to countenance John, after the death of Lewis, being thus in-gaged with the Bourguignon, whom shee did hate deadly, by reason of the imprisonment of her brother Lewis of Bauaria? but as she had first loued, and after hated him, might she not in like sort receiue him againe into fauour, as the diuersity of her passions did moue her by new occasions, to loue or hate the same man?

The Emperor Sigismonds proceeding, made it very suspicious, being the greatest instrument of the alliance betwixt John and the Bourguignon. And to what end did the Bourguignon goe to him into Sauoy after al this? It is likewise to be considered, that the so-daine death of John encreased this womans fury against her sonne Charles, holding it for certaine, that by the Constables counsell he had caused him to be poisoned. Ambition and choller are furious beasts, not to be restrained by respect, especially in a woman, in whom hatred and reuenge make deepe impressions. Jealousie might likewise be a violent coun-cellor vnto Charles. As if Charles (animated by the Constable of Armagnac, fearing least his mother had some great practise with the Bourguignon and his associats) had incensed the King against her, hauing moued him with some other pretext. But in effect it was who-ly to reitrame this womans power, depriving her both of liberty and treasure; but the euent will shew, that shee was not alwaies busied at her distaste, or in her deuotion. The search of the motiues is necessarie in a History, especially in famous actions, but the doubt-full coniectures are free to euery mans iudgement. This is all the certaintie of this action.

The Bour-
 guignon
 ioynes with
 the Queene.

The Bourguignon being called by Isabel, leaues the siege of Corbeil, lodgeth his footmen in the townes of Beaufe, that were most fauorable vnto him, and with his horse (which were about tenne thousand) hee goes into Touraine; when as behold (the Queene, being one morning at her deuotion in the Abbie of Marmouster, according to her custome) hee arriues with his horsemen at an houre appointed. Hee meetes the Queene, receiues her and enters the citie with her, without any difficultie, hauing first cunningly seized vpon the gates. Being entred, hee proclaimes an exemption of charges in the Queenes name, and (being accompanied by the people) hee presents himselfe before the Castle, which opens vnto the Queene, being exceeding glad, to see her selfe at liberty and to command freely. Shee referres her selfe wholly vnto the Bourguignons will; who likewise seekes to vse her name to make his designs more plausible. Hauing therefore assured Tours, they march to Chartres, a more conuenient towne for their affaires, lying so neere vnto Paris.
 Being there, and hauing assembled all the Clergie, Nobility, three estates, and such Citties as they could of their faction, she causeth Philip of Morueliers to make knowne vnto them,
 That by reason of the ill government of the Realme, through the great weakenesse of the King her husband, and according to the degree wherevnto God had raised her, being Queene of France, she desired infinitely to reforme it. And the rather for that Charles her sonne (corrupted by the ill counsell of the enemies of the State) shewed her not the duty
 of

 A shewed her not the duty of a child, to her griefe. So as to prouide good and wholesome remedies for the preferuation of the state, and for the seruice of the King her husband, by the good aduise of her cousin the Duke of Bourgongne, a Prince of the blood, shee declares her selfe Regent of France. The which was pleasing vnto them all, with this title: Isabell by the grace of God, Queene of France, hauing by reason of the King my Lords infirmity the go-uernment and administration of the realme, by an irrevocable grant, made vnto vs by our said Lord and his counsell. And for confirmation of this new authority she caused a seale to be made, whereon was grauen her image, standing right vp, with her armes hanging downe to the earth, as one without comfort and requiring helpe: on the one side were the armes of France, and on the other that of France and Bauaria quartered, with these words. This is the seale of Causes, Soueraignties and Appellations for the King.

There were two Soueraigne Courts of Iustice erected, one at Amiens, and the other at Troy in Champaigne, with expresse charge not to goe to Paris. The office of Constable was giuen to the Duke of Lorraine, by the deprivation of the Earle of Armagnac, and the Chancellourship of France to Enschache of Laftre, by the giuing ouer of Henry of Marle.
 As these things began to kindle a new fire of miseries, there were certaine Bishops which laboured to reconcile the Queene and Daulphin. The Bourguignon accepts of the motion: but the Constable of Armagnac breakes off the treaty. An article which shall make him more odious with the people. The Bourguignon hauing retired his army, and put his men into garrison, goes into Sauoy, where at that time the Emperour Sigismond was, (who erected the Barledome of Sauoy into a Duchie) and there did conferre with him at Mommellian. This was not without some great desseigne.

In his absence Philip of Bourgongne his sonne held a Parliament, to resolue vpon the meanes to make warre with more aduantage. Thus the Bourguignon wrought for his part.
 The Daulphin seeing the fields freed and without any enemy; thinkes good that the Constable of Armagnac should besiege Senlis, and the better to countenance his armes, the King himselfe goes with the armie. The Towne being prest, they take a day to yeeld, it by the leaue of Aprill they be not releued. John of Luxembourg (whom the Bourguignon had left in Picardy, for the surety of those places) gathers together what troupes hee can, and comes at the day prefixed: at which time the townes-men made a great rally vpon the Kings Campe, firing their tents and pauillions. The Constable (moued with this affront) cuts off the heads of foure of their hostages, and they kill six and fortie of his men that were prisoners. In the meane time John of Luxembourg approacheth towards Creill, meaning to fight with the Constable, vrging him by sundry skirmishes, hauing sent
Charles Dailly towards Dampmartin with a good troupe to stop the passage.

The siege of Senlis.

The Constable (fearing the euent of a battaile, being loth to hazard the King) would not ioyne, but desirous to finde some honest colour to auoyde the fight, hee sends a trumpet, to know who commanded these troupes. And vnderstanding it was John of Luxembourg, hee answered in a brauery. Seeing it is neither the Duke of Bourgongne, nor his sonne, they are not for vs, let vs goe to Paris. So hee returnes without fighting, whether the chiefe of his affaires drew him, nor fore-seeing the mischiefe which attended him, by reason of this retreat, being too preiudiciall to his honor: for the Parisiens who hated him, and yet feared him for the reputation of his valour, began now to contemne him, noting in this retreat a kinde of cowardise, as hauing refused to encounter John of Luxembourg, who had so brauely offered him the battaile. The brute of this shamefull deparrure was published by the Bourguignon faction to their maisters aduantage. They embrace this occasion being loth the peoples heate should grow cold by any better successe, obseruing likewise that the King, Daulphin, Constable, Chancellor, and all the chiefe of that party were at Paris, to be all surprised together. The Duke of Burgongne was vpon his returne from Sauoy, but he departed not without good instructions from the Emperour.

But leauing the Bourguignons army in field, let vs note the estate of that great City of Paris, Perrinet Clerc a Smith; John Thiebert a Broker, Perrin Bourdichon a Cooper (such were they whom the Bourguignons had made his Colonels at Paris) hauing practised all their friends with great secrecie, and ingaged many; they aduertise the Lord of Liste-Adam (who was

He findes the gate open, and Perrinet attending him. Then he puts his men in battaile, least he should be taken in disorder, Perrinet shuts the gate and casts the Keyes into the ditch: and then without any noise, hee marcheth with this troupe to the lesser Chastelet, where hee had left a Squadron of foure hundred men vnder the great vault, to lye more covertly.

Lisle-Adam hauing ioyned his troupe with the Cittizens, (so as the one might assist the B other) hee sends forth diuerse troupes to giue the alarum in diuerse quarters of the Citty, with charge to moue the people to armes. Euery troupe marcheth speedily to his quarter, crying out with a terrible voyce in the dead of the night, Rise good people, peace, peace, God saue the King and the good Duke of Bourgongne. At this noise all rise, some to hide themselves, others to arme: so as in short time a great multitude (being armed) wander vp and downe the streetes ready to fight. Their Captaines appoint them what houses of the Armagnacs they should force. The first troupe must seaze vpon the King, but before all was ready, the alarum was general. Such as had most interest are soonest vp. Tanneuy of Chastell, Prouost of Paris (a very trusty seruant to the Daulphin) wrapps him in a sheete C and carries him into the Bastile. A good Leuaine which shall one day raise the dow, and the hand of him that kneads it. Some others also retired themselves thether, which shall serue in this Scene. Iohn Louuet, Robert Masson, the Vicont of Narbone and Bouciquaut. The Constable of Armagnac in a disguised weede saues himselfe in a neighbours house. But all this troupe flies to the Kings lodging at Saint Pol. These Tribunes cause this poore sick Prince to rise without any respect: they force him to promise what they please, and to ride through the Citty, crying: God saue the King, and peace, thinking by his presence to increafe their troupe, and to countenance their confusion.

This done euery troupe seekes his quarter: and many are taken. The Chancellor of Marle is surprisid in his lodging and Raimond de la Guerre, whoe were good supporters D of the Armagnac faction: many Presidents, Councillors, and Maisters of the Accompts were taken, with-out any respect of persons. The Cardinals of Bar and Saint Marc, the Archbishop of Rheims, the Bishops of Senlis, Bayeux and Constance, were carried away and imprisoned: all the prisons are filled with honorable persons. But what is become of the Daulphin and Constable? they search, they hunt in all places; yet finding nothing, they command, by sound of Trumpet, that euery man should presently vpon paine of death, discover the Armagnacs. The Daulphin was safe, but the Constable (discouered by his host) is taken, carryed away by one of these Tribunes and imprisoned, hee was in danger as hee past through the streetes, riding behind him that had him in garde.

Thus was the night spent vntill day, yet without any murder, and it seemes this was by E commandement. This happened in the yeare one thousand foure hundred and eightene, the five and twenty of May, a pleasant day, the fore-runner of a mournfull winter. The Daulphin hauing escaped this danger miraculously, by the good aduice of Tanneuy of Chastell, hee resolues to doe his best in retyring him-selfe else-where, and not to hazard his person with this furious and murderous people. By the faithfull meanes of this good seru- ant, hee goes forth secretly in the night, and slips into Melun, leaping from place to place, like a bird that flies from bough to bough. From Melun he goes to Nemours, whe- ther he sends for his most trusty seruants, of whose helpees he had neuer greater need. The Marshall of Rieux comes vnto him with many of the Nobility: they consult of the meanes F to recouer Paris, before it be supplied with soldiars.

So they gather together fiftene hundred horse with all speed. The Marshall of Rieux hath the charge to lead them: while the Daulphin preferues the fortune of France in safe- ty. A dangerous enterprife, which had no successe, but the honour to haue attempted a thing altogether impossible, the which was executed with much lesse losse then the danger was

A was great. The Bastille held Saint Anthonies gate sure, for the Daulphin. The Marshall of Rieux enters it with his troupes, and marcheth boldly to the Kings lodging, but he finds it empty, the King being retired to the Louvre. The alarum is giuen throughout the whole city, they must thinke of their retreat, stones, tyles, arrowes and all things else flie from the houses and windowes, the chaines are drawne, and the streets full of armed men: all crie, kill, kill the Armagnacs. The Marshall of Rieux leads his men happily in this retreat, and fea- ring Saint Anthonies gate, he drawes them forth so closely, as he escapes this great and im- minent danger with little losse.

This alarum had put the people into armes, who hauing chased their enemies out of the heart of their citie, were quiet for that time, expecting some further command from the B Bourguignon, and an end of this terrible tumult, whilst they take breath, others are drawne into the like mutinie by their example. All the townes of Picardie, fauouring the Bourguignon greatly, make bonfiers. Compiagne, Creil, Saint Maxance, Mouchy le Preux, Pont a Choisi, Noion, Laon, Soissons, Chauny, Peronne and Gisors (expelling their garnisons) declare themselves of his party. Some daies are spent thus quietly, since the first taking of prisoners.

But behold a new tumult like vnto a violent winde, which chanced the twelfth of Iune. In the morning all the people arme by the command of their Leaders. This furious mul- titude goe forth off their houses (like a swarme of Bees creeping from their combs) armed with all sorts of weapons. In short time there are fortie thousand men assembled in the streetes and market places. Iohn of Luxembourg, James of Harcourt, the Vidame of Ami- C ens, Lisle-Adam, Fosseaux, Chastellus, Coblen, Lambourg the new Prouost of Paris, (with many others most trustie seruants to the Bourguignon,) are on horse-backe in troupes, to second this multitude on foote, ready to fight as in a day of battaile, when as about foure of the clocke (like as when the heauens darkened with thick clouds, and the ayre ouercast, the thunder tumbling in the ayre, sodenly when the lightning appeeres, the crak breakes forth and teares a Towers top) this furious multitude, flocking from all parts of the citie with a sy- lent stillnesse, burst forth into diuers parts. They open the prisons and kill such as they meete without any pittie.

D They murder Iaylors, their wiues and children, men and maides, but especially the poore prisoners are their obiekt. In this tumult, all crie, all howle, all are amazed. The confused cries of the murderers and murdered rebound vp to heauen. The Constable of Armag- nac, and Henry of Marle (being brought forth with shouts and reproches) are beaten down and laied by for the triumph. The Bishops of Constance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Xaintes and the Abbot of Saint Cornille goe the same way. The Earle of Grandpre, Raimond de la Guerre, He-Tor of Chartres, Enguerand of Marcouffy, Charles Poupard, the officers of the Court of Parliament, Chambers of Accompt, Requests and Treasure, to conclude, all that are of any account are massacred. The blood runnes through the citie, the streetes, and wallles ouerflow. The noted Armagnacs are thus murdered, but the furie of this E made multitude extends farther, euen against such as had bene with them, and of their owne faction, for many affectionate Bourguignons were beaten downe, euery man seekes his enemy to kill him vnder this pretext. The rascalles fall vpon the rich, and killing them as Armagnacs, they spoile their houses, as a lawfull prey of their conquest. They eye of this furious multitude spares neither sexe, age, nor quality. The duke of Bourgongnes fol- lowers are lookers on of this spectacle, and watch that none escape.

The Historie makes mention of sixteene hundred cruelly murdered on this mi- serable daie, noted to the dishonour of these detestable murderers, and to the grieve of France, to see her owne bowelles thus defiled with her blood, and her memorie F blemished with this crueltie. This furie continued from foure of the clocke on the twelfth daie, vntill tenne the next daie, nothing ceassing for the nights rest. These made men (hauing refreshed themselves) seeked out the rest to finish their most cruell worke.

The prisoners of the great Chastelet made resistance against their furie: they are be- seeged, forced and massacred, the greatest part are cast from the toppe of the Towre, and fall vpon their pikes, halberds and other weapons. The bodies of the Constable and Chancellor,

A To note the Constable by his accustomed scarfe, they flea a bend of his skinne and tie it about his bodie. This spectacle is drawne about the citie three daies together, and then carried out in a dung-cart, to a place where they cast all their carrion and filth, without any buriall.

The Queene
and the Bourguignon come to Paris.

The Bourguignon was at Dijon during this tumult at Paris, who was presently aduertised thereof. The History saies, that hee seemed very glad of the taking of the citie, but very forie for the murder of the prisoners, but God who kept a true register, shall one day put him in minde thereof. And in truth, hee that shall duely consider all the circumstances of this confusion, cannot imagine, but it was done by his command. Hee gathers all the forces he can together, to gard the Queene to Paris, as it were in triumph. The Parisiens meet him with great pompe, they offer him their most affectionate seruice, and present the Duke of Bourgongne and the Earle of Saint Pol his brother with purple veluet gownes, pouldred with Saint Andrewes crosses, the which at their requests they presently put on, and so (drawing nere the Queenes coach) they enter the city of Paris, the people attending at their entry, and crying, God save the King and the good duke of Bourgongne, the Coach being couered with flowers which they cast vpon it. And this was the Queenes and the duke of Bourgongnes entry after the massacre.

A plague after the massacre.

But this Parisien ioy was soone turned into heauinesse, for within three monthes after this butchery, the plague entred the citie, and slew aboue foure score thousand persons in three monthes. The History obserues, that Perrinet and his companions (after they had eaten what they had gathered in together by spoile) perished miserably, little enioying their thefts. Most of the Noblemen and gentlemen which had assisted these murderers died of the plague, except Lisle-Adam, who was referred to receiue his punishment from Henry of England, although vpon another occasion as you shall see hereafter. And was not this God who reuenged this crueltie? But let vs returne to our discourse, for seeing the punishment was so sodaine, we might not well remit the rehearsal to any other place. Charles looks but coldly vpon his wife, whom hee loued not, neither in health nor sicknesse. Hee welcomes the Duke of Bourgongne with a cheerefull countenance, who had wonne his heart, by framing himselfe to his weakenesse with milde speeches, shewes of honour and apparent humility, impressions of common sense, whereof phrensie for the most part doth not deprive madde men.

The Kings counsell assembled presently, many things were propounded the first day, they beganne with Officers; the Constables place was confirmed to the Duke of Lorrain, and the Chancellorship to Eustache of Laestre. Lisle-Adam and Chastelus are made Marshalls of France, for their well deseruing at the massaker at Paris. Our Bourguignon creates Charles of Lens Admirall of France, being captaine of Paris; and Philip of Moruilliers the Queenes Adiuocate, first president of the Court of parliament.

The English
take all Normandy.

During this confusion, Henry King of England makes other worke. Hee was in Normandy, taking townes and castles without any resistance. Touques (a castle held impregnable) was forced by him, during the passions of our mad-men, as the first fruites of his conquests, Louviers, Pont Larche, Caen, Cherebourg, Falaise, Argenton, Alencon, Constance, Saint Lo and other places followed, to make the way open to Rouen without any great difficulty.

Rouen is besieged in a manner the very day of the massacre at Paris. Henry doth assault it with all the force and policie hee can, as the Dongeon and chiefe strength of all Normandy. The citizens giue a testimony of good and faithfull subiects, by their valour and constancie. They demand succours from the King, with a protestation of the euent. The Court makes shew to stirre and to provide for their defence, but what remedy can the dead giue vnto the sicke? In the end after all their resistance seeking to maintaine themselves vnder the obedience of France, Rouen yeelds to Henry King of England vpon hard conditions. To pay him three hundred sixty five thousand crownes of gold, and three cittizens at his choise to doe his pleasure with. And so hee suffered them to inioy their priuileges. Of the three which hee had chosen to punish, he pardoned two, and caused Alain Blanchart, captaine of the commons to bee beheaded, worthy to bee eternized in our History, dying for

A for the seruice of his King and country, in a time so famous for so desperate a confusion. The sequele was great, for not onely all the townes of Normandy yeeld vnto him, but also the Isle of France was so amazed, as all obey him euen to the gates of Paris, where the fury of our miserable dissentions prepared a Throne for the sworne enemy of our Realme.

I am weary to report our shamefull losses, as reuiuing our old soares. Henry might haue grauen in his triumph. I came, I saw and overcame, onely Mont Saint Michel in Normandy was maintained vnder the obedience of our crowne, through the vallour of some Gentlemen Normans, whose names the history owes to posterity. John of Montfort Duke of Britan (seeing this happy successe) makes composition with the English, shrowding himselfe vnder his protection, but hee shall soone leaue him, when a more happy season shall make him turne to the Daulphin. In this shipwracke the Queene and the Bourguignon had meanes to glut their ambition and fury at Paris, beholding the ruine of France, hoping that in all extremities they should make their peace with the King of England at their countries cost, hauing a daughter for a pawne and confirmation of this accord.

They send Ambassadors to Henry King of England being a Conquerour, and for a baite they carry the portrait of Katherine of France, the Kings daughter, a Princess of excellent beauty, who must likewise bee the Leuain of our miserie. But Henry finding this figure to be faire, desires to see the essentiall substance, so as the Queene and the Bourguignon (gouerning the spirit of this poore sicke King) conducts him in person with his daughter, to their enemy nere to Meulan, to aduise of a meanes for a generall peace; but they departed without any conclusion, by reason of the great demands which Henry made, puffed vp with this victorious successe, seeking to sell his friendship at too high a rate. Yet the Image of Katherine had made an impression in his heart, beeing much discontented that they had refused her with these conditions.

The Bour-
guignon
creates with
the English
but in vaine.

The Bourguignon likewise found lesse kindnesse then hee expected, and returned discontent, for that Henry (puffed vp with these fortunate encounters, and carried away with hope of future victory) spake more proudly then the Bourguignons humour could well digest, which was the cause of his destemperature: for Henry said in his choler, That hee would haue both daughter and Realme, whoeuer said nay, and that there was no sufficient security for what they promised, seeing the Daulphin did not consent thereto. A pill which the Bourguignon could not easily swallow. So hee chawed vpon this speech of the English, which drew him to his ruine, for euen then hee began to study by what meanes he might reconcile himselfe vnto the Daulphin, hoping to finde a better composition with a young Prince his kinsman, and weary of the warres, then with the English growne insolent by his victories. Charles was not quiet in minde, fearing least in these treaties, they should conclude something to his preiudice. So as they both inclined to an accord, but vpon diuers causes, to oppose against their common enemy with a common force. But before wee shew the effect of this common desire, wee must see both the Estate of our Daulphin (since hee retired himselfe from Paris) and of the Bourguignon, since hee became Tribune of the people.

He growes discontented and seeks to reconcile himselfe with
the Daulphin.

Although this terrible storme might haue shaken the young yeeres of the Daulphin Charles, vnacquainted with the affaires of the world and his disposition (inclining to pleasure) seemed vnfit to endure much paine and toyle: yet the effects at neede shewed his constant resolution against all difficulties. They attribute this constancie and resolution to the faithfull counsell of his seruants, yet was it much for him to follow it. Tanneguy of Chastel, John Louvet president of Prouence, the Vicont of Narbone, and Robert Masson, were those which serued him most for Counsell in the beginning, but God soone after did raise him vp strong hands to mannage armes courageously and valiantly, La Hire, Pothon of Saint Treille (whom commonly they call Zintrailes). The bastard of Orleans, with other braue and fortunate captaines which shalbe famous in the course of our History.

But the Realme was strangely diuided into these factions. The Kings authority and the capitall city were for the Queene and the Bourguignon. Picardy, Bourgongne and many townes in Bry, Champagne and Beaufe obey them absolutely after these massacres.

1419. Onely Sens in Bourgongne held out, the which they could not pull from the Daulphin. A The Prince of Orange (of the Bourguignon faction) makes warre for him in Daulphine and Languedoc, to crosse the affaires of our Charles, who notwithstanding had the greatest part of the country at his deuotion, with the friendship of Auignon, and of the Earldome of Venaisioin or Venisse. The English possessed all Normandy, and a great part of Guienne, but Rochell, Poitiers, Saint Iohn d' Angely, Angoulesme, Fontenay and some other towns acknowledged the Daulphin. All Aniou was his, Auvergne, Berry, Bourbonnois, Forrest & Lionois obeyed him, so as they are deceiued which thinke that he only held the city of Bourges in those daies, vnder colour that his enemies called him King of Bourges, because hee made his chiefe residence there, when as his mother called her self Regent. He likewise tooke vpon him the name of Regent: A name which fortified his title with great authority, and B did countenance his affaires in those difficulties and confusions.

The Queene and the Bourguignon secke vnto the Daulphin.

The Queene and the Bourguignon laboured by all meanes to winne him, they sent him his wife honorably attended, with all her Jewels, promising him his place with respect and obedience, but their meaning was to bee ridde of him, not able to know how to conforme him to their humours. In keeping himselfe farre from them, hee preferred his head for the crowne; the which attended him; hee prevented the ambitious designs of his enemy, and made himselfe to be more respected throughout the Realme.

At these horrible massacres, his captaines roused vp their spirits. Bocquiaux seized of Compiene, Pierre-Fons, and Soissons for him, who (molesting Picardy and the Isle of France with their daily roades) held Paris in ieaousie. He himselfe had part of the honour in the execution of these conquests, not leauing all to his seruants, for hee leapt out of Aniou into Touraine, besieged and tooke the cite of Tours. The duke of Britan seeing the happy successe of the Daulphins affaires, leaues the English, and ioynes with the Daulphin, as the strongest part.

The Duke of Britan leaues the English, and ioynes with the Daulphin.

Behold the Estate of our Daulphin, who growes constant and resolute amidst these tempests, and what was the Estate of our Bourguignon? In the beginning his partisans were all fire & flame, for the zeale of his seruice, but finding not what they expected at his hands, or any successe in his affaires, but rather the discommodities of Paris, and other places vnder his obedience to increase; this heat abated dayly, finding by experience that the cause of these warres was light, being but humors and priuate quarrells, very preiudiciall to the State, the which the English did sappe, vndermine and ruine, seizing dayly vpon whole Provinces, without any difficulty.

Thus Henries victories were plaine demonstrations to the most passionate, to discover the Bourguignons dissembling: for, who sees not but his end was to gouerne, to the ruine of France. In the end euery one comming to his right wittes, findes that of a Frenchman he is become an Englishman. The folly or fury of a faction could not mortifie the feeling of lawfull obedience, vnder which they were borne. To what end (saies the common sort of these cleere-sighted) shall wee vndoe our selues, for the passions of the Duke of Bourgongne, opposing himselfe against the lawfull heire of the crowne? Thus E the Bourguignon sees the affections of his partakers to growe daily cold. A worme, which tormented him hourelly, hauing grounded his chiefe hopes vpon their constancies, who promised to stand firmly to him at all euents. Doubtlesse, whatsoeuer the Giants of States haue imagined, setting one hill vpon another, the Pirenees vpon the Alpes, with all the Appenin, to scale the throne of the French Monarchy, promising vnto themselves euents according to the mouldes of their imaginations, yet cannot the French yeild to any strangers commaund, no more then to change nature and become a stranger.

The people grow in dislike with the Bourguignon.

But, to increase the Bourguignons hearts grieve, his chiefe instrument not onely failes him, but is ready to turne violently against him. For what hath hee not attempted to winne the loue of this multitude at Paris, and of the greatest citties of the Realme, making them beleue, that hee burnt with zeale of their good, and the publike weale, the onely end of all his designs, feeding them with these goodly and popular promises of exemption of charges and impositions? But they beginne all to mutine, seeing hee spake one thing, and did thinke another, and oppressed them more then those whom hee had

A had condemned as the causes of publike oppressions: for whatsoeuer hee imagined, yet had he need of money. For how could he else make warre? how could he entertaine his great traine? his partisans, and his reputation among Strangers? And where should he raise it, but vpon such as obeyed him? to seeke it at such as could resist, were to mistake, and to make his reckoning alone in vaine. Moreouer, this people (whom he had so much countenanced, making themselves masters by his power, to become by their meanes master of his enemies) would be generally obeyed, and why not of the Bourguignon? seeing he had opposed himselfe, and prescribed a law to a sonne of France? If the Bourguignon doth worse then he hath done, shal not the people reduce him vnto reason? He hath promised exemptions of subsidies, and they are more grieuous then before. We haue preuailed (say they) against a Constable, against a Chauncellor of France, yea ouer the King and Queene, making them to yeeld her brother, and most trustie seruants, and shall we not suppress some few gallants, seruants to the Duke of Bourgongne? This was the Parisiens ordinary discourse: and their Tribunes (who were not so well entertained as before) begin to mutine. They resolute to seaze vpon some of the Bourguignons favorites, and to punish them, who had perswaded him to renew the impositions, contrary to his promise.

These men (the concealing of whose names, notes the baseness of their qualities), hauing intelligence of this search, fled into the Bastille, and the people follow after as if they would ouerthrow it. A great multitude begins to vndertake it, and had preuayled, if the Bourguignon had not instantly come much discontented, who seeing himselfe enuironed with so great a troupe of armed men, fearing the losse of his head, hee was forced to deliuer his seruants to the people, who put them all to death, to teach the Bourguignon that they had no lesse authoritie and power ouer him, then ouer the King, and the Daulphin his sonne. This occasion thrusts the people into greater furie, who (being thus armed) choose a head, called Cappeluche Bourrel, to finish their executions vpon some such as might receiue these impositions and publike charges. They march through the Citie, and enter into many houses to robbe and spoyle, vnder colour of apprehending of such as had assisted at these innovations. The rich men feared for their owne particulars, but the Bourguignon more then all, knowing himselfe to be the Author of this disorder, hauing thrust the people into D armes: for what successe should this disordered libertie haue, but to fall vpon the Authors thereof? Hauing therefore won some of the chiefe Commanders, they choose out a troupe of the most wilfull mutinous, to be freed of them, vnder color of sending them to the warre against the Daulphinois, which had surprised the Castle of Montlehery, and began to run euen to the gates of Paris. Yet they retayned Cappeluche Bourrel, vnder colour of some speciall seruice. But the Bourguignon being growne the stronger, with the chiefe of the City, he causeth Bourrel to be taken, and hanged, with some number of his associates. This multitude being at Montlehery, discontented with the Bourguignon, leaues the siege, and returns to be reuenged: but the gates were shut, and the walles well guarded, so as all passed without any more adoe. But the Bourguignon was much perplexed, being troubled in E minde to haue put a sword into a mad-mans hand: being afraid of an vnure guard, and a foretelling that his Empire should not continue long.

So, the repulse he receiued from the English, the coldness of the Nobilitie of his partie, and the peoples change, were the motiues which made him wish for the Daulphins friendship, who now prevented him, although he had often refused it. That which moued Charles thereunto, was necessitie, and the hope of a greater dessein, finding no better meanes to stop the current of the English victory, and the Bourguignons treachery, then to ioine with him, attending some better occasion. The successe fauoured this counsell of his followers. He sends Tannequoy of Chastel to the Duke of Bourgongne, to make the first proposition, and after him the Lady of Giac (in whom the Bourguignon had great confidence) to appoint a day and place for a parle, and to seeke the meanes of a good peace. They meet at Pouilly, the strong, neere vnto Melun, in the open field with their guards. The Bourguignon talked to the Daulphin on his knee, and held his stirrup, although Charles refused this submission. Proofoes to shew with what necessitie he sought his friendship, as a man that is beaten with all winds and out of breath. So they conclude an inuiolable peace, and to bandie themselves against the common enemy of France, promises are made on either side, with 1419. with all demonstrations and protestations of a firme and inuolable friendship. The articles of their accord and contract are set down at large in the originall of our historie. This peace betwixt Charles the Daulphin, and John Duke of Bourgongne, was made neere to Pouilly the strong, vpon Ponchiel, a league from Melun, in the yeare 1419. All France reioyced, as after a long and sharpe winter, when the Sunne appeareth in a pleasant spring. The King and al the Parlements ratified this accord, which euery man held for the gage of firm friendship betwixt these Princes, and their loue for a firme pillat of the Realmes quiet. But the prouidence of the protector of this French Monarchie had otherwise decreed. These reconciliations could not serue for sufficient cautions against his iustice, worthily incensed against the Bourguignon, beeing guiltie of horrible crimes, and the wilfull abuse of his patience. The courle which Charles held to be rid of his enemy, is not commendable: but in one and the selfe same worke, we must wisely distinguish of that which is of God, and that which is of man, to approue the good which is alwaies iustified in Gods ordinances, and to blame the ill, alwaies to be blamed in man: that we may stoppe our mouthes, and open our eyes, and not reply against the iust iudgements of God, but view the strange and extraordinarie punishment of the Bourguignons strange and extraordinarie crimes, who during the weaknesse of our poore King, hath so much troubled the Realme.

We haue said, (and the course of the Historie will shewe it very plainly) that the Daulphin Charles suffered himselfe to be gouerned by his seruants. By their aduice hee had made this accord with the Bourguignon, wherein they had either of them feuerall respects: although eithers intent was to make his profit with the others losses, in circumventing of his companion. But he that made his account to deceiue (hauing not yet changed his minde, although the present necessitie made him to change his countenance) was deceiued: and which is more, he which built his greatest desseins vpon murder, is murdered, beeing the onely expedient the Daulphins seruants could deuise to free him from these troubles, in dispatching the Bourguignon once for all.

Reasons to induce the Daulphin to kill the Bourguignon.

The resolution was very great, but to perswade this Prince thereunto, was of greater difficultie. A young man, iust, wise, moderate and of a very mild disposition, so as they had much adoe to perswade him to so bold and violent a remedie. Why my Lord (say they) can you beleue that the Duke of Bourgongne is any thing amended? although he stoupe now to necessitie, can he bend his heart to reason? Haue you forgotten what he did to your deceased Vncle the duke of Orleance, when as he held the same degree that you do now? did he not kill him, and maintained it as well done? braued the King in Paris, armed himself against him, and forced him to iustifie this execrable murder? He masked himselfe with a shewe of good meaning, to make his accord with your poore cousins of Orleance, but was it not with an intent to ruine them with the more facility, seeking to diuide them from your deceased vncle the duke of Berry, incensing the king & your eldest brother against the, making Edicts against them, as guiltie of high treason, and pursuing them with cruell force; when as your brother (discouering his wickednesse) had forsaken him, and that hee (yeelding to necessitie as hee doth now) concluded a peace? did he not arme himselfe by a new deuise, to ruine your blood, opposing both Paris and the States of the Realme, vnder the name of the Commonweale, to put to death the best seruants of the King your father, incensing the people against them, beeing the furious executioners of this execrable rage? And when as he found these popular furies not to succeed well, hath he not fled to force? yea seeing his great enemy your Cousin of Orleance prisoner, and your Vncle of Berry dead, hath hee mortified his cruell desseins in these common calamities? Hee hath rather stirred vp the Emperour to trouble the State, laboured to draw your deceased brother John to his humor, to kindle new fires, and to consume you in them. You (my Lord) are hee who onely trouble him, who onely may frustrate his desseins, and therefore hee strues to take away your head, and set your Crowne vpon his: what hath he not attempted against you? His last actions are worse then the first: there he sought to abuse your brother with your Cousins, here he opposeth your mother against you. There he did openly fight against the law of State, here he doth openly oppugne the law of nature. There (by his policie) he did nourish ialousie betwixt kinsmen, here by his audacious violence he teares in sunder the wombe wherein you did lie, to ruine the State. For to what end doth he giue the Regencie to your mother,

A (the King your father liuing) and you beeing borne Regent during his life, and king after his death? To what end should hee flie to a furious multitude, to decide your controuersies? He hath armed fortie thousand men, in the capitall Cittie of your Realme, and accompanied them with his men at armes. To what end serued all that, but to make a tragicall conclusion of his violent passions? why did hee cause that massacre to be made when you were in the citie, and sought for you so carefully, but to vse you as they did your Constable and Chancellor, and as many of your good seruants as fell into their hands? And after all these exploits, the Bourguignon must call the English King into France, to giue him your sister in mariage: nay rather to take your Crowne from you by peece-meales: for seeing he cannot haue it at all, hee seekes to diuide it. This is the apple for the which he sowes so much diffention. The Law reiects him, and he appeales to faith, to shadow himselfe with her cloake, and to deceiue you with more open shew. He therefore kisseth your hand, hee kneeles, hee holds your Stirrop, to hide his trecherie with a shew of humilitie. Will you beleue (my Lord) that he is in bad tearmes with the King of England. They ayme both at one common obiect. They haue sworne both to take away your life, but the Bourguignon may effect that which the English cannot. And that which they cannot worke by open force, they pretend to effect by policie, couering it with this goodly shew of peace. What effects hath hee giuen you of this reconciliation? What towne hath hee rendered? nay, what men hath hee dismissed? Continuing still in armes, hee discouers his intent: hee means to ruine you with his forces, being lodged in your bowels. His desseins beeing well knowne vnto you (my Lord) will you suffer him to preuent you? We ought to watch for you and seeke the meanes to crosse him. It is lawfull to repell craft by policie. Faith is a holy thing, but who can with reason gaine-say, if a theefe denies his name to circumuent vs, but that it is lawfull to surprise him with his owne armes? To draw an enemy into a mischief which he had prepared for a good man, is no trecherie, but wisdom, especially when there is question to preferue the State. Are you (my Lord) a priuate person? All this great bodie (whereof God hath made you the heade) stretcheth forth the armes, and craues your aide against this theefe, which hath sworne the ruine thereof. He attends but the houre to dispatch you, and to seaze thereon. The safest course is to preuent him: your enemies head shall preferue yours, and all your good and faithfull subjects. My Lord, we protest there is no priuate interest of ours, all is yours, and the publike weales. The faith we haue vowed vnto you, commands vs to deliuer our free aduise. Wee haue liued, doe liue, and will liue, your faithfull seruants, euen vnto the death. The heart makes the mouth to speake, but our hands shall execute your commandements.

The Daulphin (incouraged by these perswasions of his seruant) resolues. Wee haue said, that he parted from Tours, to parle with the Bourguignon; but after that accord, he made a voyage into Berry to assure those places, and to leaue men, in shew to ioyne with him, and to oppose against the English with their common forces, but in effect, it was for the murder of his greatest enemy. He had then twentie thousand fighting men with him. With this troupe he comes into Soulogne, approaching neere vnto those places where his men might be best employed. Montreault-faut-Yonne, (a Towne in Bry, where the riuer of Yon looeth her name, ioyning with Seine) held for him. From thence hee sends Tannequy of Chastell (a very sufficient man of his household, and his trustie seruant) to Troyes in Champagne, to the Duke of Bourgongne, desiring him to come vnto him to Montreault, to resolve vpon the effecting of their accord, and to employ their common forces against their common enemy, hauing brought them to that end, protesting that hee should be much grieved to see them burthen some vnto the people without vse. Moreouer, he had some vne priuate affaires to impart vnto him, as vnto his best and dearest friend.

Tannequy had no other answer from the Bourguignon, but that it were better for the Daulphin to come to Troyes to the King and Queene, his Father and mother, to conclude things in their presence, and by their authoritie, the which should be very necessarie, to reduce the affaires to some good course. Some daies are spent in refusing and re-intreating. The Bourguignons conscience caused him to feare, and the proceeding was suspicious, but that the apparent dislike betwixt the mother and the sonne, needed the mediation of such a friend as the Bourguignon. This was a goodly pretext, to draw the Duke of Bourgongne to be a mediator of peace betwixt the Queene and the Daulphin; and the charge of their armies

1419. armies, (being idle) was not small, the which vrged this interview. The Ladie of Giac of A whom we haue spoken) was employed againe to sollicite this treatie. So as the Bourguignon comes to Bray vpon Seine, whether the Daulphin sent the Bishop of Valence vnto him, he was brother to Charles of Poitiers, bishop of Langres, in whome he had great confidence. This Bishop had in the end power to perswade him to go to Montreau, where the Daulphin attended him. The Bourguignon goes accompanied with fūe hundred horse, two hundred Archers, and many noble men, among the which was Charles the eldest Son of the Duke of Bourbon, whom the Duke of Bourgongne had corrupted, to weaken the Daulphins partie, being a Prince of the blood. The Daulphin had prepared the Castell for the Bourguignon, but he vnurnished it of all munition for warre and victuall; and causeth the bridge to bee fortified with three turne-pikes, to stoppe their free entrance into the Towne, whether the Bourguignon must come by dutie vnto the Daulphin. This succeeded according to his desseine, but it carried the shewe of an enemy. The Bourguignon sends three gentlemen of his household to the Daulphin, Thoulongeon, Ermy, and Soubresier to aduertise him of his coming. They giue him notice of the two Barricadoes made vpon the bridge, and wish him not to aduenture. Hauing referred it to his Councell, all being on horsebacke, he resolues in the end to passe on: he lights at the Castle where his lodging was assigned, and sets his guards at the entrie of the gate towards the town. Hereupon Tannequy of Chastell comes vnto him, who after a due reuerence saluted him from the Daulphin, saying, that he attended him at the bridge foote, at the town gate.

The Bourguignon comes to the Daulphin.

The Daulphin causeth the joining of Bourgongne to be flaine.

Then John of Bourgongne, hauing chosen out ten of his most trustie followers, (Charles of Bourbon, the Lords of Nouaille, Fribourg, S. George, Montagu, Vergy, Ancre, Pontauillier, Lens, Giac, and his Secretarie Seguinat) he approacheth to the first barre, where he encounters with some from our Charles, who intreate him to enter vpon his masters word, and assure him by oath. Before he enters, (as if his heart had foretold his harme) he staies suddenly, and askes aduice of his companie, who encouraging him to passe on, hee enters the second barre, the which was presently lockt, and then he causeth some to go before him, and some behind, he remaining in the midst. Tannequy of Chastell comes to receiue him, and the Duke laying his hand vpon his shoulder very familiarly; This is he (sayes the Duke) in whom I trust. I will conclude this bloudie Catastrophe with the very words of the Originall. And so he approached neere vnto the Daulphin, who stood all armed with his sword by his side, leaning on a barre. Before whome he kneeled with one knee on the ground, to do him honour and reuerence, saluting him most humbly. Whereat the Daulphin answered nothing, making him no shew of loue, but charged him with the breach of his promise, for that he had not caused the warre to cease, nor drawne his men out of garrison, as he had promised. Then Robert de Loire tooke him by the right arme and said, Rise, you are but too honorable. The Duke hauing one knee on the ground, and his sword about him, which hung not to his mind, somewhat too farre backe, kneeling downe he laid his hand on his sword to pull it forward for his ease. Robert said vnto him, Do you lay your hand vpon your sword before my Lord the Daulphin? At which words Tannequy of Chastell drew neere vnto him on the other side, who making a signe, said: It is time, striking the Duke with a little axe so violently on the face, as he cut off his chin, and so he fell on his knees. The Duke feeling himselfe thus wounded, laid his hand on his sword to draw it, thinking to rise and defend himselfe: but he was presently charged by Tannequy and others, and beaten dead to the ground. And suddenly one named Oliuer Layet, with the helpe of Peter Fortier, thrusts a sword into his belly vnder his coate of Maile. Whilst this was doing, the Lord of Nouailles drew his sword halfe out, thinking to defend the Duke: but the Vicount of Narbonne held a dagger, thinking to strike him. Nouailles leaping forcibly to the Vicount, wrested the dagger from him, being so fore hurt in the hinder part of the head, as he fell downe dead. Whilst this was acting, the Daulphin (leaning on the other side of the barre) beholding this strange sight, retired backe as one amazed, and was presently conducted to his lodging by John Loumet and others his Councillers. All the rest were taken except Montagu, who leaped ouer the Turnepike, and gaue the alarum. There were none slaine vpon the place, but John Duke of Bourgongne and Nouailles: S. George and d. Ancre were hurt. The Dukes men charged home vnto the turnepike, but they were easily repulsed. His troupes retiring to

A to Bray are purtued by the Daulphinois, with losse, and in the end the castle is abandoned by him that had it in guard. The Dukes bodie (stript off all but his Doublet and Bootes) is drawne into a Mill, and the next day buried. This happened the tenth of September, in the yeare 1419. Behold the end of John Duke of Bourgongne. Seeing then this murther troubled the Daulphin, who had caused it to be committed, what stonie heart would not be amazed thereat? Truly the breach of faith is vnexcusable, howsoeuer it be disguised: for as faith is the ground of humane societie, so doth it extend euen vnto enemies, with whom it must be inuiolably kept.

This blow shall be deare to Charles. Through this hole, the enemy shall enter so farre into the Realme, as he shall put him in danger, and in the end hee shall be forced to confesse his fault, not able to excuse himselfe without accusing of his Councillours. But from vniust man, let vs ascend to the wisdom of that great Iudge of the world, who is alwaies iust. The Oracle cries, He that strikes with the sword, shall perish with the sword: and, The disloyall to the disloyall. They loued miserie, and miserie found them out. And, wise antiquitie sayes, God punissheth great wickednesse with great paines, euen in this life. And, Hardly can tyrants descend into the grave with a drie death, that is, without blood or murther. Oh iustice of God, alwaies iust, alwaies wise, and alwaies good! Thy iudgements are righteous O Lord: I condemne the error of men, yet I held my peace, because thou diddest it. Draw the curtaine. John of Bourgongne hath played his part vpon this Theater. He had slaine the Duke of Orleans traitorously, and now he wallowes in his owne goare, being treacherously slaine by the Daulphin Charles. Now let vs see the care his sonne Philip Earle of Charolois had to be reuenged of Charles for this cruell murther: but all is not yet ended.

The Catastrophe of this miserable raigne.

Philip sonne to John Duke of Bourgongne, stirres up great troubles against Charles the Daulphin, in reuenge of his fathers death.

D Y whose meanes Izabel, an vnkind mother, makes warre against Charles her Sonne, and peace with Henry the fifth King of England, then a capitall enemy to the State. Shee giues him her daughter Katherine in marriage, and procures King Charles the sixth, her husband, to declare Henry his lawfull heire, and to dis-inherit his onely sonne Charles the seuenth from the Realme of France.

E During these occurrents HENRY the 5. and CHARLES the sixth die, leaving the Crowne of France in question betwixt Charles the seuenth, and Henry the sixth, proclaimed King of France, at the Funerals of Charles the sixth.

From the yeare 1419. to the yeare 1422.

F T E R this tragicall and strange murther of John of Bourgongne, Philip his sonne, Duke of Bourgongne, by his decease, seekes to be reuenged vpon Charles the Daulphin, and Charles to defend himselfe. Philip was then in Flanders. The Parisiens (passionate partisans of the Bourguignon) who had seene the Duke of Orleans murdered without mouing, and they themselues had massacred the chiefe officers of the Crowne, and had shed the blood of many good men for his pleasure and passion, hauing repayed the blood soo treacherously slaine by him in the same coyne, they now grow into a greater mutinie then if the King himself had been slaine.

the exploits of the Daulphin and of Philip. But go no ster this murther.

1420. slaine. They send their Deputies to Philip, and promise not onely to be faithfull, but to assist him with all their meanes, to reuenge the murther committed on the person of his father. And at the same instant, Montagu, beeing escaped from the Turn-pike, writes to all the Citties vnder the Bourguignons obedience, of this accident, the which he could report as an eye-witnesse. Charles on the other side, writes to all the good cities of the Realme, yeelding a reason of this murther, and imputing the fault to the Bourguignons bad dealing, who would haue slaine him at a parle, exhorting the people not to mourne for the iust execution of a man borne for the ruine of France, who had willingly thrust himselfe into this mischiefe: offering all his meanes to settle the Realme in peace according to the authoritie whereunto God had called him. But in talking, hee seekes to assure himselfe of some countries, Stephen of Vignoles, called la Hire, and Poton of Xaintrailles, winne Crespy in Laonois, and Caradoz of Quesne with Charles of Flaue take Roye, places very important to trouble the citties of Piccardie, where the Bourguignon was chiefly obeyed. The strong castle of Muin opposite to Crespie, and Roye is surprized by the industrie of his seruants, and keepes all Vermandois and Laonois in alarme. This beginning caused Philip to seeke all speedie meanes to crosse Charles his proceedings, beeing resolute to continue what he had begunne: yet the Parisiens were in some feare, pressing Philip againe not to abandon the seruants of his house, the which made him more prompt in the execution. Philip being assured of his Flemings, obtaines a suspension of armes from Henry the fifth, King of England, and a day and place appointed to treat a generall peace betwixt the two realmes. Then C marching with his armie through Picardie, he recouers Crespie, Roye and Muin, to the great content of his partisans: and so he arriues at Troyes in Champagne, the appointed place for this treatie.

Isabel Queene of France (a cruell Medea, and an vnnaturall mother,) continued her tragick choller against her Sonne, who hauing defaced the common feeling of nature, did soone forget the honour she had receiued to be married into the house of France. Being thus wedded to the Bouguignons passions, she tormented her poore husbands spirits being exceeding weake, perswading him, that his best course was to disinherit this wicked sonne, to declare his daughter heire, and (in marrying her to the greatest King vpon the earth) to giue her likewise the Realme after his decease, and to her issue, as descended from the blood of France. Philip comming to the King, found new worke: for presently Henry the fifth king of England concludes a peace with King Charles the sixth, weddes Catherine his daughter, and doth obtaine by Letters pattents, That establishing a firme and free peace in both the Realmes of France and England, in regard of the marriage of Catherine of France, he is declared Regent of the Realme during the life of king Charles, to whom the title of king remains, and to Isabel his wife the title of Queene, during their liues. But presently after the kings decease, the Crowne and Realme of France with all their rights and dignities should remaine vnto him, whom king Charles the sixth calles by his letters pattents, his most deere and welbeloued sonne, and to his heires in chiefe. They cause this poore sicke King to sweare vpon the holy Bible, and to promise this for him and his, with all exemptions and necessarie clauses in so great and important a businesse. This goodly act (the fruite of the furious passions of ciuill warre) was made at Troies, the 21. of May, in the yeare 1420.

heereof France

This done, the French and English forces ioyning, and marching vnder the same colors, acknowledge one Commaunder, and for their first exploite they winne Montreau-fut-Yonne, where they take vp and burie John of Bourgongne againe, and so marching on as against Rebels, they take Melun, Meaux and Moret, and beseege Compiegne. But least matters should grow cold, Henry of England (whome they call Regent) returnes to Troies, and with a goodly traine, conducts the King, Queene, and his new wife Catherine to Paris, being better followed and ferued then the King himselfe. The Parisiens folly did wonderfully imbrace the comming of this new Royaltie, promising vnto themselues a new heauen, but this humor lasted not long, hauing tried the power of forrain Princes, and the command of their Kings by very contrarie effects.

Henryes pro-

new Royalty
of France.

The Regent held a councell presently in great state, in the pallace of Saint Pol, beeing the Kings lodging. Two throanes were erected for the two Kings, and a seate vnderneath for Philip of Bourgongne. The Kings councell (beeing few in number) is supplied by the

A the Court of Parliament, and the Vniuersity. Philip demands Iustice of the murther committed on the person of John of Bourgongne his father. His Aduocate Rollin made this instance. The Kings Aduocate, and the Vniuersity assisted him in the pursute. King Charles promisseth Iustice against his Sonne the Daulphin, and to do all good offices for King Henry his new Sonne. This was the first act of the new Regencie, against the onely Sonne of his house. And moreouer they decreed, that hereafter all the treasure should bee governed by the Regents authority and command. Henry resolues presently to call a Parliament for the necessity of his returne into England, whether he meant to conduct his new Spouse. A Parliament was held, according to this decree, but all were amazed at this sodaine alteration, euen the very report of my History hath some feeling thereof, for what canst thou see here-
B in gentle reader, but frozen Ice, in the remembrance of these confusions, renewed by the feeling of our owne. Thus the Regent caused Charles Duke of Touraine, and Daulphin of Viennois to be called to the Marble table. All solemnities obserued, and he not appearing, by a decree of the Councell, and of the Court of Parliament, he was banished the realme, and iudged vnworthy to succeed in any of the Seigneuries, as well present, as to come. The Daulphin appeales from this sentence, To God and his sword, who in the end doing him iustice, shall blesse his sword, and make it victorious ouer his enemies.

The Parisiens (discontented with the violent courses of the new Regent) began to abate their ioy within few dayes after, before Henry returne into England. Philip of Bourgongne Earle of Saint Pol, Cousin germaine to the Duke of Bourgongne, was gouernour of Paris, by the appointment of King Charles. Henry displaceth him, and appoints Thomas Duke of Clarence his brother. He sets English gards in all the strong places of the City, and displaceth the French and Bourguignons, and yet durst they not mutter. The Lord of Lisle-Adam made Marshall of France, (for that he had assisted at the taking and massacre of Paris) was as much out of fauour with this new King, as he was pleasing to the Parisiens. The Regent sends men to apprehend him, whom (as they led to the Bastille) the people made an offer to rescue, but they were sharply repulst by the English, and well beaten: a iust reward, hauing wished for a strange King: but they shall soone after haue other employments, to teach them to know new bread from old, which they had so much disdained. Thus Henry the fit made the Parisiens to know in time that he had authority to force obedience, in punishing fooles and rebels growne licentious in confusion.

On the other side the Daulphin faints not at the first bruit of this new royaltie, but growing resolute against all stormes, hee looserh no opportunity to aduance his affaires. Wee haue shewed how that Aniou obeyed him. The new Regent commands the Duke of Clarence his brother to make warre in those parts. So hee enters the Country with his army, as it were to take possession of his owne. Hee presents him selfe before Angiers the chiefe City of that Prouince, presuming that all would presently obey him: but the issue did not answer his hopes, for he found all the French resolute to defend them selues against a stranger, and to obey their naturall King. Herevpon the French ioyne together, they arme and goe to field. The English being out of hope to take Angiers, turne head against the French army lodged at Little Bauge, which attended resolutely the force of a mighty and victorious enemy. On the other side, the imaginary hope of victory thrust on the Duke of Clarence against our men, whom hee held to bee halfe dead, but hee findes them reuiued, ready to sell their liues at a deare rate. The battaile was very bloody, the one fighting for Empire and honour, and the other for their liues and altars. The euent was vnfortunate for the English. The Duke of Clarence was slaine, and the English army lost fiftene hundred men vpon the place, for the first fruites of their new Regencie, and a gage of their pretended royaltie. This famous incounter hapned in the yeare 1420. the ninth of Aprill. As in the fit of a dangerous disease the first motions of nature are very important, so is it in State. A light beginning after a great danger, drawes a great consequence eyther to good or euill. This first action had a great traine. Charles his party began to rise, as if the good hap of the lawfull heire reuiuing, had taken a new forme in setting his authoritie. John of Montfort Duke of Brittain fauoured this first successe of Aniou. After that the English had seized vpon Normandy, hee put himselfe vnder his protection: but now hee turnes taile, and allyes himselfe with our Charles against him, in a defensue and offensive

1422. league. What remaines of the historie of Brittain, I will referue for another place: let vs A now returne to our discourse. At the same instant James of Harcourt leaues the Bourguignons partie. He makes warre in the Countie of Vimeu and takes diuers places, Pont Remy, Saint Riquier, la Ferte, Mareuill, Diancourt, Araines and other small places. The Bourguignon goes to field, the smallest townes yeelds vnto him. He beseegeth Saint Riquier beeing well defended by the Lord of Offemont, but newes comes that the Daulphins armie approacheth. The Bourguignon resolues to meete them: he sends forth part of his forces; they are dispersed vpon a false alarme, that the Duke of Bourgongne was dead. As they were in this disorder, behold, he shewes himselfe to his souldiers full of resolution, and so fitly, as hauing rallied his men and encouraged them, he not onely repelles his enemy, but defeats them, takes Saint Riquier and frees Picardie from feare. Such is the varietie of our incounters: the conqueror is here conquered.

The great exploits of Henry.

The Bourguignon beeing in field, our new Regent comes from his Realme of England with new forces: hauing resolved to employ all their meanes ioynly to ruine the Daulphin, before he should fortifie himselfe with any new successe: they disperse their forces into diuers parts of the Realme, hauing more men and money then the Daulphin. The Prince of Orenge held the Daulphine in awe. The Lord of Roch-baron made warre in Forest and Auergne, and the bodie of the armie with the Regent and Duke marched against the Daulphin, who was retired to Bourges a strong cittie, and of a fit scituation, lying in the midst of such Prouinces as obeyed him. This armie marching with a victorious shew, beseegeth Dreux, and takes it by composition. Chartres yeelds willingly: from thence he marcheth with an intent to draw the Daulphin to fight, but the Regent (seeing him retire to a place of hard access) resolues to free all the Townes about Paris, but especially Senlis and Soissons, townes of importance. Hee hoped to vanquish him by degrees, and in the end to giue him the mate.

But all enterprises succeed not: Man purposeth, but God disposeth, who meant to trie, but not to ruine France. All succedes not wishfully to the English, beeing King of France in conceit. The Prince of Orenge is beaten in Languedoc, and Lanneguy of Chastell Steuard of Beaucaire, hauing happily recovered Pont Saint Esprit, (a towne of importance, vpon the passage of Rosne) all the rest yeelds to the Daulphins command: so as hee could hardly keepe his towne of Oranges. Auignon fauoured the Daulphin. Roch-baron was taken at Seruere by Imbert of Grotte, Seneshall of Lions, and so Auergne and Forest were subiect to the Daulphin: who seeing himselfe without any enemy, and forces readie for his defence, he beseegeth la Charite and takes it. From thence he goes to Cosne, where he finds great resistance, yet he doth presse it with such violence, as they are forced to come to a parle. They prefixe a certaine day to be succoured by the new Regent, or to yeeld to the Daulphin. The Regent assures them of releefe, exceeding glad of this occasion, to draw our Daulphin to the combate, wherein he hoped to vanquish him.

But he had not made his accompt with death, who holds his assignments more certaine, then all Monarches: for resolving vpon this voyage, although he had many other affaires in hand, he fell sicke, and of a strange disease, which the vulgar sort tearme Saint Fiacre, and Phisitions * Phyriasis. Enguerand assures, that the chiefe disease whereof he died, was Saint Anthomes fire: but it is more credibly reported, that he died of a Pluresie, a disease in those dayes so rare and vnknowne, that Phisitions being not therewith acquainted, nor with the cause whence it proceeded could not prescribe nor apply any remedie therefore. Henry hauing his mind fixed vpon this voyage, and his supposed victorie, parts from Senlis, hauing taken leaue of the King, Queene and wife, (whom he shall see no more) hee caused himselfe to be carried to Melun in a litter: but feeling himselfe prest by his infirmitie, he returned to Bois-de-Vincennes, where hauing taken his bed, he sent his armie into Bourgongne vnder the command of the Duke of Bedford his brother, and the Earle of Warwicke, commaunding them to pursue the Daulphin. At the bruite of this great armie, the Daulphin Charles leaues Cosne and retires to Bourges: and so the towne was freed.

Henry was not so freed from his sicknesse, the which increasing daily, made him to thinke of his ende, disposing as he pleased touching his sonne Henry the sixt of that name, whom hee had by Katherine the daughter of Fraunce, and the Duke of Excester his Vncle to bee Regent

* A disease of worms or lice.

A Regent of England, commaunding them expressly to liue in concord with Philip Duke of Bourgongne, and neuer to make any peace with Charles of Valois (for so he called him) vnlesse they might haue Normandy in soueraignty, neither to releafe the Dukes of Orleance and Bourbon, vntill his sonne were of a competent age.

And thus Henry the fift dies, beeing neare about fortie yeares old, in the vigor of his age and spirit, borne and aspiring to great matters, hauing already giuen prooofe of what hee might haue done if he had liued longer. But God would punish France by an Englishman, yet would he not suffer France to haue any other King then a French-man. This vnexpected death, in the great course of Henry the fifts victories, happened the last day of August, in the Henry the 5. dies.

B yeare 1422. followed soone after by one no lesse memorable. For Charles the sixt our good King, (but subiect to the miserablest raigne that France had euer seene to that day) fell sicke and died the 22. of October in the same yeare, fiftie daies after the decease of Henry of England. A sicknesse and death remarkable in so great a King, for after that hee had languished in so long and infamous an infirmitie, he died in a manner alone. They name but the Chancellour, the first Chamberlaine, his Almoner with some groomes of his chamber which were present at his end. After his death he was visited by such as had caused him to die liuing, and by his miserable life had made all the Realme to languish. At the funerals of this poore Prince, after the Herald had proclaimed The King is dead, another cried, God save the King, God send a long and happie life to Henry the sixt by the Grace of GOD King of France and

Charles the 6. dies.

C England our Soueraigne Lord. To the end that passion might triumph ouer the infirmitie of our King, euen in his graue. This Henry shall be crowned King at Paris soone after. But where is that Isabel, or rather Iezabel, who had so much tormented her poore husband? I seeke her in all the corners of this Historie, yet cannot find her. She who caused so great diuisions, dies without any memorie, but to haue liued too long for France and her children. Oh the vanitie of this world! which doth interre the most busie in the forgetfulness of the graue, when as they thinke themselves raised to the toppe of their desseines.

Henry the 6. proclaimed King.

Thus Charles the sixt raigned, thus he liued, and thus he died, miserable in his raigne, miserable in his life, but most happie in his death, as well to free himselfe from paine, and by this occasion, his whole realme from confusion, as also by death to change his tumultuous and miserable life, into a quiet rest and eternal happinesse, for what else can we say of him, whose miserie gaue him the title of Welbeloued, hauing nothing reprochfull in his life but his afflictions? This is all I can speake touching the iudgement of this raigne, after the repetition of so many miseries: so as measuring others by mine owne apprehension, I thinke to ease them in not reuiuing so tedious a subiect, noting that this raigne was alwaies miserable, both in the minoritie and maioritie of our King. His manners, his race, his raigne and his age do appeare by that which we haue written. Hee liued foure and fiftie yeares, and raigned two and fortie. He had many sonnes and daughters. Katherine is famous, hauing bene the mournfull gage of many miseries. Of three sonnes which came all to the age of men, Charles onely remained successor of his Crowne, but not of his fortunes, for he shall settle the Realme, redeeming it out of Strangers hands, as shall appeare in the following discourse.

Charles

CHARLES the feuenth, the 54. French King.

After the long and painefull Carriere of the fore-passe raigries, were it not time now to breath? Since the vnfortunate battaile of Crefsy, wee haue felt nothing but thornes, tempests, combustions, and shewes of ruines. And if we shall abate that little happinesse which Charles the fifth brought vnto our Auncestors, there are not lesse then seuentie yeares of confusion. But all is not yet ended: we must passe thirtie yeares more before the conclusion. And as if we felt the crosses of our fore-runners, we must shut our eyes, recouer new forces, grow resolute against all stormes, and end couragiously with them, the remainder of this painefull course (in the troublesome discourse, which we shall find in the beginning of this raigne) to see in the end a happie Catastrophe in the restoring of this Estate, and the vnion of the Church, diuided by a long and dangerous schisme, which disquieted Christendome, during the troubles of this raigne.

Notable particularities of this raigne.

Here our Frenchmen may reade with admiration and profit, that, as it is not now alone, that France hath bene afflicted, so God doth not now beginne to watch ouer it, deliuering it by miraculous meanes, when as it seemed neere to ruine. Here Charles the seuenth the least and last of his brethren, shall deface the ignominie of France, and triumph ouer the victories of a stranger, who had in a manner dispossessed him of his Realme. Of a truth God meant to punish vs by meanes of the English, but not to ruine vs. The French cannot be commanded but by a French-man. The Ocean is a strong barre to diuide these two Estates, content with their own rights. This raigne abounding in miraculous accidents, is the more considerable being the perfect Idea of the raigne of Henry the 4. lately murdered.

The order of this discourse.

But to represent so variable a subiect with proficite, it is necessarie to distinguish it in order. There are three parts famous both for the subiect and successe. The first shewes the confused and troublesome beginning of this raigne, vntill our Charles was solemnly installed King,

A King, and thereby acknowledged of all the French, for vntill that day the greatest part called him Earle of Ponthieure, or King of Bourges, in mockerie: and such as were more modest termed him Dauphin of Viennois. The second puts him in possession of his royall authoritie, shewing by what meanes he reduced the Citties subdued by the English to his obedience, beginning with the Cittie of Paris, and so proceeding to the rest of the Realme, expelling the English from all, but onely Calais. The third shewes the end of this raigne, discovering the Kings domesticall discontents, which hastened him to his graue, after the happy euents of all his difficulties.

So this raigne continued thirtie nine yeares, variable in good and euill. The beginning difficult, the midst happie, and the end mournfull. This is the Theater of mans life, where B sorrow, happinesse, and misfortune, play their parts diuersly both with great and final. Charles the seuenth was one and twentie yeares old when he began to raigne, and raigned 39. yeares: for after the decease of his father Charles the sixt, he tooke vpon him the name of King of France, (notwithstanding the pretension of the English) the 22. of October in the yeare 1422. and he died the thirteenth of Iuly, 1461. He was married at eleuen yeares of age, to Marie the daughter of Lewis Duke of Aniou and King of Sicily. By this marriage he had three sonnes and fiue daughters. His sonnes names were Lewis, Philip, and Charles. Lewis the eldest shall succeed him to the Crowne. Philip died very young. Charles liued somewhat longer, but without any great successe, hauing onely the titles of the Dukedomes of Berrie, Normandie and Guienne. His daughters were Radeconde, Yoland, Katherine, Jane and Magdaleine. The first died, beeing betrothed to Sigismund Duke of Austria. Yoland was married to Amedee Duke of Sauoy: Katherine to that great Charles Duke of Bourgongne, who shall be his owne ruine: Jane to Iohn Duke of Bourbon, and Magdaleine to Gaston earle of Foix: and this was his race; His manners will appeare by his life: he was of a tractable and gentle disposition, capable of counsell, but louing his ease too much, and suffering himself to be often carried away by his seruants. And yet as God would vse him for the establishing of the French Monarchie, so did he bring him vp in the schoole of affliction, to fortifie him against all difficulties, assisting him with great and worthe persons, both for warre and counsell, by whose meanes he did raise vp this estate, yet with great and confused combats, D and by a long and painefull patience. But let vs proceede to that which hath chanced vnder his raigne, most worthe of obseruation.

The miserable estate of this raigne, vnto the Coronation of Charles the 7. during seauen yeares.

From the end of the yeare 1422. vnto 29. in the moneth of Iune, when as he was solemnly installed King in the citie
of Poitiers.

VCH was the estate of Charles, when his fathers death called him to the Crowne. We haue scene after that the miseries of France had caused his mother Isabel to forget her owne bloud, making him to be reiectd from the Crowne, and Henry the 5. King of England substituted in his place, yet he fainted not in these extremities, but did valiantly withstand the pretended desseignes, by whose death God soone laid the foundation of this realmes restoring. Yet after the death of King Henry the 5. Charles was incountred with infinite difficulties. He had small meanes, fewer friends, and many mightie enemies. He scarce enioyed the least part of his estate, followed by intreatie, and obeyed by halues, euen of such as made profession to be most faithfull. The Citties had diuers motions, as priuate interest drew mens mindes to that partie which they held most profitable. There were but too many which followed the fortune of the English, beeing a Conqueror, the corruption of man inclining commonly to the stronger. But amidst these vncertaine humors of people, he had Diuerstie of humors in the Court.

1422. enemies which encountered him with aduantages apparently victorious: for Henry the sixt A although he were very yong, yet did he exceed him in all things: he had a realme hereditarie and absolute: the best part of the French Monarchie: the assistance of the Duke of Bedford his Vncle, with many worthy men, and great meanes. To these enemies were ioyned some great men, which fished in a troubled streame, euery one imagining to haue a part of this garment, building their desseignes vpon the Sepulcher of Charles, and the alteration of the State. Among the chiefest were Phillip Duke of Bourgongne, Amedee Duke of Sauoy, Peter Duke of Brittain, with his Brother the Earle of Richemont. Diuers instruments vnder that great engin of England: but all these motions were to ruine France, and to build their greatnesse vpon her ruines.

The Duke of Bourgongne. The Burguignon (who had a great hand in the State) was most interessed and most opposite to Charles, being apparently the author of his fathers murder. Yet Philip (a iudicious Prince) so hated him, whom necessity commanded him to hate in this accident, as if he should loue him in time, not wedding him selfe absolutely to the English: yet did hee fo worke for him in shew, as making him selfe in effect the stronger, hee might counterpeise him, if necessity required, and strike the last stroake for him to whom the French should incline. Reason likewise taught him, that the people would respect the lawfull heire of the Crowne, louing their Prince naturally, and in the end would reiect the Stranger, as an unlawful tenant, who made him selfe daily insupportable by his imperious carriage. Amedee Duke of Sauoy being on the Stage, and farre from blowes, kept the stakes, and entertained Charles, as if he should be an assured mediator in these quarrels, to end them with more aduantage than any Christian Prince: and so he nourished this diuision, by a strict intelligence which he had with the Bourguignon. As for the humour of the two brethren of Brittain, the course of the History will soone shew it: Thus Charles charged by many enemies, had few faithfull and confident friends, and in that golden age, so small meanes to entertaine his friends, as he could hardly supply the ordinary charges of his traine, selling and ingaging peece after peece, of his inheritance. So as he had nothing more assured then the equity of his cause, and his resolution in this great necessity. He had yet some good friends remaining in Scotland, whom hee bought dearly, aduancing them to the greatest dignities of the realme: for he made Charles Steward Earle of Boucquan his Constable, and James Earle Douglas Marshall of France: and to honour the Scottish-mens faith, he gaue them the gard of his person, an institution which continues vnto this day. He had likewise some friends in Spaine and Italy, who succoured him in due time, according to their meanes. Wee haue shewed what Prouinces followed the party of our Charles, amongst the which Languedoc was a principall. The importance of this country did much aduance his affaires. This reason moued both the Bourguignon and the Sauoiard against this Prouince. The instruments fit for this enterprife, were John of Chaalons Prince of Orange, & the Lord of Roche-baron, a Nobleman of Velay, one of the 22. diocesses of Languedoc. The first by the commodity of his neighbourhood did win Nismes, Pont saint Esprit, Aiguemortes, and all the rest of bafe Languedoc, vnto Beziers, except the castell of Pezenas, the tower of Villeneufue by Auignon, and the castell of Egaliers, now wholly ruined, neere vnto Vzez. This losse was somewhat repaired by the fidelity of the inhabitants. Aiguemortes set vp their Ensigne of liberty, by the direction of the Baron of Vauuerbe, and kills the garrison of Bourguignons, which the Prince of Orange had placed there. To this day they shew a great vessel of Stone, wherein they did salt the Bourguignons. The example of this strong and important city, awaked the rest, and euen vpon the approch of the Earle of Foix, (who came with a goodly army) all the townes yeeld vnto him, except Nismes and Pont S. Esprit, townes of great importance in that country, the one being the head of that Seneshauce, the other a passage vpo the Rofne towards Dauphine. But as the liberty of time made the seruant presume above the Maister, so it chanced, that the Earle of Foix, (hauing tasted the sweet of command, and transported with the common humor of men, seeking to make their profit of the common confusions of France) deteined the reuenues of Languedoc, by his absolute authority, imparting none to Charles, being exceeding poore in this confused time. This necessity was accompanied with a cruell warre, stirred vp in Velay, by the Lord of Roche-baron, a partisan to the Dukes of Sauoy, and Bourgongne, who furnished him both with men and money, for this

A strange cruelty where by they are called Bourguignons to this day.

A this rebellion, for it was rather a horrible theuery then a warre. These two occasions, drew Charles into Languedoc, to confirme his authority, and his voiage succeeded according to his intent: for he chased the Prince of Orange out of Nismes and Pont Saint Esprit, he pacified the troubles of Velay, and put the Earle of Foix from his gouernment, giuing the place to Charles of Bourbon, Earle of Clermont, a prince of the blood, to the great content of all the people. Hauing thus happily provided for his affaires, he takes the way of Velay, to returne into France, being arrived at Espaly, (a castle belonging to the bishop of Puy) hee is aduertised of his fathers death, after Henry the fift his Competitor. Hee falls presently to teares and mourning, yet hee buries not his affaires in care. His counsell aduiseeth him to change his blacke robes into scarlet, to set vp the banner of France in his name, and to B proclaime himselfe King, for the first fruites of his coronation: the which being performed at Puy, to the peoples great ioy, Charles goes to Poitiers, where hee caused himselfe to be crowned King, and receiued the homage and othes of the officers of the crowne, princes, noblemen and gentlemen that were about him, with such pompe as the strictnesse of time would permit. Then he intituled himselfe King of France, and made shew of more authority and greater pompe. But on the other side, the duke of Bedford beganne to bandy more strongly against him. Henry the sixth, his pupill, a yong infant, was in England. Hee caused him likewise to be crowned King, till the seuen yeeres after he should be solemnely installed at Paris, in the yeere, 1430. Hee set his name vpon the money of France, making a new C stampe, but without any other change, then of his name.

So that hereafter two Kings, two factions, two armies shall contend for this goodly crowne. The heire being the weaker shall fight against a strong pretender. Law fauours the one, and force the other: but the protector of this estate, will giue a fauorable doome for the weaker, that the honor of so memorable a preservation of this monarchy, apparently drawne out of the graue, may bee giuen to him, who rules the deluge of our confusions, by his miraculous prouidence. Scarfe had Charles receiued the first fruites of his royall authority, when as the dukes of Bedford and Bourgongne, his capitall enemies, assemble at Amiens, to crosse his new dignity in the breeding. There shall be seuen yeeres of exceeding bad time, but after this sharpe winter, there will come a goodly spring, when as all seemed D lost, and in the end Sommer shall follow with a plentiful harvest of rest to this Realme, whereof the lawfull heire shall remaine in quiet possession, and the pretender expelled with losse euen of that which he might haue ciuilly inoyed.

In this assembly at Amiens, great plots are laid against Charles, whose ruine was their souereigne end. All is done at the charge of the English. Peter duke of Britan and Arthur Earle of Richmont his brother, are there present. Amedee duke of Sauoy, sends his Ambassadors, vnder an other colour, but he casts the stone and hides his arme. The dukes of Bedford, Britan and Sauoy, make a defensiu and offensiu league against Charles. The souereignty of the crowne should remaine to the English: the commodities to the Dukes. They set the scale of marriages to this alliance. John Duke of Bedford marries with Anne the siter of Philip duke of Bourgongne, and Marguerit his other Sitter takes Arthur the E Earle of Richmont. Then they seeke the fruits of this alliance with the preiudice of Charles. Euery man takes his quarter, to torment him on all sides. The Bourguignon vnder takes Picardy, where hee settles John of Luxembourg, to expel the Dauphinois out of some places which they held there. Henry of Lancaster Earle of Salisbury, went into Champagne and Bry, to clesse the country about Paris, and to bridle Orleans. The Earle of Warwick vnder-tooke Guienne, to make warre against those townes that held the Dauphins party. Lewis Prince of Orange, had charge to arme in Languedoc and Dauphine. Behold a great storme rising against the lawfull heire of this crowne.

Amidst all these difficulties, Charles must needs bee in great perplexitie: but I read with ioy, that hee whom God had chosen to restore this estate, was not amazed, nor daunted, F but hauing commonly in his mouth this Oracle, wee must haue God and reason on our side. Hee hath recourse vnto God, and falls courageously to worke. Hee flies to Rochell, to assure it vnder his obedience. Being in the towne, there happens a notable accident, as hee was in counsell, a part of the chamber funke, and James of Bourbon with diuers others were slaine in this ruine. The King was but hurt. From this danger, hee passeth on to the chiefe of 1422. of his affaires. He sends into Scotland Milan, and Castile, to summon his friends to succour A him, who speedily will send him notable aides. He provides for all the passages vnder his obedience. He assures himselfe of Languedoc (from whence hee drew his chiefe helpees) by the Earle of Clermont: from Daulphin, by the Lord of Gaucourt: from Lions, Lyonnois, Forrest, Beauuiculis and Masconois, by Imbert of Groslee, Senehall of Lions: from Gascogne, and other countries of Guienne, where hee was acknowledged, by the Vicont of Narbonne, and the maister of Oruall. Hee sends James of Harcourt into Picardy, accompanied with Pethon, the Xintrailles, or Saint Treille, and Stephen Vignoles, called la Hirre, the flower of his captaines. And likewise of Bourguignon sent thither the greatest part of his forces. Ambrose de Lore goes into Maine and Perche, Pregeance of Coigny, into Champagne. The Earle of Dunois (a bastard of the house of Orleans) keeps Orleans. The townes lying vpon B the riuer of Loire, above and beneath Orleans, were vnder the obedience of the French, La Charite, Gyan, Jargeau, Meung, Baugency, Blois, Amboise, Tours, Saumur, diuerse small townes in Beaufle, La Ferte of Gaules, Januille Espernay, Pluviers. And in the countries of Gastenois and Vrepolis, Montargis, Chastillon, Milly. Nearer vnto Paris, Mont-leher, Orsay, Marcouffy (very strong places then, but now desolate) kept Paris in alarum.

Thus the cardes were shuffled, but the English had the better part, keeping the great cities and the Kings purse, and (as the stronger) hee begins the game, which had this issue for the remainder of that yeere. The English besiege and take Bazas, and the French win Meulan, vpon Seine, with great slaughter of the English, but the duke of Bedford (loth to indure C such a thorne in the sides of Paris) doth presently besiege it. Charles sends them succors, vnder the command of the Earle of Aumale, the Constable Boucquham and Tanneguy of Chastel. Too many commanders, to doe any great exploit. Jealousie of command bred such a confusion, as all these troupes marched in disorder, no man acknowledging but his private commander. Herevpon the English army arriues, who had an easie conquest of these disorderd troupes, and then Meulan yeelds to the duke of Bedford.

The sharpnesse of winter could not temper the heat of these warriors: and, as the fortune of the warre is variable, one winnes, another loseth, Ambrose de Lore and John of Be- lay (thinking to take Frensy le Conte) lost a notable troupe of their men. The Lord of Fontaines hath his reuenge vpon the English, and defeats eight hundred of them at Neuuil- le, and John of Luxembourg, a Bourguignon, defeats the Lords of Gamaches and Amaul- ry with their troupes. The Earle of Salisbury, takes the townes of Vertues and Espernay, and the strong places of Montaguillon and Osny neere vnto Paris. The composition is strange, the souldiers yeelding at the Regents discretion, are brought to Paris, bare-headed, halters about their necks, and swords at their breasts.

This miserable troupe thus tyed, and led in triumph, passeth through Saint James streete to goe to the Tournelles, where the Regent was lodged, and from thence to bee drawne to the place of execution, if the Duchesse of Bedford (moued with the pittie of a French woman, at so pittifull a spectacle) had not begged the liues of these poore condemned men. Thus that yeere passed, wherein Charles the sixth, and Henry the fifth died, but God to re- store our Monarchie, beganne in the same yeere to lay a leuaine against the attempts E of Strangers, who sought to ruine it. Jaqueline of Bauaria, Countesse of Hainault and Holland, the onely heire of those two states, had married with John Duke of Brabant, who by a blind and ambitious auarice, gaue her selfe to Humfry duke of Gloucester, vncle to the King of England, and married with him, reiecting her lawfull husband. Her excuse was, that the Brabantin was her cousin germaine, but this shalbe a meanes to dissolue that alliance so cunningly conioyned by the dukes of Bedford and Bourgonne, who shall breake vpon this occasion. The yeere begins while that losses came by heapes vpon Charles, as the current of an vnauoidable ruine: whatsoeuer he vndertooke, succeeded not.

James of Harcourt was Gouverneur of Picardy, placed there ouer some remainders of the shipwracke of that country, hee surpriseth Dommar in in Ponthieu from the Bourguignon, and spoiles the neighbour Abbaies, and the country. Hauing ruined these poore dis- armed men, he is charged by Ralph Butler and English capitaine, looeth all his conquest, and escapes hardly with his life, and sees Crotoy taken before his face, the chiefe dungeon of his designs, Rue, Saint Valery, and in the end the goodly city of Abbeuille, sufficient to stay

The French defeated by the English, & Meulan yeelded.

The cause of diuision betwixt the Dukes of Bedford and Bourgonne.

Charles hath diuers likes.

A stay the English forces, if it had beene garded by good men. After these shamefull losses he comes to Charles to excuse himselfe, he pardons him, but God made him soone pay the interest of his thefts, being the cause of his owne ruine.

Hauing no place of aboad, hee retires to Parthenay, to his vncle, who entertained him courteously, but Harcourt not content with this kinde vsage, would be maister of the castle, his practise fell vpon his owne head, being slaine by the gardes, suffering the punishment of his treachery, as he had done of his couetousnesse and cowardise. A lesson for bad seruants to their Princes, detestable either for their robberies, or for their treacherous cowardises, whom God paies in due season.

B The entrance of this yeere was also infamous, in two shamefull losses, happened to two great captaines, to Ambrose of Lore, who looeth the castle of Tenny in the country of Maine, and to Oliuer of Magny beaten by the English, at the Bishops parke neere Auranches, but from small accidents, we must come to great actions. Champagne was in no better case then Maine. The Earle of Salisbury made warre with all violence, against Pregeant of Coigny, who defended the Kings party the best hee could, but not able to beare so great a burthen, hee flies to Charles, who sends him his Constable with forces, the which were im- ploied both in an other cause, and with other successe then hee had designed, for behold the towne of Creuant in Bourgonne (situated vpon the riuer of Yonne, vpon the frontiers of Champagne) is surprised by the bastard of Baume, for the King. The Constable flies thither, but too late, for la Baume, not able to take the castle, abandons the towne. In the C mean time, the brute thereof draws forces thither, from all parts, as a cupping glasse doth humours. The Dowager of Bourgonne (mother to duke Philip) sends a goodly troupe vnder the conduct of Toulangeon Marshall of Bourgonne. The duke of Bedford doth sodainly furnish a notable supplie, for the respect hee bare to the duke of Bourgonne his brother-in-law: Charles fearing least his Constable should miscary, assembles what tor- ces hee can with all speed, and sends them vnder the conduct of the Lord of Senerac Marshall of France, the Earle of Ventadour, the Lords of Fontaines, Velay, and Gamaches. The number was very equall, but the incomber fell vpon our army. And this was the occasion.

D The Constable hauing made his choise of a little hill, a place of aduantage to attend his e- nemy, the English comes with a conquering brauery, as hee that was accustomed to gaine euery where, without any stay: hee forceth our gard, placed vpon the bridge to keepe the passage. Hauing thus passed in view of our army, impatience seizeth on our men by this proud contempt, and they cry out to the Constable, who galled with despight for this affront, resolves to the combat. So all with one fury leaue the hill, march towards the Eng- lish and offer him bataille.

The Earle of Salisbury makes a stand, to temper the heat of our French, who durst not approach very nere, fearing the furie of their English arrows. This first motion thus slackt, the Earle of Salisbury giues the signe to bataille. Those of Creuant halfe madde, hauing beene some daies besieged, issue forth, and charge on the one side. On the other side, the E body of the English army, doth march with such violence against the Scots (which were in the first battaillon) as not able to withstand this storme, they open, and giue them entry against the French, who hauing fought resolutely, in the end they leaue the place to the victors. All are in rout. The Marshall of Senerac, forgets his honour, and flies in this disorder. They account the losse about three thousand men. Of marke, the Lords of Fontaines, Gutry and la Baulme, of Scottis men, the Lord of Karados, nephew to the constable, Thomas Seton, William Hamilton, with his sonne David and John Pilot, all worthy of the memory of France, seeing they died for her in the bed of honor.

There were many more taken prisoners then slaine, by the resolution of the captaines, who in this generall ouerthrow (rallying their troupes) intrenched themselves, and fought F for their liues with the English, and saued themselves honourably with their armes. The chiefe prisoners were the constable of Boucquhan, and the Earle of Ventadour. It is a thing worthy remembrance, that either of these two lost an eye in the bataille: this was the 29. day of Iuly. The gaine of this victory to the Bourguignon, was, that Mascon, a towne of the French obedience, yeelded vnto him without any force, but feare.

This continuance of so many losses, was exceeding greuous: but as God ment to chastise chastise France, and not to ruine it; so he counterpeysed these great losses with some small A gaine. These victorious troupes returning without feare, all disordered, were defeated by the Earle of Aumale, sent by the King to preserve the rest of Champagne: eight hundred English were slaine. But this checke awaked the Earle of Salisbury, Gouvernor of Champagne for the English, who having recovered new forces, goes to field to cleere the country.

 Hee besiegeth and taketh the strong towne of Sedan, in the county of Vertus, and then Rembouillet in Bry, and Neele in Tartenois. Then the tide flowes for the French. The Bourguignon exceeding glad of the seizure of Mafcon, (a towne very important vpon Saone) commanded Thoulangeon his Constable, to rid all that the enemy held there abouts, and to leaue the trafficke free. La Buissiere a most strong castle betwixt Tournon B and Mafcon, did much annoy it. He resolues to take it by one meanes or other. But hee did not foresee, that in seeking to take, he should be taken. Hee had some familiarity with the captaine of the place. And trusting to the vsuall practices of those times, he did confidently hope to corrupt him with money. He sounds him, and findes it pregnable: they agree vpon the price, but he was ignorant of the captaines meaning, to haue more then his money. A faithfull seruant to the King, and worthy to be named in this Register. The captaine doth aduertise Imbert of Groslee, the Gouverneur of Lions, of this trafficke, who wisely prouides to take him.

Lewis of Cullant Admirall of France, was then happily at Lions, attending some horse for the King, from Philip Maria duke of Milan. The plot is laide to surprize this constable C of Bourgongne, and the successe is answerable. Thoulangeon comes to Buissiere at the appointed houre, and brings with him men and money. Hee enters the castle, with as many men as he held sufficient, and counts the money to the captaine. Hee having left his troupe in the field, behold the Lionois issue forth their Ambuscado like Lions indeed, some seize vpon the castle gate, and assure the place, others charge his troupe, which was easily defeated. The constable with the chiefe that had followed him into the castle were taken, a coun-tercharge which shall deliuer the constable of Boucchan and the Earle of Ventadour, after the battaile of Cullant.

And almost at the same instant, Stephen of Vignoles, called la Hire, and Pothon of Xaintrailles, roused themselves. Vignoles, surprisid Compiègne, and Pothon, Han, vpon the riuier D of Some. But this ioy lasted little, for John of Luxembourg, gouernour for the duke of Bourgongne, in Picardy, flies thither, besiegeth, and recouereth both the one and the other with a happy celerity. Pothon saues himselfe with much difficulty in Guise (being pursued by the Bourguignons, to their cost that were ill mounted.) Luxembourg managing his victory wisely, attempts other places: he takes Oisy, Broissy, and other small townes of Tirasche, and in the end he besiegeth Guise, where John Proisy commanded for the King: Pothon (to annoy the besiegers) issues forth of Guise, but being too farre engaged in the fight, hee is taken prisoner, to make the siege of Guise the more easie, but Proisy doth his best indeauour to defend it. The towne belonged to René of Aniou, duke of Bar, and brother to the King of Sicilia. He intreates the duke of Bourgongne to leaue it him in peace, but it was in vaine. The E siege is vehemently continued, so as in the end Guise falls into the Bourguignons hands, and so he remains maister of all Picardy. And, as if this storme had fallen vpon Charles from all parts, la Charite (a very important towne vpon the riuier of Loire) is surprisid by Perrinet Graffet, for the Bourguignon, and so the terror of the warre came into Berry, much troubling the quiet and commerce of the Court, for that the King most commonly was resident at Bourges, or at Meung.

The like mishap fell vpon La Hire at Vitry, the which hee yeelds to the Duke of Bour-gongne, by a composition very preiudiciall for the King and the Realme. And at the same time Beaumont vpon Oyse surprisid by the French, was taken againe by the English, with F much blood and sacke. In like sort the fort of Saint Michels Mont, is besieged by the English, and well defended by the French, which caused the victory of Grauelle, happily taken by the baron of Colances from the English, as it were to coole the heat of our continuall feuer with some little water. In sooth the Estate of France was then most miserable. There appeared nothing but a horrible face of confusion, pouerty, desolation, solitarinesse and feare. The leane and bare labourers in the country, did terrifie euen theeeues themselves, who

A who had nothing left them to spoile but the carcasses of these poore miserable creatures, wandering vp and downe like ghosts drawne out off graues. The least farmes, and hamlets, were fortified by these robbers, English, Bourguignons, and French, euery one struing to doe his worst. There was no speech but of efforts and contributions. All men of warre were well agreed to spoile the countreiman and the naked Marchant, euen the cattell accustomed to the Iarume bel (the signe of the enemies approach) would run home of themselves without any guide by this accustomed misery. This is the perfect description of those times, taken out of the lamentations of our Ancestors, set downe in the original. Who seeth not here the Image of our times, during the confusions of our vnciuill warres?

But amidst this horrible calamity, God did comfort both the King and Realme, for about the end of the yeere, hee gaue Charles a goodly sonne by Queene Marie his wife, a happy gage for the establishing of this realme, whereof hee shalbe a peaceable King. Hee was borne at Bourges, and there was honorably baptized in Saint Stephens church, and was named Lewis, King of France after the decease of his father. Charles would haue John of Alençon a prince of his blood, and then his trusty friend, to bee his godfather. But alas!
 both by this godfather, and this godsonne, shall growe a horrible confusion, euen when as Charles expected an end of all his troubles. Whereby we may learne, that there is nothing but vanity in worldly affaires, remarkable for great men, in that which seemeth most firme in mans life.

This was the flux & reflux of this yeere. The beginning of the new yeere shewed a better countenance: but these small gleames of good hap, were soone ouercast by horrible losses, which seemed to giue the last wound to this Monarchy, and to alter the name, if God had not staied it with his mighty hand, in laying a foundation whereon hee shall build the meanes to restore it to her ancient beautie, without any shew of the industry or force of man, when as all things seemed desperate. But the prouidence of God creepes on insensibly by degrees to perfect his worke. The losse of the Scots was very great in the vnfor-tunate battaile of Cullant. To repaire this losse, Charles sends into Scotland, Kenauld of Chartre his Chancellor and Archbishop of Rheims, accompanied with the Earle Douglas, Marshall of France. And being reduced to a miserable want of money, he ingageeth the Duchy of Touraine vnto him. A title which Douglas, shal not long inioy. But whilest they make this leauy in Scotland, and shall returne to their troupes, let vs consider the humour of the French and English during this medly.

As the successe of the English was happy, so their hearts swelled with pride, and they exceeded daily in Insolencie, especially in great cities, where they braued it disdainfully, as treading the name of Frenchmen vnder foote. This contempt bred an extreame discontent, euen in the most senselesse, to see themselves thus intreated, their Kings suppressed, and their lawes abolished. There were not two yeeres past of this new royalty, and yet disputable. How farre, say they, will this English Empire exceed, being augmented and fortified by the authority of many yeeres? Shall it be either to transport new Colonies beyond the seas, or to plant others here, and in the end to extinguish the name of the originall French, to the end that no man shal dare to repine at the ruine of his country, reduced into the power of Strangers? these imaginations were generally in all mens mindes, but com-plaints in the mouths of few, the which they whispered softly to their wel assured friends, but the time was not yet come, although the blood (which cannot degenerate) shewed many signes of hearts discontented with this seruitude, both at Paris, and especially at Rouen, where the English government was most heavy. One Michell Lailier, was the beginner of this liberty, and was put to death at Paris, and a woman was burnt, worthy to liue amidst the flames, and to shine in the goodly light of our History.

The Nobility of Picardy was much discontented with this new command. Tournay began first to stirre for the Kings seruice. So immouable is the French obedience to their Kings, and so sweete and pleasing is their command. It was a capitall crime to speake of the King of England, but as the lawfull King. Spies were let in all places, to restraine the liberty of the French. These executions were threatnings of worse, if any should murine.
 Yet the Nobility of Picardy were so wearied with the English and Bourguignon yoke, as they resolue to free themselves at what rate soeuer. The heads of this resolution, were the Lords of Longueval, Saint Simon, Mailly, M. incur, Recourt, Blondel, and many other gentlemen which had followed the Bourguignons party. These are named. The original should not conceale the rest, whom I could not specific without some author. Behold the first fruits of the French liberty. These Ensigne-bearers assemble at Roy, they fortifie themselves for the King, against the English and the Bourguignon, and take diuers townes in Picardy at a prefixed day. John of Luxembourg, thunders against them that were suspected, & some he takes and hangs. At these terrors, some draw back, and left this league. Yet the greatest part remained constant, though with the apparent danger of their liues. These were the pure and true sparkles of the French fidelity to their King, but the day-spring was not yet come, which mounting to our horizon, should in the end shew forth the goodly light of liberty to all France.

These first motions put Charles in some hope of a better Estate: but behold a new check which cooles his courage. At the same time that hee made his leauy in Scotland, the duke of Exeter prepared a great army in England, to relecue the duke of Bedford, his brother, that he might haue means to continue the warres in France. There comes vnto him eight thousand archers, and eightene hundred men at armes. For the imploying of these men, he besiegeth Galardon, and taketh it at his first approach, and without the losse of any houre, hee plants himselfe before Yury, and at the same instant all his forces come to him, vnder the command of the Earle of Salisbury. The army being thus increased, hee preseth the siege. Girault of Paliere, held the towne for the King.

The Duke of Bedford summons him to yeeld it. Girault demandes respit to aduertise the King. Charles was then at Tours, well accompanied both of his subiects and forraigne friends, for after the defeat of Creuant, fore-seeing that the English would pursue the cause with more violence, he had provided men to oppose against them. The Marshall Douglas, Duke of Touraine by his new purchase, had brought him succors from Scotland. The Vicont of Narbonne a goodly troupe from Languedoc, the which was the flower of the whole army. The duke of Alençon, the Earles of Aumale, Ventadour, Tonnerre, Douglas, Moiry, the Vicont of Narbonne, the Lords of Falette, Tournon and other Noble men of Marke with their followers were ready to doe their best endeavour. So as he had eightene thousand fighting men. The rendez-uous is in Perche, and they were shortly to march to Yury. The King staies at Chasteaudun. The Constable of Boughan sends to view the enemies countenance. The scouts report the greatnesse of the English army and their diligence at the siege, who being discouered and pursued, hardly escape. They resolute, that in stead of charging the English army, they should besiege Vernueil, (a towne obeying the English,) either to take it, or to make a diuersion from Yury. The first succeeded, for our men approaching to Vernueil with a victorious countenance and bragge, as if the English army had bene defeated, Vernueil opens the gates without any question, and yeelds to the Kings seruice. But this shew of victory cost our French-men deere, who had done better to succour Yury, then in loosing it, to hazard their owne ruine, as it happened afterwards.

Girault of Paliere, hauing long and in vaine expected succors, and doubled the prefixed time, hee yeelds to the duke of Bedford, who hauing now no other impediment, hee resolues to fight with our army at his aduantage, for the effecting whereof, he had the better means, by their long stay. Hauing intelligence of the Estate of our army, hee resolued to draw them to battaile, knowing how much it did import to send a victorious soldiär, against one, whom hee hath visually beaten. Hee therefore sends a Herauld to desie them, giuing him charge to direct himselfe to the duke of Touraine, a Scottish-man Marshall of France. To whom he saies. The Duke of Bedford my maister commanded mee to tell you, that hee comes to drinke with you. Douglas answers him. That he should be welcome, but he must make some halt, for that ainner was ready. Vpon this brauado they goe to Counsell. The mischief was, the army had no head, hauing indeed too many. A multitude of Commanders and commandements, is a plague to all good order, and especially in military discipline, which consists wholly, in authoritie. Euery one had varied in his opinion. Some were of aduice to attend the enemy, others thought it fittest to take him at his word, without induring of these brauadoes.

Thus

A Thus their diuident opinions diuident the army, and those which in shew made the armie, ouerthrew it, Douglas and Narbonne. Douglas said, Seeing the army is well lodged, hauing a good towne to backe it, to what end should they runne rashly against a victorious enemy? The Narbonnois replies, to endure these brauadoes, were to take away the hearts of the French soldiärs, and to coole their courage without any reason: and what greater indignities might a vanquished man beare? The duke of Alençon, and the Constable were of the first opinion, but the contention grew so great, as the Vicont sayd, That if the wiser had nominated to fight, hee would goe and ascend the honour of France with the hazard of his life: so beeing retired to his quarter, hee commanded to sound a march, notwithstanding the duke of Alençons intreatie to stay and march together. On the other side, the Duke of Touraine, discontented B at the Visconts choller, keepe backe the Scots. But necessitie drew forth the whole army, one battaillion after another. This disorder was the cause they could not choose a fit place of armes, nor dispose of their battaillions. All were in grosse confusedly, without any vanguard. The chiefe of the armie were on foote. They place two wings, and to euery wing a thousand horse. The Italians had the right, and the French the left. In the fore-front of this battaile they planted foure hundred horse, to beginne the skirmish.

The duke of Bedford had oportunitie to dispose better of his army, hee makes a bodie all on foote, where he placeth his chiefe forces, and lodgeth there himselfe. In the front of this body, hee placeth great store of Archers, and euery Archer hath a stake stickt in the ground, to withstand the charge of the horse: Vpon either wing he plants the choise of his most resolute Archers: behind, are his vnarmed people with the baggage, the horses beeing tied close together, taile to taile, with two cordes or withs: but for their gard hee left two thousand choise Archers. In this order he attends the French, whom hee discouers comming a farr off, resolute to fight, with the countenance of conquerours. They were long before they could set their troupes in order, and ranne a full gallop to their death. So as in hurle-burle and hast to fight, they were out of breath before they came to blowes. All the morning is spent in approaches, the two armies fronting one another: a little after noone, a signall is giuen to the battaile; our aduenturers goe to the charge, to trie if they can force the grosse of the English army.

The foure hundred Italian Lances (led by Cameron with one eye) made the point, and at the first charge beate backe the English Archers that were in the front. At the same instant, our two wings of horse, charge the English army in flanke, seeking to breake their rankes. The fury of the fight was violent on either side; our men straining to enter into the body of the English foote, and the English labouring to withstand our men with a continuall storme of arrowes. Then, behold our lanciers, hauing forced one side of the battaile, begin to crie, victory, but the first rankes beeing forced, they are seconded by the rest without disorder: and with the like impression, the whole body of the English army raise a great cry, and aduance to the combate. Thus the two armies ioyne with a horrible conflict, which continued aboue an houre, one fleshed against another with a cruell and bloody fury. And E (saies the original) there were neuer scene two parties of so great power, fight so long without knowledge who were victors. But behold a new change in our army, our French and Italian horse appointed to force the English battaile, beeing valiantly repulied flie, and leaues our footemen open to the English shot.

Both the battailes had continued long in fight, and that which had made it equall, was not onely the equality of their forces, but the counterpeize of horses, which serued honorably. But the English had a supply of two thousand Archers, referred at the taile of his armie to garde the baggage. The duke of Bedford seeing our foote naked of Launces, resolues to imploy them. So as this fresh Squadron, doubling a fearefull cry, fall violently vpon this wearied troupe, and beeing halfe disordered, disperseth them. Then all are in a route: some flie, others kill. The massacre was exceeding great in this first furie, kindled by the obstinacy of the fight. Yet after this first heate, the English accustomed to our blood, fell to take prisoners. Vernueil was the next retreat, but the gates were shut, fearing least the English should enter pel mel, with them that fled; so as the ditch serued for a graue or a prison to many. Thus the English had the victory, but they bought it full dearely, E e for

The battaile of Vernueil.

The French defeated.

1424. for they lost aboute fiftene hundred men; and our losse was farre greater. Our Histories A confesse fwe thoufand, the English report fiftene thoufand. Yet all was not lost, for Xaintrailles, and La Hire gathered together a good number of them that fled, and faued them in Mans, the nereft place of retreat.

A braue te-ment of Italians.
There happened a memorabile thing in this route. The Italian troupe which had fled, being intrenched in a nere village, to fight for their liues, hauing a false aduertisement that our men had won the victory; they presently part, and come to the place of battaile, being knowne, they are charged by the English, but their retreat was exceeding hardy, for in despite of their army they faued themselves. Being to passe a riuer at the end of certaine hedges, by so narrow a passage as they could goe but one after another, these Lombards B plant their cornets there, as the marke of their way, with sixtene armed men to make a stand, while the troupe should passe. All escape this way without any other harme, then feare: So much order preuailes euen in disorder.

The Noble-
ment that were there.
This ouerthrow chanced the sixth of August. The losse was the greater, for that it did grauate the former: many great personages were slaine. The Earle of Boughan constable of France, the Marshall Douglas (a short time duke of Touraine) the Earles of Aumale, Harcourt, Ventadour, Tonnerre, Moyry: the Lords of Grauille, Montenay, Combrest, Fontenay, Brunel, Tumbler, Guitry, Paisy, Mathe, Rambels, Lindray, Gamaches, Malestroict, Boyn, Rembouillet, Harpedane, la Treille, Fouchouincere, la Salle, Lappe, Rochebaron, la Tour, and many others in great numbers. The Vicount of Narbonne (a rash instrument of this misfortune) was taken by the Bourguignons, and presently hanged, for a punishment, hauing assisted at the massacre of John duke of Bourgogne. The chiefe prisoners were, John of Bourbon duke of Alençon, and the bastard of this house, the Marshall of Fayette, the Lord of Hormid, Peter Herisson, Lewis of Vaucourt, Roger Brouffet, Himes of Saint Marke, James du Pays, and many others; from whom the English drew great summes of money. Vernueil (to augment this misfortune) was yelded by Rambures, vpon an honorable composition, with their liues and baggage freed, except that which belonged to the army. The insolent English, spoiled the poore souldiars, when as the Earle of Salisbury arriving, slue one of these treacherous wretches, causing these poore vanquished men to be conducted into Berry or Touraine in good safety.

Vernueil
taken.

After this notable victory, the duke of Bedford hauing triumphed at Paris, managed this profitable accident to our losse. He presently deliueres these victorious troupes (carrying in their hearts & foreheads, the fortune of England) to the Earle of Salisbury, one of the wisest & most valiant captaines of his army, who imploied them with great successe, for he tooke from Ambrose de Lore (a braue and valiant captaine) the forts of Saint Susanne, Mahans, la Hines, la Ferte-Benard, as the remainders of this shipwracke, and in the end hee carried it to the towne of Mans, although the fidelity of the inhabitants yelded him their obedience more slowlie, and with greater difficultie. The English insolencie increased daily and apparently, like the swelling of a riuer. Watches were set to obserue all such as did but mutter for their libertie. The Lords of Maucourt and Rocomp were put to death, as guilty of high treason. The goods of such as were absent, were confiscate. In France it was a great crime to be a Frenchman.

The miserable
estate of Charles in di-uers ferts.

But as one mischiefe comes not alone, and grieve vpon grieve procures no health, these misfortunes which touched the members, had almost ruined the head: for this lamentable battaile of Vernueil (which made all France to mourne) had almost thrust Charles into his graue. Besides these generall losses, this poore prince was surcharged with many difficulties: the incredible burthen of his pouertie, and the reproches of his subiects, accusing him as the author of these banquerout losses, which chanced daily to his armies and townes. Thus hee was abandoned both of himselfe, and his subiects, his great and many afflictions hauing killed his courage, and lost his credit with the people. In this disgraceful necessity, there was no speech but of ingaging the reuenues of the crowne, to pay the garrisons of places, which else would bee lost. The Kings table failed daily: hee ate no more in publike, but sparingly in his Chamber, attended on by his domesticall seruants. The Historie notes, that as Pothon and la Hire came to him to Chasteaudun, to require succours, they found him at Table with a rumpe of Mutton, and two Chickens: and yet in this extreme extreme

A extreme pouertie of his, the great men got of all hands. The duke of Alençon had Niort in Poitou, and the bastard of Orleans the county of Gyan, for money they said had bene lent for the Kings seruice, who auowed all and paid all, for nothing. But that which was of harder digestion, was the continuall discontent of his subiects against him, as if (neglecting his affaires) he had abandoned himselfe to the loue of faire Agnes. A blot which doth yet blemish the name of Charles the feuenth, in the generall concept of the French nation, registered as a certaine truth, by the writers of our time, which haue written of that reigne. As it is my courte to search the originalls, and not to alleadge any new writer for an Author, so haue I carefully noted what the Ancients did obserue. Alain Charretier the Kings Secretary, saies nothing, Monstrelet speakes but vpon occasion, in the end of this reigne.

The King re-proched for the loue of faire.

B And for as much (saith hee) as the King did see her willingly, the common fame was, that he kept her dishonestly, for the vulgar is more inclined to speake ill then well. But the loue which the King did shew her, was for her pleasing behauiour, and eloquent speech, and also for that he was of all faire creatures the fairest. The History of Saint Denis, written by the Historiographer of France, doth cleerly excuse him in these tearmes. I a Chronicler, desiring to write the truth, haue duly informed my selfe, and without falsifying of the truth, doe finde by Knights, Councillors, Physitians, Surgians and other domesticall seruants, examined by oth, as appertained to my charge, to the end to free the people from scandal; that during fwe yeers that faire Agnes liued with the Queene, the King neuer frequented her but in great company nor in the absence of the Queene: hee neuer vied any lalciuous countenance vnto her, nor touched her beneath the chin. And after his sports; Charles retired himselfe vnto his lodging, and Agnes vnto hers. But he loued her for that she was pleasant and young, among the fairest, seeking all kind of delights to sweeten his thoughts and cares. These are his very words. But how soeuer, this scar remaines vpon Charles his face, that hee neglected his affaires, loosing both his time and iudgement with this woman, and in his gardens; the which blemished his reputation much, euen with his enemies, who held him for an idle person, and of small valour. But as this report made him contemptible, so the insolent behauiour of his Mignons made him hatefull, for that vnder his authority, these horseleeches oppressed the people, and tooke all reward from such as had ventured their liues for the Kings seruice.

D Thus this poore prince, surcharged with many difficulties, was so discouraged, as hee had not any care to preserue himselfe by armes how soeuer, but imploied all his spirits to finde some meanes of an accord, at what price soeuer, with the duke Bourgogne and Brian. But he was much deceiued, for they had all conspired his ruine, and euery one pretended a part in this confiscation. The duke of Sauoy looked for a share, and Lewis of Chalon prince of Orange, was in hope to make himselfe great with the remainders of this spoile. But where the wisdom of man ended, there the prouidence of God began, who prouided meanes for Charles, the which he could not foresee, neither by his industrie or authority; that the restoring of this realme might be knowne to proceed from the miraculous bounty of God, the Gardien of this estate.

Charles desires
an accord
with Britany and Bourgogne.

E We haue shewed, with what care the duke of Bedford had built an vnion with the dukes of Bourgogne and Britany, to confirme the English affaires in France. Arthur of Britany Earle of Richmond, brother to the duke of Britany, began to make a breach in this alliance. He had married one of the Burguignons sisters, and Bedford the other. This Arthur was a prince of good iudgement, who gouerned his brother wholly, and had a great interest in his brother in law of Bourgogne. Hee shall helpe much in the restoring of this Estate, vniting the hearts of Princes distracted from the King; but his soure complexions did much distemper Charles, who shall pay deere for the fruites of his seruice; as the course of the Historie will declare. The Duke of Bedford being at Paris, mightily puffed vp with his victories, plained the King: this insolent greatnesse, which made him odious to the French (although they durst not shew it) was likewise hatefull to his owne faction.

The league with England
shaken.

F Man hath alwaies the miserie that hee seekes, and is the plotter of his owne misfortune. This pride bred a iarre betwixt him and the Earle of Richmond, and made a way to the generall diuision of these confederate princes, and reunion of the whole realme. Richmond was come vnto him, to bee imploied in some honorable charge, fit for his houle and person,

Bedford and

Duke of Brit-tan, at first,

thers in law.

1424. person, making great esteeme of his loue, whereof their alliance seemed an assured gage. A But hee found nothing but discontents. Arthur was of a French humour, nourished in the mildnesse of our Kings, bred vp in their armes, and had bene prisoner for them at the battaile of Azincourt: the time onely had with-drawne him from the Kings seruice, whom euery man held lost. The pride of Bedford reuiued in him this first affection: so as not able any longer to accord with the English, he resolues to seeke all meanes to recouer the Kings good grace and fauour, and to ingage his brother the Duke of Brittain.

Thus he leaues the Duke of Bedford, and retires to his house with this discontent. There fallies out a fitte occasion to aduance this businesse, to the good liking of Richemont, for the office of Constable was voide, by the death of the Earle of Boucqhian, slaine in the battaile of Vernueil. Charles sleepees not at these newes; but as if hee had attended some good opportunity, he presently sends a trusty Gentleman to the Earle of Richemont, to offer him his loue, and for a gage thereof, the dignity of the Constable of France, with all aduantages that a King may honour his seruant with. This first summons Richemont tooke reasonable well: but he answered; that hee could not doe any thing with-out his brother the Duke of Brittain: with whom hauing conferred, he would presently aduertise Charles of his resolution. But as the Kings vrgent necessity made him to reckon the minutes, so the tediousnesse of the Brittons answer made him to languish.

His counsell likewise allowed well of this league, the which shall prooue more trouble-some vnto him, then honourable, and more preiudicial then profitable vnto France. Charles C (without attending any answer from Richemont) sends John Louuet, President of Prouence, one of the chiefe fauourites then in credit: but hee remembered not that hee was in dislike with these Princes, so as Louuet returned without any effect. Yet Charles (loth to loose this opportunity, and to giue the English any time to reconcile himselfe to these Brittons,) sends to him with all speed a very honourable Ambassage, which was Toland of Arragon, Queene of Sicile his mother in lawe, with Tannequy of Chastell, being very acceptable to these two bretheren. Their comming did greatly aduance this businesse. They preuailed so farre as the Duke of Brittain, and the Earle of Richmont his brother, were both ready to embrace the Kings friendship, and to doe him seruice, so as the Duke of Bourgongne would yeeld vnto it: and in the meane time (to draw this businesse to some good end) Richmont D should goe and treat with his Maiesty, vpon good hostages for his safety. This condition was accepted by Charles: and to loole no time, the Lord of Albret and the bastard of Orleans, were sent vnto him for hostages, and the townes of Chinon, Loches, Lusignan and Meung, were giuen him for assurance vntill the end of the treaty, and ample passports made to go and come with all liberty. This worke began this yeare in Noueniber, and shall end the next yeare with a notable successe.

But the Duke of Bourgongne embraced another notable occasion, which shall more preiudice the English, then this occurrent of Brittain. Wee haue said that this leauin was layd in the yeare 1423, by the marriage of Iaqueline, Countesse of Hainault, Holland and Zeland, a wife contended for by two husbands; the Duke of Brabant, cousin germaine and a deere friend to the Duke of Bourgongne; and the Duke of Glocester brother to the Duke of Bedford, and vnle to Henry the sixt King of England, two great parties which shall diuide the Dukes of Bedford and Bourgongne, and shall bee the meanes to reconcile the Bourguignon to Charles, and reduce him to the obedience of this crowne, expell the English out of France, and restore the realme. But the prouidence of God, which goes insensibly by degrees aboue mans conceipt, must be distinctly considered.

About the end of this yeare, Iaqueline of Hainault comes out of England with the Duke of Glocester her second husband, fortified with an army of siue thousand English. She caused the Nobility and the Citties to renue their othes, both to her and the Duke of Glocester her lawfull husband. All the Nobility obeyes this commandement, except the Earle of Conuersan, John of Lumont, Angilbert of Anghien, and all Townes except Hals. The Duke of Bourgongne greatly affected this quarrell. The Duke of Bedford foreteeing the danger that might grow by the Burguignons discontent, labours to suppress it in the breeding, and to that end he drawes them to Paris with their friends, but in vaine. The one strues to inioy his estates, and the other to hinder him. So as whilest the cause is disputed in the Court

A notable proceesse of Iaqueline against her husband, supported by the Bourguignon.

A Court at Rome, the armies prepare on either side to end it by blood and spoile. The Glocesterian begins, and the Bourguignon followes. So the end of this yeere is the beginning of a warre of foure whole yeeres, but it shalbe ended in fauour of the Bourguignon. This new yeere shalbe spent in the altercations of the Court and Britan.

The Earle of Richmont comes to Tours to Charles, as he had promised to the Queene of Sicilia, but not able to resolue any thing without the consent of the duke of Bourgongne, (as we haue saied) the King seeing it very necessary he should goe to him, doth send to him a very honorable Ambassage, Lamis of Bourbon, Earle of Clermont, a prince of his blood, the Archbishop of Rheims, and the bishop of Puy. The end of their negotiation was double, that the duke of Bourgongne should like of the alliance betwixt the King and the princes of Brittain, and that he himselfe should be reconciled vnto him, to liue and continue good friends, as they were nere in blood. The first was fully concluded with the Bourguignons consent, the other was susperided. The causes are specified, for that Philip could not with honestie let slip the death of his father, whereof Charles was the Author, this reconciliation could not bee well effected, vnlesse that Charles did chafe from him all such as had dipped their hands in this massacre, either as fautors or as executioners. They were specified by name, John Louuet president of Prouence, Tannequy of Chastell, William d' Auangour, John of Giac, sonne to that Lady of Giac, who perswaded John Duke of Bourgongne, to goe to Charles at Montfreaux-faut Yonne, where hee was slaine. But these were but colours, for notwithstanding their absence from Court, yet the Bourguignon seemed to bee nothing inclined to the Kings seruice. In effect, hee stood watching the oportunitie to effect his designs, and so entertained time, to keepe the stakes, as the whole courie of the Historie will declare. Charles employing all his friends and meanes, intreats Amedee, Duke of Sauioy to bee a mediator of this accord. In respect hereof he comes to Monuel in Bresse, but in truth this was but a shadow. They all sought to get from Charles, and so watched for opportunity. Yet the Bourguignon made all shewes of his seruice vowed to the King and the establishment of France, which hee lamented infinitely to bee fallen into the hands of Strangers. He spared no chere nor entertaynement for the Ambassadors, and for a gage of sincere loue, Philip giues his yongest sister Anne, in marriage to the Earle of Clermont, but with an intent to winne a prince of the blood nere the King. Thus the Bourguignon leueled alwaies at this marke, and did nothing but with an intent to maintaine his greatnesse at what price soeuer.

In the meane time the meaner smart for the follie of great men. At the returne of these Ambassadors, the Court is in an vprore, Charles greues to chafe away his seruants, which could not be done but in contempt of his authority. And yet the Ambassadors cried out, that without it they should not effect any thing: and the more they staied the execution, the more they hindred the Kings seruice. D' Auangour parted first with the good liking both of King and Court. Gyac made his peace, by the meadiation of the Queene of Sicilia, who had all power in this action. The King was wonderfully discontented for the departure of Tannequy of Chastell, whom he called father. A man beloued & of amiable conditions. But there was no remedy. He had giuen the chiefe stroake to John of Bourgongne. So likewise hee protested without any difficulty, to retire himselfe whether soeuer his maister should command him.

Hee beseeched him to giue him an authentick certificate, that it was not for any fact of his, but for the good of his seruice. Hee obtaines it, and a promise withall, that his offices should bee continued him. Thus he retires to Beaucaire in Languedoc, and the office of Prouost of Paris remained to him still, with the fee, and a good reputation with all men, to haue bene a good seruant to the King, and carefull of the publike good. John Louuet president of Prouence, disputed his departure with some bitterness, and obstinacy. What iniustice is it (saith hee) to condemne a man without hearing? What breach, to vse the Kings seruants thus; for an others pleasure? but not onely the Bourguignon and the Britan hated him to the death, but also the Court and people did detest him. A man of a high minde, cunning, obstinate, reuengefull, cruell. Great men hated him, as crossing their affaires with the King, abusing his tractable disposition, and meane men, as the horse-leech and the sponge of the publike treasure, and a man without mercie. The Bourguignon 1426. hated him as the first motiue of his Fathers murther; and the Britton, as hauing giuen counsell to the Earle of Ponthieure to take him prisoner at Chantonceaux. Hauing gotten great wealth and impouerished the King and the Realme, he had matched his daughters in good houses. The one, with the Earle of Dunois a bastard of Orleans, the other with the Lord of Joyeuse. The respect of this alliance saued his life. He was safely conducted to Auignon, and from thence he retires into Prouence, without any other fame then to haue governed the King ill. His daughter of Joyeuse died with thought, for her fathers disgrace. Gyac returns into grace more then before, hauing purchased the fauour of the Queene of Sicily: but hee shall loone pay for these imaginations of happinesse, not onely succeding the president in his misfortune, but also loosing his life after an ignominious fort.

These men thus chafed away, the Constable of Richmont went for his brother John duke of Brittain, who came to Charles to Saumur: he tooke the oath of fidelitie, offering him all seruice. The Bourguignon speakes not yet one word for the King; onely he forbears to make warre against him, hauing a plausible excuse, for his not sending any more men to the Duke of Bedford, being busied for the Brabantine, against the Glocestrian, in the warre of Haynault and Holland. So this accident bred some ease to Charles, but no reliefe. During these confusions in Court, Mans was lost, and after it the rest of Mayne obeyed the Earle of Salisburie. But the Constable of Richmont, (being freed from those domesticall crosses which might hinder his credit with the King) would make prooue of his valour, in arming the Brittons against the English. And as in the beginning all is good; at this first command all Brittain riseth, and runnes to this warre. But these troupes being raised, and not yet ioyned to frame the bodie of an armie; behold the Earle of Warwicke marcheth suddenly with a goodly armie, gathered out of all the garrisons of Normandie, the inhabitants of Townes, and the Nobilitie of the countrie, with great speede, who beseegeth and taketh Pontorson, a towne vpon the confines of Normandie and Brittain, neere Saint Michaels Mount. This prickt forward the Constable, to whom this scorne belonged. After that Warwicke was retired, hauing left a garrison in his conquest, behold the Constable comes to Pontorson with his Brittons, he beseegeth it, beates, and takes it by force, making a great slaughter of the English.

This successe gaue him courage to passe on: the towne of Saint James of Beuueron did much disquiet that countrie. He attempts it, hoping to be succoured with men and money from France: but hauing words alone without effects, his Brittons (being for the most part voluntaries) slippe away daily, notwithstanding any preuention of the Constables, who resolved (before this warlike multitude had abandoned him) to make profit of his presence, and to giue a generall assault. The neerenesse of Auranches (where the Earle of Suffolke with Seales, (famous captaines among the English remained with goodly troupes) gaue him occasion of feare, least they should charge his men in the heate of the assault. To this end, he sends forth two thousand men out of the bodie of his armie, to meete with these imagined English.

The Commanders hauing discovered euen to the gates of Auranches, and found nothing, they resolve to returne to the armie, not giuing the Constable any other aduertisement. The Brittons being at the assault, seeing those men come, suppose them to be English, and fearing to be coopt in, hauing an enimie both before and behind, they resolve to leaue their ladders, and retire to their campe. Their retreat was somewhat difficult, by reason of a poole with a narrow causey, which they had wonne with great labor and paine. The beseegeed seeing the Brittons forsake the wals, fallly forth courageously after them, and recover the quarter abandoned, where there was a point that flanked the poole, in the which they plant threescore archers. There were eight or nine hundred Brittons shut vp betwixt the wals and the poole: so as from this recovered point, they might choofe them one after one. The rest of the English garrison issuing forth the towne furiously, put these amazed Brittons to the sword, who are either gauled with English arrowes, like beasts in a toyle, or with a desperate courage leape into the poole. Thus lesse then 500. hundred men, ouerthrew about eight thousand. The campe was abandoned and spoiled, 18. ensignes lost, with the banner of Brittain: many prisoners were taken, after the English had bene wearied with killing. The principall that were slaine, were the Lords of Molac, Coitiuy, la Motte, and many captaines

A captaines of marke. The artillery, engins, and all the rest of the munition remained for a pawne. This vnseasonable alarm, greatly troubled the Constable, who was now become all the hope of the French, as if he carryed all France vpon his shoulders like another Atlas. To repaire this ridiculous disgrace, he raiseth new forces in Brittain with all speed, he ioynes vnto him the troupes of Ambrose of Lore to be assisted with his valour, and hauing giuen them their pay, hee causeth them to march into Aniou, where hee takes la Fleche, Gale-rande, Beaufort, Malicorne, and so reuiues the hearts of his men after so notable a losse, and kept his enemy in awe. From thence hee goes to Court, where there were other desseignes then to fight with the English. A man fitter to braue it in a counsell of State, then to dispute a battaile or the siege of a towne. Hee came to Court to be the author of many confusions during this yeare: and on the other side, his brother the Duke of Brittain, before it passe, shall leaue the party of France, and reconcile him selfe vnto the English, that the honour of our deliuerance might be giuen to God, the gardian of this Monarchie, and not to these Princes of Brittain, to whom Charles was too much affected, in buying their friendship so deere, being euen then vnprofitable, when as hee had greatest need: yet in their season, all these instruments worke to restore our decayed estate. But these were the Constables good seruices. After this shamefull disgrace, hee seekes to couer his fault, exclaiming first against the King, as if hee had bene the cause of this infamous disorder happened at Saint James, and hauing too freely discovered his griefes vnto the King, he presumed to take John of Malestroit Chancellor of Brittain prisoner, as being particularly charged to solicite the payment of such money as was appointed for this Britton army. Charles was much offended with this presumption, and in despight of the Constable, caused Malestroit to be presently released, and sent into Sauoy. The Constable was greatly discontented with this proceeding, the which hee tooke as an affront done to his person, and resolves to be reuenged. So great were the confusions of that age, as the seruant durst prescribe a Lawe to his maister, and his counsell bandie against him to controule his will. Yea the Princes of the bloud (so great was the corruption of that wretched age) were the chiefe controulers of the Kings actions. Then was there nothing more miserable than France, who discontented with her King, nourished the ambition of many Kings. This iealous ambition did nothing cure the infirmities of our Estate. Charles found it lost, hee could not raise it alone. To debase his authority was no meanes to cure the confusions of the realme. And as there is nothing more troublesome then affliction, the French nation being then extremely afflicted, did nothing amend their condition, in casting vpon the King the reproches of their calamities.

This was to depriue them-selues of their head, wherein consists the whole life of the body. An vnreasonable discontent. The whole body of the State was sicke, and this distasted people would haue their head sound. A notable circumstance, for it is strange, that (after so many miseries) this domesticall confusion had not bene the vtter ruine of the State. But let vs returne to our discourse. The Constable had great credit with the Counsell, whom in the beginning the King had greatly countenanced: but the priuate practises, and the generall discontent of great persons, had made him halfe a King, to crosse the Mignons whom all men hated. Great men hated them, as possessing the King, and the people detested them, as managing all things at their pleasure, to the preiudice of the common-weale. There were two Mignons that did greatly vex them, Gyac and Camus of Beaulieu. They resolve by a generall consent to dispatch them.

The Princes, with the Lords of Albret and Tremouille (who had a great interest in the State), were of the party. But the Constable must do the execution. The matter concluded betwixt them, was thus executed: Gyac was taken in bed with his wife, carryed to Dun le Roy, condemned and executed: that is, he was put into a sack and cast into the riuer. The Constable performed this office, without any other forme of lawe, then his bare command. Afterward Camus borne in Auvergne, as hee walked in the Kings lodging, was venturously slaine, by a soldiari belonging to the Marshall of Bouillac. Charles vnderstood it, and in a manner, toucht the bloud of his two domesticall seruants, being wonderfully discontented: but the time (which did authorise these confusions) caused him to swallowe this pill quietly. Tremouille married Gyacs widow, the heire of Lisle-Bouchart, and entred newly

But Tremouille shall haue his turne: hee shall leaue some of his haire, and hardly saue the mould of his doublet. Thus the affaires of the Court ebbed and flowed, the which raise vp one, and cast downe another. In this deceitfull manner of life, there is nothing certaine but incertenty, fauours being giuen not by desert, but most commonly by a blind appetite, which hath no other iudgement, but the apprehension of weake heads, diuiding the happinesse of a Courtiers life into quarters, this day to one, and to morrow to another. A goodly lesson for such as are fauoured in Court, not to bee transported with vaine hope, toyes to deceiue the indiscrete. The surest gards of prosperity, are integritie, wisdom, modesty and patience to remember aduersity in prosperity, according to the precepts of the wise.

This was the good government of the Constable of Richmond, a bold practiser of these domesticall confusions, whilst the Bourguignon plyed his businesse. Wee haue made mention of the sute of Iaqueline, Countesse of Hainault and Holland, for Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, her pretended husband, against John Duke of Brabant, her lawfull husband, for so had Pope Martin pronounced it, in fauour of the Brabantin; but from law they goe to armes. The Bourguignon supported the Brabantin. These Princes (hauing prepared their forces,) begin by writing. The Gloucesterian accuseth the Bourguignon of couetousnesse and treachery. The Bourguignon giues him the lye: but from reproches they fall to armes. The Bourguignon offers the Gloucesterian to end the question by combat: and by that tryall to auoide the effusion of their Souldiars blood. The Gloucesterian accepts it: all is prepared for the combat: but the Duke of Bedford interposeth his authority. To this end hee calls the chiefe men of all estates to Paris, to quench this fire, and by common aduice decrees; That that day should bee disannulled, neither should it bee prejudiciall to eyther party. That is to say, All being well viewed and considered, there was no iust cause for either to call the other to this wilfull combat, from the which they could not depart, although it were accepted, without great prejudice to both their honours. In the meane time, neither the Popes authority, nor the Regents decree, by the generall aduice of the States could preuaile, but all burst forth into open warre. The Bourguignon proued the stronger: so as the Gloucesterian (leaving Iaqueline at Mons) posted into England for new forces, but all was in vaine, the Bourguignon making his profit of this Princes absence, did easily effect his desire, hauing no oposite but a woman, dishonored for her infamous adulteries. Hee failes not to enter Hainault with a strong army, and vseth all force to reduce this people to reason.

The Country seeing it selfe pressed by the Bourguignons forces, (neither hoping for, nor desiring any succours from England, and perswaded that Iaqueline supported a bad cause) resolue to obey the stronger. Hauing to that effect protested vnto their Lady, what they thought fitting for their duty, they seaze on her person, and deliuer her into the hands of the Duke of Bourgongne. Philip receiues her honorably, and promisseth her all offices of friendship to comfort her. From Mons hee causeth her to bee conducted with a goodly traine to Gand, by Lewis of Chaalons, Prince of Orange, a braue Noble-man. The Gantois employ their meanes to honour her. This great liberty gaue her meanes to make an escape from this goodly cage: so as hauing practised some for her guide, shee disguiseth her selfe in the habit of a man, and retires from Gand to Breda, where shee doth assure the riuier of Garide, and doth solicit the townes of Holland by her Agents. The Bourguignon (fore-seeing by these beginnings a long continuance of trouble) lies thether with his army. He enters the Country; at the first they all resist him, for the respect the subiects bare to their Lady. But as the inconueniences of warre increased dayly, and that Philip did shew by public writings and priuate practises, that whatsoeuer he did, was to maintaine the right of the lawfull husband, many townes yielded vnto him. At this time John Duke of Brabant, the lawfull husband of Iaqueline, dyes in the Castell of Leneuure, hauing instituted Philip of Bourgongne his heire. The Citties seeing the Bourguignon supported both by force, and right, follow him by a common consent, as twise a Conqueror, and perswade their Lady not to oppose her selfe obstinately against so reasonable a necessity.

So without any other force, but the happy successe of the stronger, an accord was made betwixt

A betwixt Philip Duke of Bourgongne, and Iaqueline Countesse of Hainault and Holland, vpon these conditions: That Iaqueline doth acknowledge her Cousin, Philip Duke of Bourgongne, for the lawfull heire of her countries, and from thenceforth doth make him Gouverneur of Hainault, Holland, and Zeland. All these estates should take their oath and do homage of fealtie vnto Philip. All fortresses should be deliuered into his hands, and shee promisseth neuer to marrie without his consent. Thus Philip was honourably receiued throughout all these Estates, to the content of some and discontent of others, according to their diuers humours: but force contented all. Iaqueline made a good shew, yet greatly discontented to see him her master. Such was the Tragi-comedic of this long suite, for the quiet of these Estates, and the greatnesse of the Duke of Bourgongne, who made his profit of all sides, for soone after William Earle of Namur, left him the Earledome of Namur, whereof hee takes possession, to the great discontent of the Liegeois, as we shall see hereafter. This greatnesse of the Duke of Bourgongne bred ieaousie in the Duke of Bedford, he being assisted by the duke of Brittain his open enemy, and the Earle of Richmond Constable of France, whome hee sees hourly to grow great in his authoritie.

Thus fearing more mischief to fall vnto him by that meanes, he resolues to fortifie himselfe with new helpes, and to this end he goes into England, leauing the affaires of France, in charge of the Earles of Warwicke, Suffolke, and Salisburie. His stay was not long, necessity pressed him. He obtaines both men and money, fit remedies to preuent a storme. C He returns into France with ten thousand men, and a notable summe of money for their pay. For the good employment of these new forces, he resolues to beseege Montargis, a dangerous thorne, both for the neerenesse to Paris, and the conuerse of the Bourguignon, who continued his desseines, notwithstanding the still ieaousie of these Princes. The charge of this seege was giuen to the Earles of Warwicke and Suffolke, with three thousand men: the rest were dispersed in Normandie, and in townes bordering vpon Picardie, for feare of the Bourguignon, in whom he had no confidence. Montargis is beleeged, and although the waters hindered their approach to the walles, yet within few daies it was fiercely battered by the English, and valiantly defended by the French.

They cry out for succor, but the affaires in Court were so wonderfully confused, (by the intestine ieaousies of great men) that one gazed vpon another, yet no man stirred, although Charles continually cried, to armes. In the end they begin to march: and although the Constable had busied himselfe in this leaue, yet fearing the example of Saint James, hee would not hazard himselfe in the leading thereof, pretending many excuses to saue himselfe from blowes. For want of him, the charge was giuen to the Earle of Dunois a bastard of Orleans: to William of Albret Lord of Orual, to the Lords of Gaucourt, Guitry, Grauille, Villars, la Hire, Gyles of Saint Simon, Gualter of Brosard, John Steuard a Scot, and other valiant Captaines, who led fifteene or sixteene hundred fighting men. Their purpose was only to victuall the beleeged, whilst the King raised greater forces in the Countries of his obedience. The Constable remained at Iargeau attending the issue, which succeeded more happily then the desseine of so slight a succour. The Earle of Dunois doth aduertise the beleeged of his approach.

The riuier forced the English to make three lodgings, those within the towne had cunningly surprized the bridges vpon the riuier of Loing, and after the succours had secretly recovered the Rendez-vous, those within the towne stopped the course of the water so artificially, as the riuier ouerflowes the bridges. At the same instant all the troupes charge the English: la Hire leading the first troupe, chargeth the quarter where the Lord de la Poole, brother to the Earle of Suffolke commanded, and crying Montioye S. Denis he fills all with confusion, killing, burning, and spoiling: de la Poole with much adoe saues himselfe with leauen more, in his brothers lodging in the Abbey without the towne, vpon the way to Nemours. The Earle of Dunois (whose Rendez-vous was towards the Castle,) hauing ioyned with the Towne-men (who were issued forth with great resolution) chargeth the bodie of their armie, the which he wholly defeated.

The slaughter was great, for so small troupes, for they numbred sixteene hundred slaine vpon the place. In this charge the Earle of Suffolke, fauoured by the waters, gathers together all he can in his quarter, and recouers the hills, to make his retreat to Chasteau-Landon, 1424. don, and Nemours, places vnder the English command, and of nearest retreat. The honor A of this happy successe, was attributed to the Earle of Dunois, whereat the King receiued an incredible content, as a refreshing to this burning feuer, and the Constable Richmond a grievous discontent, beeing absent: and so this yeare ended.

But the new yeare will shew what fruites Brittain yeelded to France during her great necessities. This cheeke at Montargis did somewhat coole the Duke of Bedfords heate, but the Constables ambition nothing at all; who hauing vndertaken to play the king with the king, fought to croffe all the humors of this Prince: he hated what he loued, disallowed what he allowed, and dispraised what he commended. After the violent death of Gyac (of whome we haue spoken) he had fauoured Tremouille, to plant him in the Kings good fauour. But as am- B bition hath neither faith nor honestie, Tremouille finding himselfe inward with the King, retains all fauour for himselfe, little esteeming both the Constable and the Princes. Hee did onely associate vnto him in credit, Prie and la Borde, men of small accompt, to vse them at his pleasure, Icalousie mounts againe vpon the Stage: the Princes, Constable and chiefe officers of the Crowne, in steade of taking counsell to pursue the good successe of Montargis, they combine together to worke their willes vpon Tremouille, and his partisans, as they had done vpon Gyac. The plot was orderly layed. James of Bourbon, Earle of Clermont, and Charles of Bourbon Earle of Marche, Princes of the Bloud, become heads of this league against Tremouille and his companions. The league is thus plotted. Forasmuch as the King is gouerned by base people, to the contempt of the Princes and Officers of the Crowne, and to the C great oppression of the poore people, the confederates meane to punish these Flatterers, abusing the Kings name and authoritie, and to approach neare vnto his maiestie, to gouerne the affaires for the good of his seruice, and the ease of France. The execution must begin with the seizure of Tremouille, and continue with Prie and la Borde. The Constable should take Tremouille, and the Princes were to seaze on the City of Bourges, where Prie and la Borde were in the great Towre, and so to punish them.

But this enterprise came to naught, for Tremouille hauing intelligence of this desseigne, not onely preferred himselfe, but hauing perswaded the King, that this complot was made against his owne person and authoritie, it so troubled Charles, as he came in person to Bourges, and preuented the Princes entrie, and without any more disguizing hee was strangely D incensed against the Constable, as the author of these troubles and confusions, forbidding the cities to receiue him. The Constable notwithstanding smothered this disgrace, and to shew the deuotion he had to the Kings seruice, he goes to field, gathers together a goodly troupe of Brittons, and puts himselfe into Pontorfon, a towne abandoned: hee fortifies it, and mans it with a good garrison, vnder the command of Monsieur de Restrenan, and Braufort. This done, he dismisseth his Brittons. The Earle of Warwicke watched all occasions to surprize the towne, when as behold these two gouernours minister a fit meane: for (making a roade towards Auranches) they are both taken. Warwicke marcheth presently to the walles of Pontorfon with his armie. The Constable sends Bertrand of Dinan, Marshall E of Brittain speedily with great succours. Yet the seege continues obstinately. New supplies are sent thera by the Duke of Brittain, the which were cut in peeces. Pontorfon after much paine coming to a parle, in the end yeelds to the English, the besieged departing with bagge and baggage.

But this was not the end of this victorie: the English armie increased both in number and courage by this happy successe, and threatens Brittain with fire and sword. They prepare to enter. John Duke of Brittain wearied with so many losses, and fearing worse, making no accompt of the succours of France, (to whom he was coldly affected) takes part with the Duke of Bedford, renounceth all other alliances, promisseth to acknowledge the King of England for King of France, and to take the oath of obedience, such as his predecessours were accustomed to do to the Kings of Fraunce. Behold the great good which Brittain brought to our countrie in her extreamest afflictions, after so many hopes and imbracings. This yeare is painefull, shamefull, and confused, but the fore-runner of a worthie deliuerance. Take courage then my countrymen in the remainders of this tempest. We haue said, that after that miserable battell of Vernueil, the towne of Mans yeelded to the English. The inhabitants not able to beare the imperious command of the English, resolute in the end F to

A to shake off that yoke: For the effecting whereof, they seaze vpon a gate, giuing intelligence thereof to the Lord of Oruall, brother to the Lord of Albret, who happily arriues, takes the Cittie, and cuts the English in peeces. The Earle of Suffolke was within the castle. Mans surprized from the English. Talbot (that renowned Capitaine) was at Alençon, he aduertiseth him of this surprife. Talbot prepares his succours with such silence, and flies thither with such speede, as hee arriues at Mans, the third day after the surprife. Our Frenchmen (transported with ioy for so noble a conquest, and fearing no enemy among so many enemies, both politicke and discontented) slept securely in their beds after the French manner, without feare or guard. When as Talbot (hauing entred the Cittie by scaling) surpriseth them in their beddes, and killes them without resistance. And recouered againe.

B A notable example, both to imitate and to flie; to flie, that through carelesnesse we suffer not our selues to bee surprized like Swine. It is the very terme wherewith the Historie doth blemish this brutish sloath: to imitate, not to hold any thing impossible, when as resolution doth accompanie him that hath any notable attempt in hand. But this victorie staies not at Mans: the Earle of Suffolke, with his braue Talbot goes to field, they march to Laual (a towne of importance, vpon the confines of Anjou and Brittain) they take it easily, by the onely terror of their victorious armes, encountring no enemy to withstand them. The whole Court was in confusion; the Princes of the bloud and our Constable studie not to make warre against the English, but against the Mignons. It was their proiect, as if the whole C State depended vpon the Kings fauour, who lost daily, to the generall discontent of all the French. So this yeare had nothing memorable, but that our warriours had lost both iudgment, courage, and force: that through their defects God might raise vp some extraordinarie meanes, for the deliuerie of this Monarchie, almost ruined. Our Captaines then did some exploits, taking Rochfort, Bertan-court, Lanuill, Chateau neuf, Puifer, Toury, Mompieu, Nogent le Retrou, and Lude, but what toyces are these, in regard of the Stately triumphs of the English.

That which was most admirable this yeare: amidst all these domesticall discontents, and all these ruines and defolations of the State (which might well haue quailed the best affected) those of the Cittie of Tournay, (after long contentions) in the end abandon both English and Bourguignon, protesting sollemnely, not to acknowledge any other King then Charles the 7. sonne to Charles the sixt, as the true and lawfull King of France, and by consequence their lawfull Lord: yet they made a truce with the Bourguignon, beeing their neighbour, with the Kings good liking. In the meane time, the Duke of Bedford leuies what men and money he can, both in France and England, for some great attempt. Charles hath intelligence from diuers parts, but what could he doe in so deepe despaire of his affaires, and in so visible an impossibilitie.

E The famous Siege of Orlance.

F L L the citties on this side Loire, from the Ocean Sea, were lost, with the whole countries of Normandie, Picardie, the Ile of France, Bry, and Champaigne. He had nothing left but the Townes lying vpon the riuier of Loire, from Gien to Angers, for la Charite held for the Bourguignon. The chiefe was Orlance, this beeing wonne, what could hold out long for the French? Bourges could make small resistance, if the English had forced Orlance. The enemies of our State (who called Charles King of Bourges) threatened to take from him this small and languishing royaltie. Orlance then was the marke whereat the Duke of Bedford aymed, who hauing wonne the Britton, it greatly fortified the English affaires in France. As for the Bourguignon, hee had in a manner recovered the E- states of Holland, Hainault, Zeland, and Namur. And although ambition and couetousnesse can neuer be restrained: yet these Princes (nothing friendly among themselves) but as common 1428. common enemies to this Crowne, agreed well in this, to make their priuate profit by the ruine of our State. But man purpoſeth, and God diſpoſeth: we ſhall ſoone ſee how much he ſcornes their vanities. In this lamentable time, mans reaſon could not diſcerne by what meanes Charles ſhould reſiſt ſo mightie enemies. But in the weakneſſe of this Prince, I read with ioy the words of the Originall, which ſaith, During the time that the Engliſh held their ſiege before the noble cittie of Orleance, King Charles was very weak, being abandoned by the greateſt part of his Princes and other Noblemen, (eeing that all things were oppoſite unto him: yet had he ſtill a good truſt and confidence in God. He was not deceiued in this hope, as the ſequele will ſhew. The charge of this ſiege at Orleance was giuen to the Earle of Salisburie, a wife and reſolute commander: hauing giuen good testimonies of his ſufficiencie: for the well managing of this ſiege, he reſolued to take in all the forts neere vnto Orleance, that obeyed the French, and beginning with the weakeſt, parting from Paris, (taking his way through the countrie of Chartres) he ſeazeth vpon all the ſmall townes, wherein our Capitaines had ſo much toyled but a few moneths before, Nogent le Retrou, Puifier, Rochfort, Bertancourt, Januille, Toury, Mompieau, the caſtel of Pluuier, and la Ferte of Gaules, and approaching neere the cittie, (both aboue and beneath) Meung, Baugency, and Iargeau. In the end he plants himſelfe before Orleance, the ſixt of October, in the yeare 1428.

The Earle of Salisburie be- fore Orleance

A day to be obſerued, for that the 12. of May the yeare following was the laſt fitte of our diſeaſe, which changed the eſtate of our miſerable countrie, like vnto a pleaſant ſpring, after a long and ſharpe winter, when as a goodly ſommer crownes all our labours with abundance of peace and plentie. So this ſiege continued iuſt ſeuē moneths. The bruite of this great preparation did wonderfully diſquiet both Court and Countrie, vnder the French obedience, in the weakneſſe and conſuſions of the State. The King, after the taking of la Charite, was commonly reſident at Poitiers, he now retires to Chinon, to be neerer to Orleance. The townes willingly contribute men, money, and victuals. Many great perſonages flie to this ſiege, to defend the chiefe ſtrength of our King and Kingdome. Lewis of Bourbon the ſonne of Charles Earle of Clermont, the Earle of Dunois, baſtard of Orleance, the Lords of Bouſſac and Fayette, Marſhals of France: John Steward Conſtable of Scotland, William of Albret Lord of Oruall, the Lords of Thouers, Chauigny, Grauille and Chabannes. The captaines la Hire, Xaintrailles, Theolde of Valpergue, and John of Leſſego, Lombards, with many other great perſonages. There were not any of the Prouinces of Dauphine and Languedoc: for that the Dukes of Bourgongne and Sauoy, at the ſame inſtant prepared a great army, by the meanes of Lewis of Chaalons Prince of Orange, to inuade thoſe countries being wholly in the Kings obedience. The Orleanois reſolues to defend himſelfe. He preſently beates downe all that might accommodate the enemy, ſuburbs, houſes of pleaſure, winepreſſes, yea and the temples themſelues.

Charles his diligence to releue it.

Salisburie doth likewiſe uſe great dexterity and diligence to plant his ſiege, towards Beauſſe and the port Banniere, he builds a great Baſtille, which he calles Paris. Another at the port Renard which he names Rouen. Towards S. Laurence another, to the which hee gaue the name of Windſore. At the port of Bourgongne he fortified a ruined Temple, called S. Loup, and neere vnto it another, named S. John the White. At the Portereau he built a great fort vpon the ruines of the Auguſtines Church, calling it London: from the which he wonne the towre vpon the bridge, and all with wonderfull ſpeece. All the cittie is enuironed, hauing neither iſſue nor entrie, but with ſore fighting. And in theſe toyles they ſpend the reſt of the yeare.

The firſt day of the new yeare, the Engliſh (for a new-yeares-gift to the cittie) bring their ſcaling-ladders couragiouſly to the bulwarke at the port Renard, but they were valiantly repulſed by the defendants: the next day the Admirall of Cullant hauing paſſed the riuer of Loire at a foord (winter beeing very drie this yeare) viſits them of the cittie, and brings them diuers neceſſaries; vpon this returne, he encounters ſome Engliſh troupes which came ſtraggling from forrage. He chargeth them, cuts them in peeces, and ſo retires without danger. Thus the moneth of Ianuarie paſſeth without any other memorable exploite, but there happened a ſtrange accident the 20. of Februarie following. The Duke of Bedford ſent Lenten prouiſion to the Earle of Salisburie, with ſome munition of warre, vnder the conduct of John Fiſhall and Simon Bowyer, with 1700. men for their guard. The Duke of Bourbon brought

The battel of Herings, vnder ſortie ſate for the French.

A brought a goodly ſuccour of foure thouſand men to the beſieged. He reſolues to charge this Engliſh troupe, hauing well viewed their numbers. It was likely the ſtronger ſhould haue the victorie, but the iſſue was contrarie to the deſſeigne. For it chanced (as his men marched confidently, as it were to an aſſured victorie, without any iudgement) the Engliſh ſeeing them in doubt how they ſhould fight, either on foote or horſebacke, and irreſolute, in the end they reſolute to charge the French: it falling out many times in this exerciſe, that he which begins, wins. To conclude, without any further aduice, the Engliſh embrace this occaſion, charge our troupes, who were ſo ſurprized with this vnexpected impreſſion, as they preſently giue way to the Engliſh Bow-men. All flie, ſome here, ſome there without order, without command, and without courage, and few fight. Such as made head were ſlain. The reſt ſaue themſelues within Orleance. There were ſiue or ſixe hundred of our men ſlaine vpon the place. The Engliſh loſt but one man called Briſantcau. The chiefe of our ſide, were the Lord of Oruall, of the Noble houſe of Albret, John Stuard, Chaſteaubrun, Montpipel, Verduſant, Lartgoi, La Greue, Diuray, Pailly, with better then an hundred Gentlemen.

This ouerthrow was called the battle of Herings, for that they carried them to the beſeegers. The amazement was greater then the loſſe, for that the Earle of Clermont, a Prince of the bloud, who ſhould haue beene a ring-leader, full of reſolution and valour, in theſe extreme accidents, was ſo amazed with this loſſe, as he retired with his men, leauing the cittie to the baſtard of Orleance, who reſolues to attend the end of this ſeige, at what price ſocuer. In this gallant reſolution, he was vertuouſly ſeconded by the Lords of Guirry, Gaudcourt, Grauille, Villars, La Hire, and Xaintrailles, lights of great hope in this cruell ſtorme, and worthie of eternall memorie, in that they deſpaired not of this Monarchie, in ſo apparent deſpaire. And that which is chiefly to be obſerued herein, the King (vnderſtanding this retreat of the Earle of Clermont) ſaid, that he did ſee no meanes to ſaue the reſt from ſhipwracke.

To increaſe this feare, the Duke of Bourgongne comes to Paris at the ſame inſtant, with a troupe of ſixe hundred men at armes richly appointed. Our commanders (being full of reſolution) were not onely to encounter with the Engliſh, but with the conſuſion of times, the Kings miſfortune, and (which was worſt of all) the amazement of the men of warre, who diſcouered plainly the diſorder of the State. They were loth to caſt the helue after the hatchet, but fought the moſt aſſured meanes to ſaue the cittie in this ſtorme. They aduertise the King hereof, who was ſo irreſolute, as he referres all to their diſcretions. They reſolute to deliuer the towne into the Duke of Bourgongnes hands, to keepe it for the Duke of Orleance, or the Duke of Angouleme his brother, beeing then priſoners in England, with the kings good liking. Pothon of Xaintrailles, and Peter of Orſon (wiſe and valiant men) go to Paris to the Duke of Bedford, vpon his aſſurance. He heares them, and returnes them preſently, both for that he diſtruſted the Duke of Bourgongne, and held the conqueſt aſſured. The Bourguignon was greatly diſcontented with the Duke of Bedford for his reſuſall, whom after that time he neuer loued.

The Duke of Bedford diſcontents the Bourguignon.

The Engliſh triumphed as victors, ſo as our Ambaſſadours could hardly ſaue themſelues with their paſſe-port. Then the Engliſh (ſaith the Originall) beeing in great proſperity, had no conſideration that the wheele of Fortune hath power to turne daily. But the holy veritie of the Church, which drawes vs to the wiſe providence of God, cries: I haue ſaid to fooles, play not the fooles: and to the wicked, Liſt not up your hornes, ſpeake not with ſo great pride: for greatneſſe comes not from the Eaſt nor Weſt, neither from the North, it is God that raiſeth up, and caſteth downe. Hee holdes a cuppe of wine in his hand, hee imparts it to euery one at hee pleaſeth. Truly the pride of the Engliſh, who poſſeſſed a great part of this Monarchie, beeing drunke with this good fortune, was now come to his height: there remained nothing but the hand of the Soueraigne Iudge to ſuppreſſe him, but hee ſhall not long hold it.

O my countrie! forget not the time of thy viſitation. Reade in this true diſcourſe, the eſtate of thy predeceſſours. Remember their afflictions, behold their feare, ſee the image of that time wherein thou haſt borne a part, and iudge if now onely thou beginneſt to be afflicted. In this extremity, as the French were exceedingly diſtreſſed, ſo the Engliſh were tranſported 1429. ported with ioy, for their late victorie, and reioycing with a new hope as if all were wonne, A they crye to the besieged. Will you buy my faire herrings: at the same instant the townes-men issue forth along the riuer, the Earle of Salisburie stood at a window in the tower vpon the bridge beholding the skirmish, when as one of his captaines named Glacidas, said vnto him, My Lord, behold here your cittie, here may you view it plainly. But behold a Cannon charged with stones was shot from the towne, which aymed at the Earles head, stricke him and left him dead in the place. This vnexpected blow (coming as it were from heauen) changed this exceeding ioy of the English into mourning, beeing a man of great valour, who by his carriage had wonne great credit among them, beloued and honoured of all, for the mildnesse of his manners. So this losse troubled both the wits and affaires of the English armie, the which had greatly disbanded, if the Earle of Suffolke, Talbot, John Fastoll, and Seales, famous Captaines, had not happily bene there, to reuiue their spirits and courage, attending the Duke of Bedfords pleasure, who gaue the charge to Talbot, beeing the choice of their best men, and sending him new forces. So as the siege is continued with more vehemencie then before, with great presumptions, that all would goe worfe with the besieged.

The Earle of Salisburie flaine before Orleance.

The Lord Talbot commends in his place.

In this occurrent, Charles knew not what to doe, to whome should hee flie? his Princes forsake him. Orleance beeing taken, whether should he retire? Bourges was readie to yeeld, and withall, the countrie adioyning. He had no whole Prouinces vnder his obedience, but Languedoc and Daulphine. And at the same instant the Bourguignon and Sauoyard prouide worke for him in those countries. The taking then of Orleance (which in reason seemed vnauoydable) was the ouerthrow of Charles and his estate. There was no winking at that which was too apparent. That (considering the estate of his affaires in generall and of his house in particular, if Orleance should be lost) all the townes vpon the riuer of Loire, and in like sort the rest (alreadie wauering) would abandon him.

Amiddest these fearefull considerations, what could the braue and Noble Commanders within Orleance doe, but plant their hopes in God and in themselves? A soueraigne remedie in extreame dangers. So (to purchase an honourable and profitable composition) they set a good face on it, giuing the English to vnderstand, that if they desired their liues, they should buy them dearly. France reduced to so great an extremitie, and truly such, as men could do no more, behold God raiseth vp an extraordinarie meanes, the which meanes reason could not foresee, and much lesse prouide. A meanes which reuiued the daunted spirits, changed the face of our affaires, and dismayed the enemies. And to conclude, by a miraculous meanes gaue a happie successe both to our King and Realme: and this was the occasion.

Charles his miserable estate.

A young Maiden named Joane of Arc (borne in a village vpon the Marches of Barre called Doinremy, neere to Vaucouleurs) of the age of eightene or twentie yeares, issued from base parents, her father was named James of Arc, and her mother Isabel, poore countrie folkes, who had brought her vp to keep their cattell, she said with great boldnesse, That shee had a reuelation, how to succour the King: how he might be able to chase the English from Orleance, and after that to cause the King to be crowned at Rheims, and to put him fully and wholly in possession of his Realme.

Joane the Virgin, or rather witch.

After shee had deliuered this to her father, mother, and their neighbours, shee presumed to goe to the Lord of Baudricourt, Prouost of Vaucouleurs: she boldly deliuered vnto him (after an extraordinarie manner) all these great mysteries, as much wished for of all men, as not hoped for: especially comming from the mouth of a poore countrie maide, whome they might with more reason beleue to be possessed by some melancholy humour, then diuinely inspired; beeing the instrument of so many excellent remedies, in so desperate a season, after the vaine strivings of so great and famous personages. At the first he mocked her and reprooued her, but hauing heard her with more patience, and iudging by her temperate discourse and modest countenance, that she spake not idly, in the end he resolues to present her to the King for his discharge. So shee arriues at Chinon the sixth day of May, attired like a man.

Shee had a modest countenance, sweete, ciuill and resolute, her discourse was temperate, reasonable and retired, her actions cold, shewing great chastitie. Hauing spoken to the King

A King or Noblemen with whom she was to negotiate, shee presently retired to her lodging with an old woman that guided her, without vanitie, affectation, babling or courtly lightnesse. These are the manners which the Originall attributes vnto her. The matter was found ridiculous both by the King and his Councell, yet must they make some triall. The King takes vpon him the habit of a counterman, to be disguised: this maide (beeing brought into the Chamber) goes directly to the King in this attire, salutes him with so modest a countenance, as if she had bene bred vp in Court all her life. They telling her that she was mistaken, she assured them it was the King, although she had neuer seene him. She begins to deliuer vnto him this new charge, which (she sayes) she had receiued from the God of heauen, so as she turned the eyes and minds of all men vpon her.

B This matter beeing referred to counsell, it was concluded, they should take the aduise of Diuines. They answer, that in desperate diseases, the prouidence of God doth commonly raise vp extraordinarie remedies, and employes women, when as men grow faint-hearted: as in the afflictions of Israel, he hath mightily vsed Deborah and Abigail: The one to teach the people, the other to kill a furious tyrant: and Judith, which slue that great tyrant in the midst of his armie. So as necessitie, which made them to seeke all sorts of remedies, caused the King to trie if this maide spake truth, but without the hazard of any thing. This Joane (held for a Prophetesse by many) is reported by Gyrard, Seigneur of Haillian, and sundrie other French Writers, and plainly said to haue bene induced to this imposture by three Noblemen, who had incited her thereto, and layed that plot, onely to encourage King Charles to fight, despairing of his estate.

C She desires of the King, that she may be conducted to Orleance, to beginne the worke which she said she had in charge. A sword remaining in Touraine, in a place called S. Katherine of Fierebois was brought vnto her, to be armed therewith. They gaue her armes and horse, with a sufficient troupe to enter the cittie. Lewis of Cullant, Admirall of France, and James of Rieux Marshall, had charge to accompanie her with some victuals to the besieged, and to haue a care, that all should be wisely carried without hazard. Shee prepares her colours, and beeing armed at all points, she went to take leaue of the King, with a grace worthe of a great Captaine: beseeching him to trust in God, in whose name she spake. Thus she parts from Chinon the twelfth of April.

D Now they reckoned the sixt moneth of the seege, the besieged cry out for hunger. This victualling prouided at Blois, is conducted by the aboue named commanders, with great care, as well for feare of the English (who had their centinels in all places) as for the distrust they had of this new commander. Shee marched in the foremost rancke, betwixt the Admirall and the Marshall, carrying the countenance of a very resolute personage. They arriue (with this prouision) safely at Orleance, the English making no shew of arming, although she passed before their forts, in view of the armie, yet had they scarce fixe hundred men in this supply.

E The power of Gods prouidence is admirable in the hearts of men, making them to yeeld insensibly to what he hath decreed. This first exploite stirred vp the spirits of the French. Orleance begins to reioyce at the sight of this maide, attired like a man, standing vpon the point of yeelding. This first releefe was not sufficient for so great a multitude. They resolved to fetch more victuals, and to that end would returne to Blois. But before their departure, the Maiden writes this letter following, to the chiefe of the English armie, and sends it by a trumpeter. I haue truly set it downe out of the Originall, in the same words and style, both for the reuerence of antiquitie, the noble courage of this virgin, and the truth and state of the subiect.

F King of England, doe reason to the King of heauen, for his blood royall; yeeld vp to the Virgin the keyes of all the good Citties which you haue forced. She is come from heauen to reclaim the blood royall, and is readie to make a peace, if you be ready to do reason: yeeld therefore, and pay what you haue taken. King of England, I am the chiefe of this warre, wherefoeuer I encounter your men in France, I will chase them, will they or no. If they will obey, I will take them to mercie. The Virgin comes from the King of heauen, to drue you out of France. If you will not obey, shee will cause so great a stirre, as the like hath not bene these thousand yeares in France. And beleue certainly, that the King of heauen will send

Joane sends threats to
the English.

1429 " send her, and her good men at arms, more force then you can haue. Go in Gods name into A
 " your cuntry, be not obstinate, for you shall not hold France of the King of heauen, the Son " of Saint Mary, but Charles shall enioy it, the King and lawfull heire, to whom God hath gi-
 " uen it, he shall enter Paris with a goodly traine. You William de la Poole, Earle of Suffolke,
 " John Lord Talbot, Thomas Lord Scales, Lieutenants to the Duke of Bedford: and you Duke
 " of Bedford, tearing your selfe Regent of the Realme of France, spare innocent blood, and " leaue Orleance in libertie. If you do not reason to them you haue wronged, the French will " doe the goodliest exploit that euer was done in Christendome: vnderstand these newes of God, and of the Virgin.

This letter (beeing deliuered to the Earle of Suffolke) was read with laughter. Charles and his Councell were scorned, as seeking remedies without reason, and transported with folly in following of these vanities. They now assure themselues of a speedie victorie, seeing that Charles is vncertaine what to doe. The Trumpeter is imprisoned against the law of Nations, readie to be burnt in the sight of the beseege: when as suddenly there was other worke prepared for them. A new supply of victuals is made at Blois, through the care of Renold of Chartres, Chancellor of France, and Archbishop of Rheims, a great personage in his time.
 The Virgin goes to field for the safe conducting thereof to Orleance, but with a greater troupe then before: for the fame of her actions, and of this new successe, had drawne together seuen or eight thousand men: like vnto a cheerefull spring, which causeth trees beeing dead in shew, to sprout and spring againe. The commanders were not greatly moued with these popular brutes, giuing but cold beleefe to the Virgins visions and promises, so as they passe another way for their greater safetie. The Virgin lets them go, forbearing to speak any thing before their comming to Orleance: Then she said, Tu hide your selues from me, as if I were ignorant of your intentions, but you must not doubt of the performance of that which God hath decreed. This was the 20. of Aprill.

Orleance being thus fortified both with men and victuals: the Earle of Dunois, and Pothon of Xaintrailles, hold a Councell what was to be done: they call her, and intreate her to de-liuer her opinion. My aduice is (saith she) that without any farther delay, we charge the English that beseege vs, for that (GOD beeing on our side) they cannot escape vs: but before we procede, let every man dispose of his conscience, and banish all lewd and naughtie persons out of the Ar- mie. Although there were small hope or likelihood to vanquish a Conquerour, yet the Commanders resolute to accept and embrace her counsell as an Oracle from God.

The Earle of Dunois made choice of fiftene hundred strong and lusty men for the fight, meaning to beginne with the Fort at Bourgogne gate, called Saint Loup. The Virgin goes in the foremost ranke, with the chiefe Captaines of the Armie. The souldiers encouraged by her ptesence, assaile this fort furiously, beeing guarded by foure hundred English: neither arrowes, pikes nor halberds could stay the planting of their ladders. The Virgin enters the fort first, crying, Montroy, Saint Denis, the fort is wonne. The English abandon their defences and suffer themselues to bee slaine by the French, who (seeing themselues master of the fort, and wearied with the execution) take many prisoners. The Ar-tillerie and munition beeing drawne forth, they set fire on the fort. This chanced the 4-of May, a remarkable day, beeing the first fruites of the deliuerie of Orleance, and the generall restoring of this Realme.

Thus the Virgin returnes into the cittie with her victorious souldiers. All the people follow her with cries of victorie: shee can hardly retire to her lodging: all the world runs to see her, and to commend her, both men, women, and children: all crie out confusedly with a ioy mixt with teares: Blessed be this Virgin which comes to deliuer vs. On the other side, the English (seeing their men carried away like chickens before the Eagle, and their fort consumed as with fire from heauen) were greatly amazed, beeing in so great possibilitie to vanquish the French on euery side. Suffolke and Talbot make orations to their men, to reuiue their sprites, daunted at this new and strange spectacle. But we must procede, and not suffer the courage of the victorious Souldiers to grow cold. The Virgin goes to counsell with the chiefe of the cittie, causing them to resolute to continue the next day, what they had so happily begunne.

The English
grow amazed at the Virgin exploits.

At

A At the breake of day, the Virgins colours are carried through the Citty: she resolues to passe the riuer, and to take the Fortes on the other side. She passeth happily betwixt the Forte of Saint Loup that was ruined, and the new Tower, where the furiously assailes and winnes the Forte called Saint John the White, and cuts all the Souldiers in peeces: from thence she marcheth to the Portreau, where the great Bastion of London was built, vpon the Augustins Church. This place was valiantly disputed through the resolutions of both parties, but in the end it was forced. The victory was double, in vanquishing of the enemy, and in deliuering of friends, for there were many French prisoners found therein. There now remained the Tournelles, and the Bastion vpon the bridge, beeing the dungeon of their principall defence. The Virgin held this exploit sufficient for that dayes worke, leauing the rest vntill the morrow, to giue the Souldiers breath. So the Fortresse being besieged, they prepare for the last assault.

The next day (being Saturday, the sixt of May) ended this dangerous siege, which had continued seauen moneths. The sharpest Thorne remained yet behinde: the Tournelles adioyning to the bridge, was kept by Glacidas (one of the most resolute Captaines among the English) hauing well encouraged his men to defend them-selues, and to fight for their liues.

The skirmish begins at nine of the clock in the morning, and the ladders are planted.
 A storme of English Arrowes falles vpon our men with such violence as they recoil. How now (saith the Virgin) haue wee begun so well, so end so ill: let vs charge, they are our owne, seeing God is on our side. So euery one recouering his forces, flocks about the Virgin; the English double the storme, vpon the thickest of the troupes. The Virgin fighting in the foremost rankes, and encouraging her men to doe well, was shotte through the arme with an arrow: She nothing amazed, takes the arrowe in one hand, and her sword in the other.
This is a fauour (sayes she) let vs go on, they cannot escape the hand of God. At this womans voyce, amidst the found of warre, the combate growes very hote. Our men greatly incou-raged by this Virgin, runne head-long to the Bastion, and force a point thereof. Then fire and stones raigne so violently, as the English being amazed, forsake their defences. Some are slaine vpon the place, some throw them-selues downe head-long, and flie to the Towre vpon the bridge. In the end this braue Glacidas abandons this quarter, and retires into the base Court vpon the bridge, and after him a great troupe of his Souldiers. The bridge greatly shaken with Artillery, tryed by fire, and ouer-charged with the weight of this multitude, sinks into the water with a fearefull crye, carrying all this multitude with it.

Thus the riuer of Loire was a Sepulchre for Glacidas, and all his troupe; always accustomed to vanquish, but when they were vanquished. An example of mans vanity, who (drunke with their victories,) cannot conceiue that the rodde of the Iudge of this world may touch them. The English lost in these three dayes skirmishes, aboue eight thousand men, and we scarce a hundred, the which was Gods handy worke. If the ioy of Orleans were great, and the Virgins honour proclaimed in this happy successe, being proofes of her true fore-tellings; If her triumph were double; when as passing through the Citty (hauing her arme honourably hurt) she was inuironed by the Earle of Dunois, Pothon of Xaintrailles, and all the most famous Captaines: the perplexity of Suffolke, Talbot and Scales, was not lesse, fore-seeing the vnauoidable course of their misfortune, if they should obstinately defend the other Fortes that were towards Beausse, although a good part of their Armie remained there. So they take counsell from danger to abandon all these Fortes, to retire into some place of safetie, and to aduertise the Duke of Bedford of their misfortunes.

The same night they gather together with great silence, about nine thousand men, and take the way to Baugency. The Orleanois are watchfull, obseruing their departure, prepare to charge the enemy, but the Virgin would not consent there-vnto. And in truth this remainder was appointed for other victories. The inhabitants thus freed, issue early in the morning out of the Citty, they come to the Bastions, where hauing gathered together great store of armes, victuals and baggage, they cast these great monuments of the English labours vnto the ground. They giue solemne thanks vnto God, the author of so miraculous a deliuerie; and to the end this singular benefit might be celebrated yearly, they

1429. they erect a monument for this memorable successe, King Charles the seuenth armed, and A loane the Virgin likewise armed, both kneeling vpon their knees before a Crucifixe of brasfe kept to this day vpon the bridge amidst the furies of our late ciuill, or rather vnciuill warres. Truly thank-giuing for so excellent a good, is due to God onely, and this memorie ought to be religiously consecrated to posteritie, as the first frutes of the restoring of this Estate, then halfe dead through the force and might of Strangers.

To confirme this goodly victorie, the Virgin parts well accompanied from Orleance, and goes to the King to Chinon, to yeeld him an accompt of her commission. It cannot be spoken, with what ioy this Prince beheld her, and what credit she purchased by this miraculous successe. But, My Leege (saith she) this is but a beginning, we must finish the God of hea- B uens worke, causing you to be crowned at Rheims, and chasing your enemies out of your state. This is the commandment I haue receiued. And so by her aduice Charles assembles all his forces. The Constable of Richmont, (who neuer durst shew himselfe after the quarrell with Tremouille) is now reconciled by the Virgins intercession, and hereafter shall doe very good seruice to this Crowne. Charles of Bourbon, Earle of Clermont, is now wonderfully discontented, to haue retired himselfe from the battaile of Herings, hauing not honourably assisted in these exploits, in the which he had held the first rancke. But John of Bourbon Duke of Alençon arriued happily out of prison from England, (he had beene taken at the battell of Vernueil) to be commander of these goodly troupes, which go resolutely to take possession of the citties of Champagne, beeing all then in the possession of the English. Men post from all parts to this banker. Their hearts beeing reuiued, their countenances change, and their affaires take a new forme. They then make proiects, saying: But whilest the King prepares for his coronation at Gyen, and to be nearest his chiefest affaires, let vs suppress these English which remaine, after that great defeat of Orleance, and let vs take from them those Townes which are neere about. The Earle of Suffolke was at Largeau: the towne is beseege and taken, all the English are either slaine, or taken prisoners: one of the Earles breethren was slaine in the fight, another of them drowned, and he himselfe was taken vpon the bridge as he was flying away. Meung was taken by Guy of Lauall, and seuen or eight hundred Englishmen slaine: Baugency yeelds by composition.

The Duke of Bedford gathers together what forces he can, to preserue the rest of the Townes from shipwracke, sending a troupe of foure thousand men to fortifie them. Talbot with Thomas Ramcston haue the charge. This troupe was presently subiect to our victorie, and when as they finde that neither men nor Townes can hold out for them, they seeke to retire themselves: but they are incountred at Patay, a small village in Beaussie, where all are slaine or taken, yet our mens furie being past, many are spared, both in the fight and in prison, that the English might haue a testimonie of our mildnesse. The great Talbot is taken and brought to Charles, who vseth him with great respect. John Fastoll flies shamefully, and is therefore degraded by the Duke of Bedford.

The English defeated at Patay.

This chanced the twentieth of May. We had all the tokens of an absolute victorie. The Commanders slaine or taken, the field wonne, an hundred and ten Ensignes brought to our Temples, their Artillerie, munition, and all other habillements of warre, are seized on: and moreover, the hearts of the King and the French were resolute to end the quarrell. Behold the first frutes: the haruest shall be gathered in time, as the Historie will shew by degrees. But let vs goe to Rheims, to crowne Charles according to the Virgins appointment.

The

The Coronation of CHARLES the seauenth.

BY this happy successe, the way was made to Rheims, although the Kings Councell framed many difficulties to hinder this voyage, as superfluous, and almost impossible: for why, say they, should Charles be crowned? The lawe of State made him to be borne a King, and hee was crowned at Poitiers. But if (to please the people) it muist of force bee so, where is the meanes to effect this decree? Rheims and all the townes of Champagne be in other mens possessions. Thus did many discourse. The Virgin answered, We must goe to Rheims, to crowne the King. It is true, the King is the lawfull beire, but his right is called in question by the English, this maske deceiues many, and makes them disobedient: As for the meanes, leaue that to the God of Heauen, he will prouide for it.

King Charles crowned at Rheims.

This aduice preuailed, as an Oracle: all things are prepared in readinesse for the Coronation. Charles retires to Bourges for this intent, as if the preseruer of the Monarchy would mocke his enemies, who called him King of Bourges in iest: For shortly after hee parts from Bourges to be proclaimed King of France. But whilest hee attends there, vntill that all things may bee made fit for his iourney to Rheims; behold an encrease of good newes to crowne his late and happy victory against the English; That the Bourguignon and Sauoyard, who would haue seized vpon Daulphine were defeated. The particulars of this discourse is: The realme being set to sale to Strangers, and that euery one sought to haue his part: the Dukes of Burgongne and Sauoy had laide a plot to appropriate vnto them-selues both Daulphine and Languedoc, with other Prouinces that obeyed Charles, vsing in this negotiation the helpe of Lewis of Chaalons Prince of Orange, a man of valour and credit, especially in those Countries, by reason of his principality which lay neere vnto them. The diuision of this marchandise was thus made betwixt them three. The Bourguignon had the Viennois, neere vnto Lions, and that which depended on Lions, whereon hee had cast his eye, to make profit of that goodly Cittie. Grifinaudan with Grenoble euen to Romans, Ambrunois, Gapenfois, Briançonois, and all the Countries of the Mountaines were the Sauoyards part.

The Bourguignon and Sauoyard, in Daulphine & Languedoc.

The Orangois (to enlarge his principality,) had Valentinois, Dyois and the Earonies, where he held some land vnder the obedience of this Crowne. This portion was allotted to him for his paines. They all arme vpon this proiect, euen when as the English pressed Orleans most. The best houses of Burgongne, and Sauoy, contribute to this warre, as to a flete that goes to the East, or the West Indies: but they had not assured their venture in the Port, with an intent to haue all the profit. This leuie is made with great shew: the Duke of Sauoy sends fife hundred Lances, vnder the command of the Lord of Varembon, besides voluntaries, and three thousand foote. The Bourguignon (with his mothers assistance) a thousand Lances. Many Noble-men repaire thither, as to an assured gaine. There were leauied in his territories nine or ten thousand foote. The Prince of Orange assembles a goodly troupe, as well of his subiects, as of his friends in Prouence, where he had a good portion: and for his beginning, he seazeth vpon Enton, a towne vpon the Rosne, a fitte passage for Sauoy and Burgongne: and Colombiers, a Castell of great importance neere vnto it. Hauing brought sixteene hundreded men thither, hee attends the troupes of Burgongne, and Sauoy, which repaire vnto him dayly. Hee puts forty men at armes into Colombiers for the gard of the place, and keepe the rest of the troupes about him with great security, fearing no enemy, in this generall amazement of the Kings affaires: but the successe was contrary to his desseigne, for Raoul of Gaucourt, gouernour of Daulphine, resolves in this extremity, who (attending no succours from the King, being visibly ingaged, and in great danger,) doth husband such forces as hee could gather together within his government, from Lions and Viarez, Countries that were vnder the French obedience. Imbert of Grosle, gouernour of Lions and Marshall of Daulphine, John de Leurs Baron of la Voute, the Lords of Ioyeuse, Turnon and Crusol (great men in the Country of Viarez) did Preparations against Daulphine and Languedoc.

1429. did their belt deuoir, the Nobility of Daulphine (renowned alwaies for their fidelity and valour) assisted as much as could be desired in so great a necessity. The Baron of Maubec is noted about the rest for his wel deseruing. Don Roderigo de Villandras a Castillian was there with a goodly and valliant troupe.

The prince of Orange defeated.

The Lord of Gaucourt resolues to charge the prince of Orange with this troupe, giuing him no leisure to assemble the body of his armie, the which increased daily. So (without any further delay) he besiegeth Colombiers, and takes it by force, before the Orangeois had any intelligence of his approach. Hauing this good successe, hee would giue the enemy no time to take breath, but desirous to make his profit of this happy beginning, hee parts suddenly with these resolute troupes to draw the prince of Orange to fight; who was then parted from Enton, hauing intelligence onely of the siege, but not of the taking of Colombiers, beleeuing confidently, that the very brute of his forces would make our men to hide themselves: but hee was deceived. Hee had foure thousand men with him, and Gaucourt had about two thousand, yet (notwithstanding his small number) being nothing amazed, hee charged and defeats them. The neceressesse of Enton saues many. There were five hundred slaine vpon the place; and two hundred of the brauest souldiers taken prisoners. The prince of Orange hauing recovered Enton, passeth the Rosne in a boate, and saues himselfe. The common report is that hee passed this violent streame on horse-backe all armed. The people of that Country doe beleue it from Father to Sonne, that this horse was kept and died at Orange, hauing a long time bene nourished there by the Princes commandement, acknowledging the seruice hee had received of this beast in his extreame necessity. Monstrelet saith, That hee parted in great disorder, and was chased euen vnto Authun. Alain Charretier, Secretary to our King Charles, writes in expresse words, That he passed the Rosne at the ferrie of Enton. Hee sets downe, that the bootie was about a hundred thousand crownes, besides many notable prisoners of Bourgongne and Sauoy, which came to bee spoiled, thinking to doe the like to our Charles.

This defeat happened the twentieth day of May, the same day that the English (which retired from Orleans) were defeated at Patay. To credit the worke, against such as made their account alone without God, who seeking to rauish any other mans goods vniustly, lost their owne deseruedly. Thus God workes speedily, as many appeere by the course of so many happy exploits, linkt one to an other in this moneth of May, as a prediction of the restoring of the estate in this Realme. The Bourguignons and the Sauoiards designe being disappointed by this defeat, Gaucourt resolues to haue his priuate reuenge of the Orangeois, being the factor of this filthie traffike. To conclude (without giuing him any respite) he passeth the Rosne with his victorious forces, and takes many places from him, the which hee sackes and burnes. But not ingaging himselfe farther in the Franch-Conte (where those of Chaalons haue many goodly places) he came to Oranges his chiefe towne, whereof hee carries the name, as souereigne prince. Hee takes both towne and castle, and all that hee held in Daulphine vnder the Kings obedience: yet the Citizens of Orange (wonderfully affected to their prince) within few moneths after chase the French out of the castle, and become masters thereof, for the seruice of their prince, to whom they yeeld it. Such was the end of this enterprife, shamefull for the Authors, and shamefully preiudiciall for the instrument.

Gaucourt takes oranges and is recouered againe.

Preparatives for the coronation of King Charles.

Ameace Duke of Sauoy (fallen from so visible a hope, to fish in a troubled water: and seeing on the other side the happy successe of Charles) he growes so much discontented, as his whole discours is to abandon the world, but hereafter wee shall see his actions. At this time he returnes in the mid-way, without effecting of any thing. Our Bourguignon flew a higher pitch, and had more then one designe in his head. But let vs now returne to our King to Bourges. The preparations for this Coronation were royall and very admirable after so great affliction, but about all it was beautified with great personages. There were present, John of Bourbon Duke of Alanson, Charles of Bourbon Earle of Clermont, princes of the bloud (who had faithfully and profitably accompanied the King in his greatest afflictions) Arthur of Britan Earle of Richmond Constable of France, Charles of Aniou sonne to the King of Sicilia, and brother to the Queene.

The

A The Earle of Dunois bastard of Orleans, Charles of Albret Earle of Perdiac, a yonger brother of the noble house of Armagnac, the Lord of Cullant Admirall of France, the foure Marshalls of France, the Lords of Bouffac, Loheac, Ricux and la Fayette. The Lords of Tremouille, Lual, Chauigny, Chaumont, Lamelan, d'Aulin, Serrant, Crusol, Saint Chaumont, and many others, with Pothon, la Hire and the virgin, excellent peeces of this triumph. Many could not come in time to this solemnity: great troupes came posting from all parts, notwithstanding the danger of the enemy, which was great in diuers places. Such was the desire of the French to assist at this wished act, loyaltie remainyng in their breasts, as the seed doth in the bosome of the earth during winter. But Charles (before hee parted from Bourges to Reims) provided for the publike safety, least the English should attempt anything during this solemnity. He sends his Constable into Normandy, and the Earle of Perdiac into Guicenne with some troupes, and reserues ten thousand men for his Coronation, as well to make his passage through townes that should resist, as to honor the ceremony. A very doubtfull journey yet most happy.

Thus he begins his voyage: The first city that was summoned by his commandement, was Auxerre: they excuse themselves by reason of the truce lately obtained by Tremouilles intercession. A presumption very preiudiciall in the example, euen now in this first triall of obedience, vpon this fame of victory, whereof none could make any question without apparent danger. Euery man did see this error, but no man durst open his mouth, for that the King did countenance Tremouille, euen with the preiudice of his affaires. So Charles entred not into Auxerre, he onely tooke their words, that at his returne they should doe as the rest, and furnish the Kings army with victuals for their money. From Auxerre the King comes to Saint Florentin, which yeelds without any question. Troies was summoned next: at the first they refused, like vnto Auxerre, through the practises of such as were of the English faction: but as Charles prepared for the siege, behold a notable troupe of the choise citizens assemble themselves, assure the City, and giue the King to vnderstand, that they are ready to receiue his commandments, and without attending any answer from the King, a goodly company goes forth to meete him, and to offer him their obedience. Charles then enters into Troies, to the vnspeakeable ioy of all the people, being wonderfully glad to see their Princes face, after so long captivity. Chaalons follows their example, and all the rest of the townes, with great alacrity and willingness.

But the chiefe combat must be at Rheims, the chiefe Rendez-uous of this voyage. The Lords of Chastillon and Saneuze, with their Partisans of the English faction, did what they could to hinder the Kings entry. But the good citizens preuaile, who (being stronger then the English faction,) could hardly keepe the people from tearing them in peeces, being loath to shed any blood. They agree and sweare by common consent, to obey the King, and to that end send him the Keyes of Chaalons. The way being thus made, and the gates of Rheims open, hee goes thither with the beautie of his Court, and is received with the vnspeakeable ioy of all the people, who come to meete him in great troupes: the fields, gates and streetes sound out; God save the King. Charles accompanied with his Princes and officers, appeares like a goodly sunne after a sharpe Winter. But in the greatest beauty of this triumph, Joan the Virgin is beheld with admiration, & loden with popular blessings.

Two daies being spent in the preparation of the ceremonie, Charles was annointed and crowned King the eight day of Iuly, in the yeere 1429. by Renold of Chartres, Archbishop of Rheims, Chancellor of France: a date to bee obserued, being the beginning of great good to this realme. This was the seventh yeere after the law of State had called Charles to the crowne, whereof he was heire, but the violence of strangers restrained and held most of the French from their obedience. So this Coronation was added to confirme the general approbation of this lawfull authority, not only in their common beleefe, but in the tongues of the French, as the sequell will shew, that this sollemne publication did greatly aduance the Kings affaires against his capitall enemy.

But as the sunne, rising higher in his Horizon, increaseth both in brightnesse and heate, so the beames of the French liberty were more apparent, and the subjects deuotion to their naturall Prince kindled daily, after the long and sharpe Winter of the English command.

All Champagne yeelds to King Charles.

1429 command. This was a reuiuing both to their hearts, State, and manner of the image of a golden age, after the horrible tempest of a long a mortall confusion. The French did straine to receiue their King, and the King to receiue them with a fatherly loue. The Kings commandements (generally proclaimed to liue modestly without oppression of the people) were freely executed, and the people made the best cheere they could, to so pleasing guests.

This act did greatly daunt the English, all the Prouinces taking a new resolution to submit themselves vnder the obedience of their naturall prince, as the sequell of the History will shew. But before we ingage our selues in so long a discourse, order doth command vs to obserue the estate of the Church and Empire, hauing past it ouer in silence, since the yeere 1364. towards the end of the reigne of Charles the fifth. Doubtlesse wee were sufficiently troubled with our owne confusions, vnder the miserable reigne of Charles the sixth, imbarcking our selues in forraigne stormes. We are therefore briefly to note, according to our stile, what hath happened since fifty nine yeeres, in these two great bodies.

The estate of the Empire.

The disposition of the Emperor
Venceslaus.

We haue left the Empire in the hands of Charles the fourth, an excellent Prince, but exceeding more in law and valour, then in iustice and vertue; yet hee vsed the counsel of Barthol, an excellent Lawier, hauing gouerned the publike affaires of Germany and Italy, twenty and six yeeres, amidst many confusions, and in the end he purchased the Empire, with the preiudice of the Empire. His sonne Venceslaus, whom hee had caused to bee crowned King of Hungary, and Bohemia, at the age of two yeeres, hauing bought the Empire for him, hee caused him to bee installed, and liued two yeeres after, dying in the yeere 1378. hauing left a wretched successor of so great and royall a dignity, deformed in minde and body, a foole, idle, voluptuous, and a coward; hauing no other care but to wallow in the most infamous vices and sinnes of drunkennesse and whoredome; nor other minde, but to doe euill and mischief; as malicious and cruell, as without valour and vertue. So (contemning his affaires and businesse) hee grew contemptible: in hating of his subiects, hee grew so hatefull, as in the end, the Germanes and Hongariens (beeing wearie of such a scorne,) take him prisoner: and at last, after a painefull and shamefull patience (they hauing suffered him two and twentie yeeres, and a huge masse of diuerse and sundrie confusions, which grew by his ill & wicked gouernment) they depriue him of the Imperiall dignity, by a common consent. And yet to shew, they bare no malice to the house from whence he was descended, they choose in his place Jesse, Marquis of Brandebourg and Bauaria, the sonne of Iohn Henry, brother to Charles the fourth, and so cousin germaine to Venceslaus, who liued in that state but sixe moneths, and had nothing of the Empire, but that hee was buried with the Imperiall ornaments of that country.

Then Rupert Count Palatine, duke of Bauaria, and first elector, was chosen Emperor, after much controuersie and dissention, a man of small stature, but of great iudgement, vertuous, valiant, and louing the common-weale. He laboured and tooke great paines to redresse the confusions of Italy, then exceedingly disordred, through the quarrells of Galeaz duke of Milan, the Venetians, Florentines, French, and Arragonois, vpon diuers and sundry occasions: but finding that whatsoeuer he could doe, he lost his labour (euen by the disloyaltie of such as imploied him) hee suffered them to ruine and spoile one another, and retired himselfe home, where (after he had happily gouerned the Empire ten yeeres) hee died in the yeere of our Lord 1410.

The estate of the Church.

Sigismund King of Hungary and Bohemia, a prince of happy memory, succeeded Rupert, by the generall consent of all the Germanes, who loued and honoured his vertues: and although he sought against the Turke with ill successe, when as he borrowed forces of Charles the sixth (as I haue said) yet his losses did nothing blemish his reputation, nor his vertues, whereof he gaue great prooffe in the gouernment of the Empire. But that which troubled him most, was the state of the Church, then plunged in tragicall confusions, bred by the long and scandalous Schisme which dismembred it by peece-meales, through the dissention and controuersies of sundrie Popes, which were chosen in diuers places, and that diuerslie at one instant.

Order commands vs now to represent it, as carefully as the subiect is of importance. I tremble to rippe vp these shamefull and detestable wounds. I will endeauor to represent it plainly and sincerely, following the steps of Platina, Naueker and Theodore of Niem: who hauing

A hauing remained in the Court of Rome, Secretary to diuers Popes, one after another, and managed the affaires from the beginning of the Schisme, neere vnto the end, ought to be held for an vnreprooeable witness in that which he hath seene. This Schisme continued fifty yeeres: it banded all the Christians of Europe, diuided Kings and Princes, nourished their diuisions, bred and brought forth horrible scandales, toucht their hearts, opened their mouthes and dispensed with their hands to a new faction, referred to our latter age. Sixe Popes seated in Rome one after an other, had euery one his opposite in Auignon, with the same name or title, and in the profession of the same authority. Three Popes at one instant in three seuerall places. Foure Councillors were called to remedy these confusions, beeings generally detested of all men, both great and small, seeing the Popes (who had so long contended with the Emperours, vntill they had chased them out of Italy) contend now among themselves: and this was the cause of the Schisme.

The cause of
this Schisme.

Wee haue said, that the vnfortunate successe of the voluntary quarrell moued by Boniface the eight, against King Philip the faire, ministred occasion to transport the Pontificall sea from Rome to Auignon, where hauing bene vsually resident 74. yeeres, and the Popes chosen out of the French nation, Gregory the tenth a Limosin, grew desirous to goe to Rome, and to transport his colledge thither, consisting for the most part of French Cardinals. After his death, (beeing to choose a new Pope) the Cleargie and people of Rome beeings vnited, protest vnto the colledge, that they will haue a Romaine or an Italian, and no French-man. If they doe it not willingly, they threaten force. The French are the stronger in the Conclau, being thirteene against foure. But what could they do against the mutiny of a multitude armed with furie? To coniuere this storme, the French and Italian Cardinals agree to name an Italian Pope, with whom the Pontificall dignity should bee left in garde, vntill they might choose one by a free election of the whole colledge.

They all consent to choose Bartholomew of Naples, Archbishop of Bary in Apulia, esteemed a learned man, graue and modest. The reputation of his vertues made them proceed to confirme him in the election: so as all by a generall consent, (especially Peter de la Lune, and the Cardinal of Saint Agreue in Viarez) crowne and adore him, for a finall conclusion of his Popedom, assuring them-selues that hee would continue vertuous, as he had formerly begun vertuously. But honours change manners. Two dayes were scarce past after this sollemne reception, but this Bartholomew, (who shall now be Vrbane the sixt, in changing his degree and name) did also change his humors and manner of life. Hee which was accustomed to humble him-selfe to all men, doth now braue all them which had newly raised him to this dignity. He threatens to keepe them vnder, and checks them with reprochefull words. Otho Duke of Brunfwick (husband to Joane Queene of Sicilie and Naples), comes to congratulate his election, and for a prooffe of his great humility, (as Vrbane called for wine) Otho takes the cuppe from his talter, and kneeling before the Pope presents it vnto him. Vrbane takes it, leauing him on his knee with a frowning countenance, without speaking any thing. This insupportable arrogancie displeased the whole colledge, but especially Queene Joane, (holding this disgrace done to her selfe) and made Vrbane so odious, as they all resolute to depose him, and to choose another Pope: where-vnto Joane doth promise her assistance. They all ioyntly resolute to retire themselves quietly out of Rome, into some place of liberty. So vnder colour to auoide the heate of Sommer, they take their leaues to go to Anagnia: where hauing sojourned some weeke, they go to Fundy, a City in the Kingdome of Naples, a fit place to enioy their liberties vnder the Queenes protection. Then began they to plant their battery against Vrbane. They set downe for the ground of their right, that the condition specified in the election of Vrbane, should be auailable to those that did choose him, to declare him incapable of the dignity whereof hee shewed him-selfe vnworthy: and (to obserue all formalities,) they cite Vrbane before them, and write vnto the other Italian Cardinals, that their meaning is to name an Italian: A meanes to drawe them to increase their number. Beeings assembled, they depose Vrbane by the plurality of voyces, and beeings to choose another, at the same instant they aduance Cardinall Rupert of the noble house of the Earles of Geneua, and call him Clement the seauenth. This bred a great alteration both at Rome and in *Vrbane*s minde: for Rome is presently abandoned, and Vrbane so aimed at as hee knowes not what to do. Behold two Popes in one chaire, which is too little for them A both, seeing the world will not suffice them: for in choosing Clement, they found no more clemencie, then vrbanity and ciuill conuersation in Vrbano. Clement yeelding nothing to the vices of his competitor: an ambitious man, willfull, audacious, sumptuous and poore, ha- nothing rich but the heart, puffed vp with the greatnesse of his house. These two doe worthy exploits, especially Vrbano, whose name the people changed, and for Vrbano they called him Turbano: that is a trouble of the world, to note his barbarous and fierce nature, louing troubles and confusion.

And that which made a way to this mischiefe, Kings and Princes (who should haue im- B ployed their authorities to quench this fire) were nothing affected therevnto: for the Em- perour Charles the fourth, died soone after the breeding of this Schisme, leauing an insuffi- cient successor. France and England were too farre engaged to determine their owne quar- rels by the sword. As for the particular of France, during the imprisonment of John, the infirmity of Charles the sixth, and the halfe shipwrack of Charles the seauenth, what helpe could the French bring to these confusions, being almost drowned in their owne? In the beginning Clement had all aduantages ouer Vrbano. The authority of the ordinary and ancient Colledge, Canonically chosen, followed by the Court of Rome, and the Castle Saint Angelo, by the which hee might enter the City. All the French, the greatest part of the Italians, many Germanes, all the Spaniards and English which were at Rome repaired vnto him, and consequently all these nations followed him. France, Spaine, England, with a C part of Germany and Italy: There remained the Hongariens, and some Germanes, who for feare of the affaires at Naples (not daring to trust them-selues in Anagnia) were forced to continue in Rome, a leuaine which shall soone cause great deuisions. Vrbano as much daunted in aduersity, as hee was puffed vp in prosperity, humbles himselfe to all men: hee weepes and deplores his misery, and craues aide of euery man, promising all fauour if they did helpe to restore him. There is neither Hongarien, Germaine, nor Italian, which belong vnto the Court, but hee sues vnto him. By their aduice and direction, hee flies to the Empe- rour Charles the fourth, and to Lewis King of Hongary, intreating them to bee mediators to the Colledge of Cardinalls, who were discontented with him. But Clement (growne ouer-proude with this first successe) gaue him means to repaire his estate. Hee hath a de- D seigne to surpris Rome by the Castell: but as Bernard Caxall, with a troupe of Neapolitans would haue seized vpon one of Rome gates, hee was valiantly repulled by the Inhabitants. The Emperour Charles the fourth, and Lewis King of Hongary, sent their Ambassadors to Clement and to the Colledge of Cardinalls, to treat an accord. Clement vseth them with- out clemencie, hee checks them, puts them in prison, and in the end sends them away with many indignities. This affront moued Charles and Lewis, so as by their meanes, both Germany, Hongary, Poland, Denmarke, Sweden, Norway, and Prussie, were all affected to Vrbans faction. Charles was a spectator of this first Scene, and dyed three moneths after, leauing vpon the stage dangerous actors against Clement. Vrbano being thus fortified grew E high-minded, and for a marke of his authority, hee erects a new Colledge of six and twenty Cardinalls, all created in one day, being Italians, Germanes, Hongariens, Polonians, and other nations that fauoured him, to haue a support of this authority in all parts. Clement workes likewise, and to haue his reuenge, (for that hee could not seize vpon a gate of Rome) hee resolved to send an army to field, to vex the Romaines, and to force them to obedience: but the successe of this desseigne was not answerable to his desire; for hauing sent the Lord of Montieux his Nephew with goodly troupes furnished by Queene Jane; the Ro- maines, led by Aheric of Barbiane, defeated this army, and tooke Montieux prisoner, whom they beheaded, as a disturber of the publicke quiet, and so they chase the French out of the Castell Saint Angelo.

Clement finding himselfe nothing safe at Fundy, meanes to retire to Naples, but the Ne- apolitans would not receiue him, notwithstanding the Queenes persuasions: and so hee passeth to Auignon, whether he brings the Pontificall Sea, for the second time, as Clement the first had done at the first. It was in the yeare 1384 that the Popes second sea was planted in Auignon, siue yeares after that Gregory had retired himselfe. Clement frustrate of all hope of his returne to Rome, faints not in these first difficulties, finding him-selſe in a place of safety,

A safety, where he might command at pleasure, being proud by nature, by reason of his great birth, and by his forces vnited in two great Kingdomes. So euery one armes, for a sharpe in- counter, according to the forces they could raise. First either of them prouides his battery of excommunication. Clement the seuenth cites Vrbano before him and his college of Cardi- nals canonically chosen, with his Cardinalls vnlawfully elected by him who had beene de- posed from the charge which had beene giuen him but to keepe; declaring all that hee had done, or should doe, to be of no force. Vrbano, on the other side, incounters Clement with the like excommunications. He declares him Antipope, a Schismaticke, and an Heretike, and all them that should follow him, guilty of high treason, both against God and man. Their goods, honours, liues, bodies and soules confiscate.

B This first point performed, they come to the effects. Clement makes search throughout al the territories of his obediēce, for those of Vrbans faction, whom he imprisons, condemnes, and kills with sword, fire, and water: many are strangled, massacred, drowned and burnt with extreame cruelty. Vrbano shall doe no better, but he proceeds by degrees. He makes his peace with the Florentines, Perusins, Milanois and Geneuois: the Venetians onely hee could not winne. The Emperour Charles the fourth being dead, hee could not preuaile much with Ven- cesslaus, an vnworthy Prince: but he made his profit of Lewis King of Hongary, a capitall e- nemy to Joane Queene of Naples, the souereigne obiekt of Vrbans choler, whom hee sought to ruine, as the sole motiue of all his crosses. But amidst the disorders of these confused pas- sions, the diuers effects of Gods prouidence are remarkable, who drawes light from darke- C nesse, and order from disorder, in such sort, as it is most commonly vnknowne to man, but alwayes iust and admirable in his iust effects.

Vrbano (presuming that the force of Hongary would fortifie his proceedings) doth excom- municate Joane Queene of Naples, declares her incapable of the crowne, and calles in Charles of Durazzo, of whom we haue made mention. But who sees not, that this belonigs properly to the history of Naples, whereof we intreat accidentally, matters being tied toge- ther by a necessary vnion. In the end Joane lost both goods and life, through the power of Charles of Durazzo, who remained absolute maister of the Realme of Naples, by the death of Lewis of Aniou; whom shee had adopted, but Lewis thinking to reuenge her death, lost D his owne life, and drew France into great miseries, whereof this vnseasonable adoption was the leuaine. Behold the end of the first Joane Queene of Naples, who shall be soone follow- ed with a second Joane, to continue our voluntary languishing in Italy.

But the end of this Proserpina was the beginning of a second trouble, through the ambi- tion of Vrbano, the which hauing no limits, transported his spleene against Charles of Duraz- zo, whom hee had drawne out of Hongary. He is not satisfied that Charles should doe him homage, but hee will haue some places in his absolute power, and that Charles should inuest his Nephew Butillo (a man of no estimation, hauing nothing rare in him but his extraordi- nary vices) in the principality of Capua, and the Duchy of Durazzo, seeking to get so firme footing in the state, as he might dispossesse Charles at his pleasure.

E Durazzo, being loath to labour for an other man, excuseth himselfe to Vrbano; who takes no excuses for payment, but citeth him before his Consistory, threatening, that if hee appears not at the day prefixed, hee will proceed against him by excommunication. Charles who feared more the losse of his new purchase, then the lightnings of Vrbano, makes him vnwares a prisoner, hauing placed many souldiers about him for his gard. Vrbano seeing himselfe bra- ued by Charles, euen within Naples, complains of this affront, and by his suffrance, hee re- tires to Nocera, from whence hee sends excommunications against Charles, who laying aside all respect, opposeth a goodly army, and comes to besiege Vrbano with Ensignes dis- played in Nocera. Hee sends a trumpet to aduertise him, that hee was come according to his assignement. In the meane time he takes information of Vrbans abuses, (being F knowne and detested of al the world) and moreover hee tried the opinions of the Cardinalls, to censure or depose Vrbano: who being aduertised hereof, was so moued, as (not able to be reuenged of Charles,) hee imprisons seuen Cardinalls (the most sufficient of his Col- ledge) without any other iust matter to charge them with, but that they were the learnedest and of greatest courage: and to make triall of his forces, hee sends his Nephew Butillo against him with a troupe, which this great Captaine suffered to bee ouerthrowne,

BY VVHAT MEANES AND DE- grees, the townes subdued by the English, retur- ned to the obedience of this Crowne, and how the English were chased out of this Realme.

From the yere 1429. to 1454. after the ebbing and flowing of many actions, and the accord of the duke of Bourgogne with Charles, long debated and in the end obtained by the meanes of the duke of Bourbon, Paris yeelds to the King. The other cities and Prouinces of this Realme, one after another, in diuers seasons, and by diuers occasions, returne to the King, as to their head: and expell the stranger, who held the State.

TO THE REDUCTION OF PARIS ARE 7. YEARS, TO THE FVL RESTORING OF THE REALME 18. AND IN ALL 25. YEARES AFTER HIS CORONATION.

His happy beginning of the Kings affaires, seemed to bring with it a generall restoring of his whole Realme, by the absolute obedience of all Townes and Prouinces. But God which gouernes nature by seasons, and giues not harvest when as they sow the seed; hee doth likewise gouerne the society of mankind by degrees, that the force of mans industry, of it selfe, may appeare vaine and nothing, and not successefull but by his grace, without whom man can doe nothing. Wee haue hitherto seene into what distresse the preferuer of this estate hath drawne both the King and Realme; but in the end his prouidence shal appeare no lesse admirable in preferuing it.

course

The Bour-
guignons disposition.

Ioane the Virgin diuades
King Charles from fighting.

The duke of Bedford wonderfully discontented with his happy successe, resolues to stop the course, both by force and policie. To this end he sends to England for succors both of men and money: he leauius all he can in France, & practiseth with the Duke of Bourgogne, who was held of both parties, to haue power to strike the last stroake in this equality of affaires: So as finding himselfe fought vnto by them all, hee intertaines them all, giuing
Charles secretly to vnderstand, that hee was for him, and yet hee presently takes armes for the English. A man wholly adicted to his affaires, hauing no other obiect but his owne greatnesse, yet shall he effect no wonders, being now so much sought vnto.

Charles partes from Rheims, to obserue his enemies way, he passeth by Soissons, Chaste-au Thierry, Prouince, Couffy in Bry, and comes to Crespy in Valois, all these townes shake off the English yoke to obey him. Bedford was at Senlis, with an army of ten thousand men, from thence he writes letters of defiance to Charles, as to the vsurper of the Realme.
He represents vnto him at large, the compassion he had of the poore French people, so long opprest with warre, and doth challenge him to appoint a day and place, to end this long misery, either by a peace or bataille. A part ill acted by a stranger, for who could beleue these protestations, in the mouth of a stranger, against the heire of the Crowne?

Charles answers him by effects, and offers himselfe to the combate: the English armie was before Senlis, beeing lodged in that renowned Temple of victorie, the ancient monument of the valour of Philip Augustus. The French army was opposit against them without hedge or bush, in a large plaine. The King called a Councell, whether hee shuld giue bataille. The Virgin held opinion they should not hazard these happy beginnings vpon a doubtfull combate, being sufficient to stay the enemy, in shewing him the army, without striking. So as these two armies stood two daies together in bataille, looking one vpon another without mouing, although many skirmishes seemed to offer occasion to draw them to a generall fight. In the end there was a confused charge of some fore-lorne hopes, Picards

A Picards and French, but the battailes stood firme. After this countenance, Bedford takes his way to Paris, to auoide the alterations which the Kings approche and prosperity might breed. Charles hauing received the obedience of Compeigne, Senlis, Creil, Beauuois, Pont Saint Maxence, Choyfi, Gournay, Remy, Neuville, Mogney, Chantely, Saintines, and other places thereabouts, with the homages of the Seigneuries of Montmorency and Mouy, he marcheth towards Paris, vpon promise made by the Bourguignon, to be receiued by the Citizens. Being at Saint Denis, hee not onely findes Bedford in Armes without the Citty, but also the Citty well garded by the Inhabitants, so as the Virgin seeking to surprize Saint Honoris ditch, had like to haue beene taken, being fore wounded, and looting a goodly troope of her best and most resolute souldiers. The inconsiderate desire which Charles had to winne the loue of the Duke of Bourgogne, did much preiudice his affaires, for all Picardy held him in great esteeme, especially the great townes of Amiens, Abbeuille, and and Saint Quintin: but the respect he bare the Bourguignon, made him to neglect these occasions to his great hurt. Hauing therefore found this passage to bee very perilous, hee retires into Berry, and the Duke of Bedford (freed from the feare of his forces) goes into Normandy, where the Constable Richemont had surprised Eureux, Aumale, Chasteaugaillard, and Andely, places of importance in that Prouince.

Ioane the Virgin wounded.

But during these alterations, the Duke of Bourgogne married with Isabell, daughter to the King of Portugall, adding this third wife, to his two former deceased. The Duchesse of Bedford was at this marriage, not in regarde of the feast, but for her husbands affaires. The Bourguignon conducts her to Paris with foure thousand armed men, where hee renews the League more strongly, (some-what shaken through the affaires of Isabelle Countesse of Hainault) with his brother in lawe. There hee made the order of the Golden Fleece, as if he had already conquered the Gardens of Hesperides, like a second Iason: but hee determined to make violent warre against Charles the year following: and returning into Picardy, he tooke Gournay and Choisy, places lately subdued to the Crowne. Melun, Sens, and Villeneuve le Roy, gaue a happy beginning to this year, yeelding to the Kings obedience, but the losse of the Virgin Ioane, and the taking of Pothon, two of the greatest and most valiant heads of the Armie, quailed all the ioy of these conquests. The Tragedie was thus D acted.

The institution of the Golden Fleece.

The Bourguignon hauing taken Choisy by force, hee buies Soissons of the Captaine that commanded: and so hee marcheth against Compeigne with his Armie, with whom the Earles of Suffolke and Arondel ioyne, with two thousand men. The Virgin issues forth with a notable troupe of the best souldiers, to charge the besiegers, who bee-ing too farre ingaged in the fight alone, was taken by the Bastard of Vendosme, and presently brought to the Duke of Bourgogne. Hee reioyced much at so notable a prize, as hauing conquered all Charles his good fortunes, and reserues her as a triumph for the Duke of Bedford, whose proceedings we will now set downe.

Ioane the Virgin taken.

Pothon was then taken vnaduisedly. The Archbishop of Rheims being Chancellor, with E the Lords of Saint Seuer and Bouffac, Marshals of France, being at Beauuais; behold a yong Shepheard comes vnto them, assuring them, that God had reuealed vnto him a meanes to take Rouen. They (taking the vanity of this foole for present payment) as if God had raied vp a new Oracle, in the declining of the other, by the surprize of the Virgin) arme inconsiderately, singing a triumph before the victory. The English (aduertised of their departure and numbers) meete and surprize them, at Nully neere vnto Beauuais, when as they looked least for them, finding them like men newly dislodged, without order or feare, and ouer-came them easily. Pothon struing to make head with a squadron of five and twenty Lances, presteth so farre in among the enemies, as hee is taken: and by F Talbot himselfe, whom he had taken at the bataille of Paray, and so well intreated, as Talbot made him a good requitall; for hauing imbraced him as a brother, he honorably gaue him his liberty, and sent him in safety to Beauuais. Thus honesty and humanity reapes what it hath sowne. A good turne is neuer lost among men of honour. An example for such as manage armes honourably, in whome there is nothing more vnworthy then crueltie, especially against the weakenesse of a prisoner. Cruelty is fitter for theecues and Cannibrought to

The Virgin Ioane was nor so well intreated by the duke of Bedford, who hauing bought her for ready money, of John of Luxembourg, as the best prisoner of the army, hee causeth her to be brought to Rouen, being resolved to put her to death. The honour of the law of armes, and the consequence which made all them guilty, which should hereafter be taken by the French, did contradiet his will; but the vnruely passion of his deadly hatred conceiued against this maiden (as hauing ruined his affaires in France) preuailed aboue reason. And hauing no colour to put her to death, as a prisoner of the warre, he resolves to make her a prisoner of Iustice: but the Magistrates would not heare of it. Vpon their refusall, he hath recourse to the Diuines. And as the Oracle of Apollo spake, according vnto the money that was giuen, sometimes for Philip of Macedon, sometimes for the Athenians; so the Diuines (being pensioners to the English in this act) made their diuinity English.

Condemned
for a Witch
and burnt.

After they had grauely consulted and resolved on the matter: they declare Ioane to bee against kinde hauing abused her sex, bearing the habit of a man, against the expresse word of God, a witch working by deuills, without the which she could not haue performed so many extraordinary deeds, nor obtained such a memorable successe, and so by consequence an Idolatresse, a scismaticke and an heretike. This was decreed in the vniuersity of Paris, with many hands to the condemnation: This conclusion (being carefully procured by the duke of Bedford) was presented by him to Peter Cauchon bishop of Beauvais, whom he requested to proceed speedily in the cause. The Bishop assembles the Deane and Chapter at Rouen, he calles the Abbot of Fescamp thether with a new supply of diuines, for the execution of this decree. There is nothing more easie then to doe euill. And although they were all possessed with English passions, yet could they not so soone resolve themselves against her; so as they were long in suspence, before they could condemne her, for the answered pertin-ently to all their accusations. In the end violence preuailed, the which (being mustified with the cloake of religion and Iustice) condemned Ioane (as guilty of the aboue-named crimes) to perpetual prison: but in the end being deliuered by the Bishop to the secular power, the Duke of Bedford caused her to be burnt at Rouen, in the yeere 1431. the sixth of Iuly. D

The siege of Compiegne.

Thus she happily serued France one whole yeere, and was prisoner somewhat more, leauing a great greefe to those that liued then, to see her so intreated: and a memory of im-mortall praise to come, hauing beene so profitable and necessarie an instrument, for the deliuey of our Country being almost ruined. But the wise prouidence of God had lymited both her labours and her life. He would onely vse her in the beginning, to shewe that Charles hath not beene the Author of the restoring of this estate, but God himselfe, who would shame men by a maide, most worthy to be honoured by our posterity. I haue reported at once what was acted in two yeeres, being all of one subiect: not to breake off the order of my discours in matters which follow after. And now I will returne to Compiegne besieged by the Bourguignon. As all the French were much amazed for the losse of Ioane, so the English and Bourguignons were greatly incouraged to presse the siege of Compiegne with greater heat. This important city (seated vpon the riuer of Oize, at the entry of Picardy) had greatly furthered the Bourguignon, who for this reason was resolute to haue it either by loue or force. He doth againe negotiate with Charles, assuring him of his loue. Charles, bewitched with the charmes of this Bourguignon) giues care to his new deu-ises, and (forgetting that he had beene abused,) he promiseth to deliuer Compiegne into his hands. The Bourguignon accepts it: and the better to play his part, he drawes his Portuguaise to Noyon, being one of the cunningest women in the world, and most affected to her husband, as a gage of the loue he had promised to Charles, the which shee should manage. The Lord of Flauy Gouvernor of Compiegne, had receiued feuerall commandments from the King to deliuer it, but hee excuseth himselfe, desiring to haue a more ample warrant from the King. He shewes him the importance of the place, and the wilfulnesse of the inhabitants, and so denying his maister honestly that which might be preiudiciall vnto him, he dischargeth the dutie of a good seruant. Trulie it is a good seruice to deny the maister, when

A when as he commandes that is hurtfull vnto him-selfe. This policy succeeding not for the Duke of Bourgongne, to surprise Compiegne, hee resolves to haue it by force: Bedford sends the Earle of Huntington with a thousand English Archers to fortifie this seege. John of Luxembourg (who was there for the Bourguignon) builds great forts to keepe them from succors, and for a retreat he doth fortifie the Abbis of Venete and Royaulieu. The Inhabitants were in great extremity, yet were they resolute to endure all, vnder their wise and faithfull gouernor, rather then to fall into the hands of strangers, whose gripes they had formerly felt. If they were fiercely besieged by the English and Bourguignons, so were they as well succored by the French, vnder the happy command of the Earle of Vendosme gouernor of Beauuais, and the Marshall of Bouffac, who (hauing valiantly forced the first bastions) enter the towne and hauing victualled it, they issue forth, with great resolution, so as they take all the other torts, to their enemies great losse. So Huntington and Luxembourg retire with disgrace, leauing not onely that country free, but their victuals, artillery, munition and habiliments of warre in their lodgings of Venete and Royaulieu, sauing themselves with some difficulty, at Pont'Euesque, through the fauour of Noyon.
The Bourguignon was so amazed, as hee retired into Arthois, hauing as bad successe by force as by policy.

1430.
The governor retireth
to deliuer it.

Relieved by the French.

Our French forces being maisters of the field, they recouer all the Bourguignons conquests. Choyfy, Gournay, Bertueil, Garmigny, Reffons, Pont Remy, Pont Saint Maxence, C Longueil, Saint Mary, la Boissiere, Ireligny, Vernueil, and other places, where he had gathered together all the corne and cattell of the Country, the which was restored to the poore people, to their great content. The Bourguignons pride thus taken downe (after so many victorious hopes) was a principall part of this victory. But he resolves to haue his reuenge of this affront. Beeing come to Arras, he gathers together all the forces he can: and from thence hee goes to Peronne, to attend the body of his army. His intent was to recouer what hee had lost in this last warre of Compiegne, meaning to begin at Garmigny, which did greatly anoye all that country. He sends a troupe of 600. men before, vnder the conduct of Thomas Tirrell an Englishman. Girard of Brimeu gouernor of Roie augments this troupe with a hundred of his men. In this order they goe to the seege of Garmigny as to a marriage: but Pothon (who had his spies in all places, and had put him selfe into Gar-migny, at the brute of this seege) slept not. Hauing therefore sent to discover the enemies countenance, he learns that these Picards (being neere to Bouchoire) did hunt after hares, (whereof there are great store in those parts,) and that this troupe was wholly in disorder, running vp and downe with great cries. Pothon imbraceth this occasion suddenly, and hauing drawne his men to field, he surpriseth these hunters, being disperfed and out of breath, he defeats them, kills them, and in the end cries, that they should take the runne awaies. The Commander is taken, with most of their best men. Anthony of Vienne and the Lord of Hailly (being greatly lamented by the Bourguignon) were first led to Garmigny, and then to Compiegne in great triumph.

The Bour-
guignons defeated.

E The newes hereof did greatly trouble the Bourguignon, especially when as the Earle of Vendosme went with the French army to braue him at the gates of Roie, offering him battaile. He made shew to accept thereof, but hauing called a Councell, he framed a reasonable excuse, that his soldiars were not willing he should fight in the ende of the yeare. With these affronts the yeare ends: and with the death of a sonne which hee had by his new spouse, whome he loued deerely, his spirits were so oppressed with sorrow for this losse, as this Prince (being too passionate) had speeches vnworthy the grauity of his person, and the greatnesse of his blood, weeping and wishing for death. Doubles it often falls out that hee euen which is too much puffed vp in prosperity, is easilly daunted in aduersity. A goodly lesson for great men (who cannot learne but by great examples) that F their greatnesse doth not free them from the common condition of mankind: that they are men and must die like men. O man! whatsoever thou beest, behold good remedies against these extremities of fortune: neither to bee dronke with prosperity, nor drowned in aduersity. These fiue succeeding yeares hauing nothing memorable, but an entry to the obedience of the City of Paris, which shall giue example to all the rest of the realme. The weaknesse of parties was necessary for the making of an accord. The Duke of Bourgongne might might doe much, but his infinite designs had transported him beyond the clouds, without A some check. These small disgraces did greatly blemish his credit with the duke of Bedford, who expected more from him then he found by the effects: but that which made a breach in their loues was the sodaine death of Anne Duchesse of Bedford, sister to Philip Duke of Bourgongne, the gage of their cold friendship, which till then was very necessary, but after her decease it was but superficial, although in this occurrent their league was not apparently broken. The one weepes for his wife, and the other for his sister. The beginning of this yeere was noted by the taking of Montargis from the French, through the notable treason of a woman, who gaue entrance to the English, and who presently reaped the fruits of her treachery. But let vs attend the yeere following, where wee shall see a merueilous change B in this miserable towne. At the same time, in recompence of Montargis, Chartres returnes to the Kings obedience. The meanes is worthy obseruation, being put in practise in our times in many places. A carter liuing at Chartres had a brother resident in court with a treasurer. The familiarity this carter had to goe and come into the towne, made him both desire, and to lay the plot of so memorable an enterprife. Neere vnto the gate there was an old ruined house, in the which there was a great vault halfe filled vp with rubbish:

here they lodge a hundred men: on the other side they conuay a thousand men, secretly in the night, into a house nere vnto the towne. The carter comes at the breake of day with his cart vnto the port, where hee ouerthrowes it of purpose, faining that a wheele was split.
While the gard labours to helpe him, the ambush issues forth out of these ruines, and sur- C priseth the port, and the rest second them with such speed, as the citie is wonne. This had bin done without any effusion of blood, if the bishop had not animated the inhabitants to fight against their King, where hee himselfe was slaine with some of the citizens. About this time, René Duke of Barre, brother to Lewis duke of Aniou, and King of Sicilia, (who shall make himselfe famous in the following raigne) receiued a great check. Hee had a notable quarrell against the Earle of Vaudemont, pretending the Earledome: from words they goe to blowes, René fortifies himselfe with the forces of France: Vaudemont with those of Bourgongne. René beeing farre stronger in shew, besiegeth the towne of Vaude-mont, and when as the Earle, with the helpe of his friends, would haue raised the siege, René drawes him to fight, defying him, and promising to himselfe an assured victory. But God D (the souereigne ludge of these factions) gaue it to the Earle, and René remained prisoner in the hands of the duke of Bourgongne, to whom hee paid a great ransome. In the end, by the dukes meanes yeelding him his libertie, this quarrell was ended, marrying the eldest son of René with the daughter of the Earle of Vaudemont. But let vs reserue the rest to the following reigne.

About the end of this yeere, a solemnitie was done in Paris, which carried more shew then substance. We haue said before, how that Henry the sixth King of England, had beene crowned King of France, when as our Charles was crowned at Poitiers, after the decease of his father. Henry was but two yeeres old, and came not out of England, vntill that Charles E had beene solemnly crowned at Rheims, to the great ioy of all the French; but when as the duke of Bedford found, how much this authentike publication aduanced the affaires of Charles, he caused Henry to be brought into France, and to be crowned at Paris, with an extraordinary Maiesty, to out-countenance Charles his coronation, by a greater shew of pompe. But the blood of France cannot dissemble: no man was moued thereat, no more then to see a Tragedie acted vpon the Stage. This yeere is very barren of all memorable exploits, but that this silence noted an entrance to an accord (both parties being weary of pleading) yet with great slacknesse, as we see in diseases which come sodenly, & passe away slowly: wee must therefore crosse this rough way before wee come to Paris. Montargis taken by the English, as wee haue said, was now recovered by the French, but after a diuers F manner; for the English lost the towne by the castle, and the French the castle by the town, yet were they three moneths in winning of the castle. Hauing taken all, they lost all by the same meanes that made them so much to gape after the castle, which was the want of money. This shamefull losse greeued many of the greatest in court, and bred a new trouble by this occasion.

Tremouille was yet in great credit with the King, hauing by this meanes a great hand

A hand in the State: they accused him to haue heaped vp great treasure, to the preiudice of such as daily employed their liues for the Kings seruice. The greater men resolute to take Tre- monille prisoner, and to punish him like vnto Giac, and others before mentioned. The King was at his Castell at Chinon: Tremouille follows him as his shadow, but it chanced, as hee was in his chamber, the Lords of Brueil, Coytiuy and Fetard, followed with fortie armed men, enter and take him, not one of a hundred of that sort could escape; but sixe thousand Crownes saued his life, hoping to returne againe into credit. The Constable of Richmond pust vp with the successe of Montargis, takes Milly in Gastenois: but hauing besieged Lag- ny in Brye, he was repulsed: at the same time, John of Luxemburg (of the Bourguignon fa-B shion) is dispossessed of Ligny in Barrois, by the Ladie of Comercy. A disgrace which shall draw the Bourguignon to a composition so much desired; together with the happy successe of the French, in the countrie of Arthois, the taking of S. Valerie in Ponthieu, and the generall waunting of the chiefe townes in Picardie, tired with these confusions, beeing so great, as no man was assured of his person, of what partie soeuer, if hee were the weaker;
The Cardes were so shuffled, as an English man would become French, to take a Bourguignion, and a French man become English, or a Bourguignon, to take a Frenchman. These vniuersall trecheries were vsuall, especially at Amiens, Abbeuille, and throughout all Picardy, where the warres had beene most licentious. Which outrage hath beene reuiued in our miserable age, through the crueltie of these wretched warres, which causeth men to make shipwracke both of faith and honour.

This yeare had a plausible beginning, but without any great effect. The Councell of Pisa beeing assembled (as we haue said) to redresse the confusion of Antipopes, and to reduce the Church (diuided by this Schisme) vnto vnion, sends the Cardinall of Auxerre vnto the Kings of France and England, to exhort them vnto peace. Charles protested that he desired nothing more; the English said the like. They assemble to this end at Auxerre in great troupes, but at their first meeting, all this treatie was broken off, for both the one and the other, stood vpon the qualitie of King of France, beeing the fundamentall point of all their quarrell. The Duke of Bedford spake more proudly then Charles himselfe, as if the lawe of D State (which maintained this Monarchie) had beene made in England, an Iland become firme land, and France changed to the Isle of Albion or of Brittanie: of such force is errour euen in matters of State, when as passion ouer-rules the light of reason. So as they all depart without any effect: They onely conclude a truce, for the great want of the poore people, who could suffer no more. But this truce was a pit-fall for many, trusting the countenance of this courteous warre, which making profession to meane nothing so, is more to be feared when it smiles, then when it frownes.

We haue said, that John Duke of Bourbon was taken prisoner in the battaile of Azincourt, whome they could neuer redeeme at any rate. This yeare he died in England, and his sonne Charles succedes him. He had to wife the sister of the Duke of Bourgongne, but they fall to words for their rights, and so to warre. Charles takes from Philip, Grancy, Aualon, E Perepertuis, Mucy-l'Euésque, Chaumont, and other places. The Bourguignon had his reuenge, and beseegeth Belleuille in Beauiculois, belonging vnto Charles. Mary Duchesse of Berry, labours to reconcile these Princes, and drawes them to a peace, the which shall soone be a meanes of a generall accord betwixt the Bourguignon and France, by the mediation of the Duke of Bourbon, a profitable instrument of so good a worke. This occasion not pre-uented, was seconded by another, for the Duke of Bedford, after the death of his wife (beeing sister to the Duke of Bourgongne) marries with Iaquelin the daughter of Peter of Luxembourg Earle of Saint Pol, who was no friend to the Bourguignon: and moreouer the youth and beautie of this new spouse, had so bewitched Bedford, as he was easily drawn from F Philip, whose loue he entertained with great difficultie, yet in respect of the generall cause they made a good shew, and had met at S. Omer to that effect, but this interview encreased their discontents.

In the meane time, the truce (beeing ill obserued on either side) is conuerted into a languishing warre. Bedford makes warre in the Countrie of Maine by Scales and Willowbie, two renowned Captaines, which beseege S. Celerin. Charles succours it by the Lord of Buell,
who

who hauing lodged some troupes at Viuaun, (a village of small accompt) made it famous A by a notable peece of seruice. Scales aduertised of these troupes lodged in this hamlet, hasts thither, surprizeth them, and cuts them in peeces: but the Lord of Bucil had his reuenge: for falling vpon the Conquerours, who returned in disorder, he puts them in route. Char- tier notes it for a notable seruice, that fortie lances ouerthrew a thousand five hundred men, which were slaine, or taken prisoners: of such force is disorder and amazement in warre. The seige of Saint Celerin beeing thus raised, to the great disgrace of the English, Bedford is much grieved for this affront, sends the Earle of Arondell thither with new forces. It was at the same time when as Charles went into Daulphine: the fame of this notable victorie, holding mens minds in suspence, so as Arondell takes S. Celerin by force, and from thence he marcheth to Silley le Guil-laume. The Gouverneur fearing to want succours, treats with B Arondell, That if by a prefixed day, the French were not the stronger, at a certaine Elme neere vnto the place, he would then yeeld vp the Towne, and for assurance thereof giues him hostages. The Court was troubled at this summons: all post thither, fearing to continue their shame with losse, Princes and officers of the Crowne, the Duke of Alenfon and Aniou, the Constable of Richmond, the Marshall of Bouffac, Rieux, and Retz: the Lords of Loheac, Grauille, and Bucil, with his good fortune. Beeing all come to the Elme at the day appointed, they summon the Earle of Arondell to deliuer vp his hostages and to fight with them, but he yeelds vp his hostages and leaues the seige. The hast of the omitted voyage makes our men to post presently to Court. Arondell returns to the seige of Silley, and not able to take it, he surprizeth Beaumont le Vicont, but pressed with sicknesse hee retires to C Mans, a towne then vnder their obedience.

King Charles
makes a pro-gresse into Daulphine
and Languedoc.

The voyage of Daulphine was performed. Charles comes to Vienne passing through Auergne. The reason of this progresse was to settle matters in Daulphine, Lionois, and Languedoc, which countries had serued him faithfully and profitably in his greatest afflictions. All the chiefe of those countries attend him, and hold their Estates by his commandement. The ioy both of Charles and his subiects was exceeding great after so long and dangerous a storme. Charles did gladly imbrace his auncient seruants, the Earle of Foix, Gaucourt, and Grollee, with the Nobilitie of Viarez and Daulphine, who had giuen him so great testimonies of their faith and valour. All men were confirmed in their gouernments, no man D was denied of what he demanded, which giues them courage to do their best endeauours in his seruice. The States graunt the King a notable summe of money for the maintenance of his warres.

We haue obserued the humour of Amedee Duke of Sauoy, who during the doubtfulness of the French affaires, had carried a watchfull eye, to make his profit by their confusion. Being well informed, that Charles loued him not, he fortifies himselfe by alliances. He had giuen his eldest daughter to Lewis of Aniou King of Sicily, and now hee marries his Sonne Lewis Earle of Genoua with Anne the daughter of John of Lusignan King of Cypres, from whence the title of the Realme of Cypres comes to the house of Sauoy. This marriage was honored with the presence of the Duke of Bourgongne, the Earle of Neuers, and the Prince of Orange. These were good cautions for Amedee against Charles: but we shall soone see that he will find another expedient against all euent. As a tree in the sappe sheweth that the spring is neere, so diuers popular accidents chancing this yeare foretold what should happen. There were 60000. men in armes against the English in Vexin-Norman, and in Caux 20000. Charles doth carefully imbrace those occasions, and encouraging them both by letters and messages, he sends them notable Commanders, the Duke of Alenfon with the Lords of Lore and Bucil, braue and valiant captaines. But as a tree that sprouts forth through the fauour of a warme season, is stayed by a sharpe wind, so all these popular braueries were soone daunted, and this streame was soone turned. The townes that were mutyned yeeld to the English force, but they keepe their hearts for their King, vntill they may shake off the English yoke.

takes armes against the English.

But the wise prouidence of God, who gouernes the worke for the restoring of this estate, raised vp meanes which all the humane pollicie of Charles or of his Councell could not forice, who had laboured by all meanes to winne the Bourguignons loue. Hee harboured in his heart a resolute discontent against the English: to whom he imputed the cause of all his 1435.

A his crosses and disgraces. The Liegeois crosse him many waies, in the possession of Namur newly fallen vnto him. Antwerp and Arras are discontented, and readie to rise against him. The English (in his opinion) is the author and fauourer of these discontents, and it may be did all he could to molest him, what shew fouer he made. But how fouer it were, the Bourguignon (meaning to make an open breach with him) compounds all quarrels with this discontented people, intending to make a firme peace with Charles. So the yeare 1434. passeth without any great alteration.

This yeare 1435. shall be more happie for the French then the former. Charles beseegeth Geberoy by Poisson and La Hire. The English come to succour it, led by the Earle of Arondell, beeing a thousand against lesse then five hundred. Our men therefore resolute to retire to Beauuais, but they must accompt with the stronger. There is but one meanes of safetie, to hope for no helpe. So these braue warriors resolute to fight, and are victors: for the English troupes are defeated: sequen or eight hundred slaine vpon the place, and all the rest prisoners. The Earle of Arondell (beeing grievously wounded) dies at Beauuais, a braue and resolute Captaine, dying in the bed of honour. This was the beginning of the yeare: the nois (a bastard of Orleans) was the ring-leader in many exploits: he causeth Saint Denis to be surprized by Captaine Dreynelle, and he followes well accompanied to keepe it. In going along he takes Houdan, and then he fortifies Saint Denis with men and victuals, and leaves the Marshall of Rieux to gouerne it. And for that he would loose no time, hee im- C Meulan. The English had fortified Saint Ouyn, to keepe the countie in alarme: Occasions are offered of daily skirmishes, and daily the English are beaten. But the long stay of this lined, prepare a great power to force S. Denis at what price fouer. The Marshall of Rieux, loth to ingage himselfe (beeing in all shew the weaker) retires honourably to Meulan, without any losse. The English beate downe the defences of Saint Denis, beeing a common retreat to all men, without any more labour, either to keepe it, or to recouer it.

The English
defeated and the Earle of Arondell slain.

The accord of PHILIP Duke of Bourgongne with Charles the seventh, the French King.

IN the end behold an agreement made with Charles, so much expected, so vnprofitably sought after, and now freely offered by the duke of Bourgongne. The Deputies of the Councell presse both French, English and Bourguignon, to end all quarrels, by some good composition. The citie of Arras is allowed of by them all to treat in. The assembly was great: from the Pope and the Councell of Pisa there came the Cardinals of Saint Croix and Cypres, with twelue bishops: for the French King there was the Duke of Bourbon, the Earle of Richmond Constable of France, the Earle of Vendosme, the Archbishoppe of Rheimes Chancellor of France, the Lords of Harcourt, Valpergue, la Fayette, Saint Pierre, du Chastell, du Bois, Chastillon, du Fay, de Railliq, Rommet, Cuselles, and Cambray first President of the Parlement at Paris, with many wise and learned men, as, John Tudart, Bles- sei, John Charesier, Peter Clestel, Adam le Queux, John Taise, and la Motte. For the King of England, the Cardinals of Yorke, and Winchester, the Earle of Suffolke, the Bishop of S. Dauids, John Ratcliffe keeper of the great Seale, the Lord of Hungerford, Ralph the Wife, the Official of Canterburie, and some Doctors of Diuinitie. For Philip Duke of Bourgongne, there came the Duke of Gueldres, the Earle of Nassau, the Bishop of Cambray, the Earle of Vernambourg, the Bishop of Leege, the Earles of Vaudemont, Neuers, Salines, Saint Pol, and Ligny, besides the Deputies of many of his best townes. The pompe was great, both on the Deputies behalfe, and of the Duke of Bourgongnes, who intainted them with all the honour and good cheare that might be wished. But leauing these circumstances

of France.

stances, I make hast to the principall subiect. The Kings of France and England began the treatie. The fundamentall question was, to whom the Crowne of France belonged? The English did challenge it, both for that he was issued from a daughter of France, as also by the graunt of Charles the sixt who did institute Henry the fift and his successors, heires of the Crowne, and had dis-inherited Charles the 7. whom he tearmed an Vsurper. The deputies for Charles answered, that they ought not to call in question the ground of the Estare, which cannot stand firme without that lawfull heire to whom the law appoints, and therefore without prouoing of that which was apparent of it selfe, they came to offers for the ending of all controuersies. That if the King of England would both disclaime the title of King of France, and yeeld vp the countries held by him in diuers parts of the Realme, he should enioy the Duchies of Guienne and Normandie, doing homage for them vnto the Kings of France, as his Soueraigne, and with those conditions which his Ancestors, Kings of England, had formerly enioyed them. They stood vpon very different tearmes: their authority was limited, and possession pult vp the English. But sometimes he refuseth that after lues. He that striueth to haue all, most commonly loofeth all. One moitie in effect had more. He that vailed the English, then all in imagination, who in the end shall find, that the Soueraigne iudge, the preseruer of the lawe, and of States, giues and takes away, appoints and disappoints, according to his good and wife will: and that there is no force, nor wisdom but his. The matter was soone ended betwixt the Kings of France and England: seeing right could do no good, the sword must preuaile.

Thus the Ambassadors of England, returne without any effect: those of France stay to treat with the Duke of Bourgongne and his Deputies, amongst the which he himselfe was the chiefe, as well for his owne interest, as for his iudgement in affaires. A man exceeding cunning, who could embrace all occasions to make his profit by another, as the discourse of his life hath made manifest. But to what end serues all this mortar, and so great workmanship, to frame a building which shall be ruined vnder his sonne, and shall burie him in the ruines thereof? It is a foolish reason which thou callest reason, hauing no ground of reason, and doest not hearken to the voice of heauen. O Foole! all thy riches shall bee taken from thee this night. Man walkes in a shadow, he toyles in vaine, to make his name immortal in the grane, he hunts with infinite labour and takes nothing. As for Charles, he sought to retire the Bourguignon from all league and alliance with the King of England, and taking from him all occasions of discontent, so to engage him by great gifts and honours, as hee should resolute to follow his faction, as the most profitable, knowing that his owne priuate interest, was the chiefe end of his desseins. Matters were carried in shew according to the humour of that age, the disposition of the Court, and for the honour of Charles, who must aske the Duke of Bourgongne pardon, hauing caused his father to be slaine against his faith. But was it not true? must not the crime be confessed by him that was culpable? Charles therefore resolues to send him a blanke, and the accord doth testifie that the Bourguignon filled it with so many vnreasonable conditions, as it is strange so great a Monarch should stoupe so much to his subiect and vassall, but necessity hath no law.

A president for great men, not to attempt any thing against reason, least they be constrained to repaire it with reason, and yet to know that it is an amendment of a fault to yeeld to necessitie for the good of the State, beeing a great thrift to loose for gaine. The original sets downe at large all the conditions of this Treatie: who so please may read them in Monstrelet, and in the historie of S. Denis. The summe is, that the massacre committed on the person of John Duke of Bourgongne at Montreau-saut-yonne, is sufficiently repaired by confession and ceremonies. Great summes of present money with goodly Seigneuries are giuen to the Duke of Bourgongne: so many assurances for him and his, as a great volume is full of these scrupulous conditions.

The Duke of Bourgongnes promise is more simple, that he should declare himselfe a friend to Charles the seuenth King of France, and enemie to his enemies: that he should renounce all alliance and friendship with the King of England, and promise both his person, and all his meanes to expell him out of France. The performance was according to promise: Charles Duke of Bourbon, and Arthur of Brittain, Earle of Richmond, Conitable of France in the name of Charles the seuenth, aske pardon of the Duke of Bourgongne, for the death

A death of his father, and the Duke pardoned him for the love of God. The Cardinals (in the Popes name and the Councels) absolued the Duke from the oath which he had made vnto the English: and either part sweares to maintaine the accord in that which did concerne him. So the peace was published with great solemnity, to the incredible content of all men. The King, the Duke of Bourgongne, and the whole Realme reioyced exceedingly, onely John of Luxemburg Earle of Saint Pol, would not be therein comprehended, he shall suffer for it, and his houle after him. This was the 24. of September, in the yeare 1435. a famous day for those things which happened in this raigne, whereof this accord gaue the first occasion. The marriage of Charles sonne to the Duke of Bourgongne, with Katherine of France, daughter to our Charles, was concluded to seale this accord. From this peace sprung a more violent

B warre against the English. The Duke of Bourgongne sends backe all his contracts to the Duke of Bedford, and hauing shewed him the iust reasons which had moued him to embrace the Kings amitie, beeing his kinsman and Lord, hee renounceth the alliance of England, with a watchword, that euery one should looke to himselfe. Euery man sharpens his sword, and scoures his armes, to recouer that by force, which they could not obtaine by reason. The first fruites of this accord beganne to grow ripe euen in the heart of winter, for Corbeil yeelds presently to the King, with Brie-Comte-Robert and the Castle of Bois de Vincennes. The Bourguignon imploies all his friends and intelligences at Paris, he vseth all his instruments, meaning to set them to worke the yeare following. All Normandie begins to reuolt, Deepe, Felcan, Montier-Villiers, Harfieu, Tancarville, Bec-Crespin, Gomusleule, Loges, Villemon, Grauille, Longueville, Neuf-ville, Lambreuille, Charles-Mesnil, S. Germaine, Fontaines, Preaux, and Blainville, obey the King willingly, chasing away the English, and receiuing the French for their safetie, all which was acted in two daies. What more? to finish this worke, God takes away one of the chiefe causes, and one of the principal instruments of the miserie which had so long afflicted this estate. We haue seene what part Isabel of Bauaria played in this Tragedie, we haue sought her after the death of her poore husband, and could not find her, for in truth she was ciuilly dead. Bedford fearing the spirit of this Medea, seekes not onely to stay her hands, but to keepe her eyes from the managing of affaires. And for that she had deuoured the treasure of the Realme, he constraines her to keepe a diet. He doth therefore sequester her to the house of S. Pol, where she liued vntill the end of this yeare in great pouertie, no more assisted by the Bourguignon then by the English. Beeing dead, they caused her bodie to be put into a small boate, and so transported by the riuier of Seine to S. Denis, where she was buried without any pompe, like to a common person. A light put out, whose saueur doth yet offend posteritie.

Queene Is-
bel dies.

In this yeare also died John of England, that great Duke of Bedford, called Regent of France, who hath noted many blacke pages in this volume, and so much terrified our Ancestors. Hauing seene the former accord, and felt so sodaine effects in Normandie, fearing the rest would follow, he drowned himselfe in sorrow, and knowing no meanes to auoid this storme, he dies at Rouen the 15. of December, leauing to King Henry the sixt, a bottome very hard to vntwist, and to his young wife (beeing sister to the Earle of S. Pol) a cause of mourning, the which continued not long, for she married soone after against the will of her parents, with an English Aduenturer of small accompt, giuing cause to laugh at her, being but little pittied. Charles being thus discharged of a heauie burthen by this accord, hath more libertie to follow his honest delights. He goes to Lions, visits Dauphine, and stayes in Languedoc, a Prouince which he loues aboue all the rest, hauing found it most deuoted to his seruice. Montpellier was his aboad, a place very pleasantly seated: but taking this time of recreation, he had left good Lieutenants in France, who shall soone send him newes of their exploits.

1436.

The cittie of Paris yeelds to the King,
and expelles the English.

The English
vanquished at
S. Denis.

HE Bourguignon prepares to annoy the English, whilest that the Constable makes way for the reduction of Paris. His intent was (parting from Pontoise) to put himselfe into Saint Denis, a towne halfe dismantled: but Thomas of Beaumont Captaine of the Bastille (having intelligence of this dessein) prevented the Constable, and entered into Saint Denis with a notable troupe of souldiers. Richmond notwithstanding approacheth neere to S. Denis: the Centinell having giuen warning of his approach, Beaumont issues forth to the bridge, vpon the little riuer which is towards Pierre-fite, where he met with the fore-runners, who hauing drawne him forth, ingage him in the battaile, the which was led by the Constable, marching from the valley of Montmorency. This English troupe was easily vanquished, most of them were cut in peeces, and the rest taken, hardly any one of them escapes to carie newes to Paris. Thomas of Beaumont is slaine among the rest vpon the place. The Constable makes vse of this good successe: he presently marcheth with his victorious armie to Paris, which stood amazed at these approaching forces, wanting a Regent, who was lately deceased, and such as were left to command, were more fit to handle an oare, then to gouern the helme. Now was the time for good Frenchmen to shewe themselves, whereof there were many in the city. The Bourguignon faction being now become the Kings seruants, imbrace this occasion, and hauing consulted together, they resolute to shake off the English yoke, the which they had too long endured.

The Duke of Bourgongne was then at Bruges, but he had left the Lord of Lisle-Adam to deale with his partisans at Paris. It is the same whom he had formerly employed against Charles and his father John, in the murther of the Kings seruants. He had great credit with the Parisiens, of whom Mirhaell Lailler was the chiefe Tribune. Hee discouers by him the peoples affections, beeing resolute to submit themselves to the King: of whom they craue onely a generall abolition of what was past. This gentle demaund beeing brought to Pontoise to the Constable, and easily granted, all prepare for the effects. That quarter neere the Halles gaue the first signe of the French libertie at Paris, by the meanes of the Curate of S. Eustace: and all S. Honores streete ioynes in this hardie resolution. In the meane time the Vniuersitie beyond the bridge doth the like. Lewis of Luxemburg, Bishop of Therouenne Chancellor for the English, the Bishops of Liseux and Meaux, the Lord Willowbie, with others deuoted to the English, aduertised of these mutinies in diuers parts of the cittie, fearing some sedition, retire toward S. Anthonies gate, hauing carried all their best furniture into the Bastille, and fortifie the houses adioyning. All beeing thus prepared at Paris, the Constable of Richmond, guided by Lisle-Adam, parts from Pontoise, and comes to S. Denis in the night, where hauing rested some houres, he marcheth early in the morning, accompanied with the Earle of Dunois, (a bastard of the house of Orleans) the Lords of Suze and Bueil, with a great companie of resolute souldiers, approaching neere the cittie. Lisle-Adam with a choice troupe goes before S. Iaques gate, the appointed place for the Rendezvous, where he finds all in a readines, so as Lailler hauing planted ladders for him at the lowest part of the wall, he mounts with his troupe. Beeing entred the Cittie, the people of that quarter (who were assembled for his comming) begin to crie. A peace, a peace, God save the King, and the Duke of Bourgongne. Lisle-Adam beeing ioyned to the chiefe of the cittie, goes directly to the gate, the which was set open by the captaine of that quarter, and the Constable, who was before it with his troupes, entred in good order. Then the people redoubled their cries. They all stand at a gaze, beeing aduertised of this entrie, and exceeding glad to see themselves readie to recover their ancient libertie: they prepare to march where they

A they should be commanded to expell the English. All run to the Bastille. The Tournelles are presently seized on, and all approaches vnto the Bastille are soone wonne. Such as were within at the first, made some shew of defence, but as all things were prepared to force them, they demand a parle, and agree to depart with their liues and baggage. They are conducted about the towne beneath the Loure, to imbarke vpon the riuier of Seine, and so to passe to Rouen. They could not well haue passed through the cittie. The people aduertised hereof run to the wallles, and cry out with great shoutes, bayting the English like dogges, whom a little before they had feared and honoured as their masters. This happened the 27. of Februarie, in the yeare 1436. Thus Paris returnes to the obedience of this Crowne, hauing passed seuentene yeares vnder the gouernement of the English: which made the fatherly command of their King more pleasing vnto them, and them more willing to obey him, hauing tasted the impetuous command of a stranger.

Charles aduertised of this happy successe, parts from Montpellier, and returnes slowly by Auvergne, to giue the Parisiens time to prepare for his entrie, the which was performed with great pompe, fixe moneths after the reduction of the cittie, but with so extraordinarie an affection of the people, as drinking after a great thirst. All the townes within the Realme had followed this example, if Charles had imbraced this goodly occasion, all being drawne vnto their duty by a naturall instinct. He was of a mild spirit, pleyable to all winds, flying toyle, but patient when he had vnderaken it. We haue hitherto seene him constant inough in his afflictions, although the weight of blowes so often doubled, had made him sencelesse, so as he bare his crosses with lesse feeling, as a mortified member doth the razour or a corsuie: but prosperitie had so reuiued his spirit, as he recovered himselfe and returned to his owne disposition. He wanted authoritie to command well, and iudgement to make choice of his seruants, for he often imbraced and rewarded vnecessary men, and put backe such as were profitable.

The Kings
entrie into Paris.

This proceeding discontented such as (seruing him faithfully) did see themselves condemned. These discontents gaue them libertie to speake, and doe things, which offended the King. Experience teaching, that these tractable humours are as soone moued as pleased; and aboue all, are suspitious and cholericke: for impressions creeping into these weak spirits, makes them to fall into another extremitie of vnmeasured passion. Wee haue seene the like in the life of Lewis the Gentle, but wee shall not find the like excessse in our Charles: yet shall wee see that by the like indiscreete facilitie he disordered his owne affaires, discontented his bloud, grieved many of his seruants, filled his life with languishing in the prosperitie of his affaires, to cast him headlong (in the midst of his greatest triumphs) into the gulph of a fearefull graue: what we are to represent in this discourse, shall be the Commentarie of this truth.

As soone as the Spring appeares, the Duke of Bourgongnes armie goes to field to besiege Calais, it consisted for the most part of the communalities of his estates. He easily ingaged them in this warre, both by his authoritie and the shew of profit, to haue a towne so conuenient for trafficke. This armie had scarce continued in field ten daies, but they looked homeward to their houses, shops, and fields: besides, the English wrought them vnderhand, and sent a great supply to defend Calais. This humour did so possesse this armed multitude, as the Bourguignon had no power to hold them. All passe away like to a violent streame, and this his dessein came to nothing, although he chafed in vaine, like vnto the Persian that threatened the tempest, and whipt the sea. So all enterprises succede not. The Duke of Bourgongne beeing thus retired, the English hath his reuenge of this affront, and spoiles the marches of Boulougne, and Grauelins, to the great losse of the cuntry. The Lord of Croy sought to make head against the English, being followed by a goodly troupe: but hee was defeated and saues himselfe with difficultie in Ardres. The Flemings stirre at this losse, and march vnder the Duke of Bourgongnes command, but they returne with shame: for Calais was reserved for another season. We haue said that Charles had a sonne named Lewis borne in the midst of his greatest crosses, the first yeare of his raigne, in the yeare 1423. Beeing thirteene yeares olde, hee married him to Marguerite Stuard the only daughter of James King of Scotland, a Princesse of excellent vertues, and a gage of the faithfull seruice which Scotland did to this Crowne in her greatest dangers, who suruiued

The best souldiers were guiltie of these insolencies for want of pay. Rodrigo de Villandras an Arragonois, (who had faithfully serued the King) was in disgrace, and banished with his troupe; but being ioyned with Pothon in Gasconie, and hauing taken some places from the English, hee made his peace with Charles. This confusion was not alone in one cuntry, but generally dispersed throughout the Realme. A troupe of 2000. horse led by Anthony of Chabannes, Blanchfort, Gualter of Bron, Floquet and other renowned Captaines, parting from Normandie, passe through the countries of Vimeu, and Ponthieu, by Dorlens, Oruille, Bray, Cappy, Lihons in Sauters, and enter into Cambresy, from thence they lodge at Solames towards Hainault with infinit spoile, eating and ransoming all after a hostile manner. John of Croy the Bailiffe of Hainault sent troupes against them, but they were defeated: they were called the shauers or flears.

The Dauphin increates the English courtuously.

Factions in Flanders. The Duke of Bourgonne in danger of his life at Bruges.

In the end through Charles his many commands, they come into Champagne, where hauing remained sometime, they were employed to take Chasteau-Landon, Charry, and Nemours, and from thence they were led to Montreuil-faut-Yonne, where there was a marueilous seege, beeing well assailed and well defended: but in the end the towne was taken by force, and the Castle by composition. Charles was at Bray, and the Dauphin commaunded at this seege. He made faire warres with the English, who thanking him before the King his father, yelded him these first fruites of his authoritie in the view of the whole armie; who honoured him afterwards as the Sunne-rising, whence grew the ielousies we shall hereafter speake of. The Mignons of Court which were then in quarter, gaue a great occasion: Christopher of Harcourt Lord of Chaumont, and Martin Gouge Bishop of Clermont, men that had no good in them but to doe ill. The Duke of Bourgongne had much trouble this yeare: the English had sowed great diuisions in his chiefest cities. Bruges stirred vp strange mutinies against him, whereas he was in danger of his life: Lille-Adam chiefe Captain of his gard is slaine. A popular man whom we haue seene to command the Parisiens twice, once against the King, and another time for the King, he presumed in like sort to gouerne them of Bruges but they teare him in peeces, as the Gantois had in former times massacred Artenille their Tribune.

A multitude is a dangerous thorne, which cannot bee handled without pricking. Gant followed the example of Bruges, but in the end all was pacified, with the losse of the most seditious, to the content of the same people, who deuoure him they did adore. After these seditions, Philip returnes to warre, he beleageheth Crottoy (a place very important for the free trafficke of his countries) but after great paines and charge, it prooued all in vaine.

Two strange surprizes.

A man vnfortunate in warre, but in Councell he commaunded with an imperious grauitie. But (amiddest the generall) shall I omit this particular obseruation, profitable for the example? That great Captaine La Hire passing neere vnto Clermont (a towne then subiect to the English) was there honorably received by the Lord of Ansemont Gouverneur of the towne, and (for that he trusted La Hire much) he suffered him to enter with his men into the rauelin to eate a banquet. La Hire imbracing this occasion, makes him his prisoner, and takes the place, Ansemont had his reuenge in time, by meanes of the Lord of Mouy: he enters Beauuais, where La Hire was gouernour, goes vnto him to the Tennis-court, takes him and leades him away prisoner in view of all the inhabitants; and makes him to yeld both his ransome and Clermont againe, notwithstanding Charles his letters to the Bourguignon: but in the end they are good friends. Thus discourtesie is alwaies requited with the like, leauing a long repentance for him that is the author of the iniurie, how braue and cunning soeuer he be, God punishing iniquitie in due season, when as men thinke least of it, and by meanes least apparent. The warres had wonderfully vnpeopled France, but this scourge was not sufficient. The whole cuntry lying waste, (not able to be tilled by reason of the daily incursions and ordinarie spoiles of both parties) there fell a great famine. That which was vsually woorth but five pence, was sould for five shillings and sixe pence, or more. The people being famished, sought bread where they might find it, being forced from their houses by raging hunger, they disperse themselves in the fields and townes: in the one to finde

A finde some fruite among the trees, and in the bushes, to haue some herbes or rootes: in the other to get some morcell of bread, or some garbage, to fill the panch with any thing they could meete withall. So their bodies filled with bad meates were likewise infected with bad humors, falling into diuerse languishing diseases. In the end all turned to a plague so horrible, as all these poore creatures famished and weakned with diseases, were like vnto drye wood in a great flame. Thus one plague bred an other, and that miserable plant of warre, brought forth two branches of misery to our wretched Country, famine and pestilence. These afflictions dispersed through-out the Realme, raigned chiefly at Paris, the sollemne Rendezuous of this languishing people. There was nothing to bee seene but lamentable troupes of people pale and leane, of all sexes and ages, either running in the fildes, or vp and downe the streetes, or laide vpon dung-hils, or dead in the market places, a most horrible spectacle to behold.

A lamentable spectacle in Paris.

There dyed threescore thousand persons in Paris. All the principall men abandoned the City, except Adam of Cambray the first President, Ambrose of Lore the Prouost of Paris, and the President of the Accounts, whom God preserued in this contagion, to eternize their commendable memories for euer, hauing succoured the publike in necessity; without whose couragious resolution the City had easily fallen into the hands of the English, who watched for all occasions, and made dayly incursions from Mante euen vnto the gates. The Champian Country beeing abandoned, Wolves left the Forrests without feare, and hauing made their prey vpon the remainder of this miserable people, they came to the gates of townes, and euen into the streetes. This horrible spectacle hath bene seene at Paris, in the Theater of the world, in the most populous City of all others: So one misery drew on an other, and these afflictions continued two whole yeares, vnto the yeare 1439. whilst the contention of Anti-popes increased the fire of Schismes in Christendome, as wee shall shew in due place.

Amede or Amé Duke of Sauoy carried himselfe as we haue said, during the calamities of France: in the end of this yeare hee shall shew a strange alteration of humor, to the great amazement of all the world, for being in his castell of Thonnon, (a towne seated vpon the Lake Leman) hee retires with a small traine to Ripaille, where he had an Abbay of Monkes of Saint Maurice, and hauing imparted his desseigne but to two of his most confident seruants, (hauing bound them to keepe him faithfull company) he takes vpon him the habit of these Monkes, that is, A gray frock, a long cloake, a gray hood, a short cornet, and a red bonet vnder his hood, but vpon his gray frock hee ware a great girdle of gold, and vpon his cloake a crosse of gold. Hauing thus changed his habit, his meaning was not to change his degree, nor to leaue the world, but vnder the colour of this habit, his intent was to aspire higher, as the course of his life will shew. Being now retired to Ripaille, he calls a parliament & shewes them his intention in this new course of life; That being weary of the world, where there was nothing but toyle and trouble, hee would sequester him selfe, to dedicate his life wholly to the seruice of God. But to the end hee might prouide for the gouernment of his estate, he declares his eldest sonne Prince of Piedmont, and Claude his yongest, Earle of Geneua, and he him selfe remains Duke of Sauoy, although hee had vowed him selfe to the order of Saint Maurice, and without altering of any thing, hee reserues to himselfe the sole and soueraigne authority of all his estates. Hauing thus published his intent, hee retires with his Monkes to Ripaille, into one quarter of the lodging the which hee had built a part, accompanied with twenty of his fauourites in Monkes attire: but not liuing like vnto that profession, for leauing them their water and rootes, he qualified this solitary life with the best cheere hee could get from Chamberie or Turin. This yeare is likewise memorable by the death of three great Princesses: of Katherine Queene of England sister to Charles the seauenth, the mournfull leuaine of our long miseries: of the old Queene daughter to the King of Nauarre Mother to the Princes of Brittain, the Duke and Constable: and of the old Countesse of Armaignac, daughter to the Duke of Berry, and Mother to the Duke of Sauoy, the Earle of Armaignac and the Earle of March. All dyed almost in one day, hauing seene the strange tragedies of France acted during their liues and vpon their children, and in their ends, seeing no end of our miseries. As the fury of fighting grew cold, so the warre was turned into trafficke. There was no Towne but the gouernor kept it for him that would giue most: and Charles held it more expedient to haue a towne or place for money, then to besiege it with great charge, to the oppression of his subiects, and with a doubtfull euent. Montargis had cost either party much money to take it and to recouer it againe: Charles buies it of Francis of Surienne an Arragonois vnder the English pay, for ten thousand Crownes. He bought Dreux (the which hee could neuer yet obtaine) for eightene thousand Crownes of William Brouillart of Beaufe, a filthy traficke, worthy of that confused time, but vnworthy of all good order and all royall authoritie. The which being layd open vnto Charles, he resolues to vse an honorable force, and to spend more money to get more honour. So he besiegeth Meaux and takes it victoriously, these were the first fruites of this new yeare. In the moneth of May, Charles the onely sonne of Philip Duke of Bourgongne comes to Tours, where King Charles was resident, and takes Katherine of France his daughter to wife, according to the treaty of Arras.

Charles son to Philip of Bourgongne marries Katherine of France.

Hauiug conducted her through his Fathers Countries to Saint Omer (where the Duke attended him) hee solemnized the marriage with exceeding great pompe, the which did nothing increase the loue of these Princes allyed, nor the happinesse of the marriage, the which was of small continuance, and lesse loue betwixt the parties as the course of the history will shew. In the meane time the Bourguignon hath still two strings to his bowe: Although he had renounced the alliance of England, yet had hee not left all his intelligences, the necessity of their neighbour-hood giuing them still occasions to conferre together. And as he was alwayes watchfull of his profit, so had hee a good gage in England to settle his affaires, in retiring Lewis Duke of Orleans out of prison, being taken at the battaile of Azincourt. He caused Charles to entertaine a treaty for a truce with the English: the first grounds were laide by the Duchesse his wife, a cunning Princeesse and carefull of her husbands good. The Cardinal of Winchester comes to Grauelin to that effect, yet this was but to lay the first foundation of the worke which shall bee finished in due season. Wee haue made mention of John of Luxembourg, who would not bee comprehended in the treaty of Arras. Philip made great shew to bee displeased with him, and Luxembourg like wife to be his enemy, causing his men to be slaine with great violence. Philip treates with him vpon complaint of them that were wronged, and all is pacified. The cleere-sighted did easily finde that this was the Bourguignons policie, who seemed to bee in choller against him to gratifie Charles, being much displeased with Luxembourg, who played the petty King with his maister, but he shall not carry it long, for he dyed soone after, and the Burguignon lost the whip he held ready for all euents, and the children of Luxembourg stood in need of the Kings fauour. But now the Bourguignon flies to an other practife. Hee desired infinitely to be maister of Calais, and seeing that force could not preuaile, hee meanes to trye policie. Some of his subiects perswaded him that in breaking of a dike, they should let in the sea, and so drowne the towne and country about, whereby they should force them to obedience. Hee beleeueth this imagination, and employes much paine and cost to effect it. But this fancie of a flood, vanished away like vnto the Flemish army at the first siege, whereof wee haue seene the fruitlesse issue. So this fantastick flood proued ridiculous. But the Duke to shew that he had done some-thing, caused the bridge of Milay to be beaten downe, and some small dikes, which onely watered the country.

A ridiculous practife to take Calais.

The beginning of this yeare laide the foundation of great matters for the restoring of our estate, the which doth draw on dayly by meanes not fore-seene, and without the wisdom or care of Charles, who was chiefly interested. After the reduction of Paris, all the townes in generall were resolu'd to free themselves by force, if the King had bene so affected, but finding his minde inclining rather to peace, they beseech him to finde some meanes to compound with the English, and not to languish longer in the ordinary losses of a lingering and preiudiciall warre. The Duchesse of Bourgongne for her husbands priuate interest, layes the first stone, treating for the deliuey of Lewis Duke of Orleans, as we haue sayd. This first act was seconded by the request which the Prouinces of the realme made vnto the King, the which ministred occasion vnto Charles to call a generall Parliament at Orleans, whither not onely all the Citties sent their Deputies, according to the custome, but all the Noblemen which came not in person sent their Agents: for the subiect was to treat of a generall peace, and if it might not be effected, to set some order for the men of warre,

Charles calles a Parliament at Orleans to treat of a generall peace.

A warre, for the ease of the poore people, who could endure no more. The King was there in person accompanied with these Noblemen, the Earles of Marche, Bourbon, Vendosme, and Richement Constable, and the Archbishop of Rheims being Chancellor of France. The Agents of the Duke of Orleans, of the Duke of Bourgongne, and of the Earle of Armagnac assisted with the deputies of Paris, Languedoc, Dauphine, Guienne and other Prouinces subiect to the French. The Chancellor (a wise and eloquent man) did set downe at large the miseries of war, and the inestimable good of peace: but what better commentary then the feeling of ouerpast miseries, and the visible demonstration of our present calamities? It was decreed that in regard of a generall peace they should make all necessary pursuit with speede. As for the ording of men of warre, they should presently take some course to auoide confusion hereafter. The Lord Chancellor and the first President were chosen to negotiate this treaty with the English, through the meanes and fauour of the Duke of Bourgongne, as hauiug laid the foundation: and presently a decree was made for the gouernment of soldiars both of horse and foote, and to discharge the army of hangers on, the which did but incoimber, to the great oppression of the poore people. This was the institution of the franke-archers. The first day of May was appointed by the common consent of both Kings to meete at Saint Omer, but the King of England was aduised by the Duke of Yorke his vncl (who had succeeded the Duke of Bedford in his authority, although the name of Regent was not giuen him since the Kings coronation) that he should stand vpon termes, as hauiug no neede of peace, but onely moued with compassion of the poore people, and therefore he failed in the assignation. But there fell out an vnexpected occasion to Charles, which not onely brake of the course of this businesse and all others, but had well neere plounged France into greater misery then before. The King was gone to Angiers, where he had intelligence of the taking of Saint Susanne, for his seruice, one of the most important places of the Country of Maine, and of his losse at the seige of Auranches, which was ill attempted and succeeded worse: when as stranger newes made him loose the pleasure of this gaine, and forget the bitternesse of his losse. He was growne wonderfull wayward and suspitious, inclining visibly into two extremities: being too familiar with some of his domesticall seruants, and too seuer to his Princes and chiefe officers: either he should not haue married his eldest sonne Lewis, Dauphin of Viennois so soone, or else hee should not haue vsed him like a child. But Charles ouer-lookt him with a sower countenance, as if he had bene vnder the rodde. All this was done of purpose, practised by his secret councillors to keepe great men from attempting against him vnder the name of this young Prince, to the preiudice of his royall authority: but what he feared chanced. The Earle of Marche a Prince of the blood, had the charge of the young Dauphin, a Prince whome Charles trusted, being both wife and temperate: Lewis of Bourbon Duke of Alençon Godfather to Lewis was not so familiar with Charles as he was accustomed.

The Princes of the blood discontented.

The Duke of Bourbon was not altogether in so bad termes, yet was he not so great in the Kings fauour as he desired, greewing that such base men should haue countenance. These two Princes must lead the dance: if there dessein had succeeded, many would haue ioyned, but now they would bee lookers-on onely. At this time the Princes had men fit to execute their dessein, the Lords of Chaumont, Bouciquaut and Prye, with many aduenturers, theues, and such like. Tremouille hauiug some notice of this plot, offers himselfe vnto them and is intainted: a matter as wisely performed by them, as rashly done of him. The project of these discontented Princes was, to settle the Dauphin, that hereafter all things might be done by his authority, being ruled by the aduice of the Princes of the blood, and so in effect they would haue King Charles gouerned by his sonne.

Make a league to aduance the Dauphin.

For the execution hereof they first seaze vpon the Dauphin, who was an assistant himselfe, to be freed from the Earle of March his gouernor. He was lodged in the Castle of Loches in Touraine, gouerned with great respect, who seeing him of age, married, and of a liuely disposition, gaue him great liberty: he might go abroad at his pleasure, where he found the bastard of Bourbon, Anthony of Chabanes, with other Captaines aduenturers, who conducted him honorably into Bourbonnois. The same day the Duke of Alençon seazed vpon Niort, and by his commandement John de la Roche tooke Saint Maxent. The Duke of Bourbon hauiug the Dauphin in his power (a Prince full of a youthfull courage) he caused him

to 1439. to write to the nobility of Auvergne, and to the Duke of Bourgongne praying them to aide him in his desseins, which was to haue more liberty to gouerne matters of state hereafter, for the better satisfiing of men of honour, whome he did see (to his great grieve) kept backe by certaine flatterers which possessed the King his father, to the great preiudice of the whole Realme. These newes being brought to Charles, he presently sends to the Duke of Bourbon to returne him his sonne, and to the Duke of Alençon to deliuer his townes of Niort and Saint Maxent, and to them both to come and yeeld an accompt of these innouations: who finding by their answers that they excused themselves and sought delayes, he resolues to come to the effects, and to suppress this mischief in the breeding. He was well serued at this time.

The Duke of Bourgongne, answers the Daulphins letter.

S. Maxent taken by the league and recovered againe.

King Charles goes with an army against the Duke of Bourbon.

The Duke of Bourgongne lets the Daulphin vnderstand, that all his meanes are at his commandement, so as it be not against his father, but he aduised him to go vnto him, and not to aggrauate one error with an other, being most certaine that the shortest errors are the best. He aduised the duke of Bourbon and Alençon not to attempt a thing of ill fame, whereby they should get neither honor nor profit, and to free themselves speedily with the most honest excuses they could deuise. The nobility of Auvergne proteft vnto the Daulphin by the Lord of Dampmartin, that in all things that were in their power they would do him seruice, except against the King his father. The inhabitants of Saint Maxent (seeing the Castle seized on by la Roche) assemble and intrench themselves in the gates and towers of the towne, and aduertise the King thereof, offering to do as it should please him to command. The King was at Poitiers. This aduertisement was brought him as he dined: whereupon hee presently dispatcheth the Admirable of Coitiuy and the Lord of Varenne, Seneschall of Poitou to these good subiects of Saint Maxent, and the next day he followes himselfe. The Castle was presently besieged, battered and forced, and the heads of such as were taken, paid for la Roches folly, who escaped in the night, vnder colour that he would seeke counsell and succour. Mont-richard being taken by the Princes at the same time obeyed the King. The Earle of Dunois a bastard of the house of Orleans, who was of their faction, leaues them presently, and followes the King. This was the end of this yeare, and shall soone be the end of this hurly-burly, ill attempted and worse executed. The Princes had seduced many townes in Auvergne, notwithstanding their first protestation, but for that it belonged to the Duke of Bourbon, it could not be, but many of his subiects and priuat seruants must make some shew of obedience, especially in the Daulphins presence, and at his intreaty. Charles resolues to march thither with all speede. He had eight hundred men at armes, and two thousand archers, and had so provided for their lodgings as they marched without offence to any. And for that it was likely the English would make his profit of our domesticall confusions (seeing the Princes of the bloud presume to attempt against the head of their house, and to set the sonne against the Father) Charles preuented it with such dexterity, as all the frontiers against the English, were very well fortified. Hee had intelligence also that the men of warre being generally discontented for their pay, and grieved that the king so exclaimed against their disorders, vpon his subiects complaints, would be easily drawne to the league: He therefore sent for them whome he might most suspect, and ingaged them in his seruice, the Vicont of Loumeigne, the bastard of Foix & Halezard, valiant capitaines, and well-beloued of the aduenturing soldiers. This done, he sends Pothon, Floiques and Bresay with his troupes; and followes himselfe without any stay, being accompanied with the Earle of Marche, the bastard of Orleans, the Constable of France, and many Noble men with a well ordered traine.

The Townes of Chambon and Euon being fortified by the Princes, were easily taken by Pothon. They were in danger of their liues through their resistance, but by the Constables means their peace was made for sixe hundred crownes of gold, which then made a hundred markes of siluer. These places being reduced to obedience, Charles came to Ebruele, which yielded, from thence he went to Aigueperse, and Cursot, the which likewise obeyed, notwithstanding the perswasion of the Princes. Charonx resisted and was taken at the first assault: the spoile was great, the troupes remaine there 15. daies, whilst that Charles takes Escuroles, with 5. or 6. other forts fauouring the discontented Princes. The duke of Bourbon was at S. Portain, where he had ingaged the Daulphin to seaze vpon the townes of Auvergne. Tremouille was there there also, who had brought a hundred lances to the Princes with a thousand vaine hopes of his great meanes: but hearing that the King approched, (being armed with right and force) they aske counsell of their wounded consciences, which aduised them to flie into Bourgongne. So parting from Saint Portain they come to Moulins, and from thence they take the way of Saint Desire to passe into Bourgongne, but hauing intelligences that they could passe no further; and that the Duke of Bourgongne had preuented them, they returne all amazed to Moulins, finding their affaires to succed but ill. Clermont & Montterraut could neuer be drawne from the Kings seruice, notwithstanding all the perswasions of the Princes: Rions followed their faction and was soone reduced to the Kings obedience. Charles being arrived at Clermont calls an assembly of the Estates of Auvergne, shewing the importance of this action by the bishop of Clermont. The whole country is presently at the Kings deuotion, offering freely to imploy their bodies and goods for his seruice.

But not reflecting mildnesse with his force, Charles thought it good that the Earle of Eu should treat with the Princes, who in the end resolue to attend vpon the King at Clermont. The Daulphin remained at Moulins, and the dukes of Bourbon and Alençon vnderooke the voiage vnder his Maiesties safe-conduct, they carried with them Tremouille, Chaumont and Pry, whereof Charles being aduertised, he sent to countermand them, not meaning these three should be comprehended in the passport. The Princes hauing spoken with the King, and drawne matters to some good accord, they promise to bring the Daulphin to Clermont, and to pacifie all by this enteruiew, but this yong prince so disdained the refusal his father had made of his three seruants, as he protested he would not goe vnto him, but would rather hazard all. This humour made him to faile in the assignation, and Charles was resolved to vse force. He therefore sends his vanguard, which besiegeth and takes Vichy, Cursot, and Varennes obey presently without contradiction, Saint An must be forced, but in the end it obeies. So doth Rouen, Châtlier, Perrieux and all the places of Rouannois. This successe did mollifie the hearts both of the Daulphin and Princes, to draw them vnto reason: so as hauing (by the mediation of the Earle of Eu) perswaded the King to like of their comming, they went to Cursot. Charles was very milde to his sonne, and at the first gaue him good entertainment, but when he sees this yong man fully bent to haue Tremouille, Chaumont and Prie (his good and faithfull seruants) receiued into fauour, and boldly to say vnto him, That hee must himselfe returne, being ingaged in his word and honour, hee said roughly to him. Lewis, the gates are open, and if they be not bigge enough I will cause sixteen or twenty fadomes of the wall to be beaten downe, to passe where you please: you are my son, you cannot tie your selfe to any without my leave, but if you will goe, you may depart: for by the helpe of God, we shall finde some of our blood, which shall helpe vs better to maintaine our honour, then you haue yet done. So the accord was made without comprehending of these three. The Dukes of Bourbon and Alençon sweare to serue the King, and yeeld vp Loches, Corbeil, Bois de Vincennes, Sancerre, Sancouins, Brie, Conte-robert and other places which they held. The Daulphin remains with his father, who changeth al his traine, except his Confessor and Cooke. But all this is but counterfeite, you shal soone see other broiles. This phrensie of state bred in the Kings house against the King himselfe, was by our Ancesters called the Praguery. Nine monethes of this yeere being spent in these garboiles, Charles returnes to Tours, to provide for the rayfing of the siege at Harfieu, where the Earle of Somerset had laine long: but it was in vaine, for the towne was taken in the end, after a long and painefull constancie of the Inhabitants, who could not be releued in time by reason of these home-bred troubles: and yet there was a second mischief; the Lord of Gaucourt governor of Daulphine (a worthy seruant to the King) returning from the siege, and causing some of his baggage (which was scattered from the troupe) to retire, hee was surprisid by a company of English, and led prisoner to Rouen, to the great grieve of Charles who loued him, hauing giuen good testimonies of his loyaltie in his greatest extremities.

But in exchange Charles takes Conches and Louvièrs; (townes of importance in Normandie) from thence hee came into Champaigne, to suppress a part of these aduenturing theeves, who had surprized some places in this Prouince, Musse l'Euesque, Montagu, and others. The Kings army (led by the Constable) takes them, and razed them by the Kings command, pardoning most of these theeuish capitaines, among which were the bastard of Vergy and

and the Lord of Commercy, but he caused Alexander bastard to John Duke of Orleans to be drowned, a notable theefe, who (hauing followed the discontented Princes) had spoken vnworthily of his maister. This execution of Iustice is memorable vpon one of so high a birth, being followed the same yeere with the exemplary death of Gyles de Raiz Marshall of France, issued from a great and famous house, who being found guilty of Negromancy and Scorcery, was condemned by the Court of parliament of Britan, and burnt at Nantes with some of his seruants, culpable of the same crimes. He was honored for his valour, but neither his armes nor his bloud could stay the hand of diuine Iustice, meritoriously executed by this iust decree of the magistrate. Priuate actions worthy to be registred in the history, to shew that the greatest cannot flie the hand of God, after they haue long abused his patience. But the treaty of peace betwixt France and England, being discontinued aboue a yeere, was againe reuiued by the industry of the Duchesse of Bourgongne a Portugefe, but much affected to the quiet of the Realme, and a very sufficient woman, who had great credit with her husband. She followes it so wisely, as in the end the two Kings send their Ambassadors to Calais. On Charles his behalfe were the Archbishops of Rheims, and Narbon, and the Earle of Dunois bastard of Orleans. For Henry King of England, the Cardinall of Yorke, and the duke of Exeter, who brought with them Charles duke of Orleans, being so long kept prisoner in England.

This poore prince (after the languishing of so long a prison) was exceeding glad to see some meanes to returne to his house, hauing felt the aire on this side the sea, and embraced the Earle of Dunois, one of the branches of his house, who had so faithfully serued him in his afflictions: but he greued to see himselfe presently carried backe into England, for that they could not agree vpon the fundamentall points, the English being resolute not to leaue one foote of that which they held in France. And although the King were content they should freely inioy what they possessed, so as they had done in times past of the crowne of France by homage: yet would they not yeeld in any sort, being loth to relinquish their pretended souerainty. But he refuseth which afterwards doth sue. At this time they were enforced to retire with this resolution, that without infringing any thing of the treaty begun, euery one should goe home, and consider of his affaires, to assemble againe when need should require: the which either part desired. And this is all could be done for the generall. They proceeded farther for the duke of Orleans: but as in these trafficks such as hold the possession do commonly vse policy, the stronger giuing law to the weaker, so in so precious a matter as life, the English must be sued vnto, making no hast to deliuer him, for that they drew great profit yeerely for the pension of this great Prince. Moreouer Charles had no great care of his deliuey: for that some malicious spirits had seasoned him with some bad impression against this poore prince, perswading him, that his long imprisonment was not without some mistery, and that it hatched some mischief against the King and his estate. The which being miserable in so great a person, gaue all men a iust cause of compassion. But notwithstanding all these difficultes yet must this prince (one of the goodliest plants of this crowne) be now deliuered, to leaue a successor for the realme of France: and God, who would honor his race with the crowne, had prepared an admirable meanes for his deliuey, by his helpe, from whom in reason hee might least hope, euen when his owne friends had abandoned him.

The duke of Orleans de-
liuered.

A notable example for all men in many respects: a prison of sue and twenty yeeres, was a great affliction to a prince borne to command, and yet captiue to an other. The losse of all his goods gaue him a sufficient occasion to resolute to perpetual misery, and to leaue it for an inheritance to his posterity. In the end slander, a most cruell sting to a generous minde, which hath honour for his assured treasor, had beene able to suppress him. But God, who gouerns the rod wisely, giues him liberty, goods and honour in due season: in despite of this deuilish enuy, which seeking to afflict the afflicted, and controuling aduersitie as well as prosperity, is then corrected when it seekes to correct an other: but God doth neuer send helpe too late.

The Duke of
Bourgongne
vnderstake for
the Duke of Orleans ransome.

Philip hauing resolved to doe this good turne for the duke of Orleans, and to withdraw him out of prison, compounds for his ranfome with the King of England, for three hundred thousand crownes. He giues his word for it, and paies it, and so Charles duke of Orleans being 1440.

A being honorably conducted, comes first to Calais, where the money being paied, he comes free to Grauelin to the duke of Bourgongne his deliuerer, who receiued him with all the thewes of loue he could desire. He was taken at Azincourt, in the yeere 1415. and was deliuered in 1440. the five and twenty of Nouember, by the meanes of his sonne that had slaine his father, and had done all hee could to ruine his house. Being come to Philip, (hauing thanked him for this good office, and protested to hold him for his father) hee swears a perpetuall league with him, the which is confirmed by the marriage of Mary of Cleues the niece of Philip with the duke, and then he swears to the treaty of Arras, except the article of the murther committed on the person of John Duke of Bourgongne, whereof he was innocent: and for confirmation of this sollemne league, he takes the order of the golden fleese, B from the hands of Philip, and is admitted into the number of his Knights. Behold two great enemies are become great friends by so memorable an occasion.

The duke of Bourgongne had his priuate considerations for the safety and quiet of his house, he sees himselfe raised to greatnesse. But as it is no lesse verue to keepe then to get, French party, as the greatest and most assured for the good of his affaires: so likewise hee considered that he should need some trustie friend nere the King, on whom he might confidently relie. And what greater personage then the duke of Orleans the first Prince of the bloud? And what greater bond then to free him from captiuitie? necessity also forecing C him thereunto, for it was very apparent that this Prince being freed from prison, had the like action against Philip, that Philip had against the King: for although Philip had not slaine his father, yet was he sonne to the murtherer, and the quarrell must needs bee hereditary in these great houses, where discontents and wrongs goe from father to sonne: being also likely that the King discontented to haue beene forced by his subiect to aske him forgieuesse in the view of all Europe, would maintaine the right of his bloud, in a Prince that had neuer wronged him, against his reconciled enemy, whose friendship hee had so deere bought: wherein he noted well the Kings humor, being suspitious, ialous, and impatient of any new authority, which (being able to oppose it selfe) he would neuer faile to crosse in all occasions. Philip wisely foreseeing all these difficultes preuented them, in assuring D himselfe of the duke of Orleans loue, vpon so good consideration, suppressing thereby all doubt of danger, which hee might hereafter feare. Herein we see a notable example, that we must neuer despaire in the greatest crosses of this life, that quarrells must be mortal, and whereas they die, friendship must be immortal. That the best meanes to vanquish an enemy is to doe him all the good we can.

The reason
that moued
the Duke of
bourgongne
to doe this good turne.

The honor of this good worke was not attributed to the duke of Bourgongne alone, but to the Duchesse his wife, who wonne as great credit in drawing her husband to this reconciliation, as her Predecessor did dishonor, by the incensing of her husband against the house of Orleans, whence grew that infamy which polluted these two houses with two tragical murders. The wiues honor is to pacifie quarrells betwixt the kinsmen and Allies of the house whereinto shee is matched, and contrariwise it is an importune ialousie to sow dis- E sention among kinsmen. God also blest the mediation of this worthy Princeesse in the marriage of Mary of Cleues, Neece to her husband, with the duke of Orleans, by whom hee had Leuis the twelfth which shalbe King of France, and two daughters, the one Elenor which was married into the house of Nauarre, of whom is issued Ioane Queene of Nauarre, mother to the good and valiant King Henry the fourth lately murdered. This yeere shalbe full of warre, and successfull for Charles: yet in the end it shal minister occasion to enter into the former treatie of peace, which hauing begunne the yeeres before and little aduanced, shalbe ended in the following yeeres, after another manner then the English expected. Charles seeing that the King of England by his cold delaies, sought not onely to make his conditions better (being sought vnto) but also to drawe him into some inconuenience, F he resolues to armes.

The English had taken Creil vpon Oye and could not bee dispossessed of Pontoise, a towne of importance for the neerenesse of Paris. The King resolues to take them both. The Admirall of Coytiuy besiegeth Creil, and forceth it in the Kings presence. Thus the way is made to Pontoise where the siege was memorable, being well assailed and well defended, 1441. defended, but in the end it was taken by Charles for the good of France. He lodgeth at the Abbey of Maubouillon, accompanied with his sonne the Dauphin of Viennois, Charles of Aniou, the Earle of Clermont, the Constable of France, the Marshalls of Loheac and So-loigne, Lewis of Luxembourg Earle of Saint Paul & of Pigney, who brought vnto the King a goodly troupe of men from the duke of Bourgongne, with them of the city of Tournay, who sent a gallant squadron of their citizens. Thus vnto brought both French and Bourguignons vnder the same Ensignes, against the common enemy of France. There were also the Earls of Eu, Albret and Vaudemont, the Vidame of Chartres, the Lords of Chastillon, Tancarville, Iogny, Morneil in Bry, Bueil, Mouy, la Tour, Angest, Longueuall, Moyencourt, Suze, Chabannes, Flauay, Saint Symon, Mailly, Penefac, Blancheport and thofe braue capitaines, la Hire, Pothon and Floquet, with an infinit number of the Nobility, who added their valour to the number of the soldiars, which they had brought vnto the King. The city of Paris sent a goodly troupe, so as Charles had twelue thousand fighting men. At the first approach the bastion vpon the bridge next to Maubouillon was taken by la Hire, on the other side against the Abbey of Saint Martin, they make a bridge with a great bastion, where they lodge three thousand archers, yet the towne was not so straightly besieged, but Talbot sent in both men and victualls.

The memo-

The Duke of Yorke goes with an army
to releue Pontoise.

Whilest that Charles stood discontented with this error, behold a greater brauadoe, for the duke of Yorke (Lieutenant generall for Henry King of England) comes to Cenery and Hotonuile, places very nere to Pontoise, with a goodly army of eight thousand men, and sends his heraulds vnto Charles to offer him bataille, Charles (who by the aduice of his counsell would not commit this succesfull beginning of his affaires to the hazard of a bataille) returnes them with no other answer, but that he should haue his bellie full sooner then hee liked. The riuer of Oize was betwixt both armies. Charles resolues to keepe the passages from Pontoise to Beaumont, and the duke of Yorke to passe the riuer in despite of the French, and to this end he caused many small boates of Leather, wood and cords to bee brought, with other stufte fit to make bridges. The bridge of Beaumont was garded by the French, but the English passe at an Abbey beneath the bridge, and with such danger in their artificiall boates, as ten resolute men might haue staied a great army, but the silence of the night so fauored their passage, as a great part of the English army was past, before our Sentinells had discouered them. Then was there no remedy but to aduertise the King, of the enemies passage.

Charles retires from Pontoise.

The duke of Yorke (hauing thus happily passed the riuer and rested his souldiars that night) marcheth in goodly order towards Charles, meaning to charge him: Charles takes counsell of his feare couered with this resolution, not to hazard a generall bataille, but hee was likely to haue fallen into an other inconuenience, for without attending of the enemy, hee puts all the waightiest of his carriages into the fort of Saint Martin, vnder the gard of Charles of Aniou, and the Admirall of Coitiuy with two thousand men, and with them la Hire, Rouhan, Estouteuile with other resolute capitaines: & so leauing his lodging of Maubouillon he retires to Poissy. The duke of Yorke takes vp his lodging at Maubouillon, being abandoned, & makes a shew to attempt the fort of Saint Martin, but hauing tried it in vaine he takes his way to Poissy, and lodgeth before the towne in view of the King and his army. There were some skirmishes without any great successe, Charles continuing his resolution to hazard nothing, and Yorke his proiect to victuall and saue Pontoise. So the English retires to Mante, to send refreshings from thence to the besieged, but this great brauado came to nothing. The beginning was dishonorable for the King, but the end was both happy and honorable. Being retired to Saint Denis, and hauing sent the Constable vnto Paris, hee resolues to send to Pontoise, and to winne it or to die. The reason was, that this his retrait or rather flight was so infamously spoken of by the greatest in Court, and so odious to the Parisiens, (who had defraied a great part of the charge at this siege) as it was to bee feared they would make some mutiny against him, if the successe were not good. His spies did likewise assure him that the Princes of his bloud (especially since the returne of the duke of Orleans) were resolute to make some extraordinary assemblie, and to admonish him touching the government. It chanced then that the Earls of S. Pol & Vaudemont (notable partisans of the duke of Bourgongne) left the King, when he had most need of succors, and

A and they of Tournay were of the same party. Hee had the Dauphin with him, whom hee caused to watch diligently both day and night. But how could hee doubt that these tricks came not out of the Bourguignons budget? Choller banished feare, so as beeing resolved to repaire this error, and to preuent his enemies practises, hee runnes to Pontoise (for hee was but ten daies away) and giuing the Duke of Yorke no leasure to releue the besieged, he resolues to take it by force. This indignation succeeded happily. Hee caused three assaults to be giuen on three parts, and at the first hee wonne our Ladies Church which is without the towne, whereby he might greatly annoy the besieged. He tooke this quarter for himselfe, accompanied with the Earles of Marche, Albret and Tancarville. The Dauphin was at the Port Friche ioyning to the riuer of Oize, with the Earle of Maine, the Admiral and the great maister of the Crosbowes. On the other side of the battery was the Constable, the Marshall of Loheac, the Lords of Mouy, Touars, Suze, Seran, Sanzay and the vidame of Chartres.

The Canon being planted of all sides, and a reasonable breach made, the French enter furiously, and the King with the first (of such force is resolution in a great Prince,) to animate a whole army, as the head giues life to the whole body. The English were consumed like to straw in the fire, and five hundred were slaine at this entrie, and foure hundred taken prisoners. The Inhabitants were spared (by the carefull command of Charles) who acknowledging the happinesse of this victory: for without doubt if hee had failed, his enemies were ready to conspire against him.

Pontoise taken by assault.

C Hee calles together all the Princes, Noblemen and capitaines of the army, hee thanks them for the good and faithfull seruice they had done him, in this notable occasion. Hee makes the Lord of Ialongs Marshall of France, and many Knights. Hee called for him that first entred the breach, commends his valour, and rewards him with an honorable pension. But why hath the History concealed this honest mans name, his reward had bene immortal? Such was the issue of the siege of Pontoise, remarkable for many circumstances, but then very considerable for the Kings affaires, who had an honorable reuenge of the English brauadoe. But as one good hap followes an other when it pleaseth God, so Charles receiued many good aduertisements at the same instant.

D The English drew together many garrisons in the country of Maine, from Mans, Fresnoy and Mahinne la Iuhez, and had sacked Saint Denis in Aniou. The French which were in Sable, Laual and Saint Sufanne, led by the Lord of Bueil, meete them laden with spoile, and very ioyfull; they charge them, defeat and kill them, leauing foure hundred vpon the place. Pier of Breze issues out of Conches and surpriseth the English at Beaumont le Roger: sleeping without feare, he awakes them with the sword, kills them and takes the towne. John Forsquet doth likewise about the same time take Eureux (a towne of very great importance in Normandy) the meanes is memorable, a fisherman makes a hoale in the wall, whereby he enters in the night, and becomes maister of the towne. But in exchange they receiue a checke. The capitaines and soldiars which had taken many prisoners at Pontoise, had compounded with an English captaine for their ransome, who had taken the debt vpon him. The prisoners were kept at Cornille, a castle nere vnto Chartres. While they expected money, this mediator hauing free liberty to goe and come, obserues all the passages so well, as hee soone findes meanes to pay all these ransomes, for one morning hee surpriseth the place, frees the prisoners, and takes all them that had them in gard.

E The Parisiens honor Charles at his returne, whom they were ready to deuoure, if the successe of Pontoise had not bene good. The duke of Bourgongne sends his wife vnto him for many respects, who returned with no great satisfaction: and Charles duke of Orleans (who had not yet seene him since his returne from prison) comes vnto him with a goodly traine: the King receiues him very gratioously, and allowed well the excuses of his long delay, and to crosse the duke of Bourgongne, hee giues his cousin of Orleans towards the payement of his ransome, a hundred and fifty thousand franks: a very great some in those daies, the which was not giuen for nothing in so great a necessity of the Kings affaires. Lewis of Luxembourg & the widow of John of Luxembourg, partisans to the Bourguignon, do homage to Charles, and yeeld the towne of Marle vnto him: these bee fruits no doubt of the victory at Pontoise. In the meane time the Princes assemblie at Neuers, the dukes of Bourgongne,

There were for the most part priuate discontents, tending to euery mans priuate interest. As not to be maintayned in their degrees, to be called to Councelles, respected in their aduises, honoured in their charges, paid their pensions, and eased in their lands. But the zeale of the publike good shadowed all, with a shew of Iustice, peace, order, and releefe to the people. That it was fit the King should proceed more speedily in the treaty of peace with the English, the which had bene too coldly followed. That hee should supply his Parliaments with good and sufficient men, and thereby provide for the offices and not for the persons, that by their faithfull diligence suites might be shortened, and speedie iustice administred without delay, B or respect of either of the parties. That hee should provide for the ease of the subiect ouercharged, rule the soldiars, preuent robberies, ransomings, and extortions, the which were daily committed vnder too apparent an excuse, that the soldiars was not paid. That hee should giue honors without respect of forepassed diuisions, and declare all his subiects capable of Offices and dignities indifferently, not remembring what was past. That he should haue a competent number of graue men in his great Councell worthy of that charge, and not to commit the gouernment of the affaires of the Realme to two or three, as had bene done in former times. These are the chiefe points of their demands, drawne word by word out of the Originall.

Charles was nothing pleased with these assemblies, made both in his absence and without his priuity, whereby many inconueniences must ensue, all being done without his authority. But being taught by his owne experience, he digested this kinde of affront quietly, being loth to alter any thing at such a season, when as hee had no need of new enemies: and hauing either excused what had bene done, or contented euery priuate person, he proceeded to the principall, which was the establishment of the affaires of the Realme. The disorders of men of warre were insupportable, the which must be reformed, but that which troubled the King was the siege of Tartas, remarkable by this circumstance.

Tartas is a towne in Gasconie belonging to the house of Albret. This town was besieged by Capitall de Buch, a great Nobleman of that countrie, and of the English faction. It was concluded for the extreame necessitie of the country that there should be a surceasse of armes, and libertie of free trafficke in that Prouince, vntill midtomer following, vpon condition that if the King did not succour the towne by that day, it should yeeld to the English, or else the French should remaine in free possession without any controuersie. And for assurance of this treaty, the eldest sonne of the Lord of Albret should remaine in hostage. The matter was of great weight, being not onely a question of the losse of a place of great importance, but of the Kings reputation, who leauing his subiects, was in danger to be abandoned by them, and so to loose all Gasconie, where the English had gotten many partisans. Charles prouiding carefully for his affaires, giues two blowes with one stone, where-with he strooke both the thecues and the English. He armed with exceeding speed, hauing drawne together foure thousand horse, eight thousand archers, and eight thousand other foote. An infinit number of great personages and voluntary Noblemen posted to this iourney, as to a solemne assignation whereon depended the quiet and honour of France. The Daulphin did accompany him in this voiage, Charles of Aniou Earle of Maine, the Constable of Richmont, the Earles of Marche, Eu, Castres, Foix and Lomaigne the eldest sonne of the Lord of Armagnac: the Lords of Albret, Gaure, Cominge, Estrac, Tartas, Tancarsville and Montgascon the eldest sonne to the Earle of Boulongne and Auvergne, and Philip of Culant Admiral of France with an infinit number of gallant Nobility. Thus Charles parting from Paris come first to Saumur, whither John Duke of Britan sent his Ambassadors, to offer him homage and men. Shame, to haue so often left him in all his extremities, would not suffer him to see the King, although the Constable were a good mediator for him. Here restored to the King the forts of Essais and Palluau which annoied all the country of Poitou, F and Charles gaue them in gard to the Constable: from thence he passed into Poitou, and provides that Marueil, and Saint Hermaine, should no more trouble the people: he then comes into Xaintonge, which had bene much tormented by the Lord of Pons, who humbled himselfe vnto the King, promising to liue in peace. Taillebourg was taken by force, and the thecues punished. Bretueil was taken and razed. Thus Charles spent this yeere against thecues

A thecues who had surprised some townes. The next yeere was happily imploied against the English our open enemies, making a great breach in Gascony and there abouts, where the English had gotten deepest footing, by the ancient and lawfull possession of his Ancestors. In the end by this breach the whole Prouince remained his, but the prouidence of God imparts his blessings by degrees. Hauing thus pacified Poitou and Xaintonge, he comes to Limoges, and so to Tholousa, which was the Rendez-uous of all his troupes. Being arriued, he giues notice to them of Tartas, that they should continue firme, and that they should bee releued by the prefixed day: but as hee labors on the one side to settle his affaires, so the English on the other side seeke to ouerthrow them.

B Behold Talbot comes out of England into Normandie with two thousand men, and the Duke of Yorke hauing leuied men in the country it selfe and places of their obedience, goes to field with foure thousand men. With these forces hee thinkes to take all that Charles held in that Prouince, where he had left the Earle of Dunois and the Vidame of Chartres for the gard of those places: but this enterprife had small successe. Talbot besiegeth Conches, and at the same instant the Earle of Dunois Galardon (a place holding for the English) to cause a diuersion. Talbot hauing taken Conches, the Earle leaues Galardon, hauing no reason to hazard his small troupe against so great forces, and puts them into garrison, making a defensiu warre, attending the successe of Tartas. Talbot fearing least Galardon should be surprised by the French, doth raze it, and this was all.

C Let vs now returne to Tholousa, to conduct Charles from thence to Tartas, for there lies the weight of his affaires. Assignation is giuen, it must bee held. To conclude, the King comes at the appointed time, with a goodly and mighty army: the condition is performed, he demands his hostages, and the effect of the accord. So young Albret is deliuered, Tartas continues vnder his obedience, the day honorably kept, and all the Prouince in quiet. Tartas thus victoriously assured, Charles resolues both to husband the occasion with his forces, and to proceed farther. Saint Seuer was held by Thomas Rameston with a hundred men at armes, and foureteene hundred Crosbowes, and fortified what might bee in those daies. Charles takes it by force, slew the greatest part of the English, & takes the Commander prisoner. Acqs hauing endured a siege of sixe weekes is yeilded by composition. The Earle D of Foix was with the King, and imploied both his person, men, and meanes to doe him seruice: but the impatiency of the French thrust them vpon his country, where they committed many insolencies. The Bearnois discontented with the French, assembles his forces and chargerth them as enemies; but they had their reuenge, for they fell vpon this ill-armed multitude, and slue seuen hundred, to the great grieve of Charles, fearing that this escape might alter his affaires: but the Earles discretion couered this excessse, and Charles continued his course. Agen held for him, from thence he summons Tonneins, Marmande and Port Saint Mary, which yeeld him obedience. Reole being obstinate, was besieged, and assailed with difficulty, but in the end it was taken.

Tartas releued by King Charles.

E The sharpe winter (hindring the course of the riuer of Garonne, for the victualing of the army) made the siege long & difficult, and gaue the English meanes to recouer S. Seuer and Acqs, not very well garded: but the Earle of Foix winnes Saint Seuer againe, and the Earle of Lomaigne Acqs. A great number of the Nobility of the country (forced to make a good shew during the English command) submit themselves to the King, as the Lords of Pujols, Raufan, Roquetaillade and Pelegrie. Thus Charles hauing made the Lord of Coitivy Seneschall of Guienne, gouernor of that conquered country, he makes his returne into France. Being at Montauban hee lost those two great captaines so famous in his reigne, Potton and La Hire, more rich in vertue and honor then in substance: yet Potton was maister of the Kings horse, and his sonne was Marshall. La Hire left for his chiefe welth the immortal memorie of his loyalty and valour, the which he happily imploied in the greatest necessity of this crowne. Names in truth most worthy to be consecrated to the perpetual memorie of posterity, for a president to such as manage armes, and make so great profession of honour. And with what title were these most honored, for their vertues or for their castles? A happy exchange, to change perishing gold, which oftentimes makes him hatefull that loues it, with the pleasing smell of immortal praise. An vnreprouable ambition amidst the reproches of this golden age, which loueth gold more then honour.

The death of Potton and La Hire.

So Montauban was a tombe for their bodies, and the whole world the Epitaph of their praises. At that instant and in the same place, Charles ended the controuersie of the Earldome of Cominges. Joane daughter to the Earle of Cominge and Boulogne (married at the first to John duke of Berry, sonne to King John,) was after his decease married to Mathew Earle of Castel-bon, of the house of Foix. She had one daughter by this Mathew, but for that there was no good agreement betwixt them, shee makes a Will to bridle her husband, that by vertue of the authority of a father, hee should not enioy her lyuing, instituting King Charles the seuenth her heire, in case her daughter died without lawfull heirs. In disdain of this Testament, Mathew much yonger then she, and who had not taken her but for her Crowns, kept her prisoner, an aged woman of foure score yeeres.

The daughter of Joane of Cominges being dead, the Earldome belonged vnto the King as lawfull heire, by the donation of Joane the lawfull heire. So Charles was bound by a double bond to defend the gray heires of this old woman, against the insolency of her cruell husband, who finding himselfe supported by the fauour of the Earle of Foix and Armagnac his cousin (hauing already seized vpon some townes of Cominges, and playing the pettie King, during the confusion of times and the neighbourhood of the English) thought all things to be lawfull. The King adiournes them both to appeere at Tholousa (whereas then he established a parliament for all the countries of Languedoc, Foix, Cominge, Gaure, Quercy, Armagnac, Estrac, Lomaigne, Magnaoc, Bigorre and Rouergue) Mathew deliuered Joane his wife into the Kings hands, and it was decreed by the Court of parliament (the which they note to be the first of this sollempn assembly) that Joane should liue in free liberty out of Mathews power, & should enioy the moiety of the reuenues of Cominge, and therest should goe into the Kings cofers. The Earle of Foix and Armagnac yeelded vp the townes of Cominges which he had vsurped, and was adiourned vnto Paris, to yeeld an account of many rebellions whereof hee was accused, especially for that he set in his titles, Bernard by the grace of God Earle &c. A marke fit for soueraignty, the which appertaines not to Seigneuries subiect to this Crowne.

Thus Charles remembers lawes in the heate of warre, but it requires an other Comissioner to execute this decree by force of armes, after the death of Joane, who being conducted to Poitiers, liued not long in this libertie. Charles beeing returned to Poitiers about the moneth of March, resolues to imploy his son Lewis, both to fashion him to affaires, and to draw him from such as would seduce him. He giues him the government of those countries which lie betwixt the riuers of Suze and Seine. For the well imploying of this new authority, there were two goodly occasions presented one vpon an other. Deepe was reduced to the Kings obedience, this was a great annoiance to Rouen: for the freeing whereof the duke of Yorke doth besiege it, raising forts to keepe them from all releefe. This siege had continued nine monthes, very tedious to the besieged, when as behold the Daulphin accompanied with the Earles of Dunois and Saint Pol and the Lord of Gaucourt, assailes these forts and forceth them, kills three hundred English and many Normaines, either by the sword or water, and so frees Deepe.

This occasion, was followed by an other, which chanced in a manner at the same instant. Joane Countesse of Cominges dies at Poitiers, soone after shee had tasted the ayre of libertie, and the good cheere which Charles made her. Vpon the report of her death Bernard Earle of Armagnac seizeth vpon the townes of Cominges, Duret, Lile in Dodon, Samathan and Lombres, and preparing to warre, he leuies troupes in Arragon, by Salezard a capitaine of that country, causing John of Lescun a bastard of Armagnac to inuade the Kings territories. This excesse might haue proued verie preiudiciall, when as Charles sends Lewis his sonne into Languedoc, with a thousand horse, to quench this mischiefe in the breeding. Being arriued at Rouergue, all yeelds vnto him. Euery thing is opposit to the Earle of Armagnac. The Earles of Perdnac and la Marche, the chiefe supporters of his insolency, leaue him in the plaine field. Salzard doth likewise abandon him: of such force is a royall maister against a bad cause.

The Earle of Amagnac (seeing himselfe thus abandoned) shuts himselfe into Lisle-Jordan, to dispute his pretensions with more aduantage, but hee thrust himselfe into the toyle, for hee was taken by Lewis, and led prisoner to Carcassone. These happy exploitcs did greatly

A greatly recommend the Daulphins iudgment and valour, whom all men held worthy of a great command. Charles hauing commended him for so well doing, would haue sent him backe against the Earle of Somerset, who had raised a great army on the frontiers of Normandy and Britan, the which was like vnto a fire of straw, for hauing taken la Guierche by force, he left it as soone for money, and so retired with his army without any other exploit. The heate of the English grew more temperate touching the chiefe points of their affaires. They stood vpon tearmes in the two first fruitelesse assemblies made for peace: but now they seeke the King. The Earle of Suffolke writes vnto him that hee hath commandment from the King his Master, not onely to renew the treaty of peace discontinued, but also to finde meanes to marry him in France, he receiues a fauorable answer from Charles, and vnder his safe-conduct comes to him to Tours. Charles continued still in an humor to loue peace, and to seeke it, but the Earle of Suffolke, and the Lord Rosse had no charge but to treat of a generall truce, the which they concluded for a yeere and a halfe: but this shall be a goodly occasion to send home the English. After a shower comes a sun-shine, and euen experience teacheth, that after a great raine comes a long drought. Now wee shall see nothing but truces, one after an other, marriages and aliances, during foure yeeres; which is a preparatiue to a ciuill peace for about a hundred yeeres.

This truce being made, they must now seeke warres else where, so fruitefull is our vanity of change, so as wee cannot liue without suffering or doing harme to others: when as they treated of this truce, it was demanded by the Ambassadors of both Kings what their men of warre should doe? This truce (say they) will bee more chargeable vnto vs then warre, for they must liue: They haue not bene accustomed to worke, and yet they will make good cheere, neither can the poore people endure any more. Moreouer if they haue no worke, they will fight with themselves: wee must therefore calme this storme, and send them to such as loue vs not: This was the cause of the warre in Suizerland, whereof Lewis was general, leading both French and English vnder the same ensignes. Mathew Gooche was Collonell of the English forces, for the King of England vnder the Daulphins command. He entred with his army into the territory of Basill and the country of Elsas, betwixt Basill and Strasbourg, one of the goodliest and most fertill prouinces of Germany, they terrified Metz, tooke Montbeliard, and filled all those countries with feare and combustion. The motives of this extraordinary enterprize, may well bee obserued by that which I haue said: but these causes were farre fetch, and not to be embraced by two Kings, who but euen now tormented one an other, especially by Charles who hauing suffred so many crosses, should haue horror to cause others to feeble the like without constraint, yet he found a pinne for all these holes. Charles would haue his sonne take Montbeliard, to be reuenged for the Gouernour, for the wrong he had done him, spoiling his country as farre as Langres in his greatest necessity. Hee assailed the Suiffes (and namely them of Basill) beeing fauourers of Eugenius against Felix his competitor, that is to say against that Amedee Duke of Sauoy, who had so crossed him in his affaires, whom hee could neuer loue what shew soeuer hee made in pollicy. And for that Germany, and that quarter neere vnto Suifferland supported Felix against Eugenius, he therefore hated them. And to gratifie René King of Sicilia, who had a priuate quarrell against the city of Metz, he turned his forces against it. But what meaning soeuer Charles had herein, he embraced this voluntary warre with an incredible affection, as if it had bene to defend the heart of his Realme. He himselfe came to Espinall, and hauing sent his army before to Metz, hee continued the siege siue months, vntill the Cittizens had paid two hundred thousand crownes for the charges of the warre, and acquitted King René of a hundred thousand florins of gold, which they had lent him in his necessity. Lewis the Daulphin parting from Montbeliard ruines Portentru, in disdain of the Bishop, a great solicitor against Eugenius, and from thence he enters into the territories of Basill with this goodly and flourishing army, tied together with so many feuerall strings, hee incountred 4000. Suiffes, being resolute to defend their country. The greatest part of them were cut in peeces, but they sold their liues deere, for the Germain Histories report, that wee lost aboue siue thousand men, although wee had the victorie. The Emperor Frederic the 3. (a prince which otherwise loued peace) vpon the complaints of the cities lying alongest the Rhin, caused the to arme: so as Lewis returned into Lorraine fearing to be too far ingaged in 1444. an enemies Country, whome he had incensed against reason: yet Frederic sent his Ambassadors to Charles, to renew their ancient alliances. So this cloude of people-eaters passed, falling vpon diuers quarters like a shower of haile in a field of ripe corne, leauing nothing memorable but a notable example of rashnesse, making a warre which was neither necessary nor iust, afflicting quiet and peaceable people without any occasion. Whilest that France and England made Switzerland to weep, Henry the sixt King of England, married with Marguerite of Anjou, daughter to Rene Duke of Anjou, and of Lorraine, and King of Sicile and Naples. The Earle of Suffolk fetcht her from Nancy, where Charles was resident, whilest that his army afflicted these poore people. He feasted and conducted this Princeesse as his owne daughter, euen with teares of ioy: but this ioy was sodenly conuerted into heauines, by the death of the Daulphins wife his daughter in law, whom he loued deere for her vertues, which made her amiable to all France. She was one of the chiefest in this great solemnity, from the which shee went to the bed of death: her death was the sepulcher of her Monity, the widow of James King of Scotts, who was come to see her: and whilest her funerall was making, her Sisters ariue from Scotland to attend on her, nay rather to descend with her into the graue, if the humanity of Charles had not reuiued them, giuing them honest meanes to maintaine their estates in France. Thus passeth the Ocean of this miserable life, in the which there is more cause of mourning then of ioy, both in great and small. The marriage likewise of England, wherein were so great shewes of ioy, shall end with a lamentable Tragedy, as we shall see hereafter. The truce was so pleasing to both Realmes, that before it was expired, the Kings of France and England renew it for five yeares more, in hope of a perfect peace, promising by their seuerall writings published generally, to meeete together within six monethes in some conuenient place, to confirme this peace so generally desired of all their subiects. And to confirme the assurance of their promises, the English deliuer Mans to Charles with all that hee held in the county of Maine: but all is put into the hands of King Rene his father in law. Francis Duke of Brittain doth homage to the King for the Duchy of Brittain and the Earldome of Montfort. This was at Chinon, but some monethes after there chanced a tragicall disafter in that house. Francis suspecting that Gyles his brother would deale treacherously with him, by the too familiar correspondency he had with the English, caused him to be put in prison, by the Councell and care of Charles who had sent him foure hundred lances, vnder the command of the Admirall Cossigny. But they dealt worse with him, causing him to die in prison for hunger. The history of Brittain describes this accident very plausibly, but it is true that Gyles died being prisoner with his brother Peter, who suruiued him not long after, hauing a great remorse for this tragicke accident. In the rest of this yeare, and the three following, there is nothing memorable, but the pursuits which Charles made for the re-union of the Church. But not to breake off the course of our history, which is properly to treat of that which concernes our estate we reserue it for a more conuenient place. A worke in truth not onely worthy of a great Monarke, but of a peaceable time, that in the peace of the state, we may see the peace of the Church. The soldiars insolency was nothing abated by this voiage of Germany. They returne more fiesht then before against the poore laborer. Charles made new orders to retrain them, causing them to be duly obserued: but the ouer-weening violence of the English increased daily, not onely by the negligence, but by the command of such as had the charge. The duke of Yorke being called home into England, the duke of Somerset succeeded him, a proud man, who thinking to do better then the rest, did absolutely ruine the English affaires in France. He dispensed with his soldiars in all their villainies, and kept them ready to breake the truce, vpon any profitable occasion. In the meane time the Souldiers ordinary practise was to stand in Sentinell, to surprize some good house in the country, being ill garded: to robbe it, spoile it, and carry away the prisoners by vnknowne wayes. To this end they had their spies, their guides, and their retreats. The fields were full of robberies, by men disguised in strange and fearful habits, being masked when they espied their prey: and therefore they called them counterfeit faces. But to draw men into danger, they marched likes passengers, expecting the commodity to surprize them. There is heard nothing but complaints, of violence. All the pursuits which were made to repaire the breaches of truce, did but increase the paine and charges of the interessed.

But

1435. A But of these small disorders committed by the souldiers, there grew so great an inconuenience, as in the end it filled vp the measure against the English, being hated and detested of all the French, for their pride and insolencie. Fougères a Towne of Brittain vpon the confines of Normandie, then very rich and populous, being without guard vnder the assurance of the truce, was easily surprized by Francis of Surienne, called the Arragonois, a Knight of the order of the Garter, and a great Captaine vpon the marches of France, obeying the English. The towne being surprized by him, (being accompanied with sixe or seauen hundred souldiers) suffered all the miseries that might be. They kill, spoile, and sacke, rauish women, robbe Churches, take prisoners, and from thence they runne into Brittain, and fill all full of feare and combustion. The Britton appeales to the King, and both complaine to Henry King of England, and to the Duke of Somerset his Lieutenant in France: they presse them to repaire so notable a breach, else they would seeke a meanes of reuenge. But they receiue nothing but words, disauowed by mouth, and aduowed in effect: for Somerset causeth S. James of Beuron to be fortified, contrarie to the treatie. Charles receiuing these bare answers from England, sees which way the chance would fall, and that the game would not passe without blowes, yet hee restrained his men with great modestie, holding it for a maxime, that he must vse no force. But when as moderate remedies can take no place with men not capable of reason; then to oppose force against the iniurious passion of his enemy. I read with ioy in the Originall, that Charles contained himselfe, and was forced to this last warre. To haue God on his side, and the wrong on his enemies. To conclude, this moderate proceeding did so iustifie the good cause of Charles, as it was continued with a happie euent: not onely to abate the pride of the English, but to expell them out of the whole Realme: as the iust iudgement of God pursued their arrogancie in this attempt, by the breach of publike faith: the vndoubted ruine of humane societie, which hath no certaine foundation, but in perfect faith. Here endeth the yeare, but the controuersie shall beginne more hotely by iust armes, accompanied with a victorious sentence, the which the Iudge of the world shall pronounce against the pretender of this estate.

Normandie reduced to the Kings obedience.

HE Duke of Brittain first interessd by the English, begins first to resist him: but Charles is drawne to force by constraint. The Ambassadors of France and England, were assembled at Louiers, to redresse the breach at Fougères, when as behold Pont de l'Arche (a towne vpon the riuer of Seine, foure leagues from Rouen) is surprized by the Lord of Breze, for the Duke of Brittain. This troubled Somerset, who presently sends to make complaint vnto the assembly. Charles makes him answer, that it is a requittall: but if he wil redervp Fougères, and the goods that were stolne, valued at sixteene hundred thousand crownes, he should haue Pont de l'Arche againe. The which being disdainfully refused by Somerset, Charles protests by his Ambassadors in open assembly, That if warre followed (which God forbid) the fault should not be his, causing an authentick act to be taken by certaine Apostolicke and Imperiall Notaries, for his discharge and iustification. Seeing therefore that this mild course was scorned by his stout enemy, he resolues to haue his reuenge by force of armes. To this end he combines with Francis Duke of Brittain, to make warre against the English their common enemy, vpon condition the Britton should not treat with him without his leaue. A very needfull restraint, hauing often failed, as we haue scene. All prepare to warre, in euery place where the English had any footing in Gasconie, in Normandie, and in all other parts where there was any remainder of their ancient Conquests. Guienne shall begin the game: but it shall end in Normandie, to make perfect the French obedience, whereof it offers these first fruites to Charles in the beginning of this yeare, as to their ligence, that he had taken Gerberond, and the Bailiffe of Eureux Couches, with great slaughter of the English. Complaints are presently made by the English, Talbot is the messenger:

Charles lets them know that they are in the fault, seeing they began first: yet hee offers to yeeld all that had beene taken by his commandement, according to the law of reprisals, so as they would deliuer what they had taken, and suffer his friends and allies to liue in peace. B Talbot answering, that he had no such charge, Charles lettes him vnderstand, that hee would redresse it by lawfull force: that he did vnwillingly enter into warre, yet would he soone shew the English, that his mildnesse had a sting: and so he goes to field with a goodly armie. There were three chiefe dens for theeuers, the Rendez-vous of all the English robberies in those parts, Verneuil, Mante, and Loigny. Verneuil (an infamous place for our defeate) was first taken: a Millar gaue them entry by a hoale in the towne wall, by the which the water did run to his mill ioyning to the wall. The towne began, and the castle followed: a strong tower diuided from the castell held out some daies, but it yeelded when as Charles arriued. Mante C yeelded in view of the armie. Loigny was surprized by Scalado, but the English intrenched in the bafe Court, fought it out resolutely, and lost both liues and goods. Vernon a towne vpon Seine yeelded of it selfe, by the voluntarie obedience of the inhabitants. Ponteau du- mer was forced by the Earles of Eu and S. Pol, where as many English men were lost. But Lizieux by the graue aduice of their Bishop yeelds voluntarie obedience, and auoides the miseries of the vanquished. Louuiers did the like, and Gournay was sold by an English captaine that held it. Essey was taken by a gentle stratageme of the Duke of Alanfons. The Captaine accompanied with the fouldiers of his garrison, was gone forth to fish a poole, while he seekes for fish he is taken himselfe, and his Lieutenant deliuers vp the Castell to the kings seruice. Fescampe is taken by the Abbot, hauing intelligence with the Monkes: and at the D same instant a ship arriues out of England, beeing ignorant of this losse: the French suffer them to land and take them all prisoners. Harcourt makes shew to resist, but yeeldes by composition after the sege of eight daies. The armie marcheth against Neuf-chastell of Nicourt, and takes the towne by force, the castle yeelds by composition. The Earle of Clermont was desirous to recouer his chiefe house whereof he carried the name: his subiects gaue him entrie into the towne, and so by the towne he wins the castle. S. Loos at the sight of the armie demands and obtaines a good composition, with all the neighbour castles. Ca- renten yeelds after three daies, and Pont d'Oue is taken by assault: Constances and Gouray by composition. Alenfon freed it selfe from the English, and yeelds to the mild commaund of their good Prince the Duke of Alanfon, who shewed his mercie euen to the English being vanquished, to whom he gaue both life and goods. E

Rochequion was yeelded vp by the captaine of the castel, who of an English man becoms French, by the perswasions of his wife, who was a French woman. Chasteau-gaillard a fort of importance vpon the riuer of Seine, endured a siege of fixe weekes, but the presence and good fortune of Charles, made him master of the place. Gisors, so famous for the English quarrels, was yeelded to the King by the Captaine, who likewise came to the Kings seruice, and in the end Valonges, a place of importance, the which hereafter shall come in question by a famous accident.

As the Kings armie made this progresse in Normandie, so it increased daily by these new conquests. Rein King of Sicily, and the Duke of Brittanie, arriue with goodly voluntarie F troupes, and some townes newly reduced to the Kings obedience, with an infinite number of good fouldiers: but about all, the Court was goodly, by the multitude of Noblemen, who went not onely to honour the Kings good fortune, but carried by an inward instinct of his right well gouerned, (as it were by a celestially guide) did runne to an assured victorie, and to the possession of an heires lawfull right. The Dukes of Bourbon, Alanfon, and Brittan were

A were there, with the Earles of Richmont Constable of France, of Maine, Eu, Saint Pol, Du- nois, Caftres, Tancarville, and Dampmartin. The Duke of Lorraine, and John his brother, augmented the traine of King Rein. John was: mall of Vrins, Baron of Treignell, and Chancelor of France was there, hauing succeeded Remauld of Chartres Archbishop of Rheims, being lately deceased. The Lords of Culant, Bueil, Montgascon, Blainville, Preffigny, Brion, Prailly, la Bouffiere, Monter, Aigreuille, Malicorne, and Han, with an infinit number of the Nobilitie.

Charles resolu'd to embrace these goodly occasions, finding (by the obedience of so many countie townes) the way laid open to Rouen, the capitall cittie of that Prouince: he determines to beseege it, and all with one consent aime at this goodly marke, as the chiefe of the Kings affaires. But it chanced through the prouidence of God, that whereas there seemed greatest difficultie, there it prooued most easie, by the loyaltie of the French, who cannot denie their Prince. The combat was ciuill, managed more by counsell then by force.
 The cittie was much at the Kings deuotion, yet were they kept in awe by the English forces, beeing masters of the strongest Forts within the cittie. The Duke of Somerfet was there present with authoritie. Talbot must imploy all his valour: but neither force, forts, authoritie, nor valour were of any force, for that God hauing determined to restore this estate, by the meanes of Charles the feuenth, inclined both hands and hearts to his decree, the which no mortall man can preuent.

C The King beeing at Pont l'Arche, had certaine intelligence from the best citizens of Ro- uen, that the whole Cittie was resolu'd to obey him: desiring onely to be supported by his presence and forces: vpon this aduice he causeth the Earle of Dunois to march, and to shew himselfe vnto the Citizens: who sends a Herald to summon them to yeeld their obedience vnto the King, whom the English were like to haue torne in peeces. No citizen dares shew himselfe vpon the walles: all is filled with enemies. The English had seized vpon the wals, so as no man within the towne durst approach. Hauing thus marched about the towne in good order, fearing no lesse the lightnesse of the peoples humour, then the Winter which approached (beeing then October) he resolues to retire. Charles and his Councell distrust these popular humors, as not able to draw the cittie to yeeld: he therefore thinkes it best to lodge his armie about it, and to seaze vpon the passages of the citizens chiefe houses, being the best meanes to draw them to reason. The which was speedily put in practise. The troups were scarce lodged in their quarters, when as Charles lying at Pont l'Arche, had intelligence that his seruants had seized vpon two towers, by meanes whereof they had a quarter of the cittie. Whereupon the Earle of Dunois shewes himselfe presently with the armie before the cittie, and diuides his troups according to their quarters. The brute of those forces is great vpon their approach: they haue aduice to march, the which they do resolutely, beeing set in order, full of generous resolution, as in the Kings presence. The Ladders are set to the wall, and they begin to mount, all prepare to follow, fortie of our men get vp the wall, when as the Lord Talbot arriues with three hundred desperate English, who hauing cut the cittizens E in peeces, charge our men that were ingaged, some they kill, the rest leape from the walles, and few recouer the place from whence they were mounted. The King holding the cittie wonne, comes to Darnetall, when as the Earle of Dunois returnes to aduertise him of the hard successe of this popular brag, so as all held it for wind and smoake.

In the meane time the cittizens slept not, the little bloud of some that were slaine set all the rest of the cittizens on fire, who resolu'd to vnmaske themselves, and to speake plainly to the English. The whole cittie is incensed by meanes of the magistrates, euerie man prepares his armes against these strangers. The Archbishop of Rouen (a name which the histo-rie owes to the truth and honour of the French loyaltie) was a good seruant to the King, and had great credit with the cittizens: so as the whole cittie assembles with him, and by a common consent all resolu'd to returne to the Crowne of France, as to their beginning: Somer- set and Talbot runne thither with fiftie men, but what is that against a multitude? The Archbishop acquaints them with the cittizens resolution, who in their presence depute the Officiall to go vnto the King.

The summe of his Ambassage was, that his Maiestie should graunt vnto the cittizens of Rouen a generall abolition of all that was past, and leaue for the English and all others of their

This resolution deliuered boldly in the presence of Somerset and Talbot, amazed them much, their courages were daunted. And what could their weake authoritie do against the whole bodie of a cittie, fortified with the Kings approach, his armie, and his right? Thus the cittie of Rouen sends deputies vnto the King, and obtaine all they demaund, who being returned with this good answer, all are satisfied but the English, who keepe the walles, towers, bridge, castle and pallace: all this must be fought for. They prepare for force, the people do the like, all the streetes are filled with armed men to force the walles.

The citizens send againe vnto the King, beseeching him to approach with his armie with all speede, to take absolute possession of his cittie of Rouen. Attending the Kings answer, the citizens do happily winne the walles, the towers and the gates: all that belongs to the cittie obeyes the King, the English with great difficultie recouer the bridge, castle and pallace. But they enioy not these forts long: for the citizens beseege the bridge and winne it, and now the armie comes downe the hill. The citizens at the sight thereof cry, God save the King, all breake out into ioy and triumph. The armie enters the cittie, to the peoples exceeding ioy, attending the King. In the meane time S. Katherine's fort is beseege, and yielded to the Earle of Dunois: Charles lodged there whilest the cittie is freed from strangers: the castle yeeldes, the Pallace onely remains: Somerset and Talbot are there, they are men of action, who had wherewithall to fight for their liues: but how can they hold out, all being disposed to an accord?

Charles being wholly inclined to clemencie, doth willingly see Somerset and Talbot at S. Katherine's fort, who receiue a lawe from his victorious hands, yet would he not admit them with conditions like vnto the citizens: but he giues them leaue to retire with their liues and goods vpon these conditions, That they should leaue their prisoners and artillerie, deliuer vp Arques, Caudebecq, Tancarville, Lisle-bonne, Honne-fieu, and Monstreuille, they should pay fiftie thousand crownes presently, and discharge their priuate debts in the cittie before they departed: for assurance whereof they should leaue Talbot (the flower of all their men) with fife other hostages such as the King should demand. So Talbot remains for a pledge. After ten daies (all articles agreed vpon being performed, except Honne-fieu) all the hostages haue leaue to depart, except Talbot, who stayes vntill Honne-fieu is deliuered. But Talbot must haue more time to taste the bountie and clemencie of our King, and the French courtesie. Thus Charles enters Rouen with great pompe, but the peoples ioy exceeded the stateliness of his traine. Their shoutes drowne the Trumpets and clarions, all cry, God save the King. This poore people (greedy to see their Prince, after so long and cruell a seruitude) weepe for ioy, men and women, young and old, all runne; many bon-fires are made, but the fire of publike deuotion burnt more cleare. This was the tenth of Nouember in the yeare 1449. a notable date for so singular a deliuerance. There yet remained some townes in Normandie to conquer. Charles loth to loofe any opportunity, or to giue the enemy any leifure to bethinke himselfe, would scarce allow of any time for the publike ioy and content of his good subiects, but goes presently to field with his armie.

Honne-fieu would not obey the Duke of Somerset, the which he must deliuer vp according to the treatie: there were fiftene hundred English, resolute to defend the place, but after fiftene dayes siege they yeilded vpon honourable tearmes, their goods and liues being faued. Charles for an increase of the good cheare he had made vnto Talbot during his imprisonment, giues him his libertie without ranfome, with meanes to retire himselfe into England and great gifts: but he shall make him no due requitall of this good and honourable entertainment. Fougères, the subiect of this last warre, and the chiefe cause of his good success, returns to the obedience of the crowne, through the valour of the Duke of Brittainie: and Belesme with the castle of Fresnay, by that of the Duke of Alanson. As these things succeeded happily for our Charles, so all went crosse in England. The Earle of Suffolke gouerned Henry the 6. quietly, being a young man, and of a weake spirit. As all the affaires of England depended vpon this Earle, so did the reproches. The Duke of Somerset (a Prince of the English blood) very ielous of his credit and reputation, & ashamed to be blemished with these losses in France, layes the chiefe fault vpon Suffolke, & others that had the gouernment and

England.

A and so incensed the people of London against them, as the Londoners transported with choller for so great a losse, meaning to punish the offenders, fall vpon the Bishop of Chichester, Lord Keeper of the priuie Seale, and kill him in a mutinie: they intend the like to Suffolke, if (by the fauour of some of his friends) hee had not bene put into the tower of London, to yeeld an accompt of his actions. Henry (who loued him dearely) takes him forth and sent him into France, for his better safetie. But it chanced that Suffolke seeking to auoid one danger, fell into another, where he made his last shipwracke: for being met by Somerset's people, being his capitall enemy, he was taken and beheaded, his head and bodie were sent to London, and those cruell spoiles set vp to publike view, in places most frequented. B In the meane time, all England troubled for the losse of Rouen, and the greatest part of the Prouince, resolues to hazard all, to saue the rest of their conquests in France. They had yet in Normandie the townes of Caen, Vire, Auranches, S. Sauueur le Vicont, Falaize, Damfront, Cherebourg, with the strong places of Tombelaine and Briquebee, and a great part of Guienne. With this remainder the English imagine to recouer the possession of what they had lost. So Henry sends speedily 4000. men, vnder the command of Thomas Tirell, one of his most renowned Captaines. Being landed at Cherebourg, without any losse of time, he beseegeth Valonges, a strong place and of importance. At the brute of these forces, all the English garrisons assemble, to augment his armie, and to fortifie the seege, so as being together, they make about 8000. men. Our armie was lodged in diuers places to refresh themselves since the seege of Honne-fieu, the season being wonderfull moist in the thaw of the spring, when as newes came to Charles of the landing of the English, and the imminent danger of the beseege, the losse whereof were a foule blemish to his victorie. To prevent this, he presently sends the Earle of Clermont with sixteene hundred lances, whereof the Earle of Castrès, the Admirall of Raiz, the Seneshall of Poitou, and the Lords of Montgauccon, Couran, and Rouhault were the commanders. The English armie was lodged at Fournigny, a village betwixt Carentan and Bayeux, in a place of aduantage, to keep themselves free from such forces as they might doubt should be sent from the King, being then in the countrie. Mathew Gooch an old English Captaine, came vnto him with a thousand archers. The English being thus fortified, set their backs to a riuer, being flanked with diuers Orchards and Gardens, before them they make trenches to hinder their approach, and in this sort they attend the enemy.

The neerensse of Charles made them to imagine our French to be more in number then they were; for this troupe did not exceede sixe hundred fighting men, whereof an hundred onely, commanded by Jeffrey of Couran, and Joachim of Rouault, charged the English vanguard, and hauing slaine three or foure hundred, put the rest of their armie in disorder: yet the Earle of Clermont seeing the danger he was in with his troupe, if the enemy had discovered his aduantage, hauing so great an armie against his small forces, sends presently to Charles for speedie succours. By good happe as the messenger came vnto the King, the Constable of Richmond arriues from Brittainie, who marcheth presently, not giuing his soldiers any leifure to breath, exhorting them to go couragiously to an assured victorie. His coming strake the stroke, and swayed the victorie. He had 240. Lances, and 800. Archers, and with him James of Luxemburg; the Earle of Lauall, and the Lord of Loheac Marshal of France, with the good fortune of Charles. He arriues euen when as the Earle of Clermont was farre engaged in the fight, the English had taken two Culuerins from him, and in despite had passed S. Clements Ford, preparing to discharge these Culuerins: when as behold the Constable comes with his troupe with a victorious countenance, who at his first approach winnes the bridge vpon the riuer. The English are amazed, especially when they see Mathew Gooch (who was somewhat retired from the bodie of their armie to succour at all euent) take the way to Bayeux. The Constable makes his profit of this flight, who without pursuing them, chargeth their dismayed troupes.

Thomas Tirell puts himselfe in defence with the fauour of the riuer, the orchards and gardens: but the Constable commands some of his horsemen to leaue their horses. The Earle of Clermont inuiroes the enemy on the other side: the English being charged of all sides, feeling the weight of their blowes, giue way, leaue their armes, and suffer themselves to be slaine, and taken to mercie. The courtesie of the French spared many in this overthrow, there 1450. there were more taken prisoners then were slaine. They buried in three pits 3774 carcases, by the report of the Heralds, Priests, and good men that were there. This losse did likewise burie all the conquests which the English had made in Normandie. The commanders of the armie were prisoners, Tirell, Norberie, Drcens, Kirqueby, Warberton, Arpel, Alengour, Vaquier, Calleurille, and a great number of English Nobilitie, armed with coates of armes: all are lead to Charles with their ensignes. An honorable spoile to his triumph, but a perpetual ignominie both to the runners away that faued themselves, and to the cowards that were taken prisoners. This absolute victorie cost France but eight men, to the end they might do homage to the great God of armies and victories, who by this memorable ouerthrow made way for our restauration. I read with ioy the warrant of the Originall. And therefore wise men do say, that the cause of the Frenchmens victorie, and so by his diuine power the English were overcome. This victorie was giuen vs from heauen, the 19. of Aprill in the yeare 1450. and thankes were giuen vnto God throughout the realme. A sollemne procession was made at Paris of fourteene thousand young children, from the age of seauen to ten yeares, carefully chosen out, to the great content of the people, going from Saint Innocents to our Ladies Church. This notable victorie of Fourmigny, did ioone after cause the rest of Normandie to yeeld: Vire yeelds by composition, the which was granted to 400. Lances, who might wel haue contended for their liues.

All Norman dye yeelds to Charles.

Auranches stood the longer vpon tearmes, through the resolution of five hundred voluntaries, but in the end they departed with their liues onely, and a white wand in their hands. The strong castell of Tombelaine guarded by a hundred English, yeelded two daies after. Bayeux resolues to fight it out, all prepare to armes. After the ordinance had made a great breach, and the mine readie to play, Charles fearing the facke of his subiects, as well as of his enemies, would not suffer his men to attempt so dangerous a matter, and the souldiers on the other side crie out to be led vnto the breach. But in the end they march without command, and are twice repulsed, yet Mathew Gooch (beeing amazed at the furie of these desperate men) demands a parle, the which is granted by Charles, but he obtained life onely, and a white wand for euery Souldier: to some Gentlemen of marke a horse, and to poore families some carts to carie them. A piteous spectacle, to see 400 women carying their children either in their armes or in their cracles, leauing all their goods and moueables behinde them, and hardly carying a poore cloute for their greatest neede. So Misery comes to him that spoiles for he shall be spoiled: that makes another weepe for he shall haue time to weepe. Yet Charles caused this troupe of nine hundred men beeing disarmed to bee safely conducted with the rest to Cherebourg, a place which they had demanded for their retreat. Bayeux beeing thus yeelded, the Kings armie marcheth to Saint Sauueur le Viconte, the which yeelds without batterie. They had a good composition for the number of men of warre that were in it, beeing five or sixe hundred: they grant them their liues and goods, retiring to Cherebourg. Charles was loth to loofe his men vnconstrained, for that there remained yet some places of strength.

The composition
at Caen.

Caen (a goodly and populous citie) was besieged with great preparation, but to what end should I consume time in the priuate report of assaults, seeing we haue to the victorie? A great peece of the wall beeing beaten downe, and our men burning with desire to runne to this honorable breach, Robert de Vere beeing gouernour, demands a parle, he held the castle (beeing one of the goodliest peeces in France) with foure thousand souldiers. So by the commandement of Charles, the Earle of Dunois yeelded them an honourable composition; to depart with bagge and baggage and their armes, except the artillerie: the prisoners were set at libertie, and all that the Cittizens might owe vnto the English was discharged, to the benefit of the debtor. All depart the fift of Iuly and are conducted in safetie according to the accord, and the King makes his entrie two daies after.

Falaize is besieged in the mean time, and yeelds the one and twentieth of the same moneth. Fifteene hundred English of their best souldiers, obtained a good composition to depart with bagge and baggage. Domfront garded by fifteene hundred franke Archers yeelds vpon the like composition, the second of August following. Cherebourg (one of the strongest places of Europe in those daies) was the conclusion of that account, and the crowning of this happy worke. It was guarded by 2000 desperate aduenturers, who (wonderfully griued with so many misfortunes) would be buried in the ashes of this last losse: but Thomas Gome, Gouernor of the place preuailed more then their oblitinate resolution, shewing that they had discharged their duties to their Countie in beeing the last to fight. But nature swayed most with Gome, for hauing his sonne prisoner with the King, hee would not loofe himselfe with his sonne. The accord was made absolute for his souldiers and his sonne, and vpon this accord he leaues the towne, and retires last into England, to admonish Henry to prouide for Guienne, where the whole burthen of the warre would fall. So the twelfth of August in the yeare 1450. Normandie (one of the goodliest and richest Prouinces belonging to this Crowne) was reduced to the kings obedience, in a yeare and sixe daies, hauing remained in the possession of the English thirtie yeares, and so kept by them, as it is a miraculous worke of God they were so easily dispossessed. But leauing Normandie, let vs come to Guienne, to finish the restoring of this Estate.

Guienne returnes to the Crowne of France.

Charles had begun her last feates of armes by the taking of Cognac and Saint Maigrin, as we haue said, whereas the warre continued coldly during that of Normandie. But Charles after the happie conquest of this Prouince, bends all his forces to driue the English out of Guienne, the which he had enjoyed by a lawfull title aboue a hundred yeares. Charles assembles his great Councell with the chiefe of his Prouinces at Tours, for the performance of this voyage of Guienne, and to find meanes how to maintaine his armie. This done, he giues the gouernement of Normandie to his Constable, and setled Peter of Brezay at Rouen, for the well preferuing of that which he had happily gotten. And to be the neerer to his affaires, he resolues to remaine at Tailbourg for all occurrents. He had then a small armie in Guienne, vnder the command of the Earle of Foix, who had not onely kept the enemy in breath during the warres of Normandie, but also had wonne part of the countie, by the taking of Mauleon in Sole, and Guisans.

England had a lawfull title
to Guienne.

Charles giues the command of the armie to the Earle of Dunois and Longueville a bastard of Orleans, but the Earles of Ponthieure and Perigort, haue another part, to molest the English in diuers quarters, yet these three armies shall make but one bodie vnder this Lieutenant generall to his Master, when the necessitie of his seruice shall ioine them all in one. The Earle of Ponthieure did happily begin the conquest of Guienne, in taking of Bergerac, the which was well defended, and then Gensac, Saint Foy, and Montferrand, and their dependances, by the terrour of his victorious armes. Our braue Gascons did no lesse on their side. About the same time Amanieu d'Albret Lord of Oruall was in garrison at Tartas a Towne of good presage, beeing the beginning of many blessings which God gaue vnto France. He had scarce sixe hundred men at armes, and some good footmen of the countie: but he was well accompanied with Tolereffe, Robin, and Epinaffe, wise and valiant captaines, and with his generous resolution, the hereditarie ornament of his noble house. Hee shewed by the effects, that we must not number the men, but weigh their valour, for with this small troupe he presumes to braue Bourdeaux euen at their gates, and giues a law vnto the countie of Medoc, making not onely the whole countie to contribute, but also to bring their commodities to Tartas. The Bourdelois (to free themselves, not onely from these brauadoes, but from their ordinarie toyle and charge, thrust on by the authoritie and command of the English, who were then their superiors, leaue eight thousand men vnder their Maiors command. The cittizens promise themselves an assured victorie, but this troupe encounters them, defeats them, kills and takes them prisoners. The neare retreat preferred many, but there remained two thousand vpon the place, and the victor led two thousand two hundred prisoners to Tartas, the which were taken like staves in a net, from whome hee drew great ransomes, with the honor to haue vanquished a great multitude with few men. This onely was memorable during that yeare. The next shall bring vs in an absolute victorie of all that held in Guienne for the English. Charles hauing giuen some respite to his 1453. Nobilitie and men of warre, appoints the first day of May to go to field. The armie was very faire: the Earle of Dunois had the chiefe command, (as we haue said) the which did not hinder John Earle of Angoulesme (brother to the Duke of Orleans) from ioyning with the armie, with a goodly troupe of the Nobilitie: as the Lords of Taillebourg, Pons, Rochefaucault, Rochechouard and d'Aubeterre. Duke Charles his brother, was then in Italy for his priuate affaires, whence he shall returne with another traine when he shall be King. Philip Duke of Bourgongne was much troubled, in pacifying a mutinie of Gantois, who molested him, when he had most neede to succour France, in the conquest of the two Prouinces, whereof we now speake. To auoid tediousnesse in the priuate relating of all these sieges, the Kings armie did first attempt Montguyon and takes it: then the Earle of Ponthieure arrives with his troupes, and ioynes with the Earle of Dunois the Generall, and so the armie (being increased both in men and courage) beseegeth Blaie, one of the goodliest fortresses of Guienne, a towne seated at the mouth of Dordonne, and enriched with a goodly haue of the sea, the which was well assayed and well defended, but in the end the towne is taken by force and the castle by composition, although the cittizens of Bourdeaux laboured to releue it with a flecte of siue armed shippes.

Nobi

Bourg was added to this victorie of Charles, and in this amazement, Liborne (being summoned to yeeld vnto the King) obeyes without any contradiction. But their chiefe force was prepared against Fronfac: and in the meane time the Earle of Ponthieure beseegeth Castillon, a towne in Perigort, seated vpon Dordone, (the which shall be famous in the warres of our time) and takes it by composition. Saint Million by their example yeelds obedience. In the meane time all march to Fronfac, (a place renowned since Charlemagne, and one of the strongest forts of Europe) being beleaguered of all sides: as all prepare for some great force, they within demand a parle. Their request was to haue a truce till Midsummer, if they were not succoured by that day, they would yeeld the place, and submit themselves to the kings seruice, and employ all their meanes to draw Bourdeaux to obedience. These offers pleased the Princes and the Earle of Dunois being Generall. The day being come, no succours appeare, and so Fronfac is yeelded vnto the King, to the incredible content of the whole armie, which expected great resistance from this inuincible fort.

If the Earle of Dunois preuailed well on this side the riuer of Garonne, on the other side D the Earles of Foix and of Armagnac failed in no point of their duties: hauing taken Rion, they ioynly beseege Acqs a towne of importance in that Countrie. These happy exploits performed in lesse then two moneths, did as much incourage the French as it did daunt the English, who could not keepe the townes (which yet held for them) from affecting of the French, and much more in the champion countrie hauing more libertie. So as the Nobility, together with the townes, resolute to expell the rest of the English, that the King might be wholly obeyed. Onely Bourdeaux and Bayonne remained: the most important Townes of that Prouince, whether the whole force of this royall army doth march, but the Cittizens of Bourdeaux (loth to be forced) resolute to obey. Being thus affected, they treat and make a profitable accord, as it is set downe at large in the Originall. Their freedomes and priuiledges were confirmed vnto them by John Iuuenall of Vrsins Chancellor of France, they brought their keyes to the Earle of Dunois, (as Lieutenant generall to the King in his army) and receiued the French into their Cittie with exceeding ioy, the first day of August, to the great griefe of the English, who see them selues expelled out of the whole realme, but they shall yet make a new attempt.

The oath of fealtie was authentically made to Charles the 7. both by the cittizens of Bourdeaux, and by all the Estates of Burdelois to their King and lawfull Prince, renouncing the English. The Nobilitie held vp their hands first in this oath, and namely, the Lords of Esparre, Montferrand, Duras, Rosan, Pugeols, Lansac, Lisle, and Anglade, amongst the which how many prooued periured? The Archbishop also did take the same oath of homage and fealtie to the King, with Gaston de Foix: onely Captall de Buch would not take the oath for his person, but he submitted all his Lands to the obedience of the Crowne, an error which shall be preiudiciall to the whole Prouince. Thus all Guienne was made subiect to the kings obedience, except Bayonne: for the reduction of which towne (being needlesse to keepe together so great an armie,) euery Nobleman, was commaunded to returne to his house,

Bourdeaux makes a composition and yeelds.

All Guienne sweares vnto King Charles.

A house, and that the Earle of Dunois should continue there to employ the forces of the countrie at this siege. So the Princes of the bloud depart, accompanied with twentie thousand men, whom they dismisse euery one into his country. The Earle of Foix ioyned with the Earle of Dunois, and they besiege Bayonne; the siege was long, painefull and daungerous: the which might haue bene more easie and speedie by meanes of the armie which was readie. But in truth the niggard spends more then the bountifull man in euery degree: yet in the end Bayonne submits to the obedience of the Crowne vpon these conditions: That the townsmen of Bayonne should deliuer John of Beaumont their captaine into the Kings hands, with their owne persons and their goods to be at the Kings will and discretion; and to repaire their disobedience, and to purchase the Kings fauour, they should pay forty thousand crownes, whereto they are bound by the Earle of Foix, Generall of the armie. This accord was confirmed by the entrie of the said Earle into the towne, who tooke a sollemne oath in the Kings name. Charles forgives the inhabitants halfe their fine, and conputies vnto the King, who was then at Taillebourg, to confirme their oaths, and homages already taken by his Chancellor: and the King likewise doth ratifie their priuiledges, and receiues them into fauour, so as Guienne seemed to be reduced to the Kings obedience, to the incredible content of the whole Realme, and so this yeare ended with an vniuersall ioy.

But seven or eight moneths were scarce spent in this publike ioy, such as the French might haue in euery corner of their country, inioying peace, the which they had not tasted these hundred yeares, and which in outward appearance there was no hope to recouer, the English and Bourguignons hauing taken such firme footing in all parts, when as behold, a great storme. For Talbot comes to the gates of Bourdeaux, with goodly troupes of English, where he was receiued, and tooke the Seneschall of Guienne prisoner, being Gouvernour of the towne, with John de Foix deputy Maior of Bourdeaux; and in a manner the same day, the Nobilitie which had giuen their faith vnto the King, (noted before by their speciall names) delivered all the chiefe places of the countrie to the English. Fronfac, Colceures, Castillon, Chasteau-neufin Medoc, Cadillac, Langon, S. Macaire, Liborne, and Saint Million. D And after Talbot (who came but to discouer) there arrived the next day in safetie, foure thousand fighting men from England, with fourescore ships laden with meale and salt meates, to victuall the towne. The amazement of this losse was as great, as the ioy had bene of gaine. Charles was then at Tours: the Earle of Clermont (sonne to Charles Duke of Bourbon) was gouernour of Guienne. He commands him to haue a care to the preservation of the rest of Guienne, and presently he sends sixe hundred men at armes, vnder the command of three Marshals of France, and the Lords of Oruall and Rouhault, who were then neere the King, and sends for the rest of his forces with all speed. But whilest that all prepare to repaire this losse, may we not examine the motiue of this great and sodaine change? Some new Writers accuse the ill vsage of the French to this people newly conquered, which made them to wish for the English, being more mild and temperate Lords: others blamed the negligence of our French, vnto to keepe that which they had so valiantly gotten. But who is he that can find this first cause truly noted, hearing the whole Historie speake, and representing the discontent of the French nation, against the gouernment of the English. And why did the King dismisse his armie, but to ease his people, euen with the preiudice of his owne affaires?

As for our negligence in keeping of that which we haue gotten with much paine, it is too well knowne by memorable examples: but seeing the affection of the people of Burdelois, had bene confirmed by many proofes, in this voluntarie obedience, to what end had it serued to put them in fetters, as a people vanquished by armes, and force them to obedience? But to find out the causes, we must examine the effects. L'Esparre, Montferrand, Duras, Anglade, Rosan, and others specified in the Register of the oath, will be found straight waies reuolted in these places. Captall de Buch protested openly, that he was not the Kings seruant, so as he might without reproch carrie armes against him for the King of England his master: He might remain peaceably within the countrie, inioying his houses, being vnder the kings protection, and so make his traffick for the English at his pleasure. John K. of Nauarre an Arragonois both by birth and humour, was an enemy to Charles for two respects, as hauing married the heire of Nauarre, and with that marriage the quarrels and hatred of that and Charles which was Grand-father to his wife, who had so much troubled the raignes of John and Charles the first, and as an Arragonois, by reason of the quarrels of Naples, against the house of Aniou. These were two instruments to moue many mens mindes. It could not otherwise be, but the authority and command of two hundred yeares, had purchased England many seruants, and such as had alwaies held the English party against France, and were not reclaimed to the Kings obedience but by force, could not beleue that they had any part in the Kings fauour, hauing brought nothing to his seruice but necessity and constraint. These men being wonne, doe animate, or rather force the people, making themselues the strongest, in places where there was no gardes, whereof they were not onely wearied, but plunged in the trust and assurance of a profound peace. Who seeth not then, but this made the way more easie for these disloyall treachers, to surprize those townes which they had deliuered to the English? but from whence soeuer the mischief came, this was the remedy.

Talbot was the Kings prisoner, as we haue said, at the taking of Rouen; Charles had shewed him all the fauour a man might hope for of so great a Monarche: he gaue him his liberty without ransome, and had honoured him with goodly presents: yet he is become head of the English army, which were esteemed eight thousand fighting men, and marcheth directly against the Kings army, which made hast to recouer what had beene lost, and to preserue what remained. Castillon was become English. The Earle of Ponthieure, with the Admirall and Marshals of France, besiege it, attending the King, who came posting to quench this fire. Talbot makes hast from Bourdeaux with the choicest of his men, bearing an assured victory in his conceit, being ignorant that hee went to seeke death. At the first charge our men begin to wauer vpon the braue arriual of Talbot, but they gather themselues together againe, with great resolution, to stay the course of this streame. Talbot on the other side, encourageth his men as going to a banquet, and not to a battaile, he beates the heads of pipes of Wine, to make his men drinke, him selfe being drunke with presumption, and making his Souldiers drunke with the vaine hope of victory; being mounted vpon a little Nagge, but followed by fixe or seauen thousand men, they come to fight.
The combate was fierce, but the English are repulsed, scattered and ouer-throwne. There were two thousand slaine vpon the place, and amongst the rest, Talbot was ouer-throwne from his horse and slaine, with his Sonne. The Earle of Candal (sonne to Capal de Buche), Montferrand and Anglade are taken prisoners: Esparre escapes for an other time. In the end Castillon yeelds at discretion. Saint Million and Liborne returne to the Kings obedience, to the great content of the inhabitants, being surprized to their griefe. Charles did also warrant them from all losse in this reprise. Cadillac, Langon, Villandras, and S. Maquaire, shake off the English yoke at one instant, and open their gates with their hearts. The Kings army goes from thence to Bourdeaux, being full of Englishmen, but fuller of feare, seeing the English loth to buy it so deare as Talbot had done: so as they suffer the French to wander at their pleasure vp and downe the country of Medoc. This victory was due to the presence of Charles, who being arrived at Fronfac, (the which was held a place inuicible by force) it yeelds as vanquished. The English haue their liues granted them, with a white wand, through the bounty of Charles. He doth not so intreat the reuolted French, for the capitaine of Cadillac being taken, is beheaded for an exemplary punishment.

From thence he comes to Bourdeaux, (the which was the chiefe place of his affaires) but the multitude that came vnto his seruice was admirable, they came from all parts (knowing that the King was present,) so willingly doe the French obey their Prince. There were foure thousand English remaining in the towne, and as many of their faction, being drawne together from diuerse parts of the country: the siege continued two moneths; Charles had no memorable assaults. The sicknesse which increased in the Kings armie, hastened the composition for the Citty, the which hee might haue forced, but that hee desired to spare the blood of his subiects. The composition was thus made. That all the English should passe into England with their goods: that the citizens of Bourdeaux should be all in the

A Kings protection, taking a new oath, neuer to rebell against him their Soueraigne Lord.
And for that some of the country, and of the Citty of Bourdeaux, had drawne in the King of England, contrary to their oath, the King (pardoning the greatest number) should chose twenty at his pleasure, to banish them out of the Realme, their goods remaining forfeited to the Crowne: of this number were Capal de Buche, and Candal his sonne, Du. as, Anglade, Rolan and Esparre, who in the end lost his head, being found guilty of a new treason, a yeare after this pardon. The Citizens of Bourdeaux renewe their oath of fidelity with teares, and receiue a great garrison to prevent all surprises: they build two strong Castels to that end:
one towards the Sea, called Castell Trompette, an other towards the maine, named Castell du Ha. The Earle of Clermont, gouernour of Guienne, remains in the Citty, to settle the Kings authority. Charles carried this true commendation in the recovery of his losse, to haue doubled his army by the good order which hee caused to be carefully obserued, and by his victory, in vanquishing his enemies, not onely by force, but by clemency, and his subjects by loue and mildnesse. So as both the treachery of these disloyalls, and the rashnesse of his enemies with their new attempts, were parts due to his victory, so much the more admirable, for that he doth vanquish, when as he seemed vanquished: he winnes, when as in shew he was lost: and forced as it were to warre for the desire he had of peace, he reaped the fruites both of warre and peace, in fighting valiantly, and vsing the victory modestly, to the eternal memory of posterity.

C Charles returnes from Bourdeaux to Tours, hauing happily finished so doubtfull an action. But oh the inconstancy of this world! England which had so much troubled vs, takes occasion to trouble it selfe, for the losses which they supposed to haue made of that which they had taken from vs: and as affection is wayward and often blind, so it sowes distention vpon strange subiects. The Dukes of York, Somerfet, and Glocester, accuse one another, and make factions within the realme. Richard Duke of York (being a branche of the blood royall) pretended the Crowne to belong more iustly vnto him, then vnto Henry, the sixt then reigning; but contemned, by reason of his great losses, and of his naturall defects.
Somerfet being fauoured by the King (as the ring-leader of his faction) was pursued by York, and so cunningly, as the Londoners (hating him as the cause of all the losses in France) put him in prison; but in the end he was freed by the Kings authority.

This diuision burst out into open warre, vnder the names of two factions, Lancaster, from whence King Henry was descended, and they wore the redde Rose for a mark: and Clar. nce from whence the Duke of York tooke his beginning, bearing the white Rose for a distinction. This ranchor of parties hath bathed all England with the blood of her subiects: two yeares shall not passe after the losse, but Somerfet shall dye in a battaile, and King Henry the sixt (who had carried him selfe as King of France) shall be prisoner: and whereas hee fought to ioine the Crowne of France to that of England, he shall loose that of England, both for him and his: teaching vs that we must neuer thinke to doe harme to another, but we shall receiue our share againe, and not to dispaire in our greatest afflictions. The beginning of this raigne did represent vnto vs a ruined realme, and this end restores it to her first beauty. Thus was this realme restored; from the which the English were quite expelled, except from Calais, and the heyre recouered the possession of his right, the which his successors enioy vnto this day.

The meanes of this singular deliuerance, is worthy to be obserued, vnder the conduct of the first moouer, the which the wise acknowledge to be in the prouidence of God, the So-ueraigne of Soueraignes, and the preseruer of States, whereby he maintaines the society of mankind. Truly in the course of these ordinary meanes which we seeke after, Charles holds the first place, being both capable of Councell, and full of resolution to put in execution. Hee was assisted by great personages in the gouernment of his affaires: And for the warres, hee was furnished with two Constables, which serued him faithfully, the Earle of Boucquan in his aduersity, and the Earle of Richmond in his prosperity: of two Chancellors, worthy men, and fitt for the time: of Renald of Chartres Archbishop of Rheims, and John Truennell of Vrins, Baron of Treignel, the one for the beginning, the other for the end of his affaires? And for warriours, hee had as resolute and happy commanders, as might be found in any raigne, of whom he had great need. But from all this we must ascend vnto the soueraigne cause, who hath shewed vs the rodde, and cast it into the fire, when as it pleased him: that by the example of our Ancestors, wee may more perfectly obserue the causes and remedies of our difficulties.

Now we draw neere vnto the end of this raigne: but before we conclude, wee must obserue the estate of the Church, and finish the discourse of the Schisme, whereof wee haue shewed the beginning and proceeding. We haue made relation of this inexcusable confusion, vntill the councell of Pisa, which (supposing to reforme the scandalous disorders of two Popes being enemies, Gregory and Benedict) aduanced a third, which was John the 23. so as at one time there were three Popes; John at Bolonia; Gregory at Remini (not able to be resident at Rome) and Benedict at Auignon. This multiplicity of Popes bred disorder, to the great scandale and preiudice of all Christians. So as Sigismond (not able to cure this infirmity of the minde, by force) resolu'd to haue recourse vnto the authority of the Church: and to that end he passed through France, England, Spaine & Italy, perswading all Kings, Princes and Potentates, to hold a Councell at Constance, whether the Emperours of Constantinople and Trepisonde, with the churches of Greece sent their Ambassadors, and all Christian nations assisted, to the end this councell might be ecumenicall and vniuersall. In this Councell, John the 23. (being accused and found guilty of greuous crimes) was first deposed and then imprisoned. Gregory the 12. and Benedict the 13. were likewise depriued, & Otho Colonne a Romaine Gentleman, was chosen Pope by the Councell, and called Martin the 5. This decree of the Councell, was accompanied with great and generall complaints, by reason of the corrupted estate of the Church, the which had exceeded farre in some places. Saint Bernard had begun in France, as doth appeare by diuerse places of his writings, and by booke written vpon this subiect. But many of his disciples had followed him in great numbers, Gabriel de Roquesaillade, Thomas Couet, and Nicholas Clemangis had filled all France with these complaints. But in England John Wiclef, & in Bohemia John Hus had perswaded men with greater vehemency: for Bohemia was ready to disclaime the Popes authority. John Hus teaching them not onely to leaue the abuse of manners, but the doctrine it selfe: as is contained at large in the acts of the councell of Constance. It shall be sufficient to quoad them, my stile not permitting me to set them downe at large. The reader that is careful to see the grounds of this controuersie, may goe vnto the Originall, and I will obserue the effect according vnto the duty of the history. Wiclef's doctrine was condemned. John Hus effect came to Constance, (hauing a passport from the Emperour Sigismond and the Councell,) but they were condemned and burnt as Heretikes. Hus in the Bohemian tongue signifies a Goose. John Hus when as the Iudges had pronounced this sentence that he should be burnt, he said vnto them. I appeale from you vnto the soueraigne iudge and preseruer of all truth, who a hundred yeeres hence, shall raise out of my ashes a Goose which shall not suffer himselfe to be roasted. So as John Hus was burnt in the yeare 1417. and Martin Luther began to shew him selfe in the yeare 1517.

There were great complaints against the abuses of the Church, made by Peter d' Alliaco a Cardinal, and John Gerson Chancellor of the Vniuersity of Paris, and deputy of the French Church. The Colledge of Sorbon had giuen him great instructions vpon this subiect, but nothing was effected. They onely make the Pragmaticall Sanction, to suppress the Popes authority. Gerson returning from Basill dyed for griefe at Lions. But this Councell did not end those two difficulties for the which it had bene called: for Peter de la Lune, called Benedict the thirteenth, being deposed by the Councell, and retired into Arragon, had so incited Alphonso King of Arragon, as he supported him with all violence against Martin the new Pope. And the Bohemians were so moued with the death of these two personages (whom they reuerenced) as they tooke armes vnder the command of Zisca a very famous Captaine, and did much annoy the Emperour Sigismond. Peter de la Lune, called Benedict the thirteenth, held his court apart, doing at Laniscote a Towne in Arragon, as Martin did at Rome; but this humour brought him to his graue.

After his death the colledge made choise of Giles Munion, who was called Clement the 7. Martin dies in the other seat, and his colledge doth choose a Venetian of the family of Condelme, & calls him Eugenius the 4. who findes the meanes to cause the Antipope Clement the 7. to relinquish. But the Bohemian action was of more difficulty, for they spake boldly, being

A in armes: and Sigismond the Emperour prest to haue audience for them, hauing receiued great reproches, for that (to please the Pope) he had violated the publicke faith, and suffered the breach of his passport. These causes made Martin the 5. to call a councell at Basill, whether the Bohemians had free liberty to come: but the Emperour gaue them hostages for their safety, trusting his word no more, the which he had broken in the death of their countrymen. There were likewise many more besides the Bohemians which desired some redresse for these visible confusions: so as it was there freely disputed of the necessity to reforme the Church, being fit to begin first with the Pope, and not to suffer the fore-passed disorders, to the great scandall of all Christians: and that (to auoide a future inconuenience, by the generall discontent of all men) it was reasonable he should submit himselfe to the censure of the B councell, wherevnto he was subiect.

The Councell
of Basill decrees against the Popes
authority.

As the fathers of the councell, with a generall consent, had thus concluded, and had drawne articles, That the authority of the Councell was aboue the Pope: Eugenius ( foreseeing the preiudiciall consequence of this decree ) reuokes the councell assembled at Basill; for certaine great considerations which hee said proceeded from the Holy Ghost, and transported it to Bolonia, to the exceeding discontent both of the fathers and the Emperour. They resolute to oppose themselves against this brauado of Eugenius, and to withstand him by the like authority of the Church, whereby he sought to ruine them. By the authority of the generall councell lawfully assembled, they giue him an assignation to appeere before them, and in case he disobeyes, they declare him degraded and excommunicate. Eugenius (to calme this storme) makes shew to yeeld vnto this decree, and promisseth to obey, yet seeking meanes vnder hand to crosse them, relying vpon our Charles the seauenth who followed his party. It chanced also (as Eugenius desired) that the Emperour Sigismond (who was the chiefe opposer to his desseins) died during these disorders: Yet the councell of Basill, was not dissolued, but were resolute to continue firme. Albert of Austria is chosen Emperour after Sigismond, and succceeds him both in his desire to continue the councell at Basill, and in the Imperiall dignity.

The Councell
of Basill summons the Pope to ap-peare.

Matters grew then more violent, our Charles the seauenth (being loth to yeeld in any thing to the Emperour, hauing made a generall truce with the King of England, as we haue sayd, the English likewise holding with Eugenius) sends his sonne Lewis neere vnto Basill, with an army compounded of French and English vnited, to nourish this notable disunion, the issue whereof was as wee haue said. The councell of Basill incensed by these bitter and violent courses practised by Eugenius, in the end they resolute to degrade him, and in his place they choose this Amedee Duke of Sauoy, (of whose we haue spoken in diuers places) hauing made himselfe a monke of purpose, to be chosen Pope amongst so many which aspired to this dignity, and was called Felix. But this cured not the disease: for at this new election of a Duke of Sauoy to the Pontificall dignity, all Kings, Princes, and Potentates were moued (France, England, Italy and Spaine) at so strange a proceeding, and disauow Felix. in the meane tyme the colledge of Cardinals at Rome, choose Thomas Sarzan Pope and name him Nicholas the fifth; a man commended in histories, fit to suppress this Schisme and to reduce the Church to vnion, being wise, modest, learned and quiet: all Kings and Christian Princes allowed of him by a generall consent. Felix was supported by the Germans, (for Albert fauored him) but he dies soone. Frederic the third succceeding in the Empire, a wife and a modest Prince, who (not to contradict the Germanes at the first) followed their humor in fauoring of Amedee: but in the end ouerruled by a generall consent of all Christendome, he vseth his authority with Amedee, to make him renounce his Popedom. Our Charles doth likewise interpose his authority, and sends John Inuenall of Vrins his Chancellor vnto him, being well accompanied: who finds him at Lozanna, where he had made his Pontificall seat with a stately colledge of Cardinales. He feared the King more then any man liuing: whom in his conscience he had moued to a iust dislike of him, when as he made a good shew & yet betrayed him in his greatest afflictions, (crosses which wound euen the very heart of a generous mind) Moreouer Charles was both strong & neere at hand, to controule him, if he should continue obstinate. Felix stands vpon teares, but in the end (whereas the Kings Ambassadors spake vnto him of force) he grew more milde, and treated this business by the Kings authority, protesting that for his loue he did willingly resigne his right.

The Duke of Sauoy made
Pope.

Thus

1454. Thus all obey Nicholas: and Amedee had a Cardinales hat, with the title of Saint Sabine, A and was Legat ouer his countries, and of some part of Germany. This was the end of that feuer which so much tormented all Christendome: the raine of Charles being honored with this blessing of God, to haue beene a sollemne theater both of the restoring of the realme, and the reunion of the Church.

The miserable
ble the of the batt.

But alas! during these cruell confusions of the Western Church, the Christians of the East (who endured much) were now vterly ruined. We left them in very poore estate vnder the raigne of Charles the sixt in the yeare 1396. In fifty yeares (during the scandall of this miserable Schisme and the willfull warres of France and England) there happened a greater alteration. Our Kings and Princes had labored long in vaine to recouer the holy land, consuming an infinite number of men and mony, and preuayled nothing. But Constantinople, the head of the Easterne Empire, remained stil in state, with Greece, Macedonia, B Thessaly and a part of Natolia, whereof Trepisonde was the chiefe of that Empire. In this weakenesse which drewe nere to a totall ruine, the Christians vanity was so great as to make two Empires, the one in Europe and the other in Asia, and then ether Empire being diuided into diuers parcels, held by sundry Despotes or fouveraine Lords, that among so many maisters there should be none at all. These confusions did bring in, fortifie, and wholly settle the Turkes, who were the horrible instruments of Mahomet and enemies to all Christendome. I enter not into the particular discourses of this Easterne history: it belongs not to my subiect. I onely obserue the continuance of time, to shew the estate of the Church, and C the Empire, with our Monarchy.

After our French had abandoned (as we haue said) this imaginary Empire of the East, the Paleologues seased thereon, and gouerned it diuersly, according to their Passions: Michel, Andronicus, Iohn and Manuel, hauing brought vpon the stage, both in diuers occurrents and with diuers successe, the most horrible tragedies which impiety could deuise: to the great dishonour of the Christian name. In the end Constantine Paleologus giues the last acquittance of the auncient possession of the Empire, to make a new bond in fauour of the Turkes that his name might be answerable to his miseries. We haue shewed what a breach Baiazet had made in Hungary, making so great a slaughter of the French when as he tooke Iohn Duke of Bourgogne prisoner. This beginning of a victory had in shew proceeded farther and ruined Constantinople, the which hee beseege, but that God (who would suffer the Christians to breath for their amendment) suppressed this tyrant by another traynt: for Baiazet being taken by Tamberlane, did then suffer for his cruelty, but hee left the conquest of the great city to his posterity, at such time as the wise and iust prouidence of God had decreed it: the which was 50. yeares after: for the battaile wherein Baiazet was vanquished, after he had ouerthrowen our Christians, was giuen in the yeare 1395. and Constantinople was taken the yeare, 1453. the 29. of May, by Mahomet the 2. grand-child to Baiazet, a fit instrument to punish the impiety, cruelty, and all other kindes of execrable dissolution which then reigned among the Christians, and euen among those which had the chiefe command.

cruelty against his brethren.

This Mahomet was the son of Amurath, borne of a Christian, the Daughter of the Despot of Serua, and instructed by his mother in the Christian religion, to bee the more fit to chastise the Christians, who confessing God in their mouthes and denying him in their deeds, could not be ruined by a fitter instrument and more answerable to the crime whereof they were guilty, then a tyrant Atheist, who hauing tasted the true religion, had spued it out, hauing no religion, and mocking at all that caried the name of religion. This Mahomet (seeking to settle his Empire as the eldest of his house, being loth to haue any companion) caused his two brethren to be slaine, Turfin and Calepin: the one he drowned in a basen, the other he caused to be strangled. Hauing murdered his two brethren by two of his Bahaes, Moyes and Habiz, he puts these murderers to death for his bretherens blood, shedding their blood who had beene the instruments of their murders. Hauing thus settled his Empire by these solemnities, hee applies all his wit to ruine the Christians, being diuided of themselves by strange factions, and as it were inuited him to their ruine. He seafeth vpon the Empire by degrees, being called in by the Christians to decide their quarrells, and fortifying the weaker of purpose against the strongest. A politicke man, painfull, actiue and imperious,

A imperious, getting authority by his fearfull tyranny. Being seased vpon the Country, hauing incombred the Christians affaires, and diuided their mindes by sundry intelligences, it was easie for him to beseege Constantinople: for who should succour it? The greatest enemies the Christians had within the Country, were the Christians them-selues. The Paleologues (with the Churches of the East) had had recourse to the Pope, Emperour and King of France, and by their fauour to the Councils of Pisa, Constance and Basill, one after another: but they returned with nothing but winde, dispaire and mockery. Thus Mahomet (well assured of his enemies estate) besiegeth Constantinople, the which was now but the shadow of the Empire, a great masse of building, testifying, that the beauty of the Empire was decayed. The Emperour Constantin Paleciogus (who resigned his authority vnto Mahomet) had onely a few succours from Genoa and Venice. Mahomet had two hundred and fifty ships of warre, and two hundred thousand fighting men: amongst the which the most warlike were leuied in those Countries which made profession of the Christian religion. The besieged seeing their estate desperate, sought to sell their liues deere. But what could they doe? their walles being battered downe by the horrible thunder of the Turkish artillery, their port forced by their armed shippes, and they them-selues oppressed by so infinite a multitude. So as a generall assault being giuen, Constantinople is taken by force. The City thus forced on the one side, as Constantine and many of his troupe sought to saue them-selues by a gate that was free, they were furiously pursued by the victorious Turkes, and the port being stoppt by the multitude, many were smothered, among the which C Constantine was found dead.

The Turke incensed for the losse of so many of his men, glutted himselfe with the slaughter of the poore Inhabitants of Constantinople, killing all indifferently, without respect of age or sexe, yong and old, women and maidens, with such exceeding cruelty, as no man can write it without terror, nor read it without teares. When we shall set before our eyes this goodly Country of the East, this capitall City of the Empire, where the voyce of the Gospell had founded in the sacred mouthes of so many holy personages, and famous doctors of the Church which haue serued happily in their times, to become now the dongeon of impiety, the fortresse of error, the rendezuous of all barbarisme and iniquity: D where Mahomet raifeth himselfe about the Kings of the earth, and threatens Christendome proudly, hauing an Empire not onely fashioned, but also fortified with the force and power of so many kingdoms. But alas! what speake wee of Constantinople the last of our losses in the East? When we begin by Ierusalem, the chiefe Rendezuous of the Elders of the house of God, from whence the Gospell flowed, where the holy mouth of the sonne of God and of his Apostles haue founded out: when we continue by Iury a land which hath so long nourished the true church, and beene the garde of the doctrine of health: when we crosse ouer this great country of Asia, and from thence passe into those goodly Prouinces of Europe, Greece, Macedonie and the neighbour Nations: when wee cast our eyes beyond the sea, and behold from our windowes the heauens, vnder which Africke lyes, heretofore replenished with so many goodly churches, and enriched with so many excellent Doctors, and yet all these great and large countries are at this day the receptacles of Mahomet, where he vomits forth his blasphemies, and spoiles the miserable remainders of the poore Christian church: where he takes the tithe of sonnes and daughters to giue them to Moluc, forcing them to leaue the truth: where he hath ouer-throwne all liberty, to plant his absolute tirrany, banished all learning and euery thing that may put man in minde that he is a man. What may wee say in comparing our selues with them? are we better then so many that haue liued in those desolate places, making profession of the same Christian religion, and the same hope of eternall life? Are our Prouinces stronger, more fertill and richer then theirs, and our Townes stronger and better peopled? O Christians! if he be wise that takes warning by an other, how much should these examples serue vs? The same way F which the capitall enemy of the Church hath made to Mahomet to inuest him in the Empire of the East, is it not open by our common dissensions? A miserable date: the end of the warres betwixt France and England was the confirmation of the Ottomans at Constantinople; and the beginning of many miseries to many nations, as wee shall see in the following reignes.

I earned much vented.

But as misery is good for something, nay rather as the providence of God is admirable, A who can draw light from darknesse: by the ruines of the Easterne churches, those of the West haue bene enriched. The ignorance of all learning was very great throughout all the Westerne provinces, since the rule of the Gothes. The knowledge of learning and sciences being banished out of the East by the Turke, came into the West, so as by a singular miracle, the West is now become East, this goodly Lampe hauing lightened the provinces to bee a herbinge to the Gospell. But this planting of the Muses, is due to the reignes of Francis the first, as well King of the Muses as of the French. The shipwarke of Constantinople did cast these great personages into Italy, the which haue giuen a beginning of solide and perfect knowledge to our nations, Emanuel Chrysoliras an Athenien, George Trapezondæ or of Trebizonde: Theodoros Gaza a Macedonien, Ierosme Spartiate, Gregory Tipherides, John Argyropyle of Constantinople, Laonicus Chalcoridil an Athenien, Marcus Musurus a Candiote, and John Lascares. These haue begun, but our men haue so followed, as they haue surmounted them in the knowledge of those goodly professions.

Almost about the same time the art of Printing had his beginning. Some attribute it to the yeere 1440. to John Guttenberg borne at Strausbourg, others to John Faustus at Mayence, in the yeere 1452. Doublesse it is an excellent inuention to increase knowledge, although the vanity and malice of men makes it often times their baude, to the preiudice of the truth and all good manners. But hauing wandred ouer so many strange countries; Let vs returne to France, from whence hauing expelled the English and restored this Monarchy to her ancient beauty, by the means of our Charles, wee must now see the last act of his reigne and life.

His last act of the life of Charles, contenes a notable president of the vanity of this world. Charles had passed a languishing youth, borne in the weakenesse of his father, and bred vp in the cruelties of his mother: he began his life with pouerty, the which was continued in the despaire of his affaires, and yet he purchased peace to his realme; but now he cannot inioy it, banding against his owne blood, and luying in so wilfull awaywardnesse, as in the end hee brought himselfe vnto the graue after a terrible and tragick manner. The whole Realme being in quiet after a long and tedious warre, behold a new storme ariseth in the Kings house. Lewis the eldest sonne of Charles and Daulphin of Viennois, was not well satisfied with his father, and his father lesse with him. The occasions are rather probable then true, as they are obserued by writers. For to what end should Lewis bee so discontented with his father, for that hee was giuen to the loue of Ladies? It is more likely that the ieaousie of commad, was the cause why the son was not wel satisfied with the credit his father gaue him in the State, and the father feared, least he should attempt more then was fitting. But whatsoeuer it were, behold a diuorce betwixt them. Lewis was not able to endure the waywardnesse of his ieaous father, craues leaue to make a progresse into Daulphine, to visit his subiects, and hee obtains it: but hee spends two yeeres in this voiage. Newes comes to the eares of Charles, of the carriage of his sonne Lewis, the which hee did interpret according to his ieaousie: secret spies stie out to obserue the Daulphins actions, describing them according to the humour of Charles and flattering his passions. They obserued what men repaired vnto Lewis, and chiefly what great personages he entertained, John Duke of Alanson (Godfather to Lewis) the Dukes of Bourgongne and Sauoy, and the Earle of Armaignac,

King Charles
and the Daul-

1455.

A were those on whose loue the Daulphin chiefly relied. He had likewise need of money, considering the great charges of his traine, and the small meanes his father gaue him. This necessity made him to entertaine James Coeur a rich man, and very industrious to finde meanes to haue money.

This familiarity was very vnpleasing to Charles, who was not onely ieaous of James Coeur his purse, but also of his good iudgement. All these were deepe in disgrace with Charles, but the weakest shall goe to the wall. The Kings choller increased hourly, for that Lewis came not vnto him: but he delaied the time, and auoided his fathers commands with friuolous excuses. Charles thinkes to force him, by taking away the meanes to entertaine his traine: to this end he reuokes his assignations, and commands his Treasurers and receiuers of Daulphine, not to furnish him with any thing. Lewis takes it by his owne authority and forceth them to obey him. The Officers complaine to the King, and they must haue men to resist this force. The poore subiects pay all, and complaine with the Officers. Thus the irons grow hot by degrees, especially in the fathers conceit against the sonne, by whom he sees himselfe disobeyed with a publike scandal. So he takes Councell of his choller, and resolves to force him to that which he could not willingly haue.

With this resolution he leuies troupes, giuing the charge thereof to Anthony of Chabannes Earle of Dampmartin, to leade them into Daulphine, commanding him to seize both on the Daulphin and of the townes of that Prouince, and with him he sends the Lord of Chastillon to gouerne the country, and to haue a speciall care to disperse all his sonnes intelligences being resolved to follow after with new forces. A dangerous Commission for these two seruants, who in time shall smart for it: but a more miserable employment of a father against his owne sonne, and an vnaturall feare of a childe, flying his father as his enemy: for the Daulphin seeing his country of Daulphine in armes against him, and his fathers forces to approach, persisting wilfully in disobeying of his fathers command, hee resolves to retire himselfe into Bourgongne. John de Lestun, bastard to the Earle of Armaignac, was his great counsellor, with Lewis of Chalons prince of Orange, with whom he was when these newes were brought vnto him. And for that Orange is inuironed with the territories of France, Lewis (being loth to be ingaged) departs secretly and slips into Sauoy, being accompanied with these two good guides and their troupes, hauing some houses fauorable for him in Daulphine, from whence hee passeth into Sauoy and so comes safely into the Franche-Comte & then into Brabant, where he was honorably entertained by the duke of Bourgongne.

sends an army
against the
his sonne.

Charles seeing his sonne gone out of the Realme, resolves to punish such as he held to be the cause of his departure, and that were in his power. Hee beginnes with the Earle of Armaignac, who had giuen him Lewis his bastard sonne for a guide: hee dispossesseth him of Armaignac and Rouergue, so as with great difficulty hee saues himselfe in Arragon: the colour was, that he would not obey the King, but opposed himselfe against the Archbishop of Aux, who was preferred by his nomination, with such other trifles of no moment.

Charles spoiles
the Earle of Armaignac.

E But Charles himselfe takes the charge to subdue the duke of Sauoy, against whom he had an hereditary hatred. The duke preuents the danger, and by the intercession of the Cardinal of Estouteuille, hee makes his peace with Charles: he giues him his children for hostages, and discouers what the Daulphin had said touching the marriage of his daughter Charlotte, whereunto hee would neuer agree without the Kings consent, and so they part good friends in shew. And for the effecting of that which concerned him most, Charles sends to the Duke of Bourgongne, to demand his sonne, and to let him vnderstand that hee fed the Fox which should deuoure his pulleine. The Bourguignon excuseth himselfe, and so doth the Daulphin Lewis, with so great shewes of reason, as it seemes Charles should be content: but yet he parts not from Brabant, being entertained with state by Philip according to his greatnesse. Charles is more incensed by this delay, the which hee takes for a deniall, and doubles message vpon message, and to his words he addes deeds. The duke of Bourgongne had a notable quarrell with the Gantois, who were mutined, by reason of some impositions vpon Salt. Charles fauours the Gantois against Philip, whom hee commands to suffer them to liue in peace, being subiect to the crowne: and if hee had found any aduantage, he had made warre against him: which the Bourguignon foreseeing, he fortifies his frontiers with 1456. with new garrisons, and hee himselfe remains there, to stand vpon his gard, and to preuent A all accidents. In the meane time, Lewis being a widower (as we haue said) by the death of the daughter of the King of Scots, he marries Charlotte, daughter to the duke of Sauoy. Charles was wonderfully discontented with this new presumption of his sonne, who was a young man, obstinately bent to his owne will, yet had he before giuen halfe a consent to this marriage treating with the duke of Sauoy.

Lewis marries a young, to the great dislike of his father.

banished.*

Four yeeres passe and more in these domesticall broyles, but to what end serues it to relate every particular, hauing so large a subiect: I haue faithfully continued this discourse, according to the truth of the matter, and the course of times. Before we speake of the Duke of Alençon, James Cœur remains a principall part of this criminall subiect. The Treasurer was likewise blamed, not onely for that hee furnished the Daulphin with money too liberally, but also directed him with his counsell, being a man of iudgement. I know the greatest part of writers note this accident otherwise, both vpon an other subiect, and at another season. As for the time, it is a manifest error in the calculation of Montfretet who referres this sentence to the yeere 1452. and in the yeeres fifty five, hee imploies James Cœur in an honourable Ambassage, to Felix the fifth duke of Sauoy and Pope. But this is not the first contradiction of dates we finde in this Author, who had viewed the affaires of France by the eyes of an other. As for the effect, hee reports that which all the world knew: that James Cœur was accused to haue robbed the King, and (to make his great trafficke in the Leuant more free) to haue had intelligence with the Turke, and to haue assisted them both C with armes and counsell. These were capitall crimes, and yet hee escaped for a fine of two hundred thousand crownes, and banishment: and therevpon the Lady of Mortaign was punished, as hauing wrongfully accused him. Yet I finde that more likely which the Seigniors of Lodun and Saint Pons, Gentlemen of Viarez, dying very old, affirmed to haue heard, the one of his vnclie, the other of his Grandfather, both household seruants to the Daulphin, that the very cause why James Cœur was thus intreated, was for that hee was too familiar with Lewis, as one of the instruments of his youthfull pleasures. Let every man believe what he thinks most probable, whilest we finish this processe. The duke of Alençon was prisoner at Loches, whilest that Charles toiled himselfe to punish the Earle of Armagnac, and to recouer the Daulphin his Sonne. They would haue forced this Prince to haue D answered before the Constable of France, and the foure Marshalls: the which hee refused, challenging the priuiledges of the Princes of the bloud. So Charles (after that he had caused him to languish about a yeere in prison) sends for all the Princes of the bloud royall, the peeres of France, and the officers of the crowne, to meet first at Montargis, and then at Vendosme. He sends this charge especially to Philip Duke of Bourgogne, who preparing a great army to assist there, was countermanded: & so by his example, not any of the Princes, and but very few of the Peeres, were present at this arraignment. But the King (meaning to proceed at what price soeuer,) names certaine Noblemen that should supplie their places that were absent in this action, that nothing might want of all necessarie solemnities to iustifie the condemnation. To conclude, according to the forme set downe in this E processe, John duke of Alençon was found guilty of high treason, praesising to bring the English into the realme, the ancient enemy of this crowne: witnesses are produced, letters auerred, and the confession of the accused: what more? Sentence was iudicially giuen, that he should loose his head, and forfeit all his goods, all being at the Kings good pleasure: the which neither President nor counsellor durst contradict: yet Charles giues him his life, condemning him to perpetuall prison, and his goods to his wife and children, where hee continued but two yeeres, for Lewis being King, hee freed him from prison, and restored him to his dignity.

It is a hard law, when force is ioyned to a Kings command. Howsoeuer it were, the cleere-sighted did iudge, that the Kings ielousie was the true cause of the condemnation of this poore prince, who had alwaies serued the King faithfully, and the King had loued him about all the princes of his bloud, honouring him so much as to make him his gossip, carrying his eldest sonne Lewis to the Font. This his familiarity with his Godson, and the credit the Daulphin gaue vnto his counsell, was held to bee a dangerous testimonie against him. Were it then iustly or vniustly that this prince was thus intreated; who seeth not heere a great

A great proofe of the inconstancie of this world, of great friends they become capitall enemies: neither bloud, nor the gages of loue in so holy a thing as the badge of our Christiannity, can subdue the violence of passion, the which hath no restraint: yea euen that which should be of most force to vnite loue, hath most power to breed and increas ielousies. A notable president in two so great personages. Passion makes these two great princes prisoners, borne of one bloud; the one a King, the other capable of a Kingdome. The one is prisoner at Loches with his gard, the other at Vendosme or at Tours, in the greatnesse of his Court. This is the difference, the one endures paine forceably, the other voluntarily. But he that commits a sinne, is he not a slaue to sinne?

After this condemnation, Charles seemed alwaies grieved both in minde and countenance, the ielousie which he thought to quench, in suppressing him whom he suspected, so increased, as in the end it was the cause of his death. Hee suruiued little about two yeeres after this tragedy, the which happened the tenth day of October, in the yeere of our Lord 1488. and the King died the two and twenty day of Iuly, in the yeere 1461. which time was vnto him a languishing prison, or rather a pining death. Doubtlesse he that serues God doth reigne, and he that serues vice is but a slaue: the crownes and scepters of Kings haue no exception in this. The quiet of a good conscience is true liberty: And who can haue a good conscience, but in doing well? How farre better and more honourable had it bene for Charles, to haue bene beloued and respected by his sonne Lewis, who being growne great, and hauing giuen many testimonies of his iudgement and valour, might well haue eased him in his greatest affaires, as Robert did Hugh Capet, being associate in the same reigne: to be honoured and serued by the princes of his bloud, especially of this his trustie friend, who had giuen him so many proofes of his loyaltie in his greatest affaires, and received likewise from him such firme gages of his loue, and to reape the fruites of this so much desired peace, the which hee had purchased for all his subiects. But if he afflicts others, hee hath a good share himselfe. He makes his sonne to sike, and to begge his bred in a strange countrie: he causeth a poore prince of his bloud to languish in prison: and he himselfe feelles in his soule a continuall torment of griefe, a fire of choller, and a torture of ielousie, trusting no man, but liuing in continuall feare, and was this man at rest? A D strange torment, hee hath brought peace to all men, and cannot inioy it himselfe, hee hath bread and cannot eate it.

But what read I in the Originall of the manners of our Charles? This King Charles (saith His loues, Montfretet) after his reconciliation with Philip of Bourgogne, was of a good life and deuoute, but when he had recovered his realme, he changed his manners, and polluted his life, in maintaining dishonest women in his Court, leaving the company of a good and loyall wife, suffering more honour and reuerence to be done to those women, by the greatest of his Court, then to the Queene: they being more richly attired then the Queene her selfe, the which was an ill president in such a person: yet hee governed his realme very nobly and wisely, and was indued with goodly vertues, maintaining iustice throughout his whole realme. Montfretet and the historie of Saint Denis, excuse the loue of faire Agnes, and here they accuse Charles. My dutie is to quote every part E faithfully in this my Inuentory, in the which there is nothing of mine owne but the bare report, whereby it appeares, that vertues are mixt with vices: and that it is more easie to beare aduersitie then prosperity. Let the example of Dania be confronted with this: Wine causeth drunkennesse, and water tempers. Sometimes age is more weake and imperfect then youth, to the end the whole honour of any good that is in man, may bee ascribed to God, who is the Author thereof. Joy and griefe, ielousie and loue, be they not contrary affections? and yet behold they are both in one subiect, distracting him diuersly. Inconstant nature of man! who is a slaue to sinne, by the meanes of sinne, which receiues the motions of diuers windes, from North, South, East and West, both soure and sweet.

It will be now time after all this, to shew the end of our Charles: but wee may not omit some notable things which chanced in this season, during the ebbing and flowing of these feuen variable yeeres. Lewis the Daulphin was resident at Genepe in Brabant, and married with the daughter of Sauoy, by whom he had a sonne. The duke of Sauoy with his wife (who was daughter to the King of Cyprus) came to visit Charles, and to pacifie him, with hope that hee should soone see his sonne, with this new gage of loue, but all this did but ease and not cure Charles his infirmity. Wee haue said before, that Henry the sixth King of A England, was put in prison by the duke of Yorke, who pretended the crowne to appertaine vnto him by a iuster title then vnto Henry. He makes an accord with the duke of Yorke, to free himselfe from this captiuitie, that Henry should inioy the crowne during his life, but after his decease it should come to the Duke of Yorke, and to his heires after him: and so the prince of Wales, sonne to King Henry, should be excluded from the succession of England. By this accord Henry was released, but Yoland his wife (daughter to King René of Sicilia) shewes her selfe more resolute then her husband, who (hauing provided for her affaires) disauowes this accord, as prejudiciall to her sonne, and against the lawes, which allow of no forced contract made by a prisoner: and so shee armes to maintaine her sonne the lawfull heire of the crowne. The duke of Yorke likewise leuies an army to frustrate the Queenes designs. At that time the Queene did winne both the victory, and the heads of the Duke of Yorke, of his second sonne, and of the Earle of Salisbury his chiefe partisan, whom shee tooke prisoners in the battaile, and caused to bee beheaded, but shee shall haue her turne.

In the meane time these troubles ministred an occasion vnto Charles to attempt against the English: although (transported with these home-bred discontents) hee had a trouble-some enemy within himselfe, without seeking one beyond the seas. This was done by the counsell and aduice of the Constable of Richmont, who fearing the Kings humour; and loth to deale in these discontents, laboured to diuert him, giuing him a better subiect to exercise his spirit. It was also happy for the constable, that hee was farre off, being likely that the iealousie would haue brought him first in question, whom Charles loued not much, for the crosses he had receiued by him in the beginning. The cause which had drawne Richmont from Court, was honorable for him: for by the death of Peter Duke of Britan his Nephew, he was called to the Duchie. Being Duke he would not leaue the office of Constable, notwithstanding all the intreaties of his subiects, being desirous to honour that charge in his age, the which had honored him in his youth: although hee inioyed the Duke-dome but three yeeres, dying with the good opinion of all France, hauing assisted it much both with his counsell and valour.

This aduise to attempt against England, giuen by the Constable, was executed by the Normans, vnder the command of Peter of Brezay, Seneschall of Normandie, accompanied with a good number of the Nobility of Normandie, and foure thousand fighting men: these might doe some great exploit in a country diuided and troubled: but God hath appointed the limits of Kingdomes; and that great ditch of the sea is sufficient to distinguish these two Monarchies, who haue inough to content them without attempting against their neighbour. To conclude, this army lands in England, and takes Sandwich, the which they presently spoile and leaue, & so returne to Honnefleu, from whence they imbarcked, carrying away store of prisoners and spoile. Their speedy returne was chiefly to saue their liues and goods, which had bene in great danger, if they had ingaged themselves farther, for any rich spoile.

death in the midst of ioy.

Charles was intreated by Laaislaus King of Hongary, (sonne to that great Iohn Huniades, one of the strongest champions against the Turke) to grant him Migdaleine his daughter to wife, the which he did. As he prepared for this voyage, and a stately traine for his daughter, which might equall or surmount the Ambassage sent from Ladislaus, newes comes of the death of Laaislaus, (a young man of twenty yeeres of age, and of a generous hope) being poisoned at Prague: Whose death was the cause of many miseries, as wee shall hereafter shew. Their ioy in France was changed to mourning, and the wedding to a funerall, to the great grieve of Charles. But to put him in minde of necessary causes, amidst these voluntary afflictions, It chanced that the mother of Ioane the Virgin (to purge the blot of infamy in the death of her daughter, being condemned as a Sorceresse by the Bishop of Beauvais, to please the English) obtaines a reuocation of this sentence from the Pope, and Charles confirms it, causing it to be solemnly published to the content of all Frenchmen, to whom the remembrance of this generous spirit shall be for euer pleasing.

In the meane time, this iealousie which was settled in the heart of Charles, is fed by the daily whisperings of his household flatterers. And now behold a strange accident; A captaine (in whom he had great confidence) assures him that they ment to poison him: hee beleeues

A beleeues it, and plants this apprehension so firmly in his minde, as hee resolues neither to eate nor drinke, nor knowing whom to trust. Hee continued obstinately for seuen daies in this strange resolution, the which in the end brought him to his graue: for being obstinate in this humour (not to eate, notwithstanding all the perswasions of his physitions and seruants,) the passages were so shrunke, as when he would haue eaten, it was then too late: and feeling his forces to decay, he provided for his last will, and died the two and twentieth day of Iuly at Meun vpon Yeure in Berry, in the yeere 1461. hauing liued nine and fiftie yeeres, and reigned nine and thirty, leauing two sonnes, Lewis and Charles: the first shall reigne after his father, and the second shall bee the cause of new troubles in France, but not such as haue reigned vnder our Charles the seuenth.

The tragical
death of
Charles.

A prince who hath as much aduanced the French Monarchy, as any King that euer commanded: for finding the realme ruined, he hath restored it: his predecessors had planted the English in the bowels of the Estates, hee expelled them, bringing in a gentle peace after an intestine warre of a hundred yeeres. A friend to Iustice, good order and the people, resolute in great affaires, capable of counsell, wife, couragious, happy in the execution of good counsels, and happy in seruants that haue faithfully serued him to the end of the worke of restauration, wherevnto God had appointed him. But these great and heroike vertues were blemished by some vices, which were more visible in his prosperity, then in his aduersitie: for affliction restrained him, but his happy successe puffed him vp, and gaue scope to his humours, making him suspicious and amorous, to the preiudice of his affaires, and dishonour of his person. On the one side, vngouerned loue to strange women, making him to forget the lawfull loue of his wife, and to loose both time and iudgment, whereby hee blemished his reputation; both with subiects and strangers. On the other side, presumption of his good successe, made him vnpleasing to his best seruants, yea euen to his house, in the end it brought him to his graue, after a most fearefull and tragicke manner, leauing in his vertues, an example to be followed, and in his vices to bee auoided, with a visible prooffe in his happy successe, That God vseth weake instruments, to the end that he might be knowne to be the Author of the good worke they haue in hand, that his grace seeming strong in their weakenesse, the homage and honor of all good might bee giuen to him: for whose euer glories, let him glory in the Lord.

His disposition.

His imperfections.

Charles had no sooner closed his eyes, but postis flie to Genepe in Brabant vnto Lewis, to aduertise him of his death. The originall notes it for exceeding speed, that through the diligence of Charles of Aniou, Lewis was aduertised of the death of his father, the very same day he died. This post was speedy, yet slow in regard of the desire Lewis had to returne into France, and to take possession of this goodly crowne, which attended him.

His wives.

As it not then likely, that this so happy a Catastrophe of the latter reigne of Charles, should haue purchased Lewis as happy and peace-full a crowne, as his fathers had beene painfull and full of crosses? But the heires of worldly possessions (which wee call the goods of Fortune, and of the body) doe not alwaies inherit the same humors and complexions of their predecessors. Charles was of a courteous disposition, affable, a friend to Iustice, and capable of counsell: hee leaues Lewis his eldest sonne, a prince in truth humble in words and shew, wife in aduersitie, painefull, a free entertainer of men of merit, curious to know all men, of a good capacity, perfect in iudgement, and very continent. But these vertues were blemished with many vices: ill-tongued, reuengefull, cruell, full of fraud, dissembling, distrustfull, variable, a friend to base people, and an enemy to great persons, yet willing to repaire the wrongs hee had done to many. But let vs impute this alteration to the multitude of his forreigne and home-bred foes, who had greatly altered the good seeds which nature had planted in him. That which plunged him in a labyrinth of troubles and afflictions during all the course of his life, was that at his first comming to the crowne, hee dis-countenanced most of the princes and noblemen, whom Charles had fauoured, preferring meane men to their places, changed (in a manner) all the ancient officers of the crowne, and cashiered and discharged the old companies of men at armes, whereby such as hated him, did take him as an enemy to all valour and vertue. Lewis the Daulphin at the age of eleuen yeeres, was rashly engaged by some Noblemen and others of the realme, in the warre called the Praguery, against Charles his father, who speedily suppressed it by his resolution, as wee haue seene. Being come to the age of man, hee married with Marguerit daughter to the King of Scots: and as hee fell rashly in loue, so he reaped nothing but repentance.

After her death (not able to beare the vnpleasing waywardnesse of his father) hee retires into Daulphine, and takes to his second wife, Charlotte daughter to the duke of Sauoy,
by

A by whome he had Isachim, who dyed young, Anne married to Peter of Bourbon, Isone the wife of Lewis Duke of Orleans, and after King of France, the twelfth of that name, Charles his successor, and Francis who died like-wise in his infancy. In the end Charles going to sup-presse the practises of his sonne in Daulphine, and the neighbour Prouinces, Lewis aban-dons the country, and retires to Philip Duke of Bourgongne, at whole charge he was entertained six yeeares.

Charles being deceased, Philip of Bourgongne (to perfect this good office of hospitality to Lewis) accompanied with Charles Earle of Charolois his sonne, James of Bourgongne Earle of Estampes, Adolfe Duke of Cleues, the Lord of Rauenstein his brother, nephewes to the said Philip, the Earles of Nassau and Saint Pol, and many other Noblemen of the Netherlands, conducted him into France, with foure thousand horse well appointed, chosen among a hundred thousand fighting men, the which Philip had leauied vpon a brute that some Noblemen of the country would aduance Charles the younger brother of Lewis to the Crowne. John Duke of Bourbon (the Duke of Orleans as well for his old age, as for that he mourned for King Charles deceased, came not from Paris) Peter and James of Bourbon brethren, the Earles of Eu, Vendosme, Dunois, Grandpre, Philip of Sauoy, with the greatest part of the Princes, Noblemen and Officers of the Crowne, go to meete him, and conduct him to Rheims, where he is solemnly annointed and crowned by John Lucanall of Vrins Archbishop of that place, assisted by the Cardinall of Constance, the Patriarke of

C Antioch, the Popes Legat, 4. Archbishops, 17. Bishoppes and 6. Abots, the 15. of August.
1461. being about 38. yeeares of age. Two daies after Philip did him homage for his Duchy of Bourgongne, as Peere and Deane of the Peeres of France: for the Earldome of Flanders as a peere of France, and for the county of Artois and all other lands he held of the crowne. Then made he a sumptuous and stately entry into Paris, with very ioyfull acclamations of the people, as you may see at large in the Originalls. After many sports, tourneys and publike feasts, Philip taking leaue of the King, exhorts him to lay a side all hatred and spleen conceiued against some of his fathers ancient seruants, from whome he should draw as many good seruices, as they had giuen testimonies of their loialties to their lawfull Maister: to liue in loue and vnity with his brother Charles, and to aduance him according to D the degree he held within the realme. Lewis was no sooner installed, but the inhabitants of Rheims minister an occasion to imploy the first fruits of his forces. About Saint Remy the collectors of imposts were slaine and their contracts burnt in open street. The King sends thither many souldiers disguised like marchants and labourers, who entring secretly, and at diuers gates, become the stronger and are presently followed by some troupes led by the Lord of Mouy, who seaze vpon the towne, takes 80. or a 100. of the most culpable, puts them to death and suppresseth the mutinie. About the end of the yeare Lewis made a pro-gresse into Touraine, where the Earle of Charolois comming from the pilgrimage of Saint Claude, did visit him, and the King (in reward of the kindnes he had receiued from Philip) giues him the gouernment of Normandy, with 36000. frankes yearly pension: for the non pai-ment whereof there will sonne grow great dissensions and ciuill warres. In sooth the words of a Prince should be held for Oracles, neither should he be lesse iudicious then constant in his promises. The Duke of Alencon was set at liberty, whome Charles the 7. had restrained.
But oh the vanity of man! we shall see him hereafter a prisoner, and condemned vnder his authority, who now giues him both life and liberty. Then the King gaue to his brother the Dukedome of Berry for his portion, and assigned the Queene his Mothers dowry (who shall not long enioy it, but dies in the yeare 1463.) in the country of Xaintonge, with the towne and gouernment of Rochell, Chinon, Pezenas, and other places. Then he went in pilgrimag to Saint Saunear of Redon in Britany, where the Duke did homage for the said F Duchy, the County of Montfort, and other places which he held of the crowne. But deu-otion did not so much drawe Lewis into Britany, as a desire to discover the Dukes affection, his country, and forces, whome he held in ielousie, the which shall easily draw the Duke into the vnion of the malcontents, as we shall soone see; which will fall out happily for him, to disappoint the King of the prey he hunted after in Britany.

1462. nours of Prouinces, and most of the officers both for Iustice and war: he placeth new; being A chosen out of those that had bin companions of his fortune, the which (to agrauate) they called a banishment, imputing it to them that were displaced. Moreouer, he prohibited all Princes, Noblemen and Gentlemen, the sport of Hawking and Hunting, vnder great and odious punishments, no further then he should permit: a second firebrand of the following combustions. Now the King of Arragon (seeking to reduce his rebellious subiects of Barzellona to their duties by force) ingageth the County of Roussillon to Lewis, for three hundred thousand crownes, whereof he receiued fifty thousand presently, being followed with a goodly and mighty army, to succor the said King, vnder the command of James of Armaignac Duke of Nemours. Henry King of Castill, complains by his Ambassadors of these succours giuen to his aduersary, which was a breach of the League betwixt France and Castill. The King (as well to end this quarrell, as that which Blanch the onely daughter and heire of the King Nauarre, wife to the said King of Arragon, had with the King of Castill, by reason of some places in Nauarre) he goes Bourdeaux, and there concludes the mariage of M. galsine of France his sister, with Gaston the eldest sonne to the Earle of Foix, and presumptiue heire of Nauarre, who lay hurt at Libourne with a Lance at a Tournay, whereof he dyed, leauing a sonne and a daughter: Francis Phæbus his successeur (who raigned but one yeare) and Katherine who succeeded him, and was married to John of Albret: then he goes to Bayonne, where the King of Castill comes vnto him, and ends all controuersies. A dangerous and fatall enteruiew: for these two great Princes, the most strictly allied of all Christendome, of ancient time from King to King, from realme to realme, and man to man, bound by great curses to maintaine this necessary league, the which neuer yet had any breach, they now conceiued a contempt and disdain one of another. The French of the Castillians sumptuousnesse and pride, in their wordes, countenance, and apparrell: The Castillians of the plainenesse of the French attire, for Lewis had short garments, and of bad stuffe, the which the Spanish nation did impute to miserableness, wherewith he was neuer blemished. So as from that day, these Kings did neuer loue; but both nations conceiued such a mutuall hatred one against another, as they haue left it hereditary to their posterity: and we haue felt the bitterness of this old leuaine in our late and more then vnciuill tumult. So perilous shall the enteruiew be of our Lewis with Charles of Bourgongne (who shall D hereafter come often in place) at Peronne, as we shall see.

Lewis being returned to Paris, as by the purchase of Roussillon he had fortified his realme towards Spaine, so desired he to assure it on the other side, redeeming the townes lying vpon Somme, the which had bene ingaged by the treaty of Arras, to Philip Duke of Bourgongne, for foure hundred and fifty thousand crownes, with this condition, that the King should maintaine all the officers aduanced by the Duke in the said townes: a promise without performance, for after the oath taken to serue him against all persons, at the first he tooke away the Government of Amiens, of Arras, and of Dourlans from Saneuse: that of Mortaigne from Haut-bourdin a bastard of Bourgongne: and the Bailiweke of Amiens from the Lord of Creuecoeur (whose lands he did confiscate soone after) aduancing to these offices E Launoy the Nephew of Croy, whereby he did greatly discontent the Duke, and the Earle of Charolois his sonne more, who in despite of the said redemption, did afterwards chafe away the Lord of Croy, with his whole family, and confiscate their goods, they being the meanes thereof. Being retried into France, Lewis gaue him the country of Guynes, with the office of Lord Steward of his house. A discontent which shall hasten the Charolois, to arme against our France. Moreouer Lewis, to tye the Pope vnto him, (by the meanes of John Bluet Bishop of Arras, (whoseince was made Cardinall, in recompence of so good a seruice done to the court of Rome) sends Gosfrid Bishop of Albi Cardinall of Abbeville vnto him, to renounce all rights of the pragmaticall sanction. So doing, the Pope promised to send a Legat into France, that should giue all benefices, to the end that all the money which should F be raised thereby might remaine within the Realme, and be no more transported to Rome. But the Pope being seized of the charter of the said Sanction, made no accompt to performe his promise: and to please the Romans, he caused it to be draged through the streetes. So as Lewis being thus deceiued, did forbid to carry any more money to Rome, nor to bring any Bulls from thence.

He

A He made Sforza Duke of Milan his vassall, giuing him Sauonne which the French held, (a heauy motiue of lamentable warres, which followed) & receiued his homage. But whilest he labours to purchase friends abroad, hee procures himselfe insensibly mighty enemies at home, the Princes and Noblemen to whom the first places in court, and offices of the crowne did appertaine, seeing themselves with great indignity supplanted by these mushrooms growne vp in one night, and put from the Kings fauour, they found one another, both by mouth, writings, and by diuers messengers: being assured of their mutuall loues, they open their mindes, discouer their conceptions and conclude, To defend and maintaine their dignities. For (say they) to what end doe we suffer the indignities and braueries of these new vpitarts? we should shew want of courage not to apprehend the wrong the King doth vs. We haue armes, men, friends and money to force him to reason, seeing we are debarred his presence by these base people that possesse him. The chiefe were Charles duke of Berry the Kings brother, John duke of Bourbon who had married Charlotte the Kings sister, Francis duke of Britan, John Earle of Dunois, bastard brother to Lewis duke of Orleans, the duke of Nemours, the Earle of Armaignac, and the Lord of Albret. The duke of Berry was easily drawne into this league, discontented to haue no better portion then Berry. The duke of Bourbon had not yet receiued his marriage money. The Briton could not digest foure hard conditions, the which Lewis (hauing an army ready in case he refused) required of him. That he should no more intitle himselfe, By the grace of God duke of Britan; That he should coine C no more money without his permission, that from thence-forth the King should leauy taxes and subsidies in Britan, and not the duke. And that all that were benefited within the dukedome, should acknowledge him immediately for Patron and souereigne. Priuiledges which till then had bene alwaies expressly reserued to all the dukes his predecessors, in the homages they did to the crowne. The Earle of Dunois had alwaies bene the chiefe of the army and Lieutenant generall to Charles the seuenth, and now is deprived of all his offices and dignities by Lewis his sonne. So euery one pretended diuers causes of complaint.

Charles of Berry must carry the bable, a young prince and credulous, an age which doth easily make men bold and rash, for they would vse him as the reuenging instrument of their passions. But where is the meanes to draw him from Court without icalousie? Behold D an occasion is offred. After that Lewis had visited the townes of Picardy lately redeemed, hauing crossed Normandie and Touraine, hee passeth to Poitiers, leading Charles his brother with him. Lewis going one day to his deuotion, John of Rommille and Tannequy of Chastel (Nephew to that Tannequy that was charged for the death of the duke of Bourgongne) agents for the Britan in this action, vnder colour to carry Charles Duke of Berry to the hunting, they lead him into Britan. Tannequy was discontented, for that hauing disbursed fifty thousand franckes at the funeralls of Charles the seuenth, in the absence of Lewis, he had neither recompence, nor any thanks of the King, and was not satisfied for the space of ten yeeres. There remained nothing but to bee assured of Philip Duke of Bourgongne, who even then had great cause of discontent: for during the partialities of England, betwixt the E houses of Lancaster and Yorke, Lewis supported Henry against Edward (he being of Lancaster and this of Yorke) for that Henry had married the daughter of René King of Sicilia, & by consequence was nere kinsman to Lewis. In fauor therefore of this Queene, he makes a proclamation in the territories of the duke of Bourgongne, forbidding them to aide or assist Edward, terming himselfe King of England. And for a greater disgrace, King Lewis would impose a custome vpon the salt in the Duchie of Bourgongne.

The Bourguignon opposeth: he protests that Edward King of England is his ally, & that he could not deny him succors being required. As for the custome he shewes forth the ancient priuiledges of Bourgongne, and intreats the King to forbear in the execution of this charge. Behold a sharpe touch, which might easily open the dukes eares, to harken to these F malcontents: yet would he not enter, but suffers the Earle his sonne to vse al his meanes for this effect, being discontented for the government of Normandy taken from him, and his pension not paid; for the redeeming the townes vpon Somme, and the aduancement of Croy in France. And although the passing and repassing of the Agents and factors of these Princes were very secretly performed by men disguised like religious men, pilgrims league, and beggers, yet could they not worke so secretly, but the King had intelligence, that the Briton 1465. Britton had sent to practise the love and league of the King of England, and that by John A of Rommili, Vice-chancellor of Brittainie, hee had made a strict alliance with the Earle of Charolois, a violent and valiant Prince. Thus the King sends the bastard of Rubempré, a sea Captaine, to surpriſe ſuch as he ſhould finde paſſing out of Brittainie into England, or from the Bourguignon to the Britton. This baſtard lands at la Haye in Holland, hee enters the towne (with three in his company) where then the Earle was reſident. Being examined of his quality, and of the cauſe of his landing, he makes ſome difficulty to diſcouer himſelfe. He is put in priſon, as a pirate, ſent (ſaid they) by Lewis to ſurpriſe the Earle treacherouſly, and ſo to preuaile more eaſily with the Duke his father. This brute was diſperſed through the Country, which made the King odious. At the firſt report of theſe newes, Philip being B at Hedin, diſlodgeth without taking his leave; although hee had promiſed not to depart without ſpeaking againe to the King. Lewis (aduertiſed of the baſtards detention,) ſends the Earle of Eu, the Chancellor Mornilliers, and the Archbiſhop of Narbonne to Laſſe: they accuſe his ſonne of treachery and infidelity, for that hee had made a League with the Duke of Brittainie, a friend and confederate with the Engliſh: hee complains of the reſtraint of Rubempré his ſeruant: and demands amends for words giuen out againſt the Kings honour: that the priſoner ſhould bee enlarged, and for expiation of the crime, that the authors of this ſlander ſhould bee deliuered into the Kings hands (eſpecially Oliuer de la Marche, one of the cheife in the Dukes Court) to bee exemplarily puniſhed. The Chancellor who deliuered the ſpeech, beeing but a blunt man, made it as bitter as hee C could, and omitted nothing that might make the fact odious and criminall (for the which hee ſhall in time and place, bee diſauowed by the King and looſe his office) adding moreouer, that hee could not conceiue the cauſe of the Earles diſcontent, if it were not for the penſion and gouernment which the King had giuen him, and ſince taken away.

Ambaſſadors
from Lewis
to Philip.

Philip answers to the Ambaſſadors.

Philip answers, that Rubempré being charged with many crimes, was juſtly taken, and in a Country where Lewis had no right. If the informations did acquit him, hee would ſend him to the King. That la Marche was of the County, and therefore the King not to bee his competent Iudge: yet if hee had done or ſayd any thing againſt the honor of his Maieſtie, he would puniſh him to his liking. Mornilliers inſiſts, vrging that Philip ſhould not D deny the King, and that he ſhould command his ſonne, not to entertaine any bad conceit of his Maieſty, nor beleue the ſlanders impoſed vpon Rubempré. The Duke replies: That till then hee had neuer denied the King any thing: and contrarywiſe the King had failed of his promiſe, in that contrary to their tranſaction he had fortified the Townes redecimed, with great gariſons, the which he ſhould haue inioyed during his life; taking an othe of the Nobility, to carry armes indifferently againſt all he ſhould command. That if his ſonne were iealous and diſtruſtfull, hee tooke it of his mother, who had often ſuſpected him to go to other Ladies: and not from him, who ſuſpected no man. The Earle of Charolois toucht with the Chancellors ſpeech, would haue taken the defence of his honor and the Duke of Brittainie: but Philip fearing leaſt choller ſhould tranſport him beyond reaſon, commands him to prepare for the next day. The night brings Counſell. The Earle hauing conſidered well of his plea, answers very reſpectively: yet he maintaines, that the proceſſe of Rubempré would ſhew, that his imprisonment was both iuſt and duly made. That he had made an allyance and ſtrict league with the Duke of Brittainie, being brothers in armes, but their aſſortiation did nothing preiudice the Kings ſeruice, nor the good of his realme, but rather their common forces ſhould bee alwayes ready for the preferuation of his crowne and the publick good. As for the loſſe of his gouernment and penſion (whereof he had neuer receiued but one quarter) hee was nothing diſpleaſed: that as for any wealth and honours, the fauour of the Duke his Lord and Father did ſuffice him.

Thus the Ambaſſadors returne nothing to Lewis, but threats from the Earle, who charged the Archbiſhop of Narbonne particularly with this ſpeech. That within one yeare he would make the King repent the iniurious words he had cauſed his Chancellor to giue him, in the preſence of the Duke his father. And hauing ſpeedily aſſembled a great armie out of Artois, Henault, Boullen, Flanders, Holland and Brabant, conſiſting of foure thouſand men at armes, & eight or nine thouſand archers, vnder the enſignes of Lewis of Luxembourg E

In truth theſe were goodly ſhewes, able to perſwade the credulous, and to ſupplant the affections of the ſimple.

B For the firſt fruites of his forces, he takes Nelle (a litle caſtell neere vnto Noyon, in the which there was a gariſon) Roie, Montdidier, Beaulieu, and Pont Saint Maxence, then hauing paſſed the riuers of Somme and Oiſe, he comes with little ſpoile of the countrie, to S. Denis, where all the confederates ſhould meete, but they failed of their appointment. Hauing preſented himſelfe before Paris, and ſkirmiſhed at the gates with ſome loſſe to the inhabitants, ſupported onely by the companies of men at armes of Charles of Melun, Bayliſſe of Sens, of the Maſhall Joachim Rouault, and the Lord of Nantouillet, afterwards great Maſter: he ſeazed vpon Saint Cloud, where his armie paſſed the Seine, to draw towards Eſtampes, and to ioine with his confederates, whom the Kings armie ſtayed in their march. In the meane time the Duke of Bourbon ſeazeth vpon the Kings reuenues and treaſure, and C of the chiefe Officers, from whom he might draw any money.

He takes

Then did Anthonie of Chabannes Earle of Dampmartin eſcape out of the Baſtille at Paris, whom Lewis held priſoner, for that he had made warre againſt him in Daulphine, by the command of Charles the 7. vntill he had provided ſuch caution as he demanded for the performance of the condition for the which he had giuen him his life. That he ſhould paſſe the remainder of his life an Exile at Rhodes. Who going through Gaſtinois, tooke and ſpoiled the Caſtels of S. Pourſain, and beeing aduertiſed that the King ſent to beſeige him by the Bayliſſes of Sens and Melun, he retired himſelfe to the Duke of Bourbon. This flight did ſodenly draw the King vpon the Duke. The places of Bourbonois were in a manner all taken and aſſured: but hauing intelligence that the Duke of Nemours with the earles of Albret and Armagnac did march, and that ſuccours came to the Duke of Bourbon out of Bourgonne, leuiued by the Earle of Beauieu and the Cardinall of Bourbon, breethren to the ſaid Duke (the which were of more ſhew then profit) he willingly hearkens to an accord with theſe Princes, wrought by his ſiſter beeing wiſe to the Duke of Bourbon, that they ſhould beare armes for the King, and labour to winne their confederates vnto him. A convention ill obſerued, by meanes whereof Lewis had cauſed the ſiege of Rion in Auvergne to be raiſed, the which was at their deuotion: this done, he goes towards Angers, to trie if by mildneſſe and good meanes he might reclaime his brother beeing in Brittainie. Not able to effect it, and hearing the Earle of Charolois approached with great expedition to Paris, hee E leaues Rene King of Sicily and Duke of Aniou, and Charles Earle of Maine his Vncles by the mother ſide vpon the frontiers of Brittainie, to hinder theſe great forces from ioining with the Bourguignons. And leaſt the Pariſiens (abused with this goodly ſhew of the common weale) ſhould receiue them, he beeing ſo farre from them, cauſed his Vncles to aduance, who diſlodging alwaies before the Britton, did greatly annoy him for want of victuals, and hindred his march, and he himſelfe poſts to Orleans with ſpeed, and from thence to Châſtres vnder Montlehery, with no intent to fight vntill he had viſited Paris, and gathered a greater power, but neceſſitie forceth him. The Earle of Charolois hearing of the Kings approach, marcheth towards him with the baſtard of Bourbon, commanding the rereward to ioine with the Earle of Saint Paul, who led the foreward, and takes his place of battaile in the plaine of Montlehery, where they appeare at the breake of day the 27. of Iuly. Hauing diſcovered the Kings armie led by the Lord of Brezay great Senefhall of Normandie, he commands all his archers and the greateſt part of his men at armes to leaue their horſes, and e-uery man to plant a ſtake before him in the formeſt ranks: to withſtand the furie of the horſe: behind he compaſſeth himſelfe in with his carriages, and on the flanke hee fortifies himſelfe with a forreſt adioyning, hauing reſolved to fight on foote in a place of aduantage for 1465. for the foote, before that all Lewis his troupes were ioyned. Lewis had about two thousand A two hundred well appointed Lances, besides the Nobilitie of Daulphine, and some great Gentlemen of Sauoy and Bresse, a great number of Archers, and other men of warre; but not equall to the Bourguignon. God, who disposeth of batailles, would now chastise our King, but not to his ruine.

The Earle of Charolois like a great commaunder vsed a good stratagem, seeing the French armie could not descend into the valley of Torfou, but by small troupes: for when as the forward appeared, they were not aboue 400. Lances, yet he gaue respite to them that were farthest off to set forward, whilest the two armies spend the time in light skirmishes and Cannon shot. Hauing past some foure houres, the Earle aduertised that the Parisiens B (beeing sent for by the King) might come and compass him in behind, he aduanceth first: our forward doth likewise march; but he beates them backe vnto the village, and (to dislodge them from thence) he fires certaine houses, so as the wind driues the flame and smoke into our archers faces, who did likewise fight on foote: he forceth them to abandon the place and to recouer their horses. The Bourguignons likewise mount and gallop after our runnawaies, but they had recouered a long and large ditch which they found by chance in the field with a strong quick-set hedge, behind the which they breathed, whilest the enemy laboured in the pursuit: but issuing at either end in troupe vpon the Bourguignons, they charge them so resolutely, as they turne their backs, ouerthrowing their owne archers in the flight: some recouer their carriages, and some the Forest: amongst others the Earle of S. Paul and his breethren, the Lords of Rauestin, Haplaincourt, d'Aimeries, d'Inchi, Rabodonges, and many others. The Nobility of Daulphine, Sauoy and Bresse had the chiefe honour of this defeat. The archers thus broken, they remained at the mercie of the French. But beeing pestered with the baggage, some Bourguignons rallied together, turne their carts, compass them in, and beate them downe with great beetles of lead. And to increase the losse, the Earle of Charolois fighting on the right hand towards the castle, had an easie victorie over our men, chasing them backe aboue a thousand paces. But hauing intelligence that they were ioyned againe, and that if he passed but two arrow shoots farther he should be taken, he returned suddenly, and encounters an amazed troupe of footmen flying in the village. He D chargeth them, but no man turnes head, sauing onely one souldier who stricke him on the breast with a bore-speare, but the foot-man lost his life with some few others, who could not in time recouer the gardens and orchards. As he passed against the castell, he met by chance with a troupe of men at armes, which saued themselves from the route at the carriages: one of them in the charge giues him a dangerous wound in the throat with his sword, by reason of his beuer that was fallen. Jeffrey of Saint Belain, called La Hire, Bayliffe of Chaumont, and Gilbert of Grassay knew him, they presse him to yeeld and not to be slaine: but behold the sonne of a Phisition of Paris, called John Cadet (the historie in truth owes his name for so worthy an act) beeing big and mightie of bodie, mounted on a horse of the same proportion, rushes through them, and diuides them that held him. Then happily arriues the bastard E of Bourgongne, and the Earles guard, by meanes whereof the French retire themselves to their ditch, where they had beene in the morning. During the which, a false brute of the kings death had almost ouerthrowne all: for euery one began to faint. The Earle of Maine, the Admirall of Montauban, and the Lord of Barde embracing this common beleefe, fle with all the reward. Lewis aduertised of this amazement, takes off his helmet, shewes himselfe to his souldiers, and so assures them that he is aliue. On the other side, the Bourguignon rallies his men disperfed and wearied, readie to lie if they had beene charged. At the same instant the Count Saint Paul goes to the field and gathers together vnder his ensigne about eight hundred men at armes, and but few foote.

Behold, the two armies standing in bataille one against another, and mutually discharged F their Canon. The night approached which ended the bataille: an incounter, where the notable flying on either side did wonderfully moderate the furie of the fight. The which beeing thus ended, the King was conducted by the Scots to the castle of Montleherie, hauing neither eaten nor drunke all that day, and then he retires to Corbeil. The Earle keepes the field, spoiles the dead, and therefore holds himselfe a Conqueror. Amongst the Kings men were knowne Jeffrey of Saint Belain, the great Steward of Normandy, Capitaine Floquet Bailiffe of Charles of Bourgongne taken and relicued.

A famous bataille for running away.

A of Eureux, with many Gentlemen, to the number of foure hundred horse and but few footmen. Of Bourguignons, the Lords of Lalain, Hames, Oignie, Varenne, and almost all the Earles archers: Haplaincourt, Aimeries, Inchy and many others were taken flying, and brought prisoners to Paris: of foot-men there were more slaine, then of the Kings part. All which were esteemed by some, at two thousand of both sides: others held them three thousand six hundred: but all affirme constantly, that there were more Bourguignons then French, although Lewis lost more horsemen.

In truth, the firme resolution, the constant labour, the dangerous hazards, manfully passed by the King, were sufficient motiues to encourage his men to honour: and if he had bin well and courageously followed, notwithstanding his small number, and want of artillerie, B the Earle of Charolois souldiers had digged their graues at Montleherie. Three daies after, the Earle of Charolois beeing aduertised that his confederates approached, went to receiue them at Estampes. The Dukes of Berrie and Brittain, the Earles of Dunois and Dampmartin, the Lords of Loheac Marshall of France, of Bueil, Chaumont and Charles of Amboise his sonne, all disgraced by Lewis, and put from their offices, although they had well serued the King his father. They brought with them (saith the Historie) eight hundred good men at armes, most Brittaines, who had newly left the companies, euery one pretending some discontent. Of Archers and other men of warre resolute and well appointed, fixe thousand on horsebacke, all of the Brittons charge, who assured (by some men at armes that fled) of the Kings death, promisseth to himselfe much good in conceit, in case the Duke of Berry come to the Crowne. And if at that instant they would haue giuen him credit, they should haue suppressed the Bourguignons, or at the least dismissed them, verifying, That there is small loyaltie, and lesse pittie in men of warre.

On the other side, the Duke of Berry began to loath these broyles: for in open Councell, (hauing viewed seuen or eight hundred hurt men wandring vp and downe the Towne) hee said: How much more glad would I haue beene, if this warre had neuer begun, then to purchase my selfe riches and honour with the price of so much blood. A speech worthie of a milde Prince and not bloudie: but ill digested by the Bourguignon, supposing that Charles would easily make his peace vpon the least motion made by Lewis. And to assure himselfe as well with- D out as within the Realme, he sends William of Cluny (afterwards Bishop of Poitiers) to Edward King of England, although hee had alwaies supported the house of Lancaster, from whence he was issued by his mother, against that of Yorke. Hauing refreshed their troupes they all dislodge from Estampes, and take the way to Saint Mathurin of Larcham, and Morin in Gastinois, and hauing an intent to passe the riuer of Seine, the Earle employes many coopers to make pipes, hauing brought great store of stiffe for that purpose, whereon a bridge was made (for want of conuenient boates) through the fauour of the Canon, which the Earle had planted in an Island in the midst of the riuer.

There ioynes with them John Duke of Calabria the onely sonne of Rene King of Sicily; the Prince of Orange, Thibaud of Neuf-chastell Marshall of Bourgongne, and Montagu his brother, the Marquis of Rotelin, the Lords of Argueil and Houlongeon, with many E others, leading nine hundred men at armes, of the Duchie, and Countie of Bourgongne: Sixe score men at armes barded Italians commaunded by Galeot and Campo-basso; foure hundred Germaine crosse-bowes sent by the Count Palatine, and five hundred Suissers (the which were the first that came to our warres, a fatall and lamentable alliance for the Bourguignon, as we shall see in his place) of other footmen very few. All this great torrent of an hundred thousand men, enuiron Paris, they seaze vpon S. Maur, Pont Charenton, Conflans, S. Denis, and other places thereabouts, they tyre the inhabitants with continuall skirmishes, even at their gates: and shake their affections by practises and deuises. The Duke of Berry writes to the Clergie, to the Court of Parliament, to the Vni- F uersitie (which then was in great credit in Paris) and to the Bourgeses to euery one apart, shewing them that all these forces tend not but to the peoples ease and profit: and requires them to depute men of iudgement and learning, to vnderstand more at large the causes of this great assembly.

Ten Deputies heare their complaints, beeing led by William Chartier Bishop of Paris, they report it to the Councell of the cittie, who answers: That the cittie shall be free for the Prince

Paris beleaguard.

1460. Princes to enter into at their pleasure, they and theirs abstaining from violence and paying A their expences. Surely this would haue bene a conquest of the cittie of Paris. But the great Master of Nantouillet, the Marshall Joachim, and other captaines take a view of their forces, and by this meanes retaine the Parisiens, who changing their minds, are fully confirmed ces, and by the arriuall of John of Rohan, Lord of Montaubon Admirall of France, with great troupes of men. O light and inconstant people! how easie is it to moue thy affections, and to make thee in an instant to applaude that partie which euen now thou didst abhorre. But let vs leaue them in this good humour, and see what remedie the King had for these gar-boyles, attending the succours the Duke of Millan sent him.

Lewis beeing (after the battaile) retired from Corbeill to Paris, flatters the peoples humours, treats popularly with them, erects a priuie Councell of fixe Councillours of the Court, fixe Doctors of the Vniuersitie, and fixe Bourgeses, to gouerne his affaires according to their aduice and direction: he leaues fixe hundred Lances in Paris, vnder the command of the bastard of Armaignac, Earle of Cominge, Maister of Gilles, of Saint Simon, Bayliffe of Senlis, la Barde, Craon, Charles of Mares, and Charles of Melun his Lieutenant in the said towne. Then he goes into Normandie, to assemble all the Nobilitie and men of warre he could: from whence he sent the Earle of Eu to haue the command of the warre and of the cittie, followed with two hundred Archers well in order. The Earle beeing arriued, he sends the Lord of Rambure to the Leaguers, offering to be a mediator for their discontents vnto his Maiestic, but it was without effect.

The King hauing intelligence of the confederates trafficke with the Parisiens, knowing that this people doth easily change their affections with the successe: and foreseeing that this baite of the commonweale, would soone bewitch them, displeased also that the Bishop had without his knowledge treated of an accord, he hastens his returne, accompanied with the Earles of Maine and Ponthieure, and the forces of Normandie. And for the first fruites of love to his subiects, he confirmed all the priuiledges they enioyed in his fathers life: he abolished all new impositions, and retained none but the auncient and ordinarie farmes of merchandise that is sold by great: then did he punish, either with banishment or death, such as had yeilded to the reception of the heads of the League into the cittie. Hee doth sharply blame the Bishop, (at the instigation of the Cardinall of Albi,) to haue bene a dealer in his absence for his enemies, with an inconstant and ill aduised people: and hauing provided for the suretie of the cittie, he prepares to offend and defend. The Bourguignon likewise vseth all force, making great and daily skirmishes with the Parisiens, sometimes chasing and sometimes chased. And thereupon comes new supplies to the Leaguers, the Dukes of Bourbon and Nemours, the Earle of Armaignac, and the Lord of Albret (notwithstanding the former treatie) with about fixe thousand men.

On the other side, the King receiued from Francis Sforze Duke of Milan, fixe hundred men at armes, and three thousand foote, commaunded by Galeas his eldest sonne, with this Councell of State: That to diuise this companie, he should yeeld to all conditions, and onely preserve his men. An aduice which Lewis shal cunningly put in practise speedily. These Milanois were employed in Bourbonnois, vntill newes of the peace shall come. The Earle thus fortified, offers battaile, but the King would not hazard any thing, desiring to disperse this mistie cloud without effusion of blood. And to annoy them of Conflans and Charenton, he sends foure thousand francke-archers, and about foure hundred pioneers, supported by the Nobilitie of Normandie, and some men at armes, who plant themselves vpon the riuers side, right against Conflans, at the English port, where they make a large and along trench vnto the cittie, with a bulwarke of wood and earth, whereon they plant many peeces of artillerie, which at the first driues the Duke of Calabria out of Charenton, with great losse of his men and an extreame terror to the Earle of Charolois, who lodged at Conflans in a house belonging to his father. Two cannon shot passed through his chamber beeing at dinner, and slue his Trumpetter, carrying a dish to his table. This amazement makes him goe downe with speed: he fortifies his lodging, pierceth the walles, and plants a cannon for a counter-batterie.

But they must dislodge these francke-archers, and preuent the losse they receiued from the other side of the water. For the effecting of this, he obtaines a truce for two dayes, in which Meanes to pacifie a people that was.

A politicke aduice.

A which time he made a bridge of boats. The bridge almost finished, the francke-archers leaue their trenches, carrie away their artillerie, and retire to the suburbs into the Carthusian cloister. A part of the Bourguignons armie passeth the water: they enter the suburbs of S. Marceau, and skirmish, but with little losse on either side. Hereupon our Captaines resolute to assaile the enimie in diuers parts. A page sent by night giues them intelligence. At the breake of day some horsemen charge home to the artillerie and kill a Canoniere. This was in shew the effect of the pages aduertisement. All arme: they make barricadoes and stand firme. The Artillerie thunders: the Kings answers them. They send forth two hundred horse to discouer: who see a troupe issuing forth the cittie to learne the cause of this tumult, and moreouer a great number of Lances in conceit: and so they report that all are come forth in battaile, but the day breaking they prooue but thiftels. So this alarme turnes to laughter. In the meane time they treat of peace, but the demands of the confederates were excessive. The Duke of Berry demands Normandie for his portion.

The Earle of Charolois, the townes of Somme lately redeemed. For the better effecting hereof, the two commanders conclude of an interview. The King mounts vp the water right against the Bourguignons armie, accompanied with the Lords of Montauban Admirall, Nantouillet, Du Lauz, and few others. The Earls of Charolois and S. Pol, come to receiue him. He then offers to giue his brother the Prouinces of Brie and Champaign, excepting Meaux, Melun, and Montereau, the which he would not accept. Hee grants the Charolois his desire, dis-awowes Moruilliers in certaine speeches, wherein he saith, hee had exceeded his charge: and for the Earls sake he promiseth to giue the office of Constable to the Earle of Saint Pol.

These entercourses of either side prooue farall for the King: for besides that the Princes doe daily suborne more of his men then he can draw from them: behold, Pontoise is deliuered to the Britton by Sorbier, commanding there vnder the Marshall Joachim; and to finish so notable a trecherie, he marcheth towards Meulan to the same intent: but the inhabitants beeing aduertised, he returnes without effect. There growes another vprore in Paris: the Souldiers vaunt insolently, that the cittizens goods are at their free disposition: that they will rake the keyes of their houses from them, and for a need will pull the chaines out of their streetes. Hereupon the Prouost of Merchants calls the Captaines of the quarters, and chiefe of the cittie to Councell: he commands them in the night to make fires at all the corners of the streets, and to watch in armes, euery man in his quarter. The people stand vpon their guard, ready to attempt some great action. The King himselfe goes the round, he findes the gate of the Bastille towards the fields open, and the artillerie cloyed. But oh the prouidence of God! misfortune is good for something. These vnexpected fires disappoint the conspirators practises, they hinder the approach and entrie of the enimie, and saue the cittie. Moreouer, Gisors is beleagard, and the garrison abandons it. But that which imports more, the widow of the great Seneshall of Brezai, (gouerned by the bishop of Bayeux) then resident at Rouan, with some other Partisans, giues John Duke of Bourbon entrie into the Castle, and so into the cittie. The cittie desiring long to haue a Duke remaining in the countie, consents to this change, and sweares to the said Duke, for the Duke of Berry. In a manner, all the townes and castles of the Prouince follow the example of their capitall cittie.

O strange chance! The Bourguignons armie was now reduced to extreame necessitie of victuals and money, so as all the Noblemen dreamed onely of a retreat. And yet (an admirable thing) the price of victuals was not risen in the cittie. So many stormes caused Lewis to demand a second interview, before that the yeelding vp of Rouan should be knowne to the Earle. He grants the Duchy of Normandie to his brother: restores the townes vpon Somme to the Earle: to the Britton his Countie of Montfort, with promise to defray his charges: hee giues the office of Constable to the Earle of S. Pol: he promiseth vnto John duke of Calabria, men and money to recouer his realme of Naples, to pay what had bene promised for the mariage of his sister to the Duke of Bourbon, with the execution of other clauses contained in the contract: to restore vnto all others their goods, offices, and dignities, which they had enioyed vnder his father Charles. He grants vnto the Princes, that not any one should be bound to come in person at his summons, but should discharge their homage and duties, in sending such forces as they were bound to furnish at need. To conclude, all the publike good is turned to priuate interest. The Earle of Charolois accepts these 1466. conditions so willingly, as discourfing with the King, the vehement desire hee had to see the execution of this treatie, carries him into the trench of the bulwarke of Francke-archers, by the which they entred the cittie. The Bourguignons hauing lost him, crie out that hee was stayed. The chiefe assemble together, they tremble, they condemne their Earle of rashnesse, alleading the inconuenience happened to his grandfather at Montereau, in the presence of Charles the seuenth, and they beginne to talke of their safetie: but as they walked into the field on horsebacke, behold they discouer about fiftie of the Kings horfe, conducting the Earle to his quarter. So euery one reuiued his spirits, and ioynly commend the Kings loyalty.

The peace of Conflans, and the conditions

Two daies after the treatie of peace was read, and sworne on either side, at Bois de Vincennes; Charles the Kings brother did homage for the Duchie of Normandie: the Earle of Charolois for the townes and land in Picardie, and likewise the rest that had homages to doe. The Earle of Saint Paul tooke his oath for the office of Conftable: the rest for the most part receiue their goods and honours. So the Duke of Normandie was conducted to Rouan part receiue their goods and honours. So the Duke of Normandie tooke his way to Amiens, and received homage of the inhabitants, as also of other places that were restored vnto him by the peace. Then he entred into the countrie of Liege, which had rebelled of late daies against his father, vpon the first bruite of the ouerthrow of the Earle his sonne at Montleherie, without attending the truth. He pacified the Countrie, and returned into Brabant. This was called the peace of Conflans, which was but counterfeite, the 28. of October 1465. the which the Bourguignon had not so easily yeilded vnto, if hee had receiued sooner that refreshing of men and money, which Philip sent him by the Lord of Sauzeu.

It was an act of great import, for Lewis to disperse these Princes so cunningly: he did well fore-see, that the Charolois beeing farre from them, and busied in his owne Countries, would hardly returne in the winter season. Moreouer, he knew well the meanes (as hee was an excellent plotter of factions) how to diuide the Dukes of Normandie and of Brittainie. And in truth they were scarce arriued in their new Duchie, but all the Noblemen, Gentlemen and Captaines, expected some preferment from Charles Duke of Normandie, so greatly aduanced by this peace; and moreouer the Duke of Brittainie, who had beene farthest engaged in the charge, was little amended by the treatie: they all by a generall discontent shew a notable subiect of distrust of their new Duke: so as there is spread abroad a still rumour, That the Brittons would carrie Charles into Brittainie. Vpon this bruite, the Dukes seruants and the inhabitants troupe together, they runne by heapes to Saint Katherines Mount (where Charles remayned yet, attending the preparatiues of his entrie) they leade him into the cittie, without any other assistance, but the Cleargie in their ornaments. The Duke of Brittainie, fearing the mutinie of this people, retires vnto his countrie: and in his way hee takes some townes in Normandie, wherein he leaueth diuers garrisons.

Lewis embraceth this occasion; and vpon this diuision marcheth against his brother, treats with the Duke of Brittainie at Argenton, to win him from the alliance of the Duke of Normandie: he takes from him (by the Duke of Bourbon newly reconciled) Eureux, Verdon, Louiers, Pont de Larche, and other places: and by Charles of Melun, Gysors, Gournay, Chailly: and consequently all bafe Normandie. Caen held with some other places, being in the hands of Lescur, a trustie seruant to both the Dukes. Charles abandoned by all men and set vpon by so mightie an armie, resolues to retire into Flanders, and seekes to the earle of Charolois, whome this diuision did much grieue: for he desired about all things to see a Duke in Normandie, the which should greatly weaken the King. But the time was vnreasonable, beeing busied against the Liegeois. Yet for a prooffe of his good happe, hee labours to put some troupes (gathered vp in Picardie) into Deepe: but Lewis preuents him, and compounds with the Gouverneur. Hereupon the two Dukes reconcile themselves, considering (but too late) that as their dissention had already ruined the one, so might it easily ouerthrow the other: according to the saying, That by concord small things increase, but by discord great are ouerthrowne. In truth it is a hard matter for great men to entertain friendship long: and for the State it is necessarie to haue one soueraigne head ouer all, who by his iudgement, wisdom, and credit, may retaine the subiects in obedience.

So the Duke of Normandie begs helpe of the Britton, being poore, ouerscome, and abandoned

Lewis sets vpon his brother.

The Dukes of Normandie and Brittainie are reconciled

A doned now in his aduersitie, of all them that during his prosperitie had grounded the anchor of their hope vpon his fortunes, and had newly made their peace with the King. The Duke of Brittainie receiues him, and in his fauour sends an Ambassage to the King: giuing him to vnderstand, that for the honour of his blood, and respect of his Maiestic, hee had receiued him; seeing him a fugitiue, and vnprovided of necessarie meanes to entertaine his estate. Thereupon Lewis makes answer, that he could not dismember Normandie, the goodliest flower of his Diademe, from the crowne of France, whose demaines are inalienable. The Duke replies: That to giue a portion to his brother, grounded in part of the successfull right, was an alienation of long time receiued in France, seeing that many held it euen then by the same title. But they commonly say, it is in vaine to preach to them that care not to do well. Lewis could not yeeld to the preferment of his brother: and the Brittons Ambassadors returned with no other answer, but a bare confession, that it was reasonable to giue him some portion, and that he would consider of the quantitie thereof.

Thus Rouan (wanting their Duke some few daies) yeelds the King obedience with small ado: who suddenly causeth many to be executed of his brother Charles his faction. The Lord of Eternay, taken by Charles of Melun, great Maister, in a Friars weed, accompanied with an Augustine, was beheaded: yet some write that both were drowned in the riuer of Vre. The King offended with the entertainment which the Duke of Brittainie had giuen to his brother, and aduertised that John Duke of Calabria was dead beyond the mountaines, hee calles home the troupes he had giuen him, to haue the greater forces to assaile the Britton, for receiuing of his enemies, and practising intelligences within his Realme. And euen then the Duke of Alenfon promised to giue the Duke passage through his countrie, if he would enter into Normandie. Moreouer so many Ambassages from the King to the Duke and Earle of Charolois, and from them to the King, from the Earle to the Dukes, and from them to the Earle, were but to discouer their humours, and vnder colour of faith, to withdraw mens affections. So the Duke of Brittainie, not able to perfwade the King to reason, enters into Normandie, takes Caen, Bayeux, and Auranches: he burnes Meruille and some other places, whilst that the King assembles the forces of Aniou, Poictou, and Normandie: and the Earle of Charolois resolues to succour his confederates, hauing suppressed them of Liege and Gant. And for that our Lewis hath beene so confusedly incombred amidst the combustions of those people, let vs leaue France, to learne briefly the cause, the proceeding, and the end of these warres.

Rouan returns to Lewis.

The Liegeois hereditarie and capitall enemies to the house of Bourgongne, (seeing all tend to open warre betwixt the King and the Earle of Charolois) seeke the Kings friendship and alliance, and they obtaine it, vpon condition to enter presently into the countries of Hainault and Namur, belonging to the Duke of Bourgongne, with all acts of hostility: the King promising vnder his seale, to succour them with two hundred men at armes, (euery one hauing three horses at the least) and not to treat any accord or peace with the Duke without their consent, and to comprehend them in it: puffed vp with this fauour and imagined succours, they send a Herald to Philip beeing at Bruxels, with letters, defying the Earle his sonne with fire and sword, and thereon demand an answer.

The Duke hauing read these letters, deliuered them vnto the Herald, willing him to cary them to his sonne. So hee returns to Liege, but he is presently sent backe with other letters, defying the Duke himselfe and all his allies. And sodenly they breake into the Dukes countrie, they spoile, rauish, burne, and omit no outrage that one enemy may doe to another. Philip assembles the forces of his countries, and sends for the Dukes of Cleues and Gueldres, the Earles of Nassau and Horne, the Marquis of Rothelin, and others that were neighbours to Liege. But this multitude finding the King to faile them of his promise, and that they were not able to resist so great forces, they shut themselves vp within the walles of Liege. Then at the first and false newes of the ouerthrowe of the Earle of Charolois at Montleherie, (as the passions of a disordered mind doe easily make man to beleue what hee wisheth) they take a subiect of new folly. Those of Dinan especially (a people of Liege, proud and arrogant to haue at sundrie times endured seuentene sieges of Emperours and Kings, yet neuer conquered) make a picture very like to the Earle of Charolois, and attired with his armes, they carrie it in troupe neere to Bouuines in the Countie of Namur: they 1467. they let vp a high gybber in the sight of the cittizens, and there they hang this Image, crying with open throate. See there the sonne of your Duke, that false traitor the Earle of Charolais, whom the French King hath, or will cause to be hanged, as you see here. He armed himselfe the Sonne of your Duke, he lyed: he was a villaine bastard, changed in his infancie with the Son of the Lord of Hainsebergh, our Bishop. Did he thinke to ruine the Noble house of France? From these and such like insolent speeches, they come to deedes, armed against the subiects of Philip, with fire and sword, the instruments of their horrible outrages. This was not all, the father must receiue the like disgrace by his picture, the which they carried to the dung-hill before Bouuines, and setting it vpon a peece of wood. See here (say they) the seate of the great Toade your Duke. Those of Bouuines exhort these mad men to performe the duties of good subiects to the Duke, before that matters grew more bitter. But the bearer of this good and wholesome counsell, returned without his head: they send an innocent child with the like Letters, hoping his tender age would moue some respect, and mollifie these cruell and vnaturall minds, but in despight of the Duke and of their neighbours, they killed him most barbarously, and tare him in peeces.

O insolent people! which hast not yet learned, That there is no vice whereon God doth more often shew his iudgements, then vpon pride. The great wealth thou hast gathered together during thy long felicitie, hath it so furiously transported thee beyond the bounds of obedience? and to what end is thy great wealth, but to drawe thee headlong to thy ruine? Philip takes his reuenge by the defeat of foure thousand Liegeois, fortified within Montre-nac, a village siue leagues from Liege. The Earle of Nassau did this exploit, but the Duke would be present in person with the Earle his sonne, at the taking and vtter desolation of Dinan. He beseegeth it with aboute twentie thousand horse, beside foote, which were in great numbers, takes it, spoiles it, and destroyes it, and dragges eight hundred prisoners chained together, to be drowned in the Menze before Bouuines: an expiation for the tyrannicall indignities they had endured by the Dinandois. Those of Liege did for this time escape the like fortune, but it was deferred, and behold another cause of indignation, which they procure to themselves. Lewis of Bourbon Bishop of Liege by resignation, and admitted to the dignitie by the intercession and fauour of Duke Philip to the Pope, begins to preferre the most confident and trusty seruants of the said Philip, to all offices and dignities within the towne. The people are grieved thereat, they mutine and expell the Bishop. This reuolt against their spirituall and temporall Lord, procures the Popes Excommunication against them. Philip after the destruction of Dinan turnes head against them: but terrified with so sharpe a punishment, they flie to the Earle of Charolois, who is a meanes for their peace and pardon, paying fixe hundred thousand Florins of the Rhin in fixe yeares, and three hundred hostages for a securitie of their deedes and promises, specified by the Bishop. Thus this people restored to fauour with their Prince, and reconciled to their Bishoppe, were absolved of the Excommunication, by Onuphrins a Romane Cittizen and Bishop of Troyes.

Whilist that Philip subdues the Liegeois, Lewis employes his whole studie to ruine the house of Brittanie, and to confirme a truce with the English, who threatened France with a new descent during our diuisions, and hee practiseth the Bourguignon by all meanes. And to presse him to renounce his Brother Charles and the Duke of Brittain, hee takes the Liegeois into his protection against their Duke, in case he shall hereafter wrong them: the which he doth signifie vnto him by the Constable of Saint Paul, and the Cardinall Balue, offering notwithstanding to renounce their alliance, if hee will likewise abandon his brother and the Britton. This Brauado proceedes to effects. He sends them foure hundred Launces of his Ordinances, vnder the conduct of the Earle of Dampmartin, the Lords of Salczart, Conyhem and Vignolles, with fixe thousand Archers. The Earle of Saint Paul, (but without the Kings authoritie) led them some troupes speedily leauied vpon the frontiers of Picardie. The first act of his Tragedie, which in the end shall make him leaue his head at the Greue in Paris. But it was now time for Philip to leaue the troubles of this world, to enioy an assured and euerlasting rest in heauen.

This inconstant and mutinous people, supposing by the decease of their Lord, to be at libertie, they breake out, go to field, recover all the townes, chase away the garrisons placed by

A by the deceased Duke: spoile and sack the places they take by force, with-out any care of their ingaged hostages, who were all ready to bee sacrificed by Charles the new Duke of Bourgongne, to requite the madde infolencies of their countrymen, yet hee reserues the reuenge for a more famous memory. Hee parts from Louvain in armes, and well accompanied, and goes to besiege Saintron. The Liegeois (to raise the siege) issue forth with thirty thousand men, some siue hundred horse, and great store of Artillery. The Duke turnes head againe, chargeth them, and ouer-comes them, hee killies about nine thousand: the approaching night saues the rest. Presently after this charge, the Duke (puffed vp with this good successe) speaks bigge, hee writes vnto the Constable like a Rodomont, answerable to the speeches he had with him at Louvain: That hee beseeched the King for his sake to attempt nothing vpon the State of Brittain, advertising him of the memorable battaile which hee had wonne. After the which Saintron yeelds vpon conditions, and the tenth man is chosen out at the Dukes pleasure, and then beheaded. Tongres was no better intreated: and these miserable wretches thus tithed, were for the most part of those hostages, which hee had freely sent home, vpon condition to imploy themselves to pacifie the seditious humours of their fellow-Cittizens.

In the end, as he turned all his forces against Liege, premeditating with himselfe of a lamentable and bloody reuenge, behold three hundred of their best Cittizens come forth in their shirts, bare-headed and bare-legged, bringing the Keyes to the Duke. Hee enters the City by a great breach of twenty fadome, beaten downe in the wall, disarms the inhabitants, takes from them their Artillery which remained, razeth all the Towers and Towne walles, and chargeth them with heauier impostes then euer his father had done. A worke of heauen, which quencht the fire of sedition, which began to flame at Gand: a stirring people, and second to the Liegeois in inconstancy: of whom it is commonly said; That they loue the sonne of their Prince, but not the Prince him-selfe. So the Gantois bring vnto him on foote as farre as Bruxelles, the seuentie and two banners of the occupations, which hee had granted them at his entry, with all the priuileges and letters they had tumultuously wrested from him.

Charles sent the said Banners to Bologne la grasse, to accompany those which his Father had in like sort taken from them: hee disanulled their priuilege of the law, whereby the people had right of fixe and twenty Sheriffes of the Towne, to choose euery yeare two and twenty, and the Prince but foure: hee condemned them in thirty thousand Florines to himselfe, and fixe thousand to his officers and followers: All other Townes compounded for money, and then hee made his entry armed into Gand. Thether came Ambassadors to him from Lewis, labouring to drawe him to consent to the warres which hee pretended to make in Brittain: the which not able to obtaine, the Winter was spent in sending one to another: and Summer being come, Lewis enters the said Duchie, with an army of fifty thousand men: and at his first arriuall hee takes Chantosse, and Ancenis, and after some other military exploites, he forceth both his brother and the Duke of Brittain, to accept such conditions as he would prescribe vnto them: That they should renounce all alliances, and especially that of the Duke of Bourgongne: That his brother Charles, lately Duke of Normandy, should haue twelue thousand Francks a yeare rent, for his portion, issuing out of some lands which should carry the tide of a Dukedome or County, and three score thousand Francks for his pension; but there is much difference between promise & performance.

In the meane time Charles of Bourgongne, at the instance of his allies, was already advanced to Peronne. Then had Pope Pius the second sent a Legate into France, for the renunciation of the Pragmatick Sanction, made by Lewis at his comming to the Crowne. The Patents are read in the Chastelet without contradiction. Balue comes to the Palace the first of October, to haue them in like sort published. But Maister John of Saint Romain, the Kings Proctor generall, opposeth himselfe directly against the execution thereof, notwithstanding the iniurious threats of the said Cardinall: Replying (saith the Originall) that he had rather loose both his office, & all his wealth, then to do a thing against his conscience, to the hurt of the Realme, & preiudice of the Kings dignity. In the end, the Rector of the Vniuersity, (for then they maintained by faithfull obedience, their ancient authority) & the Deputies thereof, go to the Legat: they appeale from him, and the effect of the said Letters, to the holy at the Chasteler, and depart not before their opposition be registred.

Herevpon the King sends the said Legat and Cardinall with John Ladreseche Treasurer of France, to the Duke of Bourgongne, to signifie vnto him the accomde made with his Brother and the Duke of Brittainy, and to treat of a peace with the said Duke of Bourgongne, but alwayes tending to diuide him from them: and (for a baite) hee promifeth to giue him fixe score thousand Crownes of gold, the one halfe to bee paide before hee dislodgeth for the charges of his leuie: and hoping to winne him wholly to his will, hee concludes of an enter-view at Peronne, by the meanes of the said Blau, and to this effect, the Duke writes him a Letter with his owne hand, as a warrant to goe and come. And in the meane time, B that Charles (busied at home) should no wayes hinder Lewis in the warre hee pretended to make in Brittainy, (for hee still gaped after the conquest of that Prouince) hee had sent againe vnder-hand, to sollicite the Liegeois to a new sedition, where-vnto they were too prompt for their owne good: they arme, and by stealth surprise Tongres, and carry their Bishop with many Chanoines (whom they hated to the death) prisoners to Liege. Yet some-what respecting the Legates presence, they were content to pull out the hearts of fiue or fixe of them, in sight of the Bishop, with an out-ragious violence, hewing one of them into many peeces, the which with a brutish derision they cast one at another like vnto Tennis Balles.

Lewis sollicite the Liegeois to a new rebellion.

These two Princes liued in continuall distrust, and feared one another: for the safety of their persons at this meeting, they fortifie them-selues with great forces. Lewis to free the Duke of all ielousie, comes ill accompanied, but he is followed by John Duke of Bourbon his brother in law, the Cardinall brother to the said Duke, the Constable of Saint Paul, the Cardinall Blau, (a man which dealt much in matters of warre and state) by Tannequoy of Chastel, newly receiued into fauour, and many other commanders of troupes. Charles had sent for the Army of Bourgongne, where there were many Noblemen, in former times ill intreated by the King: as Anthony Chasteauneuf, Lord of Lau, who had escaped from Vifon, a strong place in Auuergne, where Lewis kept him prisoner, vnder the garde of Charles of Melun, who (sauiug his owne head) imbrued three scaffolds with bloud, with that of Charles at Loches: of Remonet, sonne to the wife of Charles at Tours: and of the Kings D
Proctor of Vifon, in Meaux: Ponces de Riniere, of Vrfe (afterwards Maister of the Kings Horse:) three Princes of the house of Sauoy, that is to say, the Lord of Bresse, the Bishop of Geneva, and the Earle of Rhosmond, bretheren, followed by many Gentlemen, Sauoyards and Bourguignons. The King seeing all these within the Towne; and the Armie lodged there-about, findes that hee wrought politickly: but cunning is preuented by cunning. So the prouidence of God blinds man in his owne malice, and shadowes his eyes, to confound him in his fraudulent desseignes. And to increase his folly, he requires the castell of Charles to lodge in: for that the greatest part of those that were last come, were ill-affected vnto him. What then? an enemy that had a desire to crosse the policies of his aduersary, would hee refuse him this Cage, that sought to intangle him-selfe in his owne snare? E yet hee periwades him to feare nothing. Let Princes learne not to commit them-selues rashly to such assemblies, the very baites of deceits, collusions and periuries.

The newes of this second mutiny at Liege, being reported vnto the Duke, hee sodenly causeth the gates both of the Towne and Castell to be shut, but vnder a cold pretext, That one had lost a male full of Jewels and money. Lewis seeing him-selfe coopt vp, and many archers at the gate, being lodged moreouer right against a great Tower, whereas the Earle of Vermandois had once caused Charles the Simple his predecessor to die, blame him not if he feared. So (as an ancient said) Malice drinks the greatest part of her owne poison. They could not treat of a more important matter then the life of a King of France and of his Estate. Charles doth first impart this businesse to some of his Chamberlaines and groomes F of his Chamber (amongst others to the Lord of *Argenton, to whom the King since gaue this commendation, to haue bene a great helpe in this pacification of Peronne) who then tempered this spleen all they could. He holds a councell the most part of the second day, and almost the whole night, hauing all the desire in the world to doe the King a shrewd turne; who in the meane time pacifieth with all vehemency such as he thought might serue him: he

A he vnfurnisheth his most trusty seruants, being farre from his treasure, commands to make distribution of fifteene thousand crownes: (but the commissary retayned a part as the King was since aduertised) he giues to some, and promifeth to others. In the end their resolution in counsell was, that Lewis his excuse should be admitted, who did sweare that hauing sent his Ambassadors to Liege, euen when as the Duke did arme against France, the great affection he had to a final and vniuersall peace had so transported him, as he had forgot to countermand them. Thus promise being made to Charles of Bourgongne, to accompany him at his request in the voiage of Liege, and to giue vnto Charles his brother the Earledomes of Brie and Champaigne, (which the Bourguignons did, that at neede they might haue more A peace between Lewis & Charles of Bourgogne.
B means to succor one an other) the treaty of Arras and peace of Charenton were reconfirmed and sworne vpon the crosse which Charlemagne was wont to carry, called the crosse of victory.

Truely experience hath alwayes testified, that Princes do more wisely pacifie their quarrells by graue and trusty seruants, then by enteruiues, from the which such as had neuer any matter to determine together, do seldome part without mutuall dislikes and grudgings; the seeds of diuisions and war, the which may be long smothered, but at length it breakes forth. From henceforth you shall see vpon this stage a wretched people, panting yet with the bastonadoes lately receyued: but not yet vanquished, and so much the more lamentable, for that their owne calamities cannot make them wise: who hauing obstinately rebelled against C their naturall Prince, and indiscreetly imbraced our Kings quarrell, run headlong to their totall ruine. Lewis was ingaged by promise, and summoned to performe it. Besides the Scotts of his gard, he sends for three hundred men at armes, hauing with him John Duke of Bourbon, Charles Cardinall of Bourbon and Archbishoppe of Lions, and the Earle of Beaujeu brothers to the Bishoppe of Liege. A city then of the bignes of Rouan, exceeding well peopled, seated in a mountaine country fertill, watered with the riuer of Meuze, which runs through it, but by the last yeares checke almost all dismanteled, and greatly weakened of men, so as the Marshall of Bourgongne and the Lord of Himbercourt leading the forward and gaping after spoile, thought to haue entred at their first approach, before the King or Duke were arriued. John of Vilette chiefe Tribune of these Liegeois, and other capitaines D seeing them lodge confusedly in their suburbs, they issue resolutely by the old breaches, and kill aboute eight hundred men, amongst the which were a hundred men at armes: they hurt many, and amongst them the Prince of Orange. All the people were ready to make a generall sally, but some Canonadoes shot into the great streete kills very many, and keeps in the rest. The Tribune was hurt and died within two dayes after, with some other capitaines, whilst the two commanders arriued, and take their lodgings, Lewis in a great farme, a quarter of a league from Liege, Charles in the midst of the suburbs, where the King went to lodge the next day right against the Bourguignons lodging. This approach breeds a great distrust, for Charles doubted that Lewis would cast himselfe into the towne, or practise something against him, or at the least saue himselfe before the taking of the town. To be E
the better satisfied, the Duke doth lodge three hundred of his best men at armes in a barme betwixt his lodging and the Kings, the better to obserue the Kings actions.

In the meane time, they make a good shew, and keepe good gard vntill the nyne and twentieth of October, the eight day of the seage, when as Charles and all his men disarm them-selues, to be the more ready the next day for the assault. During these eight daies, the besieged gaue liberty to their Bishop to go to the Duke and to offer him their towne and goods, desiring nothing but their liues. But he had resolved a sharpe reuenge, and retaynes the Bishop, not accepting of any offer. The Apostolike Legat had no more any credit with Charles, neither was he so happy as he expected. The Liegeois abandoned by the French, dispayring of all foraine succors, and of all grace with their Prince, behold a troupe of fixe hundred choise men of the Country of Franchemont issue forth, hauing for their guides the Maisters of those two lodgings where the Generalls did lie. The party was well made, and the enterprife great, but ill managed; yet did they hardly faile in it. The guides should lead them secretly through the hollow rocks neere vnto these Princes lodgings, to surprise them; kill them, or at the least to carry them away before their guards were in armes.

Moreouer

1468. Moreouer all the people should issue forth by the gate and breaches right against the great streete of the suburbs, and with their cries and fighting discomfort the whole army, or at the least sell their liues deere, in dying gloriously. They issue forth, kill the sentinells, and stayed at a pavilion in the which the Duke of Alencon, and the Lord of Craon were lodged, where they slew some seruants with their halberds and partuisans; they charge euen vnto the grange, wheras the three hundred men at armes were in their first sleepe, the whole multitude runs thither, and troubles both Nations, some crying, God saue the King, others God saue the Duke of Bourgongne, and some also cry God saue the King, and kill, to sow diuision betwixt the French and Bourguignons.

The King and Duke in great danger of their liues.

The miserable estate of two Princes.

They awake, they arme and defend the entry. In the meane time succors come from all parts to the Duke, being charged by a Squadron led by the maister of the lodging. He is flaine first, and then all his company. The King is no lesse amazed, his host compasseth his house with an other band. The Scots are about him, they first kill the host and then his followers: and so the multitude recouers the towne in disorder. The two Princes talke together, and thanke God for their deliuey, and with a iust cause: for if these desperate men had neyther lingered at the Pavilion nor at the grange without doubt they had had these two Princes at their discretion: but God would reserue ours, for the restoring of his estate and increafe of his reuenues with the Bourguignons losse: and the Bourguignon for a more tragicke ende. Our Lewis grew likewise pale with distrust, foreseeing that if Charles did not take this towne by assault, the burthen might light on him, and that hee was in danger to bee stayed and taken, being the weaker in the army. There was no hope of retrying, he was too well garded: and his honour likewise ingaged. Thus he stood vpon thornes, yet resolute in shew, and alwaies an absolute dissembler. A miserable estate of these two Princes, who of late had so solemnly sworne a peace, and yet one could not assure himselfe of an others faith. This desperate fall had amazed the Dukes men who (euen by the Kings aduice) would willingly haue delayed the assault for some dayes, but Charles, constant in his desseine, lettes Lewis vnderstand, that if he pleased he might retire to Namur vntil the towne were taken: as for himselfe he would not part without seeing the issue the next morning: but Lewis was ingaged in honor, who would neuer giue the least suspicion of cowardice: he therefore answers, that he would take his part of the sport. The day being come, euery one repayres to his colours, the signe is giuen by a field peece and two shot of a serpentaine, to the end the vanguard lodged on the other side should charge at the same instant. The trompetts and drums sound, the companies approch, and all march resolutely. But when they thought to ioyne, they found no resistance. Their chiefe commanders were dead, the most apparent being slip out of the towne, some one way, some an other, the common people were gone to diner, thinking that Sunday would be a day of rest. So the whole army consisting of about forty thousand men, enter at both ends, and find the cloth layed: they kil at the first incounter two hundred men, women, children, and religious indifferently: they rauish women, maids, and nunnes, spoile the City, and holy places: the Duke saues the great Church of Saint Lambert with great difficulty, the people fly ouer the Meuze, and so saue themselves in the forest of Ardennes, and other places thereabouts, where (to inceased their misery) some gentlemen (who till then had held their party) strip them, kill a number, and take the best prisoners, and by this treachery and piteous starageme make their peace with the Duke. Many died of hunger, cold and sleepe: the history makes mention of a gentleman that had the paulsie in one legge, and a page that had two fingers of one hand faine off. The wine was frozen in the pipes, and for three dayes was cut out with hatchets. And for the last act of this tragedy, the Duke doth place foure thousand men about the quarters of the city, to beate downe the bridge vpon the Meuze; to defend the houses of the Clergy about the great Church, and to preferue the other Churches from ruine, whilest that others set fire on the towne, ouerthrow the walles and fill vp the ditches. Wrath and victory doe neuer forget any kinde of reuenge. And if we shall belecue some writers, there perished about fifty thousand soules in this warre, most cruell beyond all bounds of humanity. Learne O yee nations to containe your selues in the obedience of your Soueraignes; and not to imbarke your selues rashly in Princes quarrells! who retire themselves easily out of the mire where they leaue you ingaged.

Liege

A Liege is a president vnto you wherein you may obserue the iust iudgement of God, vpon a cruel rebellious people, enemy to all souereignty, both spirituall and temporall, of long time subiect to daily rebellions, vntill their generall ruine. As we haue brought our Lewis to Liege, so let vs returne him into France. Charles exceeding proud with the happy successe of his designs, suffers himselfe to be sought vnto by mediators from the King for his departure: and afterwards he himselfe moues him, as desiring to goe and cause their accord to be proclaimed and inregistred in his court of parliament at Paris (which else were of no moment) and the next yeere to meet in Bourgongne, and to feast one on the other mutually for a monethes space. Charles (hauing drawne a promise from the King, to confirme all hee had sworne at Peronne) yeelds, but not without grudging, and hauing accompaigned him halfe a league, he causeth him to be conducted to the frontiers, by the Lord of Cordes, and Murs great Bayliffe of Hainault. A pitious spectacle to see a souereigne reduced to that extremity, as to humble himselfe before his vassall: but we must haue patience for seuen yeeres, and then shall we see a strange alteration of fortune: and yet seuen yeeres after, an other Catastrophe no lesse tragicall in this house of Bourgongne: and the vniing of the said Duchy to the crowne of France.

Lewis present is a co-lour to get leaue to depart without trouble.

After the Kings departure, Charles enters the country of Franchemont: he kills, spoiles, burnes and makes all desolate: then (glutted with reuenge) he retires into Brabant. Lewis taking his leaue of the duke, demanded of him captiously, in case his brother (who was in Britan) would not accept the portion he had giuen him, how hee would aduise him to gouerne himselfe: and the duke answered, that if he were content, it should please him whatsoever they did. This speech was cunningly construed by the King: for hauing inrouled the sayd vniion in the court of parliament, and proclaimed it throughout all the streets of Paris: he offers Charles, Guienne, for Brie and Champagne, his brothers neighbor-hood with the Bourguignon being suspected vnto him. Charles refuseth it, fearing to displeafe the duke of Bourgongne, who by Ambassages and admonition exhorts him not to change: for if happily the King should annoy him, hee might daily haue succours out of Bourgongne.

Charles was in all things gouerned by an other, namely by Odet de Rye Lord of Lescun and afterwards Earle of Cominges. Lewis subornes him, and by his meanes winnes Charles to accept of Guienne, as more plentifull and rich, with mutuall assurances to liue like brethren and good friends. For confirmation whereof they meet at Charron and feast together, then they depart, Lewis into Touraine, and Charles into Guienne. The duke of Bourgongne greeued with this exchange, imploies the Cardinall Balue, a turbulent and pernicious member in a State, a dissembler, and taking pleasure (as they say commonly) to put his finger betwixt the barke and the tree. An vnkinde man. The trust which Lewis reposed in this man, was the means to procure him a Cardinals hat: and to that end the King had sent an Ambassage to Paul the 2. and sends Fumee also, one of his most trusty seruants, to perswade the Pope to desist from the refusall hee had made thereof, being aduertised of many things that did diswaide him: at whose vrgent perswasion a Cardinals hat was granted him: yet behold he writes to the duke of Guienne in fauor of the Bourguignon: That this change tended but to deceiue, diuiding him by this meanes from his friends and confederats, and by other messengers, he aduertiseth the Bourguignon: That the peace concluded betwixt the two brethren, was a baite to surprise him: the which the King deferred only vntil his brother had visited his new Duchy, and set an order in his house. Let him therefore arme and begin first. These letters are surprisid, with other instructions, so as the Cardinal is arrested, & carried prisoner to Montbafon, where he shal continue eleuen yeeres. Lewis hauing thus plaisted this peace with the Bourguignon, comprehended the Britan therein, and giuen the Duchy of Guienne to his brother Charles for his portion, he had now no more so mighty enemies, against who he should employ his forces: yet would hee not dismishe his troupes, for there camera new raske in hand. To keepe them in practise, hee sends part of them vnder the command of the Admiral bastard of Bourbon (for Montauban was dead) and the Earle of Dammartin, into Armagnac. He had bin one of the war of the commonwealth, & this enterprife did alwaies sticke in Lewis his stomach. At the first without any effusion of bloud, they make him peaceable possessor of the country, whereof they inuest his brother, and so the yeere ended.

A baill disposition of a Cardinal, whom Nic. Gil. calls a deuill incarnate.

Cardinal Balue committed to prison.

But

But let vs see the first fruites of the following yeere . To be reuenged of Charles of Bour-gongne, he must haue some apparent colour. Lewis doth vnder-hand practise the townes lying vpon the riuer of Somme: animates the Nobility of the countrie to complaine in the parliament at Paris of the difficultie they had to receiue iustice, and therevpon to require the Kings assistance and fauour. Moreouer they charged the Bourguignon, that hee extended his limits farther then hee ought by the treatie, and vsurped the Kings rights and prerogatiues, forcing some Lords, whose lands did hold directlie of the King, to doe him homage and seruice against all men. Vpon colour of these complaints, Lewis assembles the Estates at Tours, in the moneth of March, and Aprill, (the which was all hee euer held:) but hee calles none but his most confident seruants, who would not contradict him in any thing. For a conclusion of the assemblie, the Duke is summoned to appeere at the parliament of Paris. Hee retains the officer many daies at Gant, and in the end sends him backe.

As all things were prepared to ruine the Duke of Bourgongne; behold there fallies out another matter of some moment in this action. The Earle of Warwicke (hauiing about all others supported the house of Yorke against that of Lancaster) had besides his patrimony enriched himselfe about foure score thousand crowns a yeere reuenew in rewards and offices by Edward King of England, Competitor to Henry the sixth, whom he kept prisoner at London: which Henry had so long ruled our France. This his great credit drawes ielousie after it, too ordinary in soueraigne princes, especiallie to them whom they haue raised vp: whereby the Earle fallies into some disgrace with Edward. The duke of Bourgongne, to whom the Earles great authority, and the secret intelligences hee had with our Lewis was wonderfull odious and suspect (for the duke had married the sister of Edward, to fortifie himselfe against Lewis, not for any affection hee bare to the house of Yorke, beeing by his mother issued out of the house of Lancaster) feeds this hatred of Edward against Warwicke, who finding himselfe forced to yeeld to the stronger, resolues to retire into France: hee leads with him Marguerite the wife of Henry, daughter to René King of Sicilia, the prince of Wales sonne of the layd Henry and Marguerite: the duke of Clarence sonne in law to Warwicke, and brother to Edward, the Earle of Oxford, with their wiues and children, and many followers. In his passage he takes many ships from the Bourguignons subiects, and sells the booty in Normandy. And for a requiall Charles caueth all the French Marchants to betaken that were come to the faire at Antwerp: he complaines to the Court of parliament at Paris, of the reception the King had made of the Earle of Warwicke, threatening to fetch him wherefoeuer. But the arrogancy of his words, was but the leuaine of his spleene.

Lewis giues such entertainment to the Earle of Warwicke, as he might hope for: hee armes all the ships he can finde in his fauour: by meanes whereof hee returnes happily into England, and gathers together an infinite number of men, which ioyned with him from all parts:
he marcheth against Edward, and forceth him to flie to his brother in law into Holland, being accompanied onely with seuen or eight hundred men for his gurd, without money, and without apparell other then for warre. Hee draws Henry out of prison, where hee himselfe had formerly lodged him, and installes him againe in his royall state.

Edward (notwithstanding the presence of the dukes of Gloucester and Somerset, sent by Henry) obtaines of the duke of Bourgongne (but vnderhand and secretly, for that he would by no meanes incense Henry, whom all England now obeyed) succours of men, ships and money: hee returnes into the realme, is receiued into London: hee meets with the Earle of Warwicke, fights with him and kills him, with his brother the Marquis Montagu, and cuts al his army in peeces. The duke of Clarence (before the battaile) goes to his brother Edward, and with his owne hand slue (as some write) Henry, whom Edward had taken in London and led to this battaile: this was in the yeere 1471. on the after day. This happy victory is seconded by another no lesse famous. The prince of Wales sonne to Henry, followes after, with whom the dukes of Gloucester and Somerset had already ioyned, leading forty thousand men of his faction. Edward putt vp with the prosperous successe of his first victory, marcheth towards him, fights with him, kills him, takes the Earle of Somerset prisoner, and the next day cuts off his head.

Edward.

Edward recouered it in twenty, and remained in peaceable possession vnto his death. It the Earle had patiently attended the great forces which the prince Edward brought vnto him, who will not thinke but he had remained a conquerour? But hee feared Somerset, whose father and brother he had put to death, and he must feele the effects of the diuine Oracle: Hee that hath shed mans blood, his blood shall be shed, for God hath made man after his owne image, and: All those that haue taken the sword shall perishe by the sword. In the meane time whilest these sturres are in England, Charles the eight of that name, afterwards King of France, was borne vnto Lewis at the castle of Amboise, a happie proppe of an old decayed father. This birth caueth the princes hereafter to bee lesse respected, and the King more feared and honored, who hauing now an heire to whom he might leaue the crowne, bandies all his wits, to weaken his enemies, as well for his owne priuate regard, as to leaue the realme whole and peaceable to his successor. Charles of Guienne liued, for shew, in good amity with the King. Francis of Britan (although hee had preferred the order of the Golden fleece before that of Saint Mitchell, the which Lewis had offred vnto him) beeing loth to loofe assured friends, to accept the friendship of a prince in whom he could repose no confidence, yet he contained himselfe. Charles of Bourgongne wore the garter openly, and molested the Kings subiects and friends. Moreouer Lewis had iust cause to be greeued for the brauadoe done him at Peronne. The nobility thrust him on, namely the constable of Saint Paul, fore-seeing that the continuance of peace would be a hinderance to his great offices and penions. He had a pay without checke for foure hundred lances, of forty thousand franks yeerely, besides the fee for his office, and allowance for many places where he commanded.
Men fish most easily in a troubled water. He offers the King to take Saint Quentin by means of the credit he had in the country: most of his luying lying thereabouts, and vaunts to haue great intelligence in the low countries.

The duke of Guienne offers both his person and his meanes, with fise hundred men at armes for this warre, but it was the least of his desires, for he was corrupted with the infections of that age, in the which all great men sought to maintaine themselues with the ruine of one of another. The duke of Bourgongne takes the alarme, puts the greatest forces hee can to field, entertained with halfe their pay. Lewis suffers him to runne on foure or fise monethes, entertayning him with sundry Ambassages, to free him from all feare, so as troubled with that great charge, in a season when as money was scant, he dissolues this army, and leauing his frontier townes vnfurnished, retires into Holland. In the meane time Arthur of Longueuall takes Saint Quentin, the Constable enters it with two hundred Lances, and takes an oth for the King. They practise Amiens, the Kings army comes before it, one part holds for the King, an other for the duke, who might haue assured it, if hee had sufficient forces ready to enter, but foure or fise hundred horse (with the which hee came posting) would not suffer him to hazard his person.

The Kings friends discovering this bragge, double their courages and let in the Kings army. Abbeville meanes to follow, when as the Lord of Cordes enters for the duke and assures the place. The duke vnprovided of men, and doubting the intelligences which the Constable bragged of, retires with feare and speed to Arras, to halten a leuy both of men and money. Thether (notwithstanding the promise which Charles of Guienne had made to the King) comes a secret messenger vnto him, with this aduise written and signed by the layd Charles: Labour to content your subiects, and then take no care, for you shall finde friends, but these were but iests. This letter makes the duke breathe: he sends to the Constable, to let him vnderstand, that this warre was without defie or summons, intreating him, not to deale against him according to the rigor of his present forces. The proiect of the dukes of Guienne and Britan with the Constable, was to imbarke these two great princes in mutuall warre, in a season of aduantage for Lewis: that the Bourguignons necessity (being abandoned of his allies) might force him to giue his only daughter to the said duke of Guienne: the which he had often promised, but without performance: whom (as Oenomaus did his Hippodamia) he promised to many, and gaue her not to any.

So this Constable who tooke delight to nourish these princes in feare and mutual diffirust, answeres the Bourguignon: That the King had a strong and flourishing army, and great intelligences in his countries, that he knew no better expedient to auoide this storme, then
to

1471. to accomplish that to the duke of Guienne, which he had so often reiterated: which done A the dukes of Guienne and Britan would declare themselves for him, and would succor him with their forces. But what shall the Constable get to entertaine these princes in distrust and icalousie one of an other, either of them being too cunning to discover his policies? Within short time both of them (hauing ioynly conspired against him) shall set his head to sale, and in the end plant it vpon a scaffold for a spectacle. The Briton writes to him in the like and more rigorous tearmes: suffering the Lord of Lescut to lead a hundred men at armes, Britans to the King. This proceeding caused Charles of Bourgongne to conceiue a great hatred in his heart against them all: but misfortune is good for something. It made them the more affected to the Kings seruice during this warre, so as at this time the Bourguignons estate was in great danger, whereas by the said marriage hee had wonderfully B weakened the King: but man purposeth and God disposeth.

Lewis his ar.
my in Picardy

It is commonly said, that halfe the world knowes not how the other liues: and the ordinary custome of man is to bee cleere-sighted in other mens affaires, but blind in his owne. Behold two princes incensed one against an other, and yet who should examine their consciences could allege but frivulous pretexts. Lewis hauing put fourteene hundred men at armes and foure thousand frank-archers into Amiens, commanded by the Constable, and other chiefe Officers of the crowne, assembles the body of his army at Beauvais, hauing with him the Duke of Guienne his brother, Nicholas Duke of Calabria, the eldest sonne of John Duke of Calabria and Lorraine, the onely heire of the house of Anjou, C and a great number of Nobility, whereby he recouers Roye, Montdidier, Abbeville and all the country of Ponthieu. Charles passeth the riuier of Somme, takes Piquigny, plants himselfe betwixt Bapaumes and Amiens, and keeps the field about six weekes, with a firmer resolution in shew, to fight with the King if he presented himselfe.

Charles submits himselfe.

But blockt vp within his campe, and seeing himselfe (ready through want) to be forced to yeeld at the Kings will and discretion; his Maiesties army in Burgongne (commanded by the Daulphin of Auvergne, sonne to the Earle of Montpensier, in the which were the Earle of Cominges, the Lords of Combronde and Charente, Maister William Cousinot and others) hauing likewise vanquished all the enemies forces, Charles by a letter of his owne hand, D humbles himselfe to the King: he is greeued that he had so wronged him for an others pleasure, not being duly informed of all things.

And obtains
a truce.

Virtue findes some respect euen in an enemy. Lewis, who vnder a simple bait to recouer the townes vpon Somme, had not so hotly kindled this quarrell, without the great intelligences wherewith the Constable had abused him, especially in the townes of Antwerp, Bruges and Brussels: he graunts a truce for one yeere. This was the fourth day of May. An vnseasonable truce for the constable (who then serued his maister, without dissembling) and other horse-leeches, whom neither troubles, oppression of the people, nor the tediousnesse of affaires did any thing touch, but as pleasing to the duke as the peace of Constans. So the King returns into Touraine, Charles out of France into Guienne, the duke of Bourgongne into Hainault, where he assembles his Estates, and shewes the losse hee had receiued, for that his men at armes were not so soone ready as the Kings, and giues order to bee E no more surprised vnawares. Thus the Estate is pacified, but the duke of Guienne was no sooner returned home, but there springs vp new seeds of diuision. He receiues the Earle of Armagnac into fauor, and restores him to full possession of the Lands which the King had confiscated. Lewis moued with this reconciliation, sends forces and takes the lands into his owne hand, disappoints the Earle, whom he knew to be a stirring and a factious man: and euen then he resolved to dispossesse his brother of the Duchie of Guienne, as hee had done of that of Normandy.

New troubles
by the duke of Guienne.

The duke fore-seeing this storme, sends often to the Bourguignon, and vnder colour to seeke his daughter, labours to bind him more firmly vnto him by that alliance. The Bourguignon hauing his heart putt vp with as great conceits, as his person was susceptible of trauel, but exceeding the capacity of his sence, he fed him with hope: yet had hee no such meaning, but preferred her, as a most pretious iewell to bee courted by many, and to serue him at need, according to diuers occurrences, both of their persons and meanes. Neither would he haue so great a sonne in law, as the only brother of a King of France, whom hee might

A might not rule at his pleasure, neither could hee digest the words and proceedings of the Duke of Brittain and the Constable. The Constable would haue the Duke of Guienne beholding vnto him for this marriage, the Britton repined he should haue the honor. The king comes to crosse it, and with reason, for this alliance had wonderfully fortified his brother, who (being ioyned with the Duke of Brittain) had greatly crossed the Kings estate and his childrens. Moreouer the King of England did much disswade the effecting thereof: (said he to the Duke of Bourgongne) if the King of France comes to dye with-out children, his brother succeeds to the crowne, and this marriage vnting to it so many Provinces and Seigneuries, the estate of England were neere her ruine.

But to what end serue these affectionate and contrary poursuites? Alasse! some one B thinks him selfe sound, that carries death in his bosome. But hee that rageth in heauen, Psalm. 2. laughs them to scorne: within few moneths our Charles of Guienne, leauing the world, shall leaue his loues. So it is, that their vehement solliciting, extorted some verball promise, confirmed by a letter, but he had great Corriuals, who all pretended to haue the best part in the pie: Nicholas Marquis of Pont, sonne to John Duke of Calabria and Lorraine. Philip Duke of Sauoy, Maximilian Duke of Austria, sonne to the Emperour Fredericke. All these marched in equall rancke: but in the end Maximilian shall be conquerour, yet not during the life of Charles of Bourgongne. This marriage gaue a goodly colour to these mediators, but vnder the shadow thereof they treated of other matters. They must auoyde this C storme, ready to oppresse the Duke of Guienne. Behold therefore the publike Ambassadors, and priuate messengers of these three Dukes, are sent respectiuely one to another. The Lord of Vrfe and Poncet de la Riviere, Agents for Charles of Guienne. The Abbot of Begard, since Archbishop of Lion, is an instrument for the Britton to the Bourguignon, they taxe the King to haue practised and suborned, what by friendship, and what by force, the Duke of Guennes seruants: to haue already defaced a place belonging to the Lord of Estillac, with many other things: shewing that the King would soone dispossesse his brother of Guienne, if he were not speedily preuented: that to this effect he was armed, and ready to enter into Xaintonge. The Duke of Bourgongne sends often to the King touching these D affaires. The King excuseth himselfe, and accuseth his brother, as hauing treated with the Earles of Armagnac and Foix, to his preiudice, seeking to enlarge his limits with-out his priuity, and to enter into factions with his enemies: yet hee promisseth to suffer him to enjoy his portion peaceably.

Corriuals for the heire of Bourgongne.

A new league
betwixt the Dukes of Bourgongne,
Guienne and Brittain
against Lewis.

This promise carries no credit, and workes lesse effect: the Dukes of Guienne and Brittain insist: they presse the Bourguignon: yet that it may bee done without the assistance of the English, the ancient and generall enemy of this Realme, seeing that all their common designs, tended but to the good and ease of the publike: that his assistance, with the great intelligence he had with many gouernours and Captaines of places, did fortifie them sufficiently: pleasant people, to seeke with a bloudy wound once againe to abuse the common people with this baite of publike good, and to couer their priuate passions with so E pleasing a shew. Charles of Bourgongne casts the stone and hides his arme, and the better to disguise his proceeding, hee solicites the English secretly, to inuade France on the one side, whilst that he seemed blind, and not to see it. But it was in vaine, the English had more willingly assisted the King, if this marriage had not allyed the two houses of France & Bourgongne. In the end, behold a number of Princes in great perplexity, the which is more lamentable, for that they shall trouble their heads with so many preiudiciall and extrauagant conceptions: this confusion shall in few yeares oppresse them in a manner all, and Lewis preuaile thus much, the Duke of Bourgongne (possessed with an earnest desire to recouer Amiens, S. Quintin, and other townes vpon Somme) armes twelue hundred lances, three F archers to a Lance, well armed, well mounted, and good leaders. What doth our Lewis? In truth he had too good a iudgement to want foresight, and he that thought to surpriseth shall be surpriseth. To diuert the Bourguignons leauy, he had often sent the Lord of Craon, and the Chancellour of Oriole, who (being very trusty seruants) in the end conclude an absolute peace. The king yeelds to the Duke the foresaid townes, he abandons vnto him the Earles of Neuers & S. Paul Constable: the one (hauing serued the king loially at Peron) had purchased 1472. the dukes indignation, the other (hauing nourished hatred and distrust betwixt these two A princes for his owne profit) had so vnreconciledly estranged them from him, as they bandy ioyntly to his destruction, and giues him all their lands, to incorporate them to his owne, if he could. The duke in exchange, forsakes the dukes of Guienne and Britan, and their seigneuries to dispose at his pleasure, promising not to deale at all in the warres which Lewis pretended against them. A foule and dishonest trafficke, made to the preiudice of so great personages.

Notable deceit and treachery.

The duke signes and sweares this fraudulent and counterfeit peace. A blow able to amaze the dukes of Guienne and Britan at the first hearing, to see themselves thus abandoned of their chiefe support. But he repaires it with an after-blow, and by letters of credit written with his owne hand, giues them aduice to continue their course: that his intent was onely to recouer his townes vpon Somme: which done, he will beseech the King by especial Ambassadors to desist from making warre against them, and vpon his refusal he will succour them with body and goods: that as the King at his pleasure had broken the treaties of Conflans and Peronne, so might he infringe his promise, and oth. As for the Earles of Neuers, and Saint Paul, the constable, although he had a iust occasion to hate them, yet would he remit their iniuries, and suffer them to inioy their owne, and beseech the King to doe the like by the dukes of Guienne and Britan, suffering euery one to liue in peace and safety, vnder the Articles respectiuelly accorded: if not, he would succour his allies.

Craon and Orieole had likewise sworne for the King, leading Simon of Quindii/a gentleman bred vp in the dukes house) to receiue the oth of his Maistie. But from a new subiect springs a new proiect. Behold newes are brought, that the duke of Guienne is sicke, and without hope of recouery. Vpon this aduice, the King delaies the oth, findes euasions, attending the course of his disease, and in the meane time doth speedily seize vpon many places of Xaintonge: he doth presse Rochell, the which (vpon these accidents of reconciliation and sicknesse) inclines to a composition: he with-drawes many of his brothers chiefe seruants, and resolues to signe this peace, as the sundry euents of his affaires should lead him: and in the meane space he prouacts time with the Bourguignon, during the which, Charles duke of Guienne dies at Bourdeaux, the twelfth day of May, by the which Lewis recouers the Duchie without blowes, and moreouer retaines Amiens, and Saint Quintins.

The Duke of Guienne dies.

O subtil wits! both deceiuers, but not of like industry: so our Lewis shall more easily auoide the snare. But oh death in generall! which by the dissolution of the body and soule, doth dissolve great designs? The Britans were ready to enter, building vpon great intelligences and practises within the Realme; the which without doubt had much troubled the State. But oh vnseasonable death in particular, how fildy shalt thou serue to shadow the filth and hatefull, (yet well coloured) reproches of enemies, and the murmurings of the most respectiue! A death too much neglected, but by some affectionate seruants to the deceased Duke, who discover, that Jourdain Faure, borne at Die in Daulphine, great Almoner to the duke, and Abbot of Saint John d' Angely, assisted by Henry de la Roche, one of the said dukes Kitchin, had hastened his death by so violent a poison, as with a strange and lamentable contraction of his sinewes, his haire fell off, and teeth fell out before his death. The Lord of Lescut retired himselfe into Britany, leading prisoners with him these cursed murderers, where the Abbot was found one morning starke dead in his chamber with a Thunder-clap, Hauiing his face swollen, his body and visage blacke as a coale, & his tongue hanging halfe a foote out of his mouth. God doing that iustice in the twinkling of an eye, which men delaied. Let vs confesse the truth, and without passion: the verity of the Historie doth presse vs vnto it: that Charles had bene an ill brother, and ought more honour and obedience to him, to whom that great Author of Nature had giuen the right of eldership about him, yet should he haue been regarded as a sonne of France, and from his infancy receiue a portion fit for the entertainment of his estate and house. Kings haue alwaies power to controule the insolencies of their neere allied, when they forget their duties.

Note the murderers of Princes.

But howsoeuer, let vs obserue the order of diuine iustice, who easily raiseth vp homebred scourges: but in the end he doth cast the rod into the fire. Lewis must bee measured with the same proportion he had measured his father, and Charles must suffer for the rashnesse of his rebellions.

This

A This death being little lamented, makes such to speake, as had but too diligently obserued Lewis his speech, hearing one day of the death of the King of Castils brother: Hee is but too happy (saith he) to haue lost his brother: but hatred and ill will, grounds their passions euen vpon needles points.

1472.

At the same instant, Nicholas Marquis of Pont, heire of the house of Aniou (one of the above named riuall) made sure to Anne, the eldest daughter of Lewis, abused with the great (yet vaine) promises of the duke of Bourgongne, renounced this so worthy an alliance of his soueraigne Lord, for a frustratorie hope, which the vassall gaue him to marry his daughter: but he was ignorant that death the yeere following would punish this rashnesse, and

B prevent him from the inioying, either of Anne or Mary. A season likewise famous by the death of Charles Earle of Eu, a wife and vertuous prince, whose faithfull seruit to France deserues this testimony, that being sonne to Philip of Bourgongne, Earle of Neuers and Rethel, and grand-child to Philip the Hardy, a sonne of France, and duke of Bourgongne, and by consequence nere kinsman to Charles, yet in all these combustions, he had faithfully serued the King, and preferred the Flower-de-Luce before the Red crosse. Let vs likewise obserue the death of William Chartier bishop of Paris, who (after his conference with the league before Paris, in the Kings absence) was alwaies in such disgrace with him, as after his death, Lewis caused his Epitaph to be changed, making mention of the bad seruices he had done him, during the warre of the common-weale, suborning the inhabitants in fauour of the C Bourguignon. The death of the duke of Guienne had wonderfully afflicted Charles of Bourgongne, and to increase it, he had intelligence, that the Britans would not arme, considering that he was dead for whom they should rise. In the meane time the chance was cast: he had bene at great charge, and to turne head without restitution, were a shame: but that which made him mad, Amiens and Saint Quentin were lost: he must hazard all. And first he writes to many townes: he chargeth the King to haue consented to his brothers death, and labours to draw them into armes, declaring himselfe their protector, but no man stirres: so the final effect of his letters, sets him on fire, and in this choller he marcheth to Nesle in Vermandois: hee spoiles, burnes and makes all desolate, besiegeth the towne, batters it, and takes it: hee kills the greatest part of five hundred Archers, commanded by one called Little Pierard, takes some, and amongst others the capitaine, and cuts off some of their hands. Many soldiers and Townsmen flying into the church, are barbarously slaine at the altars, embracing the Images: the duke enters himselfe into the church on horse-backe, and seeing these carcases. Behold (saies he) this is goodly, I haue good butchers: then hee burnes and raseth the place.

Fifteene hundred franke-archers being in Roie, vnder the command of Peter Aubert, Bailiffe of Melun and Nugnion, are amazed, and at the dukes first approach, abandon the town, and yeeld it vnto him; Loisset of Balagni, Mouy, Rubempre, and others of the arrierban, with about two hundred lances compound, leauing horse and armes, euery man at armes only hath a horse. The duke puts a garrison therein, and likewise into Montdidier. Thus hee E holly pursues his conquests: but Beauvais cooled this heat. He did beleagar it (being vnprovided of men of warre:) the inhabitants were commanded then by the foresaid Balagny, and some few men at armes, so as they were not able to saue the towne, without the present assistance of him, who doth loose and restraine the raines of his iustice at his pleasure. At their first approach, the Lord of Cordes leading the vangard, plants two Canons against the gate, makes a great hole, but for want of munition the battery ceaseth, they come to blowes, the one to enter, the other to defend the entry, and they presse the duke to set forward: the defendants ready to be forced, set fire on the portall, which makes the assailants to retire. The duke arriues, and suffers the fire to take his course, hoping in the end the towne would be his. And indeed if he had lodged a part of his army towards Paris, there had bene F small hope of safety. But God had otherwise decreed, for in sight of the enemies troupes, he giues courage to the Earle of Dammartin, to the Marshalls of Ioachim and Locheac, to William of Valleu, the Seneshals Lieutenant of Normandy, to the Lords of Crussoll and Rubempre, to Beine and Torcy brethren, to Basil, Salezard, Themenot of Vignoles, and Merv of Croy (all braue and worthy of memory in this siege) to thrust themselves into the town, with a good number of foote, and about two hundred lances: who at their first entry, giue 1472. their horses to the women ( who take them, set them vp, and looke vnto them) and present themselves vpon the walles, incouraging the Beauvoisins, and discouraging the Bourguignons. The duke being enraged, makes all his canons to approach, and thunder 15 daies together: he makes a breach, and giues a sharpe assault, but well defended. Six score men are slaine, and 1000. being wounded leaue the place, so as the duke retires his companies appointed for the assault, and becing frustrate of his conceiued hope, pressed by extreame famine, he raiseth the siege, and retires in good order, fearing a charge. But these valiant capitaines knew that the best course was to make a bridge of gold to a flying enemy. This was on Saint Magdelins day, the 26. of the siege. A small aide doth sometime great good. Beauvais wauered, and was ready to compound. But what curtesie might they expect of a passionate enemy, who breathed nothing but bloud and fire? For the auoiding whereof, louing and kinde dealings were of great moment, which this towne receiued of those two mighty neighbor cities, Paris & Orleans, assisting them with pioners, victuals, canon, powder, bows, arrowes, pikes, tooles, apparel, and other necessary refreshings, but especially from Orleans, with a hundred pipes of wine, a meanes whereby the eternall providence preserued them from sack, spoile and a generall defolation by fire, whetewith the Bourguignon threatned them, if force had preuailed. Beauvais freed, the duke marcheth into Normandy, and presently takes Eu, Saint Valery by Crotot, Rembures, and ( being the scourge of this desolate Realme ) leaues in all places behinde him the pittifull and cruell marks of his passage: he spoiles and burnes all the country of Caux, Neufchastel, of Nicourt (a good and a great C town of warre, but vnfurnished of men) Longueuille, le Fahy euen vnto the gates of Rouen, being little annoied or hindred by the Constable, who lead foure hundred Lances: whose winking serued as a Whetston to sharpen the Kings displeasure and harred against him, and the ialousie of both these commanders, hauing of purpose entertained this warre betwixt them, who cunningly smother a secret dislike, which cost the said Constable his life. Then winter approching, he retires into Picardy, hee had no sooner turned his back, but these braue capitaines in Beauvais, recouer Eu, Saint Valery, Rembures, and so casting themselves into Noyon, they frustrate the dukes purpose, who meant to besiege it. The Bourguignons fire flames yet farther: A swarme of his partizans, led by the Earle of Roussy, the Constables sonne, falls vpon the country of Tonnerre, spoiles the country, runnes D as farre as Joigny, and vnto Troies, burnes both farmes and villages without resistance. For reuenge whereof, the Dauphin of Auvergne flies to Bourgongne, drawing after him, where he passeth, a burning befome. Pittifull exploits of warre, the witness of reuenging spirits, and alwaies the people smartes for the error of great men. But behold other troubles, Peter of Bourbon, Lord of Beauieu, being at Lestore, as Lieutenant generall for the King in Guienne, was surprisid by the Earle of Armagnac, who was lately dispossessed of his lands: who by this meanes recouers the said towne. Lewis mouued with this affront, causeth his army to march, and followeth himselfe in person: but the Cardinall of Arras commanding the troups, receiues the towne by composition, makes the Earles appointment: and the better to confirme it, he breakes the sacrament in two, takes the one halfe, and giues the Earle the other, either of them swearing this accord. Trusting therein, he abandons the towne to the Cardinall, who brings in the army, and by some soldiers suborned, hee caused the Earle to be murdered laying of his praies, not in the castle, but in a priuate house neere to Saint Geruais church, and then sacked the towne.

Gods iustice is slow, but in the end it paies home. This Earle had ( vnder a false Bull of dispensation, purchased for money of Ambrose of Cambray, Referendary to Pope Calixtus ) married his owne sister: and after by sundry rebellions, purchased the Kings displeasure, and made himselfe guilty of diuine and humane treason. But abhorring the Earles life, let vs likewise abhor the Cardinalls proceeding, selling ( vnder the holy communion ) his bloud to them that trusted in his oth. The King put many Gentlemen in prison at Loches, who had followed the said Lord of Beauieu, whom the Earle had sent home: but the chance fell vpon John Deymer, being quartered at Tours: who dying, charged the Lord of Saint Basill, a younger brother of Albret, with this treason, being nourished and bred vp in the house of Bourbon, for which crime he lost his head at Poitiers, the seuenth of April 1473. And to increase Lewis his crosses, Parpignan (a town in the county of Rosillon) is by treason

A treason deliuered vp to the King of Arragon, the ancient Lord, where hee enters with his sonne, about the end of Aprill. But the King had an army ready, the which hee sends thither, and besiegeth it hotly: the French were yet maisters of the Castell, by the faithfull valour of maister James of Fou ( issued out of the house of Brittany ) he recouers it, and giues the gouernment to Tanneguy of Chastel. Thus the troubles railed by the Earle of Armagnac, and the King of Arragon, were like to a fire of Straw.

1473.

Let vs obserue in the same course, the apprehending of the Duke of Alanfon, so shall we see the carriage of our Lewis. He is accused to haue offered the sale of his Duchy, and other lands in Perche and Normandy to the Bourguignon: and then to follow his fortune, ( a crime which shall put him in minde of his condemnation pronounced at Vendosme ) hee was seized on by Tristan the Hermite, Prouost of the Kings house, ( a speedy executioner of his Maisters will ) and brought before the King, who sends him to the Loure at Paris, where by a sentence giuen by the Chancellor of Oriole, the 17. of Iuly 1474. hee was condemned to loose his head, referuing notwithstanding the Kings good pleasure, who in the end of the yeare 75. shall binde him vnto him the second time for his life.

but pardoned.

Lewis hauing recouered Guienne, reduced Lestore, punished some, and pacified Parpignan, hee assembles all his forces vpon the Marches of Brittany, to the number of 50000. men, ready to employ them in that country. But the Duke, by reason of the death of the Duke of Guienne, being frustrate of the intelligences hee had in France, and too weake to C auoide this storme that threatned him, sent vnto the King, lodging at Pont de See, Philip of Elgars, a Gentleman of his house, and William of Soupleinuille, a follower of the Lord of Lescut. His maiesty giues eare to an accord. The duke of Brittany being possessed of so wise and valiant a man as Lescut, might much annoy him: For in Brittany there was neither wisdom nor vertue, but what proceeded from him ( so saies the History ) Moreouer he had alwaies during these partialities shewed himselfe a Frenchman, and would neuer yeeld that any places of Normandy should be giuen to the English: hee must therefore be dealt with. To this end the King commands Soupleinuille to giue him the demands in writing, which his maister made, as well for the Duke as for him selfe. Hee doth it, and obtaines them all: forty thousand Frankes pension for the Duke, the which was paid in two yeares. For his maister, D dix thousand Frankes pension, the moiety of Guienne, the two Seneshallships of Vannes and Bourdeloys, the Captainship of one of the Castles of Bourdeaux, that of Blay, the two Castles of Bayonne, of Dax and of Saint Seuer: foure and twenty thousand crownes in gold, payable in foure yeares: the Kings order, and the Countie of Comminges: for Soupleinuille six thousand Crownes, payable at like termes: twelue thousand Frankes pension, the Mairalty of Bayonne, the Bailiwick of Montargis, and other small preferments in Guienne: for Philip of Elgars, foure thousand Crownes in reward, and twelue hundred Frankes pension, the Bailiwick of Meaux, and to bee maister of the waters and Forrests of France: which things they should enioy during the life of Lewis, who was alwayes well and faithfully serued by Lescut.

The conditions of the peace.

E Now the Britton is satisfied, and sequestred from the alliance of Bourgongne, against whom Charles now turnes head, but the season in the which the Duke of Bourgongne, retired into Picardy, caused a truce for one yeare: ending the first of Aprill 1475. A truce which ( while the Burguignon shall giue our French leaue to breath ) shall imbarke him in so many quarrels, as in the end, the most important shall swallow him vp. A truce likewise concluded to the Constables great prejudice: for both the King and the Duke hated him deadly, as the motiue of these diuisions. Hee had lately seized on Saint Quintin, expelling the Lord of Curton, and a hundred men at armes, which he had in entertainment from the King. Charles had likewise many causes of his dislike: he was the instrument to take Amiens & S. Quintin for the King; he sought to reduce him to that estate, as to force him to marry his daughter F with the Duke of Guienne: but the chiefe ground was, that during the siege of Amiens by the Duke of Bourgongne, the Constable had made a road into Hainault, spoiled the countie, and burnt ( among other exploits ) the castell of Seure belonging to Baldwin of Launai, of whom the Duke made good accompt: for reuenge whereof hee passed into Picardy and Normandy, as we haue seene. Moreouer hee had mighty enemies both with the King and Duke, who all ioyntly conspired his destruction, and animated their maisters with all their 1474- their credits. So all this yeare of truce is spent chiefly in making marchandise of the Constables life. Himbertcourt and Hugonnet Chancellor of Bourgongne, had some priuate splene, for in a conference held of late at Roie, where the Constable was employed for the King, they grew so bitter in words, as the Constable had giuen them the lye: to whom the Bourguignons modestly answered; That they did not impute this iniury done vnto them, but to the King, vpon whose word they were assembled, and to their maister, whose person they did represent, to whom they would make report.

In the end, at the instance of either part, a day is held at Bouuines: for the King there came the Lord of Curton Gouernour of Limosin, and Maister John Heberge afterwards Bishop of Eureux, and for the Duke, the two aboue-named. They pronounce the Constable an enemy, and guilty to both Princes, they promise and sweare one to another, that the first that may apprehend him, shall put him to death within eight dayes, or deliuer him to his companion to doe his pleasure. That hee should bee proclaimed by Trumpet, an enemy to both parties, with all those that should serue and assist him, and confiscate all his goods, moouables and immoouables. The King promiseth to giue S. Quintin, Han and Bobain to the Duke, with all the money that might bee found within the Realme, appertaining to the Constable, and all his lands holding of the Duke, and at a certaine day the King and the Duke should meete before Han, and there with their vnited forces besiege the Constable. But some will say; to what end serue all these voyages, and so many meetings? whereto so many complots to intrappe the Constable? must the King (to be reuenged of his seruant) make an agreement with his capitall enemy? who euen of late had fought to take away his life by poyson, promising a marchant named Ihsier fifty thousand crownes to effect it: who hauing imparted it to John Hardy his seruant, some-times in household with the Duke of Guienne, he suffered the said Hardy to loose his life, and to be quartered publikely at the Greue in Paris.

Lewis iudged of the future by the present, and with one stone gaue many blowes. Hee disarmed his enemy, or at the least gaue him meanes to transport his armes farther off, whether the great desseignes of his ambition did draw him, as we shall see here-after: and moreover the king could hardly seaze vpon the Constables person, without the Dukes intelligence, for he was seated directly betweene both. He held S. Quintin, and had Han and Bobain, his owne places, very strong and neere, hee might put in men from whence and when he pleased. He had intertainment for foure hundred men at armes well paide, whereby hee got much, in not keeping his companies full. He exacted a crowne for euery pipe of Wine, passing through his country, into the lowe countries. He had fise & forty thousand frankes of ordinary entertainment from the king, very rich Seigneuries, and great intelligences both within the Realme and in the Dukes countries. Hee was a man of action, and could both helpe and hurt much. To conclude, he knew well that flying from the one, he should be well accepted of the other. Moreover, the personage and the places hee held, deserued a good peace, and either of the two Princes would gladly haue enjoyed him absolutely, if hee had bene constant, and not dissembling to either.

Yet for all this hee auoydes all danger. He is aduertised that his head is set to sale, where-vpon he sends to both Princes, speaks big, and saith; that hee vnderstands all their practises, but especially to the King, That the Duke by this conuention sought onely to draw him to his party, and to put him in disgrace with his Maiesty, and this did Lewis apprehend most. In truth these two Princes laboured exceedingly, who should deceiue his companion most. According vnto man, it is better to deceiue, then bee deceiued. Lewis presently countermands his Ambassadors, giues them charge not to conclude any thing against the Constable, but to prolong the truce, so as the foure Ambassadors (who had already mutually giuen their seales, containing their resolution taken against the Constable) deliuer them vp, and returne without any conclusion. The King fearing least this affront might force the Constable to make his peace with the Duke, and so deliuer vp to him S. Quintin and other Forts, that were in his power, preuents him, giuing him to vnderstand, that an enter-view shall make his peace. They appoint a day and place, three leagues from Noyon towards la Ferte, vpon a little riuer. The Constable came first, but, as a conscience prick with the feeling of his misdeeds, wants no distrust and feare, hee demands hostages. The

A The King seemes to like well therof. On the riuers side, they make a strong barre with grates very high towards the Constable: there he presents himselfe, accompanied with three hundred Masters, hauing armes vnder a loose cassocke. The King approacheth, accompanied with aboute fixe hundred men at armes, and amongst others Chabannes Earle of Dammartin, Lord Steward, and a mortall enemy to the Constable. But oh Lord Stuard! but for thy presence, with what colour could the Constable haue shadowed his excuses? At the first entrance he kneeles downe, and beseecheth his Maiesty, not to hold it strange, if he appeare in armes, and thus followed, considering the quarrell he had with Dammartin. Then they treat together, the King grants him a generall abolition of all that was past, hee leaues him the guard of S. Quintin, and continues him the pay of his men at armes, being before restrained of some quarters pay: The Constable promiseth to serue his Maiesty against all men, without exception, and so he opens the barre and passeth to the Kings side, who reconciles him with the Lord Stuard, and the next day suffers him to returne to Saint Quinten. A presumption of too hard digestion for so iudicious a Prince as Lewis was, to see his Officer present himselfe like a Prince that were his enemy, yea his equall in power. But all comes to one end, it we will haue patience. The Court could not endure this manner of proceeding, and the murmuring which Lewis heares, makes him remember, that it is too great a presumption in a seruant to plant a barre before his master, and to present himselfe vnto him accompanied with men at armes, all beeing his subiects and vnder his pay, and too base in him, to go and receiue the submission of his Constable: A folly approaching neare to that of Peronne.

An act which shall much incense the Kings hatred against him; and breed a worme in the Constables conscience, the which shall gnaw him with continuall disquiet, doubtfull how to maintaine himself betwixt two such mightie enemies, but in the end he must fall: to teach vs, That neither our merits, nor any seruices we can do to our Princes, should cause so great presumption, as to thinke they could not liue without vs, or that we haue meanes to prescribe them a lawe. For naturally they hate such as thinke they are beholding vnto them, and dispatch them at length that haue braued them. Good deeds are pleasing, whilst that hee which receiues them hath meanes to recompence them, but when they are so great, or wee esteeme them so, as they are beyond all compasse of requitall, in stead of thankes we receiue nothing but hatred and ill will. It is therefore better to be loued, then feared.

Let vs now see what passed during the truce. Lewis hauing his mind free, and his bodie discharged of armes, hee resolues to prouide for his heires. Doubtlesse the choice which hee made of two Princes of his blood, did testifie, how much hee did cherish his house, giuing them two pretious pearles out of his Jewell-house, Anne his eldest to Peter of Bourbon, a goodly Princesse, and Jane the youngest to Lewis Duke of Orleans, beeing yet very young and afterwards the 57. French King: whereunto he did not yeeld but to please the King, for she was foule and crooked. This season is likewise famous for a notable Ambassage from Arragon, touching the affaires of Rouffillon. The King making the Ambassadors to iudge of the whole peece by a patterne, causeth them to see, the 20. of Aprill, a hundred and foure thousand men armed in bataille, all in one luerie, with red cassockes crossed with white, all Officers, Bourgeses and Inhabitants of Paris.

We haue said, this truce should prooue an incomber to the Duke of Bourgongne, let vs examine the effects by the causes. At what time the King tooke Amiens from the Bourguignon, Adolfe that wicked and vnkind son of Arnold Duke of Gueldres (repining at his fathers long life) tooke him prisoner one night going to bed: and making him to march on foote without hose, in a most cold season fise Germaine leagues, he shuts him in the bottome of a tower, where as the Sun did neuer shine, but by a small grate, and there he held him 6. moneths. The duke of Cleues, whose sister the prisoner had married, vnderakes his quarrel, and seeks by force to free his brother-in-law. But Adolfe hauing married the duke of Bourbons sister, in the Bourguignons house finds great fauor. So the duke of Bourgongne labors to reconcile them. The Emperor deales in it, but all without effect, vntil the Pope had interposed his authority, who commanded Charles of Bourgongne, vnder great penaltie, to draw the olde man by force out of prison, seeing his sonne would not enlarge him by intreaty. Adolfe on the one side, seeing so many Potentates busied in this action, and on the other side fearing the Dukes

Dukes forces, he releaseth Arno'd, who in the sayd Dukes chamber, (notwithstanding the inequality betwixt the father and the sonne) offers his sonne the combat. Charles seeks to reconcile them, to the sonnes aduantage, to whome he offers the title of gouernor of Bourgongne, the country of Gueldres with all the reuenues, onely Graue, a small towne, should remayne to the father, with three thousand Florins of rent, and so much pension, and the title of Duke. But oh impious and horrible answer! I had rather (saies Adolfe, to those that deliuered this speech vnto him) cast my father headlong into a ditch, and my selfe after him, then acc'd: he hath bin Duke these 44. yeares, it is now time that I were. I will willingly leaue him three thousand Florins a yeare, vpon condition that he neuer enter into the Duchy: with many other words vnworthy of a Sonne. Charles greued at the oblinacy of Adolfe, B leaues both father and sonne at Dourlans, and retyres to Hedin. Adolfe to recouer the country, disguiseth him selfe, like a French-man, and passing a ferry neere vnto Namur, he is discouered by a Priest, who giues intelligence, wherevpon this young Duke is taken and carried prisoner to Namur, where he remained vntill the death of the Duke of Bourgongne, that the Cantois deliuered him, hoping by force to make him marry with Mary the heire of Bourgongne, afterwards Duchesse of Austria, after the folly which they had made him commit before Tournay, a fatal place, for the reuenge of the wronges he had done to his father. Ar-old died during Adolfs imprisonment, whose ingratitude had iustly moued him to leaue the succession to the Duke of Bourgongne. So Charles building vpon this donation, goes with force to take possession of the Duchy. This new conquest bred new proiects, and euen then he conceiued such an imaginary power as in the end he funke vnder the burthen. He neuer had so goodly an army, especially in horse. The Earle of Campobasso, and Gilest a Neapolitan Gentleman, (the first a Greeke in disposition and most wicked, the second a very honest man,) commanded a thousand men at armes, Italiens: he had three thousand good English, and good numbers of his owne subiects, well mounted, well armed, and of long time trayned vp in warre, with great store of artillery. He was at truce with our King, and to keepe him occupied, the English by his practise were ready to land in France. What then? should he suffer his men to liue idle without employment? Guelders had encouraged him. The Emperour was no man of resolution, willing rather to endure some disgraces, then to be at charge, and without the aide of some Princes of Germany his power was small. These baits thrust him in forwards, but the expiration of the truce might haue stayed him. Yet he obtains a prolongation of the King for fixe monethes, wherevnto Lewis yeelds willingly. Foreseeing (as he had a more sound iudgement then those which did dissuade him) that this Prince sought his owne ruine: that hauing finished one enterprile, an other would spring vp, and so quarrell grow vpon quarrell, which the Princes of Germany would well preuent, being alwaies vnited in matters which concerne the Emperour.

Charles begins warre in Germany.

He demands strange things of the Emperour who leaues him without bidding him farewell.

Charles before Nuz.

So it chanced. And as in so great a proiect, he must needs wonderfully discontent the nobility and commonalties of Germany, so was it expedient for him, to tye some vnto him. He procures an enterview with the Emperour at Treues, and there treats of the marriage of Mary of Bourgongne his daughter with Maximilian Arch-duke of Austria, the Emperours sonne: which done, the Emperour should erect his lands and feigneuries in Gaule Belgicke, to a royalty: he should incorporate foure Bishopprikes to this new Kingdome, whereof the royalty should appertaine vnto him and not to the Emperour, and should creat him vicar Generall of the Empire. Frederick findes these demands so inciull and vnreasonable, as he leaues the Duke of Bourgongne at Treues, and parts without bidding him farewell. And now an other occasion thrusts him on. He that hath once passed the bounds of modesty, must needs grow exceeding impudent. Two contended for the Archbishoprike of Colongne, the one was brother to the Landgrau of Hessen, the other a kinsman to the Conte Palatine of Rhin, whome the aduerser faction had expelled. Charles was banded for the latter, and undertakes to restore him by force, hoping to plant his ensignes in Germany, or at the least to haue some part for his charges.

He first comes to Nuz vpon the Rhin, foure leagues from Colongne, supposing (that if he tooke it) to fortiffe it wel, and then to plant an other fort aboue Colongne by the surprize of some towne of importance, thereby to force the towne to yeeld, and so to mount vp the Rhin

A County of Ferrete (the which he had in pawne, of Sigismond Duke of Austria, brother to the Emperour) and so to command all that great and rich passage of the Rhin, euen vnto Holland, where it ends, thereby to deuour Lorraine, and so without the Emperours ayde, to vnrpe the tile of King of Sicile and Ierusalem. But Nuz was not unfurnished. The Landgrau of Hessen had cast himselfe into it, with many of his kinsmen, and friends, to the number of eightene hundred horse, with a sufficient number of foote, to keepe the place. The Citizens of Colongne, with their neighbours, arme sixteene thousand foote, and incampe vpon the Rhin, right against the Duke, to cut off his victuals that came out of Gueldres, and to stay the boats with their Cannon.

B The Emperour, and Princes both spirituall and temporall do arme, and as the King had often solicited them, they send vnto him to make a triall of his intent. Lewis failes not to graunt what they demanded, promising twenty thousand men, when as the Imperiall army should be at Colongne. But he had worke at home. Edward King of England discontented, that Lewis had supported Henry, and the Earle of Warwicke, against him, prepares (in the Bourguignons fauour) fifteene hundred maisters, all Gentlemen well mounted, and the most part barded, which made a great number of horse, and 14000. Archers all on horsebacke, with a great number of foote. The Duke of Brittain having already consented to rebellion, should receiue three thousand English, and ioine his army with them as appeared by letters, written by the hand of Yrfe sometimes master of the kings horse, and then seruant C to the Britton (the one letter to the king of England, the other to Hastings great Chamberlaine of the said realme) the which the King did buy of a Secretary of England, for threecore markes of siluer.

In the meane time, the King treats of a peace with the Duke of Bourgongne, to preuent this storme, or at the least to prolong the truce. The Duke excuseth himselfe vpon his word giuen to the English, who labours to draw the Duke from Nuz, exhorting him to accomplish the conuentions, considering his great charge, and that the season fit for warre, was almost spent. To this end, the Lord Scales, nephew to the Constable, makes two iournies to Charles, who pretends (by friuolous reasons) that his honour is much engaged in this siege, and that he could not rise without great blame. Lewis to crosse him, being alwaies his craves-

Lewis seeks for a peace of the Duke of Bourgongne & is refused.

D master in any action, either of warre, or peace, procures him many and new enemies. It was no matter of difficulty to draw in Rene the sonne of the daughter of Rene King of Sicile, the heyre of Lorraine, by reason of his grandmother, after the death of John Duke of Calabria and Lorraine, his Vncle, and of the Marquis Nicolas sonne to the said John. For the Duke being dead, Charles of Bourgongne, desirous to vnite this Duchy to his county, had caused him to be taken prisoner: but he was deliuered in exchange for a young Germaine Prince, who was taken studying at Paris, and marching presently with his army, he had easily deuoured that prey, if the King following him, had not forced him to passe on. Rene therefore sends to desie him before Nuz, and fortified by some French troupes, commanded by the Lord of Craon, he enters the Duchy of Luxembourg, spoiles the country and razeth Pierrefort, a place of the said Duchy, and neere to Nancy. Sigismond of Austria, had in the yeare 1469, ingaged his county of Ferrete, to the Duke of Bourgongne, with all the lands he enioyed on either side the Rhin, for threecore and ten thousand Crownes. Charles had placed Peter of Hagenbach there for Gouvernour, a wicked man, a violent extortioner, and insupportable, both to the nobility and people, who complaine to Sigismond, beseeching him to succour them against the outrage, and concussion of Hagenbach. Sigismond had bin long in dislike with the Suisses, his neighbours, but by the Kings meanes, they were all easily reconciled.

Lewis procures to Charles many enemies.

So they conclude a league, in the which the imperiall citties ioine, Strausbourg, Basill, Colmar, and Slestad, and contribute to furnish the summe due by Sigismond to Charles, the which they consign into the hands of a banker at Basill: then the inhabitants of these ingaged lands, signifie vnto the Duke of Bourgongne, that they had freed themselves of the oath they had made vnto him. And holding themselves freed from the Bourguignons obedience, they reiect his Lieutenants generals command. To suppress them, he assembles a great troupe of Picardes, Flemings, Hennuiers and Lombards, and on Christmas day at night (a good worke on a good day) he seeks to bring them secretly into Enshien. The truce now expired: as the King had vnder-hand ſtirred vp the Duke of Lorraine, the Germains and the Suiſſes againſt the Duke of Bourgongne, ſufficiently buſied before Nuz, he now by open force takes from him, ſpoiles, and burnes Tronquoy, Montdidier, Roye, Montreul, and Corbye: and then ſends the baſtard of Bourbon Admirall of France, Generall of his armie, before Arras, and thereabouts, who ſpoiles and conſumes with fire moſt of the places lying betwixt Abbeuille and Arras. The inhabitants of Arras force their men of warre to go to field, vnder the command of the Earle of Rhomont the Queenes brother.
But the Admirall hauing layed a ſtrong ambuſh, ſends forth about fortie Lances to draw forth the townſemen, who ſallying out as to an aſſured victorie, are compaſſed in like partriges in a net, defeated, chaſed and ſlaine to the number of fourteene or fifteene hundred, D many are taken priſoners, and of the better fort, James of S. Pol, the Conſtables brother, the Lords of Contay, Carency, and others. At that time the King did ſet the Prince of Orange at libertie, (beeing of the houſe and bearing the armes of Chalon) taken in warre, being ſet at thirtie thouſand crownes ranſome, the which the King did moderate to ten thouſand: and cauſed it to be preſently payed to the Gentleman that held him, by meanes whereof he became the Kings Legee-man, and did him homage for the ſaid Principallitie. So as the King gaue him power to intitle himſelfe, By the Grace of God Prince of Orange, and to coyne money of gold and ſiluer of as high a ſtandard as that of Dauphine: to grant all graces, remiſſions, and pardons, but for hereſie and treaſon.

This tranſaction, with the former prizes, did wonderfully diſcontent the Conſtable, ieal- E ous of the Kings good ſucceſſe, and fearing likewiſe ſome checke by ſo mightie an armie, which the Admirall and the Earle of Dammartin had at his gate. For the auoyding whereof he giues the King a falſe intelligence, that the Engliſh were at ſea, readie to land at Calais:
he perſwades the King to prouide for the places of Normandie, hee promiſeth faithfully to defend the marches of Picardie; and in his maſters abſence to reduce Abbeuille and Peronne to his obedience.

But let vs heare another notable part of trecherie: he ſeekes by all meanes to weaken the King, and yet would he not fortifie the Bourguignon: but that the Engliſh ſhould croſſe both their Eſtates, that his owne might ſtand firme in the midſt of their confuſions. With this deſſeine, he procures the Duke of Bourgongne, to ſend Philip Bouton and Philip Pot, F Knights, to the Duke of Bourbon, and he for his part ſends Heſtor of Eſclufe, to ſignifie vnto him, that the Engliſh would ſoone land, that the Duke of Bourgongne, and hee and the Conſtable, ioyning all their powers together, would eaſily conquer the Realme, exhorting him (for the auoyding of his owne ruine and his countries) to ioyne with them, the which if he reſuſe, and that it fall out ill for him, he was not to be pitted.

A The Duke of Bourbon ſends the King two letters of this tenor, brought to him at diuerſe times by Eſclufe, who makes anſwer to the Duke and Conſtable; that neither promiſes nor threates ſhould draw him from the obedience and faithfull ſeruice he did owe vnto his Ma-ieſtie. Lewis will produce theſe letters to the Conſtables confuſion, in the end of the next yeare. For the preſent, he muſt aſſure his frontiers. There is no newes yet of the Engliſh.
Lewis marke well this chaſe, and will cauſe the Conſtable (who ſuppoſed himſelfe to haue the aduantage of the game) to looſe the partie. Poore Nobleman! how many miſfortunes fore-tell thy approaching ruine? Thy Brother priſoner: Thy wife dead at the ſame inſtant, one Mournfull preſages to the Conſtable
ued thy head: Thy Nephew Scales priſoner, with the inſtructions he brought from England to the Bourguignon. And to fill vp the meaſure, thy ſonne the Earle of Rouſſy defeated at Grey in Bourgongne, and priſoner with the Duke of Bourbon, who ſhall not leaue him vntill the end of the yeare, (for fortie thouſand crownes ranſome) with the loſſe of two hundred men at armes, Lombards, the Baron of Couches and many others. The Marſhall of Bourgongne, ſonne to the Earle of Saint Martin, two ſonnes of the houſe of Viteaux, whereof the one was Earle of Ioiny, the Lords of Longey, Liſle, Digoine Montmartin, Ragny, Chaligny, the Bayliſſe of Auxerre, the Enſigne-bearer to the Lord of Beauchamp, and many others, eſcaped death but not imprifonment.

Sufficient warnings to amaze a reſolute mind. Hereafter the Conſtable is afflicted with C ſtrange diſtemperatures fed with the neighbourhood of the Earle of Dammartin, beeing lodged neere S. Quentin whome he knew to be none of his friends. And fearing left the king ſhould aſſault him, he ſends to take aſſurance of the Duke of Bourgongne, intreating him to ſend him his brother James of Saint Pol, the Lord of Fiennes, and ſome other his kinsmen and friends, to put them into Saint Quentin, and to keepe the towne at the Dukes deuotion, (without bearing Saint Andrewes croſſe) the which he promiſed to reſtore vnto him within a prefixed time.

They come: they preſent themſelues within view of Saint Quentin, once, twice, and thrice: The Conſtable ſeekes to
the Duke of Bourgongne
and deceiues
him.
but the Conſtable ſuſpects them, and ſends them backe. They came ſtill, either too ſoone or too late: ſo as at the bruit of theſe forces the Admirall caſts himſelfe into Arras, where-D offollowed the taking of James of Saint Pol, who beeing brought before the King, hauing libertie to ſpeake, he confeſſed, that at the two firſt iourneys, he came onely with an intent to comfort his brother: but at the third time, ſeeing the Conſtable had deceiued both his Maſter and him, if he had bene the ſtronger, he would haue kept the place for his Maſter, without offering any violence to his brother: whereupon his Maieſtie ſet him at libertie, very well appointed, ſeruing him vnto his death. And although the Conſtable had lately done a notable diſgrace vnto the King, yet his Maieſtie diſſembled it wiſely: and to take from him all cauſe of iealouſie, he willes him to go and make warre in Hainault, and to beſeege A-uennes, whileſt that the Admirall was buſied in Artois. He goes, but very loth, and with exceeding feare, and ſtayes but little: he retires betimes, beeing aduertified (as he informed the King) of two men in his armie (whome hee deſcribed by apparent ſignes) ſuborned to E kill him. This new feare, accompanied with diſtruſt, bredde a terrible diſtemperature in the Conſtables head, who hauing loſt his credit both with the King and Duke, will yet intertaine himſelfe by both, and perſwade them that he is ſeruant but to one. Hee ſent often to the Bourguignons campe to draw him from the ſeege of Nuz, that he might ioyne ſidely with the Engliſh at their coming on land, and then vpon the returne of his meſſengers, he gaue the King ſome plauſible intelligence, to cauſe him to like of his conference with the Duke, ſometimes diſgracing his affaires, to winne the credit of an affectionate ſeruant with Lewis, ſometimes extolling the Duke, to terrifie the King. But oh policie ſimply ſhadowed!

On the other ſide, he knew well that he had greatly offended the King by his laſt action.
F He ſees himſelfe forſaken by his moſt confident ſeruants, Ientis and Mouy, whom the King had entertained. Theſe might haue aſſiſted him in his peace-making, the which he ſhadowed with ſome recompence that the King had promiſed him for the Countie of Guiſe. Lewis heares them, giues them good words, and commands the Conſtable to come vnto him.
But the conſcience of our miſdeeds, is a grieuous teſtimonie. The varietie of his troubled thoughts, will not admit an eaſie releefe. He offers to come, ſo as his Maieſtie will ſwear 1475. vpon the Crosse of S. Lan, that he will neither do, cause, nor suffer any trecherie nor outrage to be done to his person. This crosse hath beene kept at Angiers time out of mind, with an old beleefe, That whosoever swearing thereon, doth forswear himselfe, he dies within the yeare, of a miserable and violent death. Lewis refuseth this oath, but submits himselfe to any other. The more he excuseth himselfe, the more the Constable presseth him. Thus posts die hourly from either of them vpon this assurance: behold, two great personages of sunflie houres, wonderfully troubled in mind, and it seemed they feared alike, to perish or to drie humours, wonderfully troubled in mind, and it seemed they feared alike, to perish or to seperate themselves absolutely. Yet Lewis was the more cunning, and did his busines more courtly. But if these two afflicted themselves in this sort, Edward of England and Charles of Bourgoingne were in no lesse doubt one of another. The King had sent John Tiercelin the Lord of Brosse, to make his excuse vnto the Emperour, for that he had not sent the armie promised by the treatie, assuring him to do it, when he had ended his enterprises begun, and for the most part well forward both in Bourgoingne and Picardie, intreating him in the meane time not to make any agreement with the Duke: and that the one should not treat of a peace without the other. That he should confiscate all the Dukes seigneuries that held of the Empire, and that he would feaze vpon such as depended on the Crowne of Fraunce, as Flanders, Arthois, Bourgoingne and many others.

Lewis sends an Ambassadour to the Emperour.

The Emperour, a man of more wit then vertue, answers by a gentle Apologie, That they must not diuide the Beares skin, before the beast be dead. As if he should say, Come according to your promise, let vs take this man, and then weare his spoiles. Let vs now see what hee doth before Nuz, where we haue left him much perplexed how to free himselfe with his honour from that enterprife. Two mightie armies attended him, and cut off his victuals both aboue and beneath the Rhine: all the Princes of Germany both spirituall and temporall, had ioyned their forces in infinite numbers; all the townes and commonalties did willingly contribute to this charge. Two other considerations did trouble him. The King made great war against him, and had burnt many places in Bourgoingne, Picardie, Arthois, and Pondieu. Moreouer, he had laboured al his life to draw in the English, but without any effect till now: and would he abandon so goodly an armie, passing now betwixt Douer and Calais, complaining of his breach, threatening (if he delay it any longer) to take another course? Yet must the Bourguignon find some bonorable pretext for his rising.

There was with the Emperour an Apostolicke Legate, going from armie to armie, to mediate a peace. The King of Denmarke was there in person, for the same effect. In the end the place is deliuered into the Legats hands, to dispose as the Sea of Rome should decree. Thus Nuz after a yeares seege, sees the Bourguignon dislodge with the losse of foure thousand of his choice men. A hard departure, that notwithstanding the necessitie of his armie, and this mightie Imperiall power, yet not daring to affront him, he did see the beseegeed and Cittizens overcome with hunger and toyle, who had beene forced within ten daies to yeeld to his mercie. Charles would willingly haue beene reuenged of René for his desie: yet he forbears vntill the next yeare, but with another issue then he expected: he shall be well beaten and then slaine. At this time vrgent necessitie drawes him elsewhere, and his troupes hauing need to be refreshed, he sends them to liue vpon the spoiles of Lorraine and Barre, and himselfe with a small traine goes to meet Edward at Calais. Edward being yet at Douer, sends Garret his King at armes, a Norman by nation, to Lewis with a letter of defiance, the tenor whereof is next more of the French then the English. He summons him, To yeeld vnto him the kealme of France, as his right, that he might restore the Church, Nobilitie and people to their auuncient liberties, and free them from their great burthens and afflictions: and vpon his refusal, he protests of all the miseries that should follow, after the accustomed manner and forme in such like cases. A bare desie grounded vpon a subiect long before debated, and often decided. The King reads the letter, commands the Herald to be brought into a Chamber vnto him, beeing alone, and saies vnto him. That he knew well the King of England was thrust into this enterprife by the people of England, by the Duke of Bourgoingne, and by the Constable of Saint Paul. That the Duke came from Nuz like a vanquished and needie man, that winter grew on, vnfitte for the effects of warre, that the Constable would deceiue King Edward, and liue onely in his dissimulations, entertaining euery man, and trusting no man. In the end, he sollicitis Garret, to perswade his master to make an agreement with him, giving him three hundred Crownes with his owne hand, and promise of a thousand, if it might be accomplished: and in publike, he caused a goodly peece of crimson velueto be giuen him, containing thirtie elles. The Herald promiseth to do his best indeauour, aduising him to send a Herald to obtaine a safe-conduct, for the sending of Ambassadors, at what time as Edward should haue passed the sea: who at his first entrie finds himselfe much deceiued of his expectation, for the Duke had promised to ioyne with him, with two thousand such hundred men at armes, with a great number of other horse and foote: and for his assurance to put some strong places into his hands, namely, Saint Quentin, relying vpon the Constable. That finding the King ouercharged, and readie to receiue a mate, he should begin the warres in France, three moneths before the landing of the English armie: but his armie was so weake and poore, as he durst not shew it.

Edward desies

The first cause of Edward's discontent against Charles.

Let vs here acknowledge another notable fauour of God to this Crowne, who had so blinded the iudgement of this Duke, as he continued obstinate and wilfull, before this strong place resolutely defended, where as he should haue attended the English. We confesse that both together would haue dangerously shaken the estate of this Realme. So the English and Bourguignon part from Calais, passe by Boullen, and draw towards Peronne: where thinking to lodge, they were disappointed, which gaue some dislike vnto the English. Beeing at Peronne, the Constable sends Lewis of Creuille to the Duke of Bourgoingne, excusing himselfe, for not deliuering vp of Saint Quentin, whereby (said he) he should haue lost all his credit, and intelligence in France, and hereafter be altogether vnprofitable for him. But he was now wholly at his deuotion, seeing the King of England within the Realme. Moreouer he promiseth the said Duke, To serue and succour him, and all his friends and allies, as well the King of England, as others, and against all men, without any exception: and intreats him, that that writing of his owne hand may serue as a gage of credit with the said King. The Duke giues his letter vnto Edward, assuring him moreouer, that the Constable should not onely giue him entrance into Saint Quentin, but into all his other places.

Another error of the Bourguignon that discourents the English.

Both the King and Duke beleeued it. The King, for that he had married the Constables Neece: the Duke, for that the Constable was in so great feare and distrust of our Lewis, as it seemed he should not dare to faile of his promises. They part from Peronne, and approaching neare Saint Quentin, they send some English troupes before, to enter the towne, as to the taking of a certaine possession. But the Negro (saith the Prouerbe) changeth not his hewe. The signall they giue them of their approach neere vnto them, are skirmishes and Cannon-shot. Two or three English are slaine, and some taken, and so they recover their armie, greatly discontented with this affront. The Bourguignon, to colour this foule and trecherous part, pretends the Constables meaning to be very good, that he could not couer the yeelding thereof, with any apparent pretext, if at the simple sight of so small troupes he should be amazed: that he would be forced thereunto, and if all the whole armie marched, he would make no refusal. But these were iests: he desired but to winne time, and not to shew himselfe enemie for any man. The next day Charles of Bourgoingne takes his leaue of Edward, promising to returne speedily with all his forces.

He deceiues
both King,
Edward and Duke Charles.

Edward and his men had small practise in the estate of our realme, they are not those braue Warriours which had so long gouerned our France: they needed conduct and direction to fashion them to our armes, without the which they know themselves at their first arriuall to be vnprofitable: but in a short time they are fashioned and become good fouldiers. In the meane time they are abandoned, and the season of doing any thing almost past: they must therefore resolue. And thus the King discouers that Edward would agree. The English had taken the seruant of James Grasse, a Gentleman of the Kings house, but for that he was their first prisoner, Edward giues him libertie. At his departure, Howard and Stanley, (both in credit with Edward) said vnto him, Recommend vs to the King your master, if you may speake vnto him. (Garret the Herald had named these two, to obtaine a passport for the Ambassadors that Lewis should send to treat.) This message bred some ialousie in the Kings head, who then was at Compienne: for Gilbert the brother of James Grasse, followed the Duke of Brittanie, and was in great credit: but beeing carefully examined, they find, he deferred credit. Lewis remembers the direction the Herald had giuen him, and suddenly takes this resolution with himselfe, To send a seruant, the sonne of Meridol of Rochel, belon-

1475. belonging to the Lord of Halles (or Scales) in qualitie of a Herald. This seruant had his countenance and personage very vnpleasing, yet a good wit, and a sweet speech. But why did Lewis make choice of a seruant, whom he had neuer seene but once, amongst so many thousands more capable of that charge? he might dis-allow him if need required, as intruding himselfe, or at the least aduenturing without his priuie, and at all hazards, the losse of a seruant was not great. This Herald fashioned after the Kings mind, hath his charge deliuered him, and is attired with a coate of armes, made likewise in hast, of a trumpets banner, enameled like a pettie Herald, that belonged to the Admirall: and then he goes to horse backe, without any mans priuie except Villiers, Master of the horse, and the Lord of Ar-genton. Beeing arriued at the English armie, he is brought before the King, to whom hee deliueres his charge; That the King his master had long desired to haue good amitie with him to the end that both their realmes might hereafter liue in peace: That since his comming to the Crowne he had neuer made warre, nor attempted any thing against the Crowne of Eng-land. If he had receiued the Earle of Warwicke, it was onely to crosse the Duke of Bour-gongne: That the Duke of Bourgongne should not haue procured his passage into France, but to make his peace with more aduantage with the King. If any others were actors (mean- ing the Constable) it was but to serue their owne turnes in crossing him, and to worke their priuate profits, not regarding the affaires of England. That now winter grew on: that his armie was not railed without exceeding charge (this was secretly to offer a recompence of all or part, which was a great perfwader to peace.) That such as nourished this warre be- twixt them, were some Noblemen and Merchants, who made their profite of the peoples losse: That if the King of England would giue care to a treatie, the King his master would embrace it with so great affection, as both himselfe and his realme should remaine well sa- tisfied. And for prooffe, if it pleased him to grant a safe-conduct for an hundred horse, the King would send Ambassadors vnto him well informed of his pleasure: vnlesse hee desired a mutuall interview in some place, mid-way betwixt both armies, then the King should grant a safe-conduct for his part.

Ambassadors

Kings.

Articles of a greement
with the English.

These speeches please, and this counterfeit Herald returnes with a safe-conduct, as he de- sired, accompanied with another Herald, to carrie one from the King of the same tenour. The next day, the Ambassadors of either side meete, in a village neere to Amiens: For the King, came the Bastard of Bourbon Admirall, the Lord of S. Pierre, and Heberge Bishop of Eureux. For Edward, came Howard, Sellenger, and Doctor Morton, afterwards Chancellour of England, and Archbishop of Canterburie. In truth it was much so to humble himselfe, but the weightie burthen of affaires which oppressed our King, forced him thereunto, who with one stone gaue two strokes: for Lewis sent backe his enemy, to the great confusion of the Duke of Bourgongne. Let vs generally confesse, that it is not now alone, that God doth shew his singular grace and fauor to this Monarchie; The Britton was watchfull, and ioyntly with the Bourguignon, they practised crosses of dangerous consequence.

The English from a generall demand of the Crowne of France, restraines himselfe to the Duchie of Normandy or Guienne. But a franke demander, requires a bold denier. Lewis protests, that he would do any thing to send the King of England out of his realme: but to yeeld him the possession of any lands, he will rather put all to hazard. He had a goodly and mightie armie, which they esteemed (saith the Originall) an hundred thousand fighting men, and in shew might do much, the English beeing in bad tearmes with the Bourguignon. But the quietest course is the best, and both beeing willing to agree, an accord is soone made. In the end, the King graunts the English three-score and twelue thousand Crownes present pay- ment: (Paris lent the money, vpon promises of restitution by the Feast of All-Saints next following) The marriage of Charles with the eldest daughter of King Edward (both beeing yet very young, neither shall it take effect:) and for the estate of her house, the Duchie of Guienne, or fiftie thousand Crownes yearly, payable in the Tower of London, for nine yeares following; at the end whereof, he and his wife quietly to enioy the reuenues of the said Duchie, and the King should remaine discharged of the payment of fiftie thousand Crownes to King Edward.

Moreover, the King promised sixteene thousand Crownes pension to some of Edward's fauourites, who had much assisted in this reconciliation: to Hastings two thousand, to Howard

A Howard, to John Cheney Master of the Horse, to Sellenger, Montgomerie, and some others, the remainder. And besides, there was great store of Siluer and Plate distributed among King Edward's seruants: so euery Saint had his candle. These conditions performed, Edward should repasse the Sea, and leaue Howard and the Master of his horse in hostage, vntill hee had recouered England: yet not without an interview of both Kings. This peace should continue nine yeares, comprehending the Dukes of Bourgongne and Brittanie, if they pleased. The Bourguignon hearing these newes, hastes to returne to the English, followed on- ly with sixteene hundred Horse; At his first arriual he discouers his inward passions by his outward countenance. But he came too late to preuent it. Edward tels him, that hee hath made a truce for nine yeares, and exhorts him to enter, according to the reseruation hee had made. Charles replies by fits, and after a reprochfull manner: That Edward's Predeces- sors Kings of England, had performed many high exploits in France, and with much sweat and toyle had wonne great reputation. He checketh him that he did not procure the En- glish to passe, for any need he had, but onely to giue them occasion to recouer their auncient inheritance. And to make it manifest, that he had no need of their comming, he would not accept of any truce with the King, vntill that Edward had bene three moneths in his owne countrie. And hauing thus sayd, he returnes towards Luxembourg, from whence he came. A brauado of ill digestion to the English and his Councell, but plausible to all the friends of confusion.

The Duke of
Bourgongne
reprocheth
King Edward
for making a truce

C But what is become of our Constable? is there no speech of him during this treatie. Now is he more incombred with feare then euer. He knowes well, that he hath displeased the king, the English and the Bourguignon, all alike, and still he apprehends the conclusion at Bou- uines. In the meane time he seeks to please all, and sets a good face on it. Edward had freely made offer to the French Ambassadors, to name some Noblemen, that were traitours (said he) to the King and his Crowne, and to prooue it by their hand-writings.

The Constable
perplexed.

The King holds a Councell vpon this matter: some maintaine, that this accusation is fraudulent, and that the English would make his demands the greater with the wracke of anothers honour, as hauing good intelligence in France. But Lewis his iudgement was more sharpe, he knew the Bourguignons courtes, he considered the season, that the English had not any one place in their hands, and that the Bourguignon had deceiued them. Moreover, he knew well, that the Constable would not giue them any entrie: and least hee should bee farre imbarqued in the league, the King entertained him with many letters, and kept him in good humor: and the Constable likewise sent often to the King, yet alwaies swimming be- twixt two streames, vnderstanding that the treatie betwixt the two Kings, grew to some perfection, he seemed well satisfied, and sends Lewis of Creuille a Gentleman of his house, and John Richer his Secretarie, aduising the King, that to auoide this threatening foraine tempest he should procure a truce, and to satisfie the English, it were good to graunt them one or two small Townes to winter in. Hee supposed in doing this, the English should bee beholding to him, and to rest fully satisfied for the affront at Saint Quentin.

Edward discusses the Constables
disseins.

E Note alwaies, that Lewis was a wonderfull instrument of diuision, when he pleased. Con- tary a prisoner at the defeat of Arras, went and came vpon his faith to the Duke of Bourgo- gne, to treat a peace. He was by chance in Court at the comming of these two persons. The King hides him in his chamber behind the hangings, to heare and report to his master the speeches the Constable and his people held of him. Creuille by the Kings commandement, with a loud voice, said, that the Constable had sent them to the Duke of Bourgongne, with many instructions, to diuide him from the English; and that they had found the said Duke so farre incensed, as by their perswasions he was not onely readie to abandon them, but to charge them in their retreat. Creuille in speaking this, did counterfeit the gesture of a paitionate Prince, stamping and swearing, S. George (the oath of Charles of Bourgongne) say- ing, that he called the King of England, Blanchorgne, and the sonne of an archer, whose name he carried: words accompanied with all the indignities that might be spoken. This mooued laughter in the King, who taking pleasure at the repetition thereof, and seeming somewhat deasse, made him to straine his voice in the report. Contay no lesse amazed then the King was pleased, would neuer haue beleueed it, if he had not heard it.

Lewis subill indulgence.

And although it greeued the King much to dissemble the Constables counsell, to giue some 1475. some places to the English; yet would he not discouer his discontent to these Deputies, but answered them graciously: I will send to my brother (the Queene and the Constables wife were Sisters) and let him understand my mind, hauing cunningly drawne a promise from his Secretarie to reueale what did concerne him. And at the same instant hee dispatcheth Con-

 The Constables trecherie.
 say to the Duke his master with letters of credit of the Kings owne hand; and somewhat to satisfie the Constable, he giues the English Eu and S. Vallery, to lodge in during the treatie of peace. In the meane time, (oh notable trecherie!) behold one of the Constables ordinarie trickes; he sends his Confessor to the King of England with letters of credit, and intreats him earnestly not to trust to the Kings promises, but rather to seaze vpon Eu and Saint Vallery, and there to passe some part of the winter: that within two moneths hee would lodge him better. Yet he giues him no other securitie, but much hope, and an offer to lend him some thousand crownes, with many other goodly shewes, to draw him from so profitable an tie accord. Edward answers, that the truce is concluded, & that he will not altar any thing. That if he had kept his word, he would haue accepted it. Thus our Constable despaires on all sides.

The King (foreseeing that the Constable would thrust Edward into ielousie) resolved by his bountie to take away all cause of suspect: for the effecting whereof, he sends Edward three hundred carts laden with the best wine he could get: and within Amiens (Edward lodging within halfe a league, for confirmation of the truce) he causeth two long tables to be set vp at the entrie of the towne, furnished with exquisite meates, and all kinds of prouocations to drinke, with men to attend all commers and goers at the table. At euery table were five or six men of reputation, fat and bigge, the better to encourage the Drinkers: amongst others were the Lords of Craon, Briquebec, Bresme, and Villiers, Gentlemen of a pleasant humour: and wheresoeuer the English tooke any lodging, they might not spend any thing. This bountie continued three or foure daies, during the which, if Lewis had meant treacherously, he had good meanes, they entering into Amiens confusedly, to the number of nine thousand, for of this great multitude, some did sing, and some slept, overcome with wine and drowinesse. But contrariwise, he committed the guard of the gate to English archers, whom Edward (at Lewis his request) had sent, to take in, and put out whom they pleased. It was then concluded, to appoint a place for an interview of these two Kings. It is done with lesse confusion and hazard in a small place. Picquiny vpon Somme was held convenient: an auncient Prophecie which the English obserued, described this very place. To this effect they build vpon the bridge two pentiles of wood, the one for Lewis, the other for Edward, either of them capable of ten or twelue men. Betwixt both was a partition, with grates to put through ones armes, going ouerthwart the bridge, that no man might go from the one to the other. Lewis made his profit of fore-passed euents: he knew that if the barre at Montereau had had no more passage then this, John Duke of Bourgogne had not ended his daies so lamentably, in the narrow bounds thereof. The 28. of August Lewis comes first to the barre, accompanied with John Duke of Bourbon, the Cardinall his brother, and followed onely with about 800. men at armes. Edward comes after, hauing with him the Duke of Clarence his brother, the Earle of Northumberland, his Chamberlaine Hastings, his Chancellor, and others: and behind him all his armie in bataille. Either King had twelue men about him, foure of the which went from one part to another, to search if there were nothing practised to the preiudice of their masters. They imbrace each other through the grate, and sweare vpon the holy Bible, to obserue the articles agreed vpon. The oath taken, Lewis mingling his serious discourse with some mirth, inuites Edward to come to Paris, that he would feast him with the Ladies, and giue him the Cardinall of Bourbon for his Confessor, (a pleasant man and of free life) who willingly would giue him absolution, if happily hee should sinne in that case. Then they conferre together awhile without any witnesses. And vpon the Kings demand, whether the Duke of Bourgogne would not accept of the truce, (men take an oxe by the horne, and a man by his word, as with the like policie the Duke of Bourgogne might haue beene surprized at his departure from Liege.) Edward answered, that he might do as he pleased, I will summon him againe (saith he) if he will not hearken to it, I will reserve my selfe to you two. This accord beeing made, Lewis begins to play vpon another string, and makes the like demand touching the Duke of Brittain, for whom hee chiefly made the motion. But he findes the English resolute in his protection, as hauing found no friend

An interview of the Kings.

A friend so kinde in his affliction. Lewis surceaseth, and with a wonderfull curtesie takes leaue of the King of England, contents all his followers with some kind words, and giues presents to some priuate Noblemen, the Heralds and trumpets, who to shew their thankfull minde began to cry, A largeesse for the most noble and mighty French King: a largeesse, a largeesse. He hath alwayes made it manifest, that he was exceeding suspitious, and that from an antecedent he could cunningly draw a good consequence. He is no sooner on his way to Amiens, but he studies of Edwards facility to harken to the going to Paris: that he was a very goodly Prince, and of an amorous complexion, and that some nice Parisien might stay him longer then his estate required, or at the least draw him to passe the sea an other time: that his Predecessors had loued Paris and Normandy but too well: Hee therefore desires to see their backs, and must by some meanes with-draw him from this humor, wishing rather to haue him his good Brother and friend beyond the seas, then here. The necessity which forced the King against the Bourguignon, serued for an excuse.

Moreover, the King was grieved, to see the English so resolute to defend the Brittons quarrell: hee would gladly haue obtained that freedome, to make warre in Brittain, the which hee wonderfully affected: and made a second motion vnto him by Bowichage and S. Pierre, who returned with this answer, That whosoever doth attempt, (saith he) against the Duke of Brittain, I will passe the seas in person, and succour him. So hee was no more importuned. Edward had an especiall cause to entertaine the loue of the Duke of Brittain, for at the defeat of Henry King of England, as we haue heard, Henry Earle of Richmond, and nearest kinsman to the said Henry, after the death of his sonne the Prince of Wales, saued himselfe with his vnkle the Earle of Pembroke, and hauing entred a barke in hast, they were with tempest driuen vpon the coast of Brittain, and there forced to take land, where they were seized on, and led with sure guard to Vannes: A very happy chance for the Duke, for while hee holds this goodly gage, he was assured to command the forces of England: but very vnhappy for the Earle, for if hee might haue landed in France, Lewis without doubt (to crosse Edward) would haue laboured to restore him. This truce did wonderfully displease some of Edwards household seruants: Lewis of Brettailles among the rest, a Gentleman of Gascony, was greatly discontented, giuing out, that the King his Maister hauing in person

D wonne nine batailles, had gotten more dishonor by the voluntary losse of this tenth, (which was in a manner gotten) then he had purchased honour in the former nine. That the French might with reason laugh at Edwards credulous facility. Lewis aduertised by the Lord of Argenton, of this Gascons free discourse, resolves to stoppe his mouth, to the end hee should not here-a-fer spend his tongue to the preiudice of this Estate: He sends for him, and makes him dine with him, offers him great aduancement, so as hee will serue him. Vpon his refusal, he giues him a thousand crownes presently, and promiseth to doe good for his brethren that remained in France: binding him to maintaine (as much as in him did lye) the friendship growing betwixt these two Crownes. Brettailles did not iudge amisse. Our Lewis had some-times a more liberall tongue then was conuenient, and feared much, least some words E had passed him, whereby the English might discouer that he mocked him: and so it chanced, yet behold how he couered it. The day after this enter-view, being in his Cabinet, hee fell to iest of the wines and other presents he had sent to the English. But he discouered not a Gascoyne marchant dwelling in England, who by chance was crept in to obtaine a licence of the King for the transporting of certaine pipes of wine, freed from impost. This marchant might talke, he must therefore be wone, and staid in France, vnder some apparent pretext. The King sent the Lord of Argenton to talke with him, aduanceth him to a good office in the towne where he was borne, hee giues him a thousand Frankes presently to transport his family, the transport of wines he required, and a man to conduct him to Bourdeaux: but all vpon condition that not he, but his brother, should make the voyage into F to England. Thus the King made amends for his rash speech.

Edward is now vnder saile, hee was a new Conqueror, his presence was therefore more needfull in England: he did neuer much affect the voyage. Two principall reasons drew him into the action. The one was, all his subiects gaping after the possession of this Crowne, did sollicit him, & the Bourguignon prest him. Another was, he might reserve a good part of the mony that should be raised for this voyage (for the Kings of England leuy nothing

Causes that moued Edward to passe and to returne home into England.

1475. about their reuenues, but for the warres of France.) But see the policy of Edward: hee had of purpose brought with him ten or twelue of the chiefe bourgeoisie of the City, whose credit was great with the commons, and who had with all care procured this tax. These men were soone weary with this military toile, presuming that at the first arriuall, a profitable battaile should decide the quarrell. And to make them taste more feelingly the sweetness of peace, from the sharpnesse of warre, Edward doth some-times trouble their heads with doubts, some-times with feares, to keepe them from murmuring at his returne into England. On the other side, he loued his pleasures, and was of a complexion not able to endure the trauels requisite for the conquest of this realme: and although the King was charged with enemies, yet had he provided well for his defence. But see the most urgent reason of Edward's retreat. The performance he desired of the marriage betwixt the Dauphin, and his daughter. A marriage which made him dissemble many things, whereof Lewis will make his profit. To conclude, as they which haue benee deceived in their friendship, hate without dissembling, Edward before he parted from Calais, sent the King those two letters of credit, which the Constable had written vnto him, with all other verball assurances which he had giuen him. Sufficient testimonies to accuse and conuince him of those crimes, where with he shall be here-after charged. Let vs now reconcile the Dukes of Bourgongne, and Brittain with the King. Contay was now returned from the Duke of Bourgongne, the day of the enter-view, and had found his maister in a good humour, when as the English were returned. Hugonnet Chancellor of Bourgongne, and other Ambassadors for the Duke, meete at a bridge mid-way betwixt Auenues, and Veruins in Hainault, so well accompanied with Archers and other men of warre, that one of the English hostages, whom the King had led with him, tooke occasion to say, that if the Duke of Bourgongne had benee followed with many such men when he came to salute King Edward, peradventure, they had not made a peace. The Viconte of Narbonne answered: That the Duke wanted no such men, and that he had sent them to refresh themselves, but six hundred pipes of wine, and a pension which the King gaue them, made them half home to their country.

Edward sends the Constables letters vnto Lewis.

Discontent betwixt the English and Bourgignons.

A truce betwixt Lewis and the Bourgignons.

The English moued here-with; It is as querey man said (replies he) that you would deceiue us. Do you call the money the King giues vs. a pension? It is a tribute: and by Saint George you may take so much, as wee will returne againe. This quarrell staied their proceeding; neither did they preuaile any more, the second time, when as the King appointed Tannequoy of Chastel, and the Chancellor Orriole to heare the said Ambassadors at Veruins: but the third assembly which was in the Kings Chamber, made a full conclusion (and in truth Brezay had reason to say one day to the King, that his horse was well laden when hee was on him, for that he carried all his Councell with him: for indeed, hee did effect more in his presence, then all his Ambassadors together,) where there was a truce accorded for nine yeares, according to the other, but by reason of the oath which Charles of Bourgongne had sworne to Edward in his choller, it might not be published vntill the 17. of October following.

Edward (discontented that the Duke of Bourgongne would treat a part) sends Montgomery (a Knight very inward with him) to the King to Veruins, hee requires two things, the one, that hee would take no other truce with the Duke then that which he had made: the other that hee would not suffer Saint Quintin to be yielded vnto him; and if he would continue the warre against the said Duke, he would returne the next spring and ioyne his forces with the Kings, so as hee would recompence him for the losse he should sustaine by the customs of Voll at Calais, which would bee of no value, (being estimated at fifty thousand Crownes) and pay halfe his Army.

The King to satisfie Edward, answers, that it is the same truce they had made together, and for the same terme: but the Duke would haue letters apart; hee thanks him for his good offers, and returns him home his Ambassador and hostages. Lewis had lately learned, that the French and the English doe easily quarrell when they are together, and a small matter would reconcile them with the Bourgignons. As for the Britton, the King could not well digest the answer which Edward had made to Bouchage and Saint Pierre, whereby he easily discovered the strict allyance betwixt them: but seeing hee could not diuide them, being in the Abbey of Victorie nere to Senlis, where hee had a priuate deuotion, the peace was absolutely confirmed, whereby the King renounced all rights pretended by him to the Duchie

A Duchy of Brittain, reseruing the souerainty and homage according to the ancient custom. He promised to keepe the Dukes person in safety, and to maintaine his priuileges, and prerogatiues, without forcing him to follow him out of his Duchy, but with his owne good liking: and moreover he should cause to be giuen vnto the Duke of Brittain the hands and seales of all the Princes of his blood, and of the Noblemen of the Realme, both spirituall and temporall, with renouation of all alliances, or former promises, and restitutions to be made, of all things taken during the warre. The patent hath the same date with that of the duke of Bourgongne.

1475. A peace confirmed with the Duke of Brittain.

Let vs now bring the Constable into open view, to play the last act of his tragedy: finding that all these shifts and deuises, could not breake the reconciliation of the two Kings, the next day after their interview, he writes very humbly to the King, by a seruant of his named Rapine: That he was well informed how his enemies labored to bring him in disgrace, charging him with many things, whereof he had shewed contrary effects: for that during all the forepassed confusions, he had faithfully kept all those places which his maiesty had committed vnto him, and beate backe the enemy whensoever he presented himselfe. And to purchase some credit, he offers to deale with the Duke of Bourgongne who (if the King please) shall helpe to defeat Edward and all his army. Lewis dissembles, and writes to the Constable, what was concluded the day before, that at this time he was busied with many affaires, and had need of such a head as his. A captious word but well vnderstood by Rapine, who takes it for a beginning of saluour for his maister. But alas how easily doth man deceiue himselfe in his vaine imaginations, and what can a perplexed soule produce, but trouble and confusion: the truce is no sooner confirmed with the Bourguignon, but the conclusion of Bouuines is reuiued whereof we haue made mention. Now this poore Constable knowes not to whome to fly.

The last act of the Constables Tragedie.

Lewis dissembles with him.

And as euery man runnes as far as he can from an imminent shipwracke, his best friends, his most affectionate seruants, and his most confident soldiers abandon him. What shall he then doe? whome shall he implore? what Sanctuary? what succors? he knowes well he hath equally displeased, Lewis Edward and Charles; his lands are on all sides inuironed by his enemies. He is too farre from any safe retreat. He holds strong places, yea almost impregnable: but who shall defend them? he inioyes great treasure, but they violently hunt after it.

The Constables piteous estate.

What refuge shall he choose? shall he goe to the King? but by what meanes shall he purchase grace? he is too farre incensed; and is seized of the letters which the Constable had written to the King of England; and the Dukes of Bourbon and Bourgongne. May he rely vpon Lewis his word? but he would not sweare vpon the crosse of Saint Lau. Shall he passe the seas? he gaue Edward too vnkind wellcome neere Saint Quintin. Shall he cast himselfe into Charles of Bourgongnes armes? but he hath spoiled his Country of Hainault, he would haue forced him to marry his daughter with the Duke of Guienne deceased, and hath often treacherously deceiued him; being aduanced by his meanes to that great dignity of Constable.

The Constable in a desperate estate.

To conclude, he alone hath more then all others maintayned these Princes in hatred, so as what party soeuer he takes, he is vndoone. Yet must he needes vnmaske him-selfe and fly to one, for what meanes hath he to warrant himselfe alone against so mighty enemies? which shall he choose? poore soule! beaten with distrust, feare and dispaire; for yielding to the one he incensed the other. Moreouer there is lesse danger for him to be beseeged by two, then by one alone, being impossible for two armies to accord long together: and contrariwise, being charged but by one, there is some hope to make his peace. Sometimes he resolues to fly into Germany, and to buy a place there, vntill he be reconciled to the one: sometimes to keepe his strong Castell of Han, the which he had well fortified to serue his need. But he is so amazed as he dares not discouer him-selfe to those few seruants that are left him. Moreover they are all subiects to some one of these Princes. Yet he must resolue: and better is it to fall once, then stagger alwaies.

But they haue both ioyntly conspired his death, he is well informed thereof, and hath scene a copy of their mutuall seales. Yet when once he hath passed his word, hee will make 1475- make a conscience to breake it. But there is no faith in the Court of France: he hath offended the King too much, and hath too great aduersaries, and no man might safely loue him whome Lewis hated. The Duke of Bourgongne is more moderate, more easie to pacifie, and if he giue his faith, he wil be ashamed to deliuer him who had thrust him-felfe vnder his protection. He gaped after Saint Quintin, he must yeeld it vp vnto him, and redeeme his head with the price of this good place. He stands firme in this resolution, and beseecheth Charles to send him a safe-conduct, to goe and treat with him of matters concerning his estate and person. At the first Charles makes some difficulty, but in the end he thinks he may well dispense with his conscience for Saint Quintin.

The Constable yeelds to the Bourgongne.

Saint Quintin yeelded to the King.

So the Constable accompanied onely with fifteene or twenty horse, goes towards Mons, B in Hainault, to Esmeriez great Bayliffe of Hainault, the dearest of his friends, attending newes from the Duke of Bourgongne, who made warre in Lorraine vpon the deffie we haue spoken of. The Foxe is now out of his earth. It must bee fore-seene, that this yeelding reconcile not the Constable to the Duke. The King well informed what troupes were in Saint Quintin, and of the inhabitants affection, hasteth thither with seauen or eight hundred horse. They meete him with their keyes: the quarters are ordered, all his forces enter and he followes. And to take from the Bourguignon all hope to recouer Saint Quintin by the Constables meanes, he giues him aduice of the taking thereof: for although in the diuision made at Bouuines of the Constables places, this fell to the Duke, yet would not the King that he should make his peace with the Bouruignon by the deliuey thereof.

The Constable prisoner.

Charles aduertised hereof sends to the great Bayliffe, that he should gard Mons well, that the Constable goe not forth, and that he should appoint him his lodging for a prison. Here the Bayliffe preferres obedience to his maister, before the Constables loue. Lewis aduertised of the Constables detention, requires the Duke of Bourgongne by Bouchages, and Saint Pierre, either to deliuer him, or to performe the conuention. He promisseth to doe it, and causeth him to be carried with a sure gard to Peronne. He had now taken diuerse places in Lorraine and Barrois, and did batter Nancy, whereof he desired to see the issue, for the deliuey or retaying of the Constable, so as with this desleigne, in steed of eight daies concluded on at Bouuines, he lets passe a moneth and more. But the Kings great instance, and his army which lay houerling in Champaigne, as ready to succor the Lorraine, and to crosse the Bourguignon in that enterprise, the conquest whereof he greedily pursued, to vnite his territories, and to passe freely from Luxembourg into Bourgongne, (for inioying this Duchy, he came from Holland vnto the Confines of the Diocese of Lion, vpon his owne land) made Charles to send Himbercourt, and the Chancellor Hugonnét, (both great enemies to the Constable) to deliuer him at an appointed day, to such as the King should send. Charles supposed to haue wonne Nancy by that day, but he was deceaued in the time. And in truth they had no sooner left him, but a countermand comes from the Duke, after the taking of Nancy, but too late.

The Constable deliuered to the King.

The prefixed day being come, they deliuer the Constable at the gates of Peronne, into the hands of the bastard of Bourbon, Admirall of France: Bouchages, S. Pierre, Cerifay and others: who led him prisoner to the Bastille at Paris, the said Admirall charging the Chancellor, first President, and other Counsellors of the Parliament being there present, in the Kings name, to make a speedy triall of him, vpon his letters written to the King of England, and the Dukes of Bourbon, and Bourgongne. So by iudgement of the Court, giuen by the President Popincourt, he was beheaded at the Greue, the 19. of December, and by an especial grace was buried at the Gray Friars in Paris. A pittifull spectacle, to see so great a personage layd vpon a scaffold, allied to the houses of France, England, Bourgongne, Sauoy, and many other great personages, the chiefe Officer of this crowne, mighty in lands, in treasure and in friends, abandoned of his friends, his goods confiscate, degraded of his offices, and finally to serue as a spectacle to the whole world.

The Constable beheaded.

He was witty, valiant, and of great experience: but in his latter yeares bereaued of the grace of GOD. Let vs apprehend this Oracle: It is a terrible thing to fall into the hands of the liuing God. The pit he had digged for an other, must swallow him vp. He had with all his force laboured to maintayne these two Princes in hatred and mutuall dissension, to substit

A substit in the midst of their partialities: He had often and impudently lied vnto them, and being both very reuengefull, it was impossible to auoide their snares. But who can warrant the Duke of Bourgongne from the law Cornelia? must his cruell couetousnesse force him to giue security to this poore Lord, to thrust him into an vndoubted ruine. Four score thousand crownes in mouables, and three score thousand crownes in ready money which he got by his spoiles, were they valuable to the falsifying of his conscience? God leaues nothing unpunished, and wee shall learne hereafter, that this disloyall act in him was the iust ruine of his house: a house for a hundred yeeres. flourishing in all perfections of felicity, the which hereafter shall runne headlong to a strange Catastrophe: and by the means of a yong and vnexperienced enemy, weake in regard of the Bourguignons great and redoubted power, God resists the high minded and chooseth contemptible things to raise and confound the proud. Let vs with one breath, see the declyning and ouerthrow of this house of Bourgongne.

Charles of Bourgongne breakes his oath with the Constable affecting the title of a King.

The violent ambition of Charles, had (as we haue heard before) armed him with a boyling desire to be a King: but Frederic the third scorned it. From that time he still plotted to get this quality. René (before Earle of Vaudemont, sonne to Ferry of Lorraine, and of Yo-land, daughter to René King of Sicilia & duke of Aniou, & of the only daughter of the Duke of Lorraine, eldest brother to Iohn Earle of Vaudemont, Father to the said Ferry, and now Duke of Lorraine) had defied him before Nuz, greeued with the Bourguignons outrages. C This is a good expedient to purchase this pretended royaltie. Lorraine made him a free passage, to vnite his countries, and moreover by the conquest of this Duchie, he should qualifie himselfe King of Sicilia, and Ierusalem, the hereditary title of this house. This vent of vaine-glory transports Charles into Lorraine: and for pretext of a quarrell, he pretends a great summe of money to be due vnto him by Renés predecessor: for non-paiement whereof (after the taking of many places) hee camps before Nancy, besiegeth it, batters it, but takes it not so soone as he presumed, being valiantly defended beyond his expectation. The King also vnder-hand fauoured this yong Duke, procuring him secretly the alliance of the Suiffes, and the Imperiall townes of Alsatia.

Charles since the siege of Nuz had in pay about a thousand men at armes, Neapolitains D for the most part. The Earle of Campobasso commanded foure hundred, a partizan of the house of Aniou, against that of Arragon: and for this cause being banished his country, had alwaies followed the Duke René of Sicilia, or Nicholas sonne to Iohn Duke of Calabria and Lorraine: after whose death Charles of Bourgongne entertayned many of his seruants: especially this Earle, a wicked man & of a corrupt conscience, who in the beginning of the warre of Lorraine, entered into practise with Duke René (heire apparant to the house of Aniou, after the death of King René his grandfather by the mother) promising to prolong the siege of Nancy, and cause defects in necessary things touching the siege. He might well doe it, hauing more authority in this army then any other capitaine. But behold an other act of notable villany.

E The duke of Bourgongne had giuen him forty thousand ducats before hand, to raise his company. Passing at Lion, to goe into Italie, hee grew familiar with a physitian, named Simon of Pauy, giuing by him the King to vnderstand, that for an hundred thousand crownes in ready money, his company entertained, and a good Earledome, at his returne, he would deliuer him the Duke of Bourgongne, and confirme the same to Saint Pry, who then was Ambassador for the King in Piemont. Being returned, and his troupe lodged in the country of Maile, hee reiterates his offer to the King, to kill the Duke when hee should come to the campe, if hee desired not to haue him brought a prisoner vnto him, assuring himselfe to excute it easily: for (saith he) he is accustomed to visit his army, mounted vpon a Nag, and il accompanied: Or if the King and the Duke should at any time fight a battaile, F he would turne to the King with his company.

Charles makes an vniust pretension vnto Lorraine.

Campobasso a traitor to Charles of Bourgongne.

He offers to kill the Duke.

Lewis discouers his treason to Charles.

Charles strikes Campobasso.

Lewis abhorres the treachery of this wicked wretch, and to shew the duke his franke and royall disposition, hee giues him intelligence thereof by Contay. In the meane time, Campobasso diuerts the Bourguignon all hee can from the warre of Lorraine, and makes the taking of Nancy, prooue more difficult. The duke is so much incensed therewith, as from iniurious words, he proceeds to blowes, and strikes him. A blow which the Earle will reuenge, 1476. reuenge in fit time. He dissembles for the present, and Charles either thinking the Neapolitane had forgotten this outrage, or supposing that his hired souldier had bene bound not to reuenge it, or happily fearing if he lost him, his affaires would receiue some dangerous checke, he entertaines him still in his seruice: yea (euen contrary to the Kings aduice) he loued, or made shew to loue him better, supposing that Lewis his intention, was to set diuision betwixt him and his most trusty seruants. But let vs rather say, that hee which sounds, euen to the deepest thoughts of man, had by a iust iudgement, taken away all apprehension from this prince, not to taste the holesome counsells that were giuen him, with most apparent reasons. This proud presumption, like vnto Nembrosb, made him conceiue a world of Chimeraes, and bring forth a shamefull confusion, as wee shall read hereafter.

The Suisses craue peace of Charles with great submission.

Hee is now puffed vp with the new purchase of Lorraine, by the taking of Nancy, with the possession of Saint Quentin, Han and Bohain, and with the Constables moueables, but he would not make this the limits of his conquests. The Suisses had incensed him, redeeming of the county of Ferrete for Sigismund Archduke of Austria. Moreouer, they had spoiled James of Sauoy Earle of Rhomont, brother to the prince of Orange of many places, lying within their marches. These Noblemen were allied, and partakers to the Duke, and thrust him on to reuenge. On the other side, the King desired to parle with him, after the manner of Picquigny, wishing him to lodge and refresh his troupes, tired both with the siege of Nuz, and the warre of Lorraine, and to grant a peace to this mountaine nation, being poore but yet froward. But Charles prefers the violent passions of his ambition, before the honest and holesome counsell of Lewis, and enters into Suifferland. The Cantons hearing of his approach, intreate for peace: they offer to yeeld vp the place in question, and by a second Ambassage, to renounce all alliances that should dislike him, especially the Kings: to serue him against all men, yea against the King, with fixe thousand men, for what pay hee would giue them, and as often as he would call them. If he did triumph ouer them by an absolute victory, there were no profit to be found, seeing the spurres of his horsemen, and the biss of his horses, were of more value then all their country.

The Suisses arme for their defence.

But he refuseth all accord, no preuention can stop this streame. He marcheth, and after this imaginary conquest of the Cantons; hee passeth the Alpes, and laies hold of Italy, for that Frederic prince of Tarentum, sonne to Ferdinand King of Naples, was lately come to him, with hope to marry his daughter. Moreouer old Rene King of Sicilia and Duke of Aniou, and vncle to the King, seeing his sonne John, and his Grand-child Nicholas were deceased, promised to resigne vnto him his pretensions of Sicilia, to adopt him for his sonne and heire, and soone after, to put into his hands the Earledome of Prouence. But wee shall soone learne the causes that mooued him to this attempt: he gaped, aboue al other things, after the goodly estate of Milan, where he presumed to haue great intelligences. The Ambassadors being returned, the Suisses protest of their submission, and of their desire to pacifie all things, calling God and the world to witnesse: and then they prepare for their defence. Charles for the first fruits of his army, fortified with fiftene thousand men from the Duke of Milan, and fife thousand from the Duchesse of Sauoy (for now heloues strangers better then his owne subiects, and the troubles of his minde, makes him conceiue a hatred and ielousie against them) he takes Lozanna, a mountaine towne, seated vpon the Lake Lemman, with other places in the country of Vaux, causing the garrisons for the most part to be hanged. Then he brings the whole body of his army (being about fiftie thousand men, and fife hundred peeces of Artillerie of all forts) before Gransson, lying neere to the Lake of Yuerdun, which belonged to Rhomont, being defended by seuen or eight hundred Suisses of the Canton of Berne. He batters, makes a breach, and giues an assault, with the losse of a hundred men. But the batterie continuing, the defendants (not able to hold the towne) fire it, and recouer the castle, where hauing many Towers beaten downe, they compound to haue their liues sau'd. An accord treacherously broken, for hee caused foure score to bee hanged (some write fife hundred and twelue) hee drownes two hundred, and puts the rest in prison. A detestable cruelty, and so odious vnto all the citties vpon the Rhine, as they send men to the Duke of Lorraine and the Suisses to their aide.

Gransson taken, and the souldiers cruelly and treacherously flaine.

He

A Hee is nothing amazed therewith; but for the stately entertainment of Ambassadors that came vnto him from diuers countries, namely from Germany and Italy, hee shewes himselfe in his campe with incredible pompe and state: pavilions and rich tents, glistering armes, goodly standards, vessell of good and siluer, of inestimable value, rich apparell, exquisite Tapistry, Jewels, precious stones, and other costly ornaments: to conclude, the goodliest furniture that might beautifie a campe. The Suisses not yet aduertised of the losse of Gransson, send foure or fife thousand men to releue it: but too late. The duke (contrary to the opinion of the best aduised) goes to meete them. They campe at the entry of the mountaines, hold the straites of hard access, and of great aduantage for the foot, and dangerous for the horse, where one man might stay fifty. But he was (as the proverbe saies) mounted to the Pies neast, and God blinding his vnderstanding, prepared an exemplary abatement of his pride. He sends a hundred archers before, to seize on a passage of the mountaines; who discover not an ambush of shot that kept it, the which suffer a part of the foreward to enter, whereas the battaile could not succour them, whom they charge with such resolution and fury, that with this terror the Bourguignons fle, and fall vpon the other part, which was yet in the plaine, which likewise turnes head towards the campe. The battaile and rereward seeing the foreward in route, shrinke presently, and (notwithstanding all the dukes labour to stay them) they saue their liues by flight, ill-informed of the small numbers of their enemies, who pursue them with all fury. Charles himselfe was forced to ioyne with them that fled, abandoning both campe and artillery, to saue their persons, staying in no place vntill he came to Ioine, fiftene or sixtene leagues from Gransson. A haltier flight then the pursute, for want of horses, so as the duke in the midst of so great a terror, lost but seuen men at armes, but very many foote. This happened the second day of March.

The overthrow of Gransson, where Charles lost all his baggage.

A day not so famous for the losse of men, as of spoile, esteemed at three millions, where-with the Suisses (not so cunning in those daies as now) made themselves rich, although they were ignorant of the value of things. For a prooue of their grosse and rude ignorance, the Originall obserues: that they did teare in peeces the goodliest and most sumptuous pavilions in the world, to apparell themselves. That a souldier did sell a siluer dish like vnto pewter, for two pence halfe peny. An other taking vp the case of the dukes great Diamond, whereat did hang a great pearle: the which he viewing, put vp againe, and so cast it into a Cart, comming afterwards to fetch it, he sold it to a Priest for a Florin worth twelue pence: the priest sent it vnto their Lords, who gaue him fixe shillings. They held it to be the goodliest in Christendome. Besides many others, they got threer pearles of inestimable value, the which they called the three bretheren, with two other the most rare stones that could be found.

Esteemed at three millions

To conclude, whatsoeuer the duke had of rich or sumptuous, he caused to bee carried after him in ostentation, to shew his superfluous and fearefull greatnesse vnto strangers. So, the eternall God did signifie vnto Ezechias by Esay: That all the cofers of his drugges, siluer and gold, his sweete perfumes and precious ointment, with all his artillery, yea all that was found in his treasures, all that was in his house, all that his fathers had gathered together vnto that day, should be carried into Babilon: for that he had made a shew to the Ambassadors of Berodac-Baladan the sonne of Baladan King of Babilon.

Presently after this battaile, the Suisses recouer their lost places, take downe their companions and bury them, and hang vp as many Bourguignons with the same halters. The King remained at Lion, attending the successe of the Bourguignons forces, fearing exceedingly, least he should subdue the Cantons. He disposed of the house of Sauoy as his owne: the duke of Milan was his ally: he held Lorraine, and hoped for Prouence, which succeeding, his power extended from the westerne sea, vnto the East: and France had had no issue out, but by the dukes fauor, or by sea: for the preuention whereof, Lewis sent often to the Duchesse of Sauoy his sister in law (being wholly at the dukes deuotion) to René his vncle, being much incensed against him, so as he would scarce heare his messengers, to the princes and comitalties of Germany, who returne him an answer; Say vnto the King, that if he warre not against him, wee will make our peace, and warre our selues against him: This was it hee feared, yet would hee not breake the truce, neither haue Charles discover the messages hee sent.

The Suisses reuenge the cruelty of Charles at Gransson.

Lewis fears the good successe of Charles.

But

1476. But now the Bourguignons shipwracke cheered him, grieuing onely at the small number A that were slaine.

The Duke sees he King shuld breake the
truce.

The duke on his part was toucht with feare, and to preuent it, he sends Contay to the King, charged with humble and gracious speeches, contrary to his custome. He beseecheth his Maiesty to obserue the truce loyally, excuseth himselfe that he did not assist at their enter-view nere vnto Auxerre, and promisseth to be there shortly, or wheresoeuer it should please the King. The King assures him of his demands, neither was it yet time to doe otherwise, but to keepe himselfe in the shade, whilest that Charles chafed. Lewis was well acquainted with the loyalty of the dukes subiects, who would easily crosse him, seeing him oppressed with aduersitie. One mischiefe comes neuer alone: the losse, shame, and despight, to see himselfe vanquished, laies him sicke in his bed. But behold a rougher charge: in prosperity friends come by hundreds, in aduersitie they flie by thousands. Gali as duke of Milan leads the dance; he was allied to Charles by reason of his praetiles in Italy: which being dissolved by this checke, hee sends a cittizen of Milan to the King, hee dissuades him from making a peace with the Bourguignon, and to preuent it, he offers him a hundred thousand Ducats presently. The King detesting the inconstancie of this man, who three weekes before was estranged from him, hunting after the Bourguignons fortunes, with a great and sollemne Ambassage: considering also that their wiues were sisters, and his couetous proceeding: he reiects his money, reprocheth the little loue hee bare to his brother in law, but in the end he accepts of his alliance. Rene King of Sicilia seconds him. Charles had already (vpon the hope which this good old man gaue him) sent the Lord of Chasteauguion into Piedmont, with twenty thousand crownes, to make a leaue of men, to take possession of that Earledome.

Lewis reconciled to the King of Sicilia

But vpon this defeat, he was happy to saue his person, and to loose but his siluer, seized on for the King by Philop of Sauoy Earle of Bresse. Vpon this amazement Lewis sends to his vnckle, desires him to come, and to assure himselfe of good entertainment, else hee would provide by force. Iohn Cosse Seneshall of Prouence, an honest man, and of a good house in the Realme of Naples, perswaded his maister to this voiage, giuing the King to vnderstand, that the treaty of Rene with the Bourguignon (the which he himselfe had procured) tended to no other end, but to let the King know the wrong hee had done his vnckle, hauing taken from him the castles of Barre and Angiers, and intreating him ill in al his other affaires, and that he neuer had any will to performe the accord. A liberty of speech very pleasing vnto Lewis, who from that time respected his vnckle, and they liued like good friends. Then Rene made a transaction with the King, that after his death the Earledome of Prouence should returne to the King, and be incorporate to the crowne.

In doing whereof, the Queene of England, daughter to the said Rene, and widow to Henry the sixth King of England, whom Edward held prisoner, was redeemed by the King, for fiftie thousand crownes. For this cause she yeelded vnto the King all the right shee might pretend to the said county, and for a certaine pension which the King assigned her during her life. The Duchesse of Sauoy sent Montaign secretly, to reconcile her to the King, yet will shee trie the issue of the dukes fortune. The Princes of Germany, and the imperiall townes, who before were enforced to temporise, now shew themselves enemies, and turne from him.

Frederick prince of Tarentum, grieued with the strange dissembings, touching the pretended marriage, leaues him: and soone after, returning into France, he marries a daughter of Sauoy, the Queenes sister: what then shall he flie to his Hollanders and Flemings? But he knowes their inconstancy, and that they fauored not his flight: yet he sends his Chancellor Hugonnet, with twelue commissioners, to require aide of men and money from his subiects, who returne with this resolution. That if the Duke their Lord were prisoner, they would mortgage and sell their liuings, to redeeme him: that to dissuade him from the warre, and draw him home into his countries, they would assist him with all their power. But to continue it, they are not resolu'd to doe any thing. To conclude, euery bird had his peck at this Owle. Euen as when a tempest ouerthrowes some great tree, euery one reares off a branch. He yeelds not yet, but would bee ashamed to confesse himselfe beaten by such a wretched people: and although all these crosse had wonderfully increased his sicknesse, and

A and that heauinesse, melancholy, choller, and other passions, had altered his bloud, with great preiudice to his health: yet he gathers together the peeces of his wracke, and within few moneths goes to field with his army. Hauing staid some space at Lauzanne, he went the ninth of Iune to campe before Morat, a small towne two leagues from Berne, belonging to the Earle of Rhomont, who lead the forward. Anthony bastard of Bourgongne camped vpon the Lake, with thirty thousand foote and horse. The Duke lodged in the mountaine, and Rhomont vpon the descent towards the Lake, with twelue thousand men. The Cantons were sooner in armes at this shooke, then at the other: and if before they gaue him a light defeat, they shall now giue him a generall ouerthrow. In their league B are numbred twenty townes, prelates and commonalties: Zurich, Berne, Lucerne, Vri, Suits, Vnderual, Zug, Glaris, Fribourg, Soleurre, Basill, Chafhouze, Appenzel, Sangall, the Grisons, the Earle of Tocquembourg, the Abbot of Sangall, Valois, la Cassé, Dye: and the ten iurisdiccions of Malny. All these did furnish eleuen thousand pikes, ten thousand halberds, 10000. shot, and 4000. horse: and the King, who made warre against the Bourguignon at an other mans cost, had vnder-hand giuen the Duke of Lorraine meanes to ioyne with sixe hundred men at armes. Moreouer the townes of Rhine, Songoy and Ferrete had sent a supply of three thousand men.

He besieged Morat.

Charles is ouerthrowne.

All these forces being ioyned, the two and twenty of Iune, behold at the first encounter, the foreward is so violently charged, as the Earle of Rhomont is forced to saue himself with C ten or twelue horse. The garrison of Morat falls out, and ioynes with the Duke of Lorraines troupes: they charge the Bourguignons campe, force it, and ouerthrow him with a horrible slaughter of his men. He recouers Befanson by the swiftnesse of his horse; and from thence, Riuere in the county of Bourgongne. In this battaile died about eightene thousand men (others say two and twenty thousand seuen hundred) and of Swisses fifty men only. At this day are seene the spoiles of this battaile, in a chappell built, where the battaile was fought, and filled with the bones of such as were slaine. The Swisses pursuing their victory, take all the places of the county of Rhomont, and along the Lake Lemane, euen vnto Geneua, which are at this day vnder the iurisdiction of Berne, and the bishop of Basill, razed many places and castles vpon the marches of the Franche county. The D Duke of Lorraine, hauing a good share in this notable victory, with his French troupes, and some supplies from the confederates, recouers Vaudemont, Espinal, Nancy and some other places by composition. Now is Charles of Bourgongne exceeding heauy, and for that the house of Sauoy had bene the chiefe motiue of this warre: (whereof the first firebrand had bene for some carts laden with skinnes, taken by Rhomont from a Suisse) and doubting least shee would speedily be reconciled to the King, he sends to take her by force, and brings her to Rouure neere Dijon, with her youngest sonne, since Duke of Sauoy. Philibert the eldest then Duke, was (with the helpe of some seruants of his house) retired to Chamberi. The King, who neuer lets slip any aduantage, and who politickly builds vpon E anothers shipwracke, treats with the Bishop of Geneua, a sonne of Sauoy, a man of a free disposition, and gouerned by a commander of Rhodes, both tractable: who deliuer into his hands the castles of Chamberi, Montmelian, and another place, in the which were all the Duchesse Jewells. She seeing her selfe deprived of liberty, dissembles no longer, but sends Riuicrol a Gentleman of Piedmont, to the King, to mediate her peace, but with all the surety that might bee: knowing well, that it was dangerous to displease him, beseeching his Maiesty to free her. Lewis a better brother then shee had bene a sister, sends to deliuer her, by Charles of Amboise Lord of Chaumont, gouernour of Champagne, who brought her to Plessis by Tours, whether the King was returned: who hauing renounced the alliance of Bourgongne, recovered her children of the King, with the places, Jewells and all things that belonged to her, and then conducted her home at his own charge. But F Charles is he tired? So many disgraces: so many losses of men of war, places, friends and treasure, haue al these so daunted him, as he hath lost al courage? He is now solitary at Riuere, sad, mournfull, grieued, displeased in himselfe, way-ward to his seruants, despised of his subiects, abandoned of his friends, and hatefull to all the world: he seekes neither comfort or counsell of any man, and his great gusterity is the cause that no man dare giue it him. And doubtlesse these encounters were sufficient to make him lay aside armes, and humbly to

Nancy taken by René, and besieged by Charles.

But Nancy must be the place of his funerall, it was wonderfull commodious for his passage to his other Signeuries; but his army being vtterly ouerthrowne, it was not possible to leauy new troupes so speedily, to succour the Lord of Beures, of the house of Croy, who defended it against the Lorraine. Campobasso did diuert him, shewing that the city was but slack-ly besieged, that it was needfull to breath, and to refresh his spirits, tired with the forepassed toiles; and in the meane time, continues his practises with Duke René. Beures pressed him B still for succours, yet could he not arriue vntill the day it was yellected, with such forces as hee could get out of Flanders, Luxembourg, and Bourgongne. He besiegeth it againe before it could be fortified and victualled, and within few daies, brings it to exceeding famine. The Lorraine not yet strong enough, attending such troupes as came to him out of Germany and Suifferland, aduentures a company of souldiers, carrying some victualls. They crosse through the campe, mainteining the skirmish, whilest that such as carried meale entred the towne. Cifron a Gentleman of Prouence, and Steward to the Duke of Lorraine, was taken prisoner amongst others. Charles commands he should be hanged. This gentleman had beene the actor betwixt Campobasso and the duke René. Seeing that he must of necessity C die, he desires Charles to heare him, and that hee would discouer a matter which concerned his person. Charles answers in choller, that they were but shifts, and Campobasso fearing his tongue, doth hasten both the duke and prouost to this execution; for (said he) by the law of armes, euery one that seekes to releue a place after the Canon hath plaied and is taken, deserues death. Cifron makes a new request, and the Duke sends to know what hee would say. He refuseth to reueale it, but to the duke himselfe, and as they returned with this an-swere to the duke, Campobasso remaining at the chamber dore, where the duke was writing with a Secretary, makes them beleue that the dukes pleasure was they should dispatch him:
and so Cifron was hanged. Hee still continues his siege, and neither shame, losses, the season of the yeere, nor his weake army, neither the great succours which he sees comming to the Lorraine, nor the secret aide the King gaue vnto his enemy, neither Alphonfus King of D Portugall, his cousin germaine, who then attended some succours from the King at Paris, against the Castilian, and went expressly to him to mediate a peace, to be the sooner dispatched (for the King excused himselfe, vpon the issue hee feared of this warre of Lorraine) could moue him.

Nancy releu-
ed by Duke
René.

The integrity of the Suiffes
in old time.

Nancy pressed with famine was ready to compound, if Campobasso had not by secret intelligence reuiued their spirits: when as behold the duke of Lorraine comes with an army of foureteene or fiftene thousand men, French, Suiffes, Germaines and Lorraines and lodgeth at Saint Nicholas of Varengeuille. Campobasso not able to doe the Bourguignon a greater dispiight, leaues him, with nine score men at armes with him, and the Lords of Ange & Montfort with six score, & they go to René. A great maiime for the duke, whose troupes E were but bare and weake. Norwithstanding vpon the Suiffes protestation, that they would not fight in the company of a traitor, the duke sends him to Conde a castle vpon the riuier of Moselle, a passage for victualls which came to Charles from the vallie of Luxembourg and Metz. He takes this passage and stops it with trees and carts, to stay the flight of such as should thinke to saue themselves, foreseeing already the Bourguignons ouerthrow, hoping by this means to haue a share of the booty and prisoners, as it happened indeed. But the fowlest and most trecherous act of his tragedy is, that he left men suborned to beginne the flight at the first charge, and others to obserue the duke, & if he fled to kill him. Charles vnder-standing these newes, harkeneth thereto (contrary to his custome) yet he follows not the advice of his counsell. The most experienced counsellled him to retire to Pont a Mousson, F whitch he held yet, & to fortifie himself there, suffering the victual Nancy. They told him that the Germaines loued the ayre of their hot-houses too well: that René would want money, so all would disband, without meanes to ioyne together againe in long time: that their victualling could not be so plentifull, but it would be spent before the middest of winter, & in the meane time he should refresh his army, increase his troupes, and furnish himselfe with all

A all things necessary, seeing that he had money which was the sinew of warre. A wife counsell, but Charles hastened to his ruine. He had in his army, but foure thousand men, whereof not aboute twelue hundred were in case to fight, yet by the aduice of some foolish people he will hazard a third battaile, exposing a handfull of men ill armed, and ill mounted, panting yet with the first and second encounters, against an army fresh, lusty, and glorious with two notable victories. The fifth of Ianuary, vpon twelfth Eue, René puts his army into battaile, nere vnto a lake at Neuf-uille. The Germans and Suiffes diuide themselves into two battallions: the Earle of Abestein and the Gouernours of Zurich and Fribourg lead the one, the Aduoyers of Berne and Lucerne the other: the rest both French and Lorraines, B march vnder their ensignes: one battallion goes towards the riuier, the other takes the highway from Neuf-uille to Nancy.

The battaile
of Nancy.

The duke of Bourgongne attends them swiftly, in a place of strength and aduantage, having before him a little riuier, betwixt two strong hedgrowes nere vnto the hospitall of Magonne, and at the entry of this great hie-way (where one of the battallions marched) Charles had planted the greatest part of his artillery, which thunders vpon the Suiffes at their first approch, but with final hurt, being farre off. This battallion leaues the hie-way, and mountes vp towards the wood, coasting along the dukes army. The duke makes his archers to turne head, appointing two wings of men at armes, the one led by James Galiot a Neapolitaine, an honest man and a valiant captaine, the other by the Lord of Lalain lieutenant of Flan-C ders. This battallion hauing gotten the aduantage on the higher ground, stands firme: then like vnto a violent streame it fals vpon the Bourguignons army, and with a thundring volle of shot defeats the foote. At the same instant the other battallion chargeth Galiot's squadron, who behaued himselfe like a wise & valiant captaine; but the horse seeing the foote men amazed, leaue all & flie after. The other wing commanded by Lalain maintaines the fight, but vnable to withstand the violent shocke of the Suiffes, in the end they giue way, and turne towards the bridge of Bridores, where was the greatest shew of their men that fled.
This bridge is halfe a league from Nancy towards Thionuille and Luxembourg. Campobasso had stoppt the passage, so as all such as tooke that course, were either slaine, drowned, or taken: if any recovered the woods, the peasants beate them downe with leuers. A chase D which continued from noone vntill two houres within night. Charles thinking to saue himselfe, was ouerthrowne by a troupe of men that followed him; discovered by them, whitch the traitor Campobasso had left to obserue him.

Charles ouer-come and slaine.

The next day he was found among the dead, lying frozen in a ditch, well knowne by many of his household seruants. He had three wounds, one with a halbard aboute the eare, whitch cut him to the teeth, the second with a pike through both the thighes, the third by the fondement. René caused him to be honourably buried in Saint Georges Church at Nancy. In this battaile there died three thousand Bourguignons, and there were taken, the Earle of Nassau, the Marquis of Rothelin, an English Earle, Anthony and Bildouin brethren, bastards to the duke (whose ransomes the King did pay) and many gentlemen. The booty was E small: but the victory of Granffon was yet fresh, and as they then did sing: hee lost his goods at Granffon, his men at Morat, and his life at Nancy. Behold this great Nembroth who made himselfe equall with Emperours, and yielded not to the greatest Kings: before time the terror of Christendome, feared by his subiects, sought to by his neighbours: who had purchased to himselfe the surname of terrible, and warrior, dronke with ambition, tran-spored with the desire of an others estate, now confounded with his owne greatnesse, who with his fall ruines his house. Doubtlesse, the daies of mortall man are like to grasse, hee fades like the flower of the field: for the winde passing ouer it, it is no more seene, nor the place therof knowne. Shame and destruction follow pride at the heeles. And who doth iudge by the effects, that the chiefe causes of his ruine were couetousnesse, pride, and crueltie
F by the effects, that the chiefe causes of his ruine were couetousnesse, pride, and crueltie couetousnesse, in that contrary to his honour and faith, hee had deliuered the Constable, for the greedie desire hee had to enioy Saint Quentin, Han and Bohain; and some moouables: Pride, in that God hauing raised him to greater dignitie then any of his predecessors, accompanied with many goodly and singular graces, yet hee thought that the owne iudgment. Cruelty, for that in the warre of Liege, he had bathed himselfe in the bloud of his poore subiects, glutting his wrath with that sex and age, whom the rigour of warre doth vsually pardon.

And what shall we say of the right hands he caused to be cut off, of those poore souldiars at Nefle? Of the fires wherewith he hath wasted so much country? Of the Suiffes hanged at Gransson, after they had yielded vpon his faith giuen to the contrary, and of late had hanged a gentleman being taking in the warre. He had good parts, valiant, painfull, vigilant, desirous to entertaine men of merit, liberall, but with discretion, to the end that many might taste of his bounty. He gaue aduice priuately, honoured strangers, and receiued Ambassadors, with State. But since the battaile of Montlehery, presuming by his onely valour to haue forced a mighty King, to leaue him the field, he conceiued so ouerweening a presumption of himselfe, as neuer after would he beleue any other counsell but his owne: attributing the issue of his enterprises to his owne iudgement and industry, with so obstinate constancy in his vnmearured designs, as in the end it was his confusion. So the voice of the Eternall breakes downe the Cedars: yea the Eternall beates downe the Cedars of Libanus. But let vs note the iudgement of God, that before Nancy he deliuered the Constable, and before Nancy he was betrayed by Campobasso. And let vs obserue the like in our daies, as we shall see hereafter. Eleuen daies before this battaile, Galeas duke of Milan was murdered in a Church by Andrew of Lampogagno, a Milanois, who leauing a sonne very yong, left withall many discordes for the gouernment of the Duchie, amongst many Noblemen, one among them called Robert of Saint Seuerin, nere kinsman to the Duke, banished from his house by the stronger faction, retired himselfe into France, hoping to perswade the King to attempt something against the state of Milan. Lewis taught by former experience, that the French haue alwaies lost easily and with shame that which they had gotten with much paine and sweate in Italy, would not harken vnto it, no nor suffer any succors passe for the reliefe of the Florentines, being ancient friends and allies to the French, against whom Pope Sixtus and Ferdinand King of Naples made warre. But for that he would not seeme utterly to abandon them, he sent the Lord of Argenton vnto them, with some troupes leui- ed in the State of Milan, as we shall shortly see.

But what doth Francis Duke of Britan, hauing lost one of the chiefe supporters of his building? He sees, that of three of the strongest heads of the common-weale, two are cut off, Charles Duke of Guienne and Charles Duke of Bourgongne, and he knows full well, that the King will not leaue this outrage vreuenged vpon such as remaine. The treaty made at the Abbay of Victory had bene confirmed by the Estates of Britany. Lewis had by his Deputies renounced all pretension to this Duchy: but hee forgets nothing, though he sleepes. Hee is now freed from his most mortall enemy: by all probability, he should hereafter employ his forces in Britan: he must therefore warrant himselfe with some fauorable support, and must seeke protection from the English.

This negotiation required much secrecy and silence, for Lewis was exceeding iealous, and discouered cunningly such practises. So as the subtilt were surprised in their owne subtilities. Peter Landays Treasurer of Britan, was the man best acquainted with the dukes most secret intelligences, and vnder him, William Guiguen. For the dispatches for England, he vsed one Maurice Bromel, who for three yeeres space was the messenger to carry letters betwixt the duke of Britan and the King of England. It chanced that Bromel passing at some port, discouered himselfe to a seruant of the Kings, who presently aduertised his maiesty. Lewis did cunningly make his profit of these aduentures. Yet must he not rashly apprehend the companion, thinking it best to discouer more. The King, to winne this messenger, cunningly imployes a certaine man of Cherebourg in Normandie, who could counterfeit the Dukes hand, the King of Englands, and their Secretaries; This Agent for the King, treats with Bromel, and for a hundred crownes for euery letter coming from either part, gets a promise of him, and a place appointed to deliuer the letter and to receiue his money. The Agent made copies, counterfeited their hands, and sealing them vp with a seale either counterfeited, or stolne by Bromel, he sent the copies into England, and brought the King the originalls. In the end, two and twenty letters, what of the Duke and Edwards, fell into the Kings hands, without discouery.

And

A And although the duke sought to the English more to defend him at neede, then to offend, yet would he maintaine himselfe in the Kings good fauour. For this effect, one day among others, he sent Chauvin his Chancellor, the Seneshall of Vannes and others of his counsell, to giue Lewis to vnderstand the deuotion he had to his seruice. At that time the King pursued his conquests vpon the heire of Bourgongne, being ready to besiege Arras, as we shal presently shew. Being arriued, they are al committed prisoners, and sequestred vnder diuers gards. After two daies, the King sends for the Chancellor, reprocheth him, that hauing often conferred with him of the affaires of Britan, holding him for an honest man, he findes it strange, that he had alwaies so constantly assured him, that his maister had no secret intelligence with the King of England, seeing that now the contrary was manifest. B The Chancellor continues in this protestation, and for more assurance engageth his life; but twelue letters written by Guiguen and signed by the duke, and ten others by Edward, made him hang downe his head, and to confesse himselfe faulty. But for his owne particular, he protests of his innocency, and in case that he or his companions deputies, be found to haue bene acquainted with this intelligence, he will loofe his life. The King is satisfied herewith, he returns them backe without any farther audience, and giues them the originalls, for a prooffe against the duke. He iustly complains, that making shew to fauor him, he doth notwithstanding practise with the most ancient enemy of the crowne. That if hee do not renounce all intelligence with the King of England, he will not take him for his friend. Chauvin being returned, makes his report, deliuers the Kings commandement, his answers, his countenance in speaking, the accents of his words, and the consequences that might ensue. He beseecheth the duke to retire himselfe in priuate, and then to verifie his sayings, he laies vpon the table the two and twenty letters.

The duke amazed to see that plainly discouered, which hee thought to haue bene knowne but to two, sends for Landays and commands him vpon his life to tell him, by what means they might fall into the Kings hands; the which must needs proceed from one of the two. Landays knowes the hands and seales, but cannot conceiue the residue; and all amazed he offers himselfe to prison, and to loofe his life, if he be any way found guilty. Then he remembers, that only Bromel had alwaies carried and re-carried these letters: they must finde out him (being then imploied in that action) and make him vnfold that doubt. He therefore sends after him in post, and takes him at Port-blanc, where he attended a winde to imbarke, and was brought to Nantes. His confession did absolue Landays; and he was cast into the riuer, in a sacke very secretly, least the King should be aduertised thereof, who sufficiently informed of the dukes ill minde, turned his armes into Britan. But the warre against Mary of Bourgongne troubled him sufficiently: yet to proceed with some lawfull pretext, he would fortifie himselfe with a grant he obtained from the Lord of Boufflac, and of Nichole of Britan his wife, the onely heire of Charles of Britan, Earle of Ponthieure: a house which in old time did quarrell for the succession of this Duchy, by the which transaction, in the yeere 1479. the 19. of January, they yielded vnto him all the rights they might pretend to the said Duchy. But it is now incorporate to the crowne, by a iuster title then by armes.

By what meanes, Abbeuille, Dourlans, Montreuil, Roye, Montdidier, Peronne, Han, Bobain, Saint Quentin, Tournai, Arras, Hedin, Boliobongue, Terouenne, Douay, and other plates were reduced to the Kings obedience; and Bourgongne united to the Crowne.

He first intelligence the King receiued of the ouerthrow of Charles of Bourgongne, gaue no assurance of his death; for by means of the posts he had newly established, he had speedy aduice. Thereupon he resolues to enter Bourgongne with the army he held in Champagne and Barrois attending the Duke, and vpon this sodaine terrour to seize vpon the country.

country. And he imagined to haue both right and meanes to doe it: right, for his rebellion and treachery committed against the crowne; meanes, for that the flower of all the Nobilitie of Bourgongne was lost; and all his forces disperfed. If happely the Duke liued, this would be his ruine. It was also to keepe the Germanes and Suiffes from the possession thereof, and to saue the prouince from ruine, loth to suffer a stranger to seize thereon, seeing it holds in foueraignty of him.

In the meane time hee giues away, (in case the Duke bee dead) some lands which the Duke possessed, and sends the Admirall with the Lord of Argenton, with authority to open all pacquets vpon the way, and if the duke were dead to receiue into his obedience, all such as would yeeld themselues. Vpon the first day of their journey they had certaine aduice by a messenger which the Lord of Craon sent to the King. Abbeuille made the way to the rest. The Admirall, and Argenton had sent a man before, to treat with the souldiers; who attending the comming of these noble men, there came forth to the number of foure hundred Lances. Beeing come forth, the people open the gates to the Lord of Torcy: and they spare the King those crownes and pensions, which the Admirall by vertue of his warrant had promised the capitaine. This was one of the townes which Charles the seuenth, had deliuered by the treaty of Arras: the which should (for want of heires males) returne to the crowne.

Dourlans follows. They summon Arras, the King, pretending this towne to bee his by confiscation, for not performance of duties, and in case of refusal, they threaten force. The Lords of Rauastain and Cordes make answer to John of Vacquery (afterwards chiefe president of the parliament at Paris;) that the county of Arthois appertained to Mary of Bourgongne, and came to her directly from Marguerite Countesse of Flanders, Arthois, Bourgongne, Neuers, and Rhétel, married to Philip the first, Duke of Bourgongne, sonne to King John, and yonger brother to King Charles the fifth, beseeching him to mainteine the true made with Dukes Charles deceased. So they returne without doing any thing, but onely wonne some men, that soone after serued the King well: who (resolving to reduce such places by force, as should disobey his command) goes into Picardy. In this voiage, hee causeth his Court of parliament at Paris to come to Noyon, with the masters of requests, and some princes of the bloud, to resolve vpon the proccesse of James of Armagnac Duke of Nemours, and Earle of Marche, prisoner in the Bastill at Paris, and taken in the yeere 75. at Carlat, by Peter of Bourbon Earle of Beauieu, at what time the dukes wife died, partly for grieffe, and partly by child-birth. Shee was daughter to Charles of Aniou, Earle of Maine. By which Court (beeing found guilty of high treason) hee was condemned by a sentence pronounced by John Boulenger the first president, to loose his head vpon a scaffold at the Halles at Paris, on Munday the third of August: and was by the like grace buried at the Gray-Friars, as the Constable had bene. Hee was one of the chiefe of the warre for the common-weale, whom the King laboured to bring to his end all hee could. Lewis is exceeding glad, to haue surmounted his most malicious aduersaries: the Duke of Guenne his brother, the Earle of Armagnac, the Constable, the Duke of Nemours. All the house of Aniou was dead, René King of Sicilia, John and Nicholas Dukes of Calabria, and their cousin the Earle of Maine, afterwards Earle of Prouence, whose successions hee had gotten.

But the more the house of Bourgongne exceeded all the rest in greatnesse and power, hauing with the helpe of the English, continually shaken the estate of this realme, for the space of thirty two yeeres vnder Charles the seuenth, & their subiects being alwaies ready to trouble this crowne by warres: so much the more pleasing was the death of their last Duke vnto him, knowing well, that beeing now freed of his greatest incoimber, hee should hereafter finde greater ease. Yet he erred in his proceeding, not taking for good a course, as hee had fore-cast, in the life of Charles of Bourgongne, in case hee should die; for allying himselfe by the marriage of the Daulphin, his sonne, with the heire of Bourgongne, or at the least with some of his princes (for that there was a difference of age betwixt them) hee had easily drawne vnto him the subiects of these large and rich Seignories, and had preferred them from many troubles, the which haue afflicted both them and vs by the same meanes: and freeing them from warre, he had greatly fortified his realme, recovering with

A small toyle, that which he pretended to bee his. The which he might easily effect, for the Bourguignons were very humble, without support and without forces, nor able to make above fiftene hundred horse and foote, which were preferred at this generall ouerthrowe.

But these are humane discourses, wherein he had done better, then thus resolutely to haue fought the ouerthrow of that house, and by the ruine thereof, to purchase to himself friends, in Germanie or elsewhere, as he pretended, but without effect. Presently vpon his arriual, Han and Bohain yeelded. Saint Quentin takes it selfe, and calles in the Lord of Mouy. William Bische, (borne at Molins in Niuernois, a man of base qualitie, but enriched and raised to great authoritie by Duke Charles,) Gouvernor of Peronne, yeelds the place, and the Lord of Cordes inclines to the French partie: They failed of their enterprize at Gand, but it succeeded at Tournay. The King had sent Master Oliuer le Dain his Surgeon, borne in a village neere vnto Gand, not onely to carrie letters of credit to Marie of Bourgongne, (who then was in the possession of the Gantois, that suffered no man to speake vnto her, but in the presence of witnesses) perswading her to yeeld vnto the Kings protection, seeing that both by father and mother, she was issued from the bloud of France: (beeing well assured that hee should hardly obtaine her) whilest that he provided her a husband fit for her qualitie, as also to worke some alteration in the Cittie, they beeing discontented with the Priuiledges which Philip and Charles had taken from them, and the rigorous exactions they had made. Oliuer hauing stayed some daies at Gand, is called to the Towne-house to deliuer his charge. Hee deliuers his letter to the Infanta, assisted by the Duke of Cleues, the bishop of Leege, and other great personages. Shee reads it, and they call him to deliuer his message. He answers, that he hath no charge but to speake to her in priuate. They reply: It was not the custome, especially to a young Gentlewoman that was to marrie: Hee insists, that he will deliuer no thing but to her selfe: they threaten him with force: he is amazed, and going from the Council, (considering the qualitie of the person) they do him some disgraces, and if hee had not speedily escaped, he had bene in danger to haue had the riuier for his graue. Doubtlesse it is a great hazard, when matters of importance are managed by men of meane estate, and the people thinke themselues contemned, if they be treated with all by men of base qualitie. This barber knew something for to preuent this inconuenience, he tearmed himselfe Earle of Meulan, (others write of Melun) whereof he was Capitaine. But Lewis reposed great trust vpon the frontiers of Hainault and Flanders, a strong and a goodly towne, but free, and at that time a neuter, seated fitly to keepe those two Prouinces in subiection. Oliuer was there some dayes without respect, during the which he corrupted thirtie or fortie men, and fraught with their promises, he sent secretly to the Lord of Mouy, that at the breake of a certain day appointed, he with his companie and some other troupes, would be in the suburbs. Hee comes at the appointed time, and master Oliuer with his men giues him entrance, to the content of the people, but not of the Gouvernors, of the which he sent seauen or eight to Paris, who departed not whilest that Lewis liued.

To speake truly, Oliuer shewed both wit and valour in this stratagemie, and for the action of Gand, he is not so much to be blamed, as he that employed him. Conde, a small towne betwixt Tournay and Valenciennes, cut off all victuals from the French, and hindred the victualling of Tournay. It was taken and burnt, for that it did but employ men which might serue else-where, and Tournay was sufficient to keepe the Countrie in obedience. It seemed that the prosperitie of the Kings affaires and his great desseins began to trouble his spirits: for prooffe whereof, a Gentleman of Hainault (the Originall doth not name him) associated with many others, offers to deliuer vp the principall Townes and places of the Countie. Hee talks with the King, who likes not of him, nor of the rest hee named. The reason is, they would sell a good peece of seruice very deare. Yet hee referred them to the Lord of Lude, bredde vp from his youth with him. But Lude seasoned with the same humour, transported with his priuate profit, demands at the first, what the townes would giue him to manage their affaires: So as the Hannuyer (who would haue no competitor in his gaine) departed without effecting of any thing, & the enterprize proued vaine. Without doubt God would not glut vs with felicitie, and it is needfull to haue some crosses, to make Moreouer, it was not reasonable to vsurpe any thing vpon this Countie of Hainault, for that it holds of the Empire, and in regard of the auncient alliances betwixt the Emperours and our Kings, whereby they ought not one to take from another. And for prooffe, Cambray, Quefnoy le Conte, and some other places of Hainault, had willingly put themselves vnder the protection of Lewis, the which he deliuered as freely, with the forty thousand Crownes that they of Cambray had lent him, for the charges of the warre.

Ambassage
from Mary of Bourgongne.

Whilst the King was resident at Peronne, an Ambassage comes to him from the Infant of Bourgongne, consisting of the principall men about her: as namely, the Chancellor Hugonnet, a very wise man, and honourable; Himbercourt, a Gentleman experienced in matters of weight; Vere, a great Nobleman of Zeland; Cripture (otherwise called Grutuse, or Grutere) with other Ecclesiasticall and secular men. They intreate the King to retire his armie, and that all controuersies might be quietly ended, according vnto right and reason. They shew, that by the customes of France, and the ordonances of his Predecessors Kings, the women did succeed in the Counties of Flanders, Arthois and other Prouinces thereabouts. That remaining but one onely daughter of the deceased Duke of Bourgongne, young, and an Orphelin, he should rather protect, then oppresse her. That the marriage of the Dauphin with her, should be more proportionable, then with the daughter of England. And for the more credit, they brought a letter, written part of it by Mary the Infanta of Bourgongne, and some part by the Douager her mother-in-law, Sister to Edward King of England, and some part by Rauestein brother to the Duke of Cleues, and neere Kinsman to the young Ladie, yet none of any credit but that of the Infanta. This letter gaue authoritie to Hugonnet and Himbercourt, and said moreouer: That Mary Duchesse of Bourgongne, was resolved to gouerne her affaires by the aduice of foure persons, the Douager, Rauestein, Hugonnet, and Himbercourt. Mary beseecheth the King, that whatsoever it should please him to negotiate with her, should passe by their hands, and that he should not impart it to any other. The King (fore-seeing that by the confusion of this people he should settle his affairs) meanes cunningly to make his profit of this letter, but not thinking it should cost two so vertuous heads, in sowing diuision betwixt the Duchesse and her subiects. Yet before hee giues audience to these Ambassadors, he treats priuately with either of them, Hugonnet and Himbercourt, (whereof the first had all his liuing in Picardie, and the other in Bourgongne,) and they desirous to be continued in their auncient authorities, giue care to the Kings of-fers: they promised to serue him, so as the foresaid marriage might take effect.
